of the republic, was the author of this meaſure, without powers from the ſenate. Finding himſelf too weak to keep poſſeſſion, he called in the aſſiſtance of Strozzi, a Florentine refugee, who ſoon arrived with a ſtrong body of ſoldiers, and erected the ſtandard of France in the city. Maran belonged to Ferdinand, and the ſenate doubted not but he would attribute this violence offered to his dominions to their ſecret inſtructions. The emperor would of conſequence be offended; and yet as the French ſtandard was erected, and the city kept in his name, they were greatly embarraſſed. To reſtore the city might involve them in a quarrel with Francis, ſince they were ignorant of his ſecret motives for acting in this manner; and to remain indifferent ſpectators, would as ſurely diſoblige the emperor and Ferdinand: but their greateſt fears aroſe from the ſuſpicions that Maran might be delivered g to Solyman, as Strozzi threatened, unleſs he was ſpeedily relieved, for he was cloſely beſieged

Diſputes concerning the city of Maran.

a by the imperial forces. As the diſtance of this city from Venice did not exceed twenty-five miles, they greatly dreaded the near neighbourhood of the Turks [d].

To diſengage the republic from her preſent diſagreeable circumſtances; the ſenate publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding, under pain of death, any of the ſubjects of the ſtate to aid, abet, or any ways aſſiſt, by men, money, proviſions, or arms, the city of Maran. They took into cuſtody the wife and children of Sacchia, that ſuch a pledge might be a check upon his conduct. Theſe meaſures they hoped would appeaſe Ferdinand: however, that Sacchia and Strozzi might not be rendered deſperate enough to put the city into Solyman's hands, the ſenate ſecretly tampered with them, promiſing that all things ſhould ſoon be accommodated to their ſatisfaction. In the mean time the biſhop of Trente arrived at b Venice, in quality of Ferdinand's ambaſſador, to ſolicit a fleet for the reduction of Maran. The ſenate expreſſed their wiſhes he might recover a city ſo unjuſtly ſnatched from him, but declined offering the fleet, under pretence that matters might better be accommodated by negociations. Accordingly a treaty was ſet on foot; but difficulties ariſing, it was ſpun out to ſo great length, that Strozzi declared unleſs things were brought to a ſpeedy iſſue, he would ſurrender the city to the Turks. Nor was this the only buſineſs of the congreſs which ſat at Trente, for they endeavoured to adjuſt certain differences between Ferdinand and the republic of an old ſtanding, relative to the cities Belgrade and Caſtlenuovo, mortgaged by the houſe of Auſtria to the elector of Saxony, and by him made over to the Venetians. Although the emperor acted the part of mediator in this diſpute, the congreſs broke up with-c out coming to an agreement, which determined both the emperor and France to decide the affair of Maran by the ſword. About five thouſand French horſe and foot were ſent to the relief of Strozzi; and, on the other hand, an imperial army was forming to reinforce the beſiegers. The Venetians granted a free paſſage to the troops of both ſides, by that means the ſtronger to evince their neutrality: they were, however, diſpleaſed that a ſmall ſquadron, equipped at Trieſte, ſhould enter the harbour of Digrana, which belonged to the republic, and thence block up Maran.

STROZZI, who was now reduced to great difficulties, ſent a meſſage to the ſenate, deſiring their acceptance of the city Maran, and ſpeedy compliance with his requeſt; to prevent the neceſſity he ſhould be under of entering upon terms with ſome other
d ſtate. Francis, in recompence of his ſervices, had aſſigned him his right to the place, with liberty to diſpoſe of it to the beſt advantage: but he excepted reſtoring it to Ferdinand; nor would that anſwer the purpoſes of Strozzi, who wanted a large ſum of money, which Ferdinand would neither be willing nor able to advance. Perplexed with this propoſal, the ſenate at length determined to embrace it, fearing above all things the city ſhould fall into the hands of Solyman. Two commiſſioners were accordingly appointed to ſettle the conditions with Strozzi's deputy [e]. Theſe were ſoon concluded, upon the republic conſenting to give him thirty thouſand ducats as an equivalent. Aleſſandro Bendimiero was choſen proveditor of the city, and ſent with a body of troops to take poſſeſſion.

Siege of Maran.

The Venetians purchaſe Maran.

His moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſent the cardinal of Ferrara to Venice, to ſolicit his cauſe with e the ſenate; he relied much on the addreſs of this venerable prelate, ſilvered over with experience and wiſdom. The cardinal was received with thoſe marks of reſpect, which were due both to his own character, and the quality of his employer: he artfully put the moſt favourable conſtructions on the conduct and policy of Francis, while he threw a veil over every inſtance of the emperor's affection for the republic: he had now an opportunity, and was at no loſs for arguments, to prejudice the ſenate againſt the alliance between England and the emperor: he recollected every inſtance through the depths of hiſtory, to depreciate the characters of the emperors, and to leſſen their inclinations towards Venice, beginning with Otho, and tracing down their politics to Charles: he enlarged on the cunning, injuſtice, and even impiety of engaging a chriſtian ſtate in war with ſo powerful a monarch
f as Solyman: he even reminded them of the deteſtable treaty in which Maximilian had engaged France and other powers, for ſharing the ſpoils of the republic; neither did he forget the late inſtance of Doria's double conduct, which had nearly been attended with fatal conſequences [f].

Such repreſentations as theſe could not fail of favouring the views of Francis; eſpecially in a ſenate already diſpoſed to live upon the moſt friendly terms with Solyman. However, all his arguments were countermined by others no leſs artful on the ſide of the emperor; yet the cardinal Ferrara found means to engage the pope and conſiſtory to throw in all their influence. In conſequence, upon his return to Rome, he procured Cavalcanti, who was baniſhed Florence, to be ſent to acquaint the ſenate of the pontiff's partiality in favour of the g French monarch. Cavalcanti was a man of letters, an orator, polite, affable, and converſant in buſineſs. His eloquence was of the perſuaſive kind, irreſiſtibly engaging, as he had the art of concealing his real deſigns: yet all he could obtain of the inflexibly prudent ſenate, amounted to no more than a ſincere deſire, that a reconciliation between his imperial majeſty and Francis might be effected. Even in this particular they reſolved upon moderation, leſt their zeal might be miſinterpreted at Conſtantinople. a

BARBAROSSA was at this time ravaging the coaſts of Italy with a fleet of near two hundred ſail, well provided with proviſions and ammunition. On his arrival at Reggio, the capital of Calabria, he found the city abandoned, but the citadel defended by a Spaniſh garriſon. This he attacked and took, giving their liberty to the priſoners, at the inſtance of Polin, the French envoy, who accompanied the infidel. The terror of the Turkiſh arms had ſpread itſelf all over Italy, nor was Rome itſelf free from apprehenſions. But Polin ſent aſſurances, and diſperſed proclamations round the country, that his incurſions ſhould be confined wholly to the imperial dominions [g]. b

BARBAROSSA, having watered at Oſtia, coaſted along Tuſcany and Genoa without touching, until he arrived at Marſeilles, where he was magnificently entertained. Thence he Nice beſieged. proceeded, with the count d'Enguine, who commanded the French fleet, to lay ſiege to Nice. He began with attacking the town, which Andrea Montford, a Savoyard, defended with abundance of courage. The batteries had effected a breach, and Montford ſuſtained an aſſault, before he made any propoſals to capitulate: at laſt he took occaſion, while the articles of ſurrender were preparing, to retire with the garriſon and moſt valuable effects into the citadel. Without loſs of time, the enemy made their approaches; but this fortreſs, ſtrong by art and nature, foiled all the attempts of Barbaroſſa and the French commander. c Siege raiſed. In want of powder, and other neceſſaries, they were at length forced to raiſe the ſiege, and reimbark the troops. Barbaroſſa paſſed the winter with his fleet in the ports of Toulon and Marſeilles; and the next year, after ravaging a ſecond time the coaſts of Italy, he returned to Conſtantinople, where he died towards the cloſe of the year one thouſand five hundred and forty-four [h].

THIS event, and the ſeparation of the Turkiſh and French fleets, would facilitate, it was imagined, a peace between their Imperial and Chriſtian majeſties. At length it was concluded, under the auſpices of the French queen, by means of Don Gabriel de Guzman and her confeſſor. The Venetians were included in this treaty, as the ſenate conducted itſelf with ſo ſtrict a neutrality, that neither party had cauſe of complaint. A treaty was likewiſe d ſet on foot between the emperor, Ferdinand, and Solyman; and for this purpoſe ambaſſadors were ſent by thoſe princes to Conſtantinople. An end was likewiſe put to the diſputes between Ferdinand and the republic; both parties agreeing to ſettle differences reſpecting the decree of Trent by commiſſioners, and to refer the late diſputes about Maran to the emperor, which he decided by ordering the ſenate to pay Ferdinand ſeventy-five thouſand ducats as an equivalent.

BUT while the peace between the Porte and the emperor was in agitation, ſome enemies to the Venetians inſinuated to Solyman that the republic had given Ferdinand the above ſum, as a ſubſidy ſtipulated by treaty for levying forces againſt the infidels: but the Venetian envoy had no ſooner notice of thoſe calumnies than he went to Solyman, and candidly laid open e the whole tranſaction, with which the Turk was perfectly ſatisfied: however, he received inſtructions from the ſenate, that he ſhould, to avoid ſuſpicions, decline viſiting the miniſters of the emperor and Ferdinand; yet, through their mediation, a truce for one year was concluded between the Porte and the Chriſtian powers.

AN event of greater importance fell out towards the end of the year 1545. It was a controverſy with the Porte concerning ſome diſtricts in Dalmatia, which both ſides claimed. The ſangiachs of Boſnia and Cliſſa inſiſted that a part of the territory of Zara, containing forty-nine villages, was really a dependency on the fortreſſes of Nadin and Laurena, belonging to Solyman. On this account they prohibited the inhabitants of this diſtrict, under the ſevereſt penalties, to acknowledge the ſovereignty of the republic, or of any other power f but the Othoman. The ſenate was greatly vexed at this proceeding: the diſtrict was in itſelf valuable in reſpect to the ſafety and convenience of Zara; beſides, giving up their right would be a precedent for farther encroachments. They knew that Nadin and Laurena had no appendages, and that nothing could be more inſolent than the claim of the Turkiſh governors; but determining, if poſſible, to avoid compulſive means, they had recourſe to the juſtice of Solyman. Nor had they reaſon to repent of this meaſure: with a moderation and integrity becoming a Chriſtian prince, this great man ordered commiſſioners on both ſides to be appointed, inſiſting upon their determining the diſpute according to equity, without regard to power. The commiſſioners met, and ſoon adjudged the lands in diſpute to the Venetians, with which Solyman was perfectly ſatisfied [i], g a Soon after this transaction Lando died, by which Venice was deprived of a prudent, moderate, and pacific prince, whose views centered in promoting the happiness, tranquility, and commerce of the republic. He was succeeded in his dignity by Francisco Donato, whose administration commenced with apprehensions that the tranquility of Italy would again be soon disturbed. The peace between the emperor and France was too ill founded to be lasting, and now an additional reason for pursuing their inveterate animosity occurred. As the premature death of the duke of Orleans raised disputes concerning the dutchy of Milan, so Francis kept possession of the dominions he had seized from the duke of Savoy: by this he hoped to oblige the emperor to reasonable terms relative to the Milanese. Besides this, other clouds obscured the serenity of Italy, and threatened a storm no less violent than what b this unhappy country had lately sustained. His holiness, finding all his endeavours for the aggrandizement of his family terminated in nothing, resolved at one stroke to raise his son Pietro Lodovico to a principality; for this purpose he dismembered from the holy see the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, annexed by Julius the second to the church patrimony, and erected them into a principality for Lodovico. The emperor refused to invest him in the right of those dutchies, as they had formerly belonged to the Milanese. This controversy running high, his holiness applied to the Venetians for assistance, soliciting them to enter into a league with him for the security of Italy. The senate offered their mediation; and thus, with the domestic commotions in which both the emperor and French king were engaged at that time, broke those clouds in which was suspended the fate of Italy [k].

FRANCISCO DONATO, Doge LXXIX.

His holiness, perceiving the emperor deeply involved in disputes with the protestant c states of the empire, resolved to proceed in another manner: he foresaw that those controversies would terminate in an open rupture, and, therefore, thought the best method of procuring the investiture of Parma and Placentia for his son, would be liberally to aid his imperial majesty in suppressing heresy. Political, not spiritual, reasons moved him against the protestants: and while he seemed to act as the head of the church, he was in fact playing the part of father to his own family. No sooner were the Venetians acquainted with his intentions, than they laboured to divert them. The discerning senate foresaw the ruin of Italy in making the emperor too powerful, by the oppression of the protestant interest in Germany; but their endeavours were ineffectual; the pope was blinded with ambition, and they were forced not only to consent, but in some measure to assist his intentions d of succouring the emperor, by allowing a free passage to his troops. The protestant princes sent an ambassy to Venice, to request that a passage might be denied the pope's forces: they represented the consequences to Europe in general of permitting the house of Austria to attain such a pitch of grandeur, by overthrowing the liberties of the empire. Their ambassadors were well received, but they could obtain nothing, the senate dreading the resentment of his holiness and the emperor [l]. Soon after another ambassy arrived from the duke of Saxony and landgrave of Hesse, to procure the loan of a sum of money; but they also were dismissed with smooth answers and obliging denials.

Although the senate could not deny the pope's troops a passage through their dominions, nor prevail on his holiness to lay aside his intentions, they expressed their uneasiness e at seeing Italy filled with military preparations in the midst of profound peace. To dispel their apprehensions, the pontiff laid open to the Venetian envoy the whole scheme of his politics and designs, with which the senate was quieted and their fears calmed. In this manner did the Venetians conduct themselves, enjoying peace amidst the tumults of war in Germany, Italy, and France, to the close of the year 1552, when the doge died, in the seventh year of his administration. He was pious, munificent, and just, and of a disposition exactly suited to the particular circumstances of the state during his government.

MARCO ANTONIO TREVISIANO, Doge LXXX.

Marco Antonio Trevisiano, doge LXXX.

In his room was substituted Marco Antonio Trevisiano, who preserved the republic in the f same pacific measures, during his short administration. He balanced between the contending powers with no less caution and delicacy than the two preceding doges had done, until the end of the year 1553, when he expired, with the reputation of a sound politician [m].

FRANCISCO VENIERI, Doge LXXXI.

Francisco Venieri, doge LXXXI.

In his place was substituted, by the unanimous voice of the public, Francisco Venieri, at that time sixty-four years of age, the greater part of which he had spent in the service of his country. Venieri, amidst the wars carried on in Tuscany, Parma, Mirandola, Corsica, and other parts of Italy, found means to prolong that tranquility handed down to him by his predeceſſors. In the beginning of the year 1554, died pope Julius, who was ſucceeded by Paul the fourth; for we reckon not upon the cardinal of St. Croix, who died a few days after his election; and ſoon after the republican city of Sienna ſurrendered to the Imperialiſts, after a long and bloody ſiege. The terms they obtained were honourable, and ſuch as their brave defence merited; but they were kept as almoſt all royal promiſes are, when they claſh with intereſt and ambition. Contareni, in his hiſtory of Etruria, places this event in the following year: certain it is, that the capitulation was ſigned ſome time before Charles the fifth reſigned the imperial diadem, which happened in November 1555. The act of renunciation bears date the twenty-fifth of October; but it was a month before the ſtates aſſembled at Bruſſels. Philip, his ſucceſſor in the Spaniſh monarchy and the Indies, b agreeable to his father's exhortation, ſeemed deſirous of cultivating peace; but numberleſs obſtructions occurring in the courſe of negotiation, a truce only for five years was eſtabliſhed, and that upon a baſis ſo unſteady, that it was broke almoſt as ſoon as concluded. The truce was propounded by the Spaniſh miniſtry, under the pretext of gaining time to ſettle the preliminaries for a ſolid peace; but the French adminiſtration ſoon diſcovered this to be only a veil thrown over the moſt treacherous meaſures; to give the duke d'Alva time to raiſe a force ſufficient to drive the French out of Piedmont, and even to attack them in Provence [n].

VENIERI and the ſenate had taken the wiſeſt and moſt circumſpect meaſures which the ſituation of Europe would permit. Both the preſent doge and his predeceſſors had ever pre- c ferred peace to war, and never entered upon the latter but with a view to repel injuries, protect liberty and trade, and preſerve the political poiſe of Chriſtendom. In the midſt of this prudent adminiſtration, the ſage Venieri was taken off by death, after governing the republic with the applauſe of all men for the ſhort ſpace of two years.

LORENZO PRIULI, Doge LXXXII.

Lorenzo Priuli, doge LXXXII. Plague and famine in Venice.

UPON his death the great council met for the election of a ſucceſſor, when, by the unanimous voice, Lorenzo Priuli was appointed doge [o]. To which his wiſdom and experience, his accompliſhments as a ſtateſman and a gentleman, gave him a juſt title. In the begin- d ning of his adminiſtration, the plague reigned with violence for ſome time at Venice; but was at length ſtopped by the change of ſeaſons, and the vigilance of Pietro Moſto, at that time magiſtrate La Sanita. The plague was ſucceeded by a dearth of all kinds of proviſions, the inhabitants of the continent avoiding the markets of Venice on account of the peſtilence. The city was brought exceeding low before means could be found to remedy the evil: but the prudence of the doge and ſenate at length ſurmounted all difficulties, and once more introduced health, peace, and quiet among the citizens of Venice.

IN the mean time the war was going on between the crowns of France and Spain, the truce being of but of ſhort duration. Upon the duke d'Alva's march into the pope's territories, both his holineſs and the French king ſent plenipotentiaries to Venice, who repre- e ſented to the ſenate, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty and the pope, cloſely united by intereſt and inclination as they were to the ſenate, ſought, in that delicate and dangerous conjuncture, reciprocal marks of good will from the republic, for the defence of liberty, and the ſecurity of Italy. They had, for this reaſon, been ſent with full powers to concert with the ſenate the moſt adviſeable meaſures for maintaining the independence of their ſeveral ſtates, and checking the haughty and ambitious views of the houſe of Auſtria, which they flattered themſelves would meet with no obſtruction from ſo wiſe an aſſembly, as the neceſſity was ſelf-evident. The whole world knew the glorious and generous efforts made by their anceſtors for the defence of liberty and expulſion of tyranny: thoſe noble actions would not ſuffer them to entertain a doubt concerning the wiſdom, the magnanimity of a ſtate f founded on the principles of freedom: they would not certainly now ſubmit to the ſervitude they had ſo long and bravely reſiſted: they would not ſurely ſurrender the liberties purchaſed with the wealth and blood of their citizens. They ſaw with pleaſure the augmentation of the republic's naval and military power, as the motives, they doubted not, were generous, ſince the meaſures of the ſenate could not fail of being prudent: they repreſented the advantages that muſt reſult from an union with his holineſs and moſt Chriſtian majeſty, as they would be in a condition to cover that part of their frontier moſt expoſed to the Spaniſh troops and the duke d'Alva. The French king had given orders to the duke de Guiſe to advance with a body of near twenty thouſand men towards Italy, at the requiſition of his holineſs, and for the defence of Italy. This was a neceſſary meaſure, g which the wiſdom of the ſenate muſt approve, as recent tranſactions muſt have convinced men,

a men, that the moſt ſolemn treaties were too weak a barrier againſt the ambition of the declared enemy of public liberty: an union between the republic, the pope, and his moſt Chriſtian majeſty would ſecure their mutual defence, check the ambition of Philip, and produce tranquillity in Europe, as well as Italy in particular. The ambaſſadors therefore beſought the ſenate to conſider, that if either the pope or king ſhould once be oppreſſed, how difficult then would be the preſervation of the dominions of the republic. His majeſty's long affection for the republic, and the general tenor of his conduct, were ſufficient proofs, they affirmed, of his fidelity to Venice, his engagements, and character.

To this the doge anſwered, with a prudence becoming the father of the ſtate, and the head of that wiſe aſſembly: he ſaid, that the friendſhip which had ſo long ſubſiſted between b his moſt Chriſtian majeſty and the republic, had given himſelf, the ſenate, and every Venetian, the higheſt ſatisfaction. It was a point of too much conſequence for the republic to neglect; nor ſhould her utmoſt endeavours towards cultivating and rendering perpetual the amity of ſo reſpectable a prince and nation, as well as of ſo mild and good a father of the church, be wanting [p].

Notwithstanding theſe profeſſions, he declined entering into any engagements which could poſſibly offend Spain, or engage the republic in a war: on the contrary, the doge and ſenate left no means untried to mediate an agreement between the pope and Philip, which, they apprehended, would be laying the foundation of a more general pacification. Their moderation was attended with ſucceſs, the prudence of Marco Antonio de c Franchefcis, ſecretary to the council of ten, ſent to Rome upon this buſineſs, having actually reconciled them to their mutual ſatisfaction [q].

This year an ambaſſy was ſent to Solyman, to confirm the peace between the Porte and the republic, which was granted without any difficulty, the Grand Seignior being at that time perplexed with the civil war among his children. The ſenate alſo ſent an ambaſſador to the court of France, at whoſe interceſſion, joined to the mediation of the pope and ſome other powers, peace with Spain was concluded. During the reſidence of this ambaſſador it was that the French monarch died of a hurt in the eye, which he received at a tournament. With regard to the republic, all was peace and tranquillity, until the following year, when her trade was infeſted by a ſwarm of pirates, who blocked up all the ports of Pirates infeſt the coaſts of Dalmatia.
d the Adriatic. They made incurſions into Iſtria and Dalmatia, cutting away the ſhipping out of the harbours, deſolating the country, and deſpoiling the cities. Upon this notice, Matteo Bembo, a brave and experienced officer, at that time admiral of the gulph, ſailed againſt them with a ſquadron of twelve gallies: he purſued, and every where ſo vigorouſly attacked thoſe pirates, that, unable to keep the ſeas, they fled to the port of Durazzo, where the inhabitants had taken arms for their aſſiſtance. Thither Bembo purſued them, and, incenſed at the conduct of the town, he battered the walls, without regard to the peace ſubſiſting with Solyman; an action for which he was baniſhed his country, inſtead of being rewarded: ſo far had pacific views and meaſures prevailed, that peace with Solyman was preferred to the honour of the republic. Had not the brave Bembo found means to e eſcape, it is probable his life would have been the ſacrifice of his country's timidity [r].

Soon after this Lorenzo Priuli died, much lamented by the people for the moderation of his public, and affability of his private conduct: but above all his death was regretted by the literati of his times. His munificence, taſte, and generoſity, conſtituted this prince the Mecænas of the age, and the real patron of merit. He was ſucceeded by his brother Jeronimo Priuli, a man of an engaging converſation, long experience in public buſineſs, and a dignity of carriage and conduct becoming the elevated ſtation to which he was raiſed by conſent of his country [s].

JERONIMO PRIULI, Doge LXXXIII.

f Soon after Jeronimo's promotion, an event happened, which, it was feared, would diſturb the public tranquility: it was the death of Paul the fourth, who was ſucceeded by the cardinal de Medicis, by the name of Pius the fifth. This haughty, cruel, and vindictive prelate ſo far proſecuted his reſentments againſt the cardinals John and Charles Caraffa, and the count Montorio, as to ſuffer them to periſh in dungeons, under pretence of their having perſuaded their uncle, the late pontiff, to the ruin of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, by the perpetual wars in which he was engaged. This prelate, in altering his condition, changed his very nature; yet, contrary to the public opinion, the new ſucceſſion of popes wrought no immediate alteration in the general ſtate of affairs in Italy. To the Venetians he was well diſpoſed, having received their ambaſſy of congratulation with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of g friendſhip and reſpect for the republic. Soon after his acceſſion to the holy ſee, he ſum- Jeronimo Priuli, doge LXXXIII.

moned the council of Trente, at which attended the Venetian commiſſioners. To this office a the republic appointed Nicolo di Ponti and Matteo Dandolo, men of extraordinary abilities, and great reputation for knowledge: they were attended by Antonio Malledona, who acquired great reputation on this occaſion, for the ſmoothneſs of his eloquence, the force of his arguments, and quickneſs of his penetration. A numerous body of the ſuperior clergy from the Venetian dominions likewiſe aſſembled at Trente; but the only remarkable tranſaction of this year was the expedition of Canalis againſt the pirates. He was ſent by the ſenate with four gallies to ſcour the Adriatic; and he conducted his affairs with ſuch courage and ability, that in the ſpace of a month he drove thoſe enemies to peace and commerce
A. D. 1565. out of the ocean into their places of ſecurity, after having taken a great number of their veſſels, the crews of which he hanged up without form of trial [t]. b

FROM this time until the year 1565, nothing memorable occurred. Upon Selim's acceſſion to the Turkiſh throne, the Venetians ſent Marini Caballo to compliment him in the name of the ſenate: his inſtructions were to procure a confirmation of the peace made with Solyman. Caballo delivered his credentials; but found it a matter of the utmoſt difficulty to procure an audience of the emperor. At laſt, by the force of gold, he ſurmounted every obſtruction, and obtained a moſt ſolemn renewal of the treaty: however, this appearance of tranquility was of no long duration, the ambition, or evil counſellors about Selim, not permitting him to follow meaſures ſo ſalutary to the empire.

War with the pirates. PREVIOUS to the war with Selim, the ſenate had a third time fitted out a fleet againſt the pirates, whoſe inſolence was now encreaſed by the thirſt of revenge. To cruſh them at c one blow, forty gallies were equipped, the command of which was given to Hermolao Tepulo. During the preparation of this fleet, the pirates committed the moſt barbarous cruelties on the Venetian ſhipping, and coaſts of Dalmatia, deſtroying men, women, and children, without remorſe, and deſolating the country with fire and ſword. The ſquadron was no ſooner in readineſs than Tepulo ſailed; and ſo vigilantly did he execute his truſt, that in the ſpace of a few weeks not a pirate was to be ſeen; the ſmalleſt veſſel laden with gold might ſecurely rove through the Adriatic [u]. Before the return of this fleet to Venice the doge died, after having held the reins of government, with great ſteadineſs, for the ſpace of eight years and eleven months. Having been honourably and publickly interred in the vault of his anceſtors, the council Maggiori proceeded to the choice of a ſucceſſor [w]. d

PIETRO LORETANO, Doge LXXXIV.

Pietro Loretano, doge LXXXIV. THE unanimous voice fell upon Pietro Loretano, whoſe capacity, courage, and experience greatly raiſed the public hopes that his adminiſtration would be equally wiſe and fortunate: however, the beginning of his government was attended with ſome unfortunate circumſtances, owing, indeed, to unavoidable accidents. The arſenal was burnt to aſhes by the careleſſneſs of one of the ſoldiers upon guard, by which the republic ſuſtained a prodigious loſs of ſtores and ammunition. Another unfortunate circumſtance was a great ſcarcity which prevailed in the city, in deſpite of all the endeavours of the doge and ſenate. Numbers of the poor dropt down daily in the ſtreets, inſomuch that at laſt a decree of the ſenate e paſſed for opening the public granaries, kept ſolely for the maintenance of the ſea and land forces. By this means the republic was deprived of the ability of equipping a fleet; from which, it is imagined, Selim formed the firſt reſolution to attempt the conqueſt of Cyprus:

Selim's deſigns upon Cyprus. he had, indeed, in his father's life-time, expreſſed a great deſire of annexing this iſland to the Othoman empire. Its contiguity to Caramania, a province of the Turkiſh dominions; its fertility; its fine ſituation; its wealth and abundance in every neceſſary of life; the richneſs of its wines, of which Selim, though a Turk, was a great admirer; together with numberleſs other advantages, ſtrengthened his hopes that he might one day obtain ſo conſiderable an acquiſition. To theſe reaſons were ſuperadded others: the Chriſtian pirates, who infeſted the ſhores of Syria, and all the Turkiſh coaſts, with perpetual incurſions, found in f Cyprus a ſure aſylum. The inhabitants of this iſland diſturbed the Turkiſh commerce, and above all the pilgrimages of their devotees to Mecca and the tomb of Mahomet. It was, beſides, a maxim of the Turkiſh policy, that a prince ſhould, upon his acceſſion, endeavour to extend the limits of his empire, and propagate the religion of his anceſtors. The mufti artfully inſinuated this laſt argument: when Selim had carried him with him to Adrianople to ſee a magnificent moſque he was building, he told the emperor, that it was neither lawful or cuſtomary to erect ſuch foundations out of the revenues of the empire; but that it was always done by aſſigning for that purpoſe ſuch lands as had been conquered by arms: that to this end no province could ſtand more commodiouſly than Cyprus, as the poſſeſſion of this iſland would equally conduce to the happineſs of his reign, the utility and ſtrength g of the empire, and the purpoſes of religion. Selim regarded this admonition as ſent from a heaven; it perfectly coincided with his own views, and to proſecute it he reſolved to break through the moſt ſolemn engagements entered into by his father, and formally ratified by himſelf. Mahomet, the grand vizier, a ſecret friend to the republic, laboured to divert his intentions: he repreſented the advantages ariſing from a good correſpondence with the Venetians, who were the chief traders to his ports: they, he ſaid, ought to be the laſt people with whom a politic Othoman prince would quarrel, whether his views were glory, empire, or the propagation of religion. To aſſiſt the Moors of Granada, and check the pride and ambition of the houſe of Auſtria, better became his greatneſs, and ſuited the politics and religion of the empire. He entreated him, therefore, to embrace the happy occaſion offered by Providence, of protecting the religion of Mahomet, of moleſting the enemies of b Muſſulmans, and opening a path to glory and dominion.

The arguments of the vizier were ſound and unanſwerable; but they neither correſponded with the opinion of Selim, or of his three great favourites the mufti, Muſtapha baſhaw of Damaſcus, and Pioli his ſon-in-law. The two laſt were the declared enemies of the vizier; they envied his grandeur, and croſſed all his meaſures. In the preſent caſe, their counſel fell in with the humour of Selim; they therefore purſued it eagerly, hoping thereby to diſgrace the honeſt and wiſe Mahomet, and procure to themſelves the chief conduct of the war. They oppoſed to the advice of the loyal ſtateſman, that the Venetians were weak, their arſenal being deſtroyed; that the councils of Chriſtian princes were divided, and their aſſiſtance precarious; that Cyprus, on account of its diſtance from the republic, would be
c eaſily conquered, and when acquired, would be a valuable jewel in the imperial diadem [x].

Their endeavours were effectual; Mahomet became ſuſpected, he ſunk in Selim's eſteem, while the others roſe proportionably to the higheſt favours. To their influence was added that of John Michis, a Jewiſh renegado, in high eſteem with Selim. This man had ſo artfully inſinuated himſelf into the emperor's favour, that nothing was denied him: he urged the attack upon Cyprus ſo warmly, that it abſolutely determined Selim; but ſo far did the renegado attend to his own intereſt, as to obtain a promiſe from the emperor of the inveſtiture of the iſland; and ſo full was he of the idea of majeſty, that he had ſtandards and other regalia prepared, with this inſcription, "Joſeph, king of Cyprus," for he had altered his name with his religion.

d MAHOMET the grand vizier, perceiving the current of the imperial councils, as well as Selim's own inclination, running impetuouſly againſt him, thought, that longer to perſiſt in his opinion would endanger his life, without either ſerving his maſter or the republic: he therefore adviſed Antonio Barbaro, the Venetian conſul and reſident, to lay the ſtate of affairs before the ſenate, and endeavour to prevail with them to tamper with a power too ſtrong for oppoſition, and to avert the impending ſtorm by ſuch conceſſions as they could A. make conſiſtently with the honour and ſecurity of the ſtate: he procured ſecretly one of the conſul's houſhold to be diſpatched with proper intelligence to the ſenate.

When this news was laid before the ſenate, they were fired with reſentment, and in the heat of paſſion determined to endure every extremity, rather than make ſubmiſſions to ſo
e perfidious an enemy; but the opinion of the moſt prudent was, that, as nothing was to be attempted raſhly, they ſhould in the mean time ſtrive to avert the blow. They ſaid, an affair of ſuch moment was not to be weighed by the nature of the injury, and the groſſneſs of the inſult, but by their own power; they, therefore, adviſed to try the effects of gold upon an adminiſtration ever corrupt and avaricious. This was an expedient they had always found more effectual than the beſt concerted and vigorouſly executed plan of warlike operations. At the ſame time a fleet was equipped, and thirty-one gallies, with all the young nobility of Venice on board, ſtationed in the gulph, of which Marco Quirino was at that time admiral, and Jiacomo Celſi proveditor.

During theſe preparations, advice came that their ſhipping was ſtopped in the Turkiſh
f ports, and the utmoſt diligence uſed for proſecuting the war. Immediately orders were iſſued for Quirino to ſail to Candia, and with all expedition to ſet the fleet of that iſland in a proper condition. A body of troops was embarked for Cyprus, and orders ſent to the governors of the ſeveral ports to put them in a ſtate of defence, and carefully to watch the ſecurity of the iſland. Nor were the other dominions of the republic neglected; their garriſons were augmented, fortifications repaired, and magazines of proviſion and ammunition formed. An addition of eighty gallies was likewiſe made to the navy; Franciſco Duodo was appointed admiral, and a captain to each ſhip choſen among the perſons of higheſt quality, and greateſt experience, in the city. Paruta ſays, that Jaconimo Zeno was made high admiral and commander in chief of all the Venetian fleet; but that each diviſion had a ſubordinate

BEFORE Selim attempted any thing by force, he reſolved to try the effects of ſtratagem. a
This ſeemed the leaſt dangerous method of effecting his purpoſe, on account of the private diviſions and perpetual diſſenſions among the iſlanders. For the execution of this deſign, one Diaſoriacus, a native of Cyprus, now at the court of Selim, appeared a fit inſtrument: he was ſubtle, inſinuating, and a knave, who proſtituted honour, virtue, and religion to his intereſt. His credit was conſiderable among the inhabitants; and ſo artfully did he conceal the baſeſt purpoſes, that his character might never have come to light, but from this circumſtance. In conſequence, Diaſoriacus accepted the buſineſs for a certain reward; and to accompliſh it, returned to the iſland, where he was well received. After he had made conſiderable progreſs, the whole plot was diſcovered by means of an intercepted letter, upon which he was ſeized, confronted with his own hand-writing, put to the torture b until he confeſſed his accomplices, who were apprehended, and put to immediate death, with the original contriver of the villany [z].

A conſpiracy diſcovered in Cyprus.

SELIM, thus diſappointed, determined to effect his purpoſe by force; and the Venetians were no leſs diligent to fruſtrate his deſigns. Eugemio Singlitico, a nobleman of Cyprus, and lieutenant general in the Venetian ſervice, offered himſelf to command the troops in Cyprus. His propoſals were accepted, and he was ſent thither with a thouſand additional forces. Jeronimo Martinenga, captain of the men at arms, made an overture to raiſe, at his own expence, a body of two thouſand foot, of which the ſenate greatly approving, he ſet immediately to work, and, in the ſpace of a few days, completed his levy, and conducted them to Venice to embark for Cyprus. The next ſtep was to implore the aſſiſtance c of all the Chriſtian potentates by the ambaſſadors reſiding at the different courts. The expectations of the Venetians from this meaſure were but ſmall; however, they imagined that neglecting it might be attributed to pride, conceit, and ſelf ſufficiency. As the conſequences of war are uncertain, the ſenate was willing to anticipate all the blame which might be laid upon their preſumption, ſhould the event prove unfortunate. They firſt ſolicited the pope for his own particular aſſiſtance, as well as his influence with the Chriſtian powers. Michele Serviana, the Venetian reſident at Rome, intreated his holineſs to take a fatherly care of the republic in ſo imminent a danger: he ſet before him the examples of his predeceſſors upon ſuch occaſions; he reminded him of the republic's ſervices to the holy ſee, for the preſervation of which ſhe had often expoſed her own ſafety; and he con- d cluded with the manifeſt danger which threatened other Chriſtian princes, ſhould the Venetian commonwealth, the bulwark of Europe, be deſtroyed. The pope ſeemed greatly moved by the ambaſſador's oration; but he lamented his inability, and made uſe of the ſame pretexts to avoid entering into the quarrel of the Venetians, which they, for a ſeries of years, had urged to other princes who ſolicited their alliance. The affair, however, was propoſed and approved in the conſiſtory, although no other conſequence reſulted than leave to levy upon the clergy the ſum of one hundred thouſand ducats towards ſupporting the expence of the war [a]. But though his holineſs was unwilling to engage ſingly in an alliance with the Venetians, he took upon him to mediate a confederacy between himſelf, the ſenate, and Philip the ſecond of Spain.

An ambaſſador comes from Selim to Venice.

MEAN time Cubath, ambaſſador from Selim, arrived in Venice. This miniſter had been e diſpatched in conſequence of Mahomet's vizier's remonſtrances to the Grand Seignior, that it would ſully the glory of his reign ſuddenly to attack a nation with whom he had lately entered into ſolemn engagements, without firſt acquainting them with his grievances, and demanding redreſs. One happy conſequence reſulted from Mahomet's propoſition; for by it the Venetians had more time for preparing againſt the efforts of ſo potent an enemy, a ſuſpenſion of arms having been granted until the return of the ambaſſador. Upon his arrival orders were iſſued by the ſenate, that before the day of andience no Venetian ſhould viſit or converſe with Cubath: his inſtructions were well known, and an anſwer reſolved upon; to prevent, therefore, all clamours from the apprehenſions of the people, this decree f was paſſed. When the day of audience arrived, he was introduced into the ſenate, when, after paying his compliments to the doge, he began with ſetting forth Selim's affection for the republic, as appeared by his ſo readily granting a confirmation of the treaty with his father; but, ſays he, his kindneſs has been requited with ingratitude; his friendly offices have been returned with injuries and inſults; his commerce and ports have been infeſted by pirates, who are protected by the ſubjects of the republic; he has complained to the Venetian ambaſſador at his court, but no redreſs could he procure. Unable longer to endure affronts, intolerable to ſo great a monarch, he demands, as the only equivalent or compenſation of the injuſtice done to his ſubjects, and likewiſe to prevent future evils, that Cyprus, formerly belonging to the empire of the Mamalucks, to which he has ſucceeded, g ſhall be ceded to him. The ambaſſador then proceeded to adviſe the ſenate, with a friendly warmth, to avert the indignation of so potent a prince, by concessions trifling in proportion to the danger to which a denial would expose the republic, telling them at the same time, that if they obstinately refused him this justice, he would not only take from them the island of Cyprus, by force of arms, but persecute the republic with all the animosity of an injured and powerful monarch [b].

To this the senate answered in the terms they had concerted, by taking God and their consciences to witness, that they religiously adhered to the treaty with Selim: as to the rest, that they were determined to suffer all the hardships of a cruel war, rather than submit to terms so injurious to the majesty of the republic. Cyprus, they asserted, did not belong to the Mamalucks, nor was it ever subject to the Grand Seignior: the promised tribute had been always paid; as to the other allegations they were false, and contrived by those who sought unjust occasions of a war. It was not, they said, in the power of princes to prevent misrepresentations of facts; but it was their duty to punish the authors of them when the falshood was discovered. As they would not deny but some pirates, after committing depredations upon the coasts of the Othoman empire, had lurked in secret places in the island of Cyprus, so the Turks could not but acknowledge the senate's having rigorously punished them whenever they fell into their hands. Upon the whole, they trusted to the justice of their cause, that if they were attacked they would be able to defend themselves, and that God would not fail to avenge himself on the authors of such calamities as must result.

With this answer the ambassador was dismissed, who took care to have the best information relative to the destruction of the arsenal, the scarcity of provisions, and every other particular of which it concerned Selim to be apprised, before his departure.

The pope's legate in Spain endeavours to establish a confederacy between Philip, the pope, and the Venetians.

All this while the pope's legate in Spain was labouring to draw Philip into a league against the Turks, to which he appeared by no means averse. Lodovico de Torres, clerk of the consistory, was sent thither to hasten affairs, as Philip had put it off until his return to Seville, where he proposed to assemble the states of the different kingdoms. De Torres, on his arrival, represented the urgency of affairs; that they would admit of no delay; and that the only method to save Venice, and secure Christendom, would be to send immediate succours. So diligently did he apply himself, that the king issued an order for his own galleys, with the auxiliaries in his pay, amounting to sixty-five sail, to repair directly to Sicily, under the conduct of Giovanni Andrea Doria, and there to wait the pope's commands concerning the time and manner of joining the Venetians. Torres likewise obtained leave for the Venetians to victual their squadrons in the ports of Sicily and Naples; but as to the league Philip answered, that it required deliberation. The application of Torres was supported by the utmost diligence on the side of the republic, who dispatched Caballo to the court of Spain, to forward and second the proposals of his holiness. Caballo acquitted himself with great address, having been chiefly instrumental in procuring the terms we have mentioned, and after the departure of Torres keeping Philip steady in his first resolution [c].

When all was concluded that could possibly be obtained for the present, Torres set out for Portugal, where Sebastian at that time reigned: here he made the same applications as at the former court, but with less success. At the same time the emperor was solicited to join in the league by Giovanni Michaeli, the Venetian minister at Vienna: he used every argument to induce his imperial majesty to break with Selim, but he found him fixed in his resolution to wait the event of the councils of Spain, Poland, and Muscovy. Nor were the ambassadors of the republic more successful in France, the ministry professing the utmost regard for the Venetians, but declining all overtures of a league: however, that no means of safety might be neglected, Vicenzo Alessandro was sent to Persia, to endeavour to stir up the sophi against Selim: upon his arrival he entered upon negociations with sultan Caydar, the king's third son, who readily assented to the proposals made by Alessandro; but his zeal was frustrated by the phlegmatic disposition and wary slowness of the prime minister, who dissuaded the sophi to take arms before the Turk was weakened by the Christian forces [d].

Such were the preparations, resolutions, and negociations of the republic at this important juncture. Nor was Selim idle; new ships were launched in his docks, a prodigious number of cannon cast, magazines of powder, stores, and provisions erected, and in short, every thing bore the appearance of prosecuting the war with the utmost vigour on both sides. The Venetians even put lands to sale, to raise money for the exigencies of the state: loans were accepted at high interest; the procurators of St. Mark's church augmented, and a fine taken; young gentlemen were permitted to enter into the great council before the time appointed by law, on their depositing a certain sum for the public use; and several other expedients were used to replenish the exhausted treasury [e].

During these preparations, Philip resolved to embrace the proposed league, and accordingly sent his ambassador to Rome to conclude it upon the same terms as the last confederacy

againſt the Turks between Charles the fifth, Paul the third, and the republic. But the Venetians, remembering the inconveniencies which enſued from beſtowing the ſupreme command on Doria, inſiſted that each diviſion ſhould be commanded by its own admiral, to prevent the whole fleet's being rendered uſeleſs by the caprice or treachery of an individual. They propoſed that all affairs ſhould be deliberated in a council of war, compoſed of the three admirals, and all reſolutions taken in conſequence of a majority: that the conduct of the whole ſhould devolve by turns upon the admirals. This affair being warmly debated, the point was carried by the Venetians. a

THE next topic was the quotas to be allotted to each party: upon this the Venetians were equally obſtinate, reſolving to withſtand alone all the power of the enemy, rather than engage in a league where they were to ſupport the whole expence, for his holineſs had hitherto declined ſending a fleet: at length, he agreed to arm twelve gallies, under the conduct of Antonio Colonna. Thus a league was concluded between thoſe three powers, in which Spain and the republic were to exert all their naval force: it was ſigned by his holineſs in perſon, by the Venetian ambaſſador, and by the cardinals Pacheco and Granvelle, to whom Philip had remitted full powers. After this, repairing to St. Peter's church, on the eleventh day of June, the pope gave Colonna the ſacred ſtandard, with which he immediately proceeded to Ancona to get the gallies in readineſs [f]. b

Treaty between Spain, the pope, and the Venetians.

MEAN time Pinalis, having refitted and victualled his fleet in Negropont, repaired directly to Rhodes, joining Muſtapha and Hali in his courſe thither; while Uluzzali, with a ſeparate diviſion of the fleet, was ſent to make continual deſcents on the coaſts of Sicily and Italy. Uluzzali was by birth a Calabrian: in his youth he had been taken and enſlaved; but, renouncing Chriſtianity, his abilities ſoon recommended him to favour, and raiſed him to the higheſt offices. c

THE Venetian fleet lay at Zara, expecting to be joined by the confederates, where they loſt many occaſions of annoying the enemy: whereas the Turks, ſpending only three days at Rhodes in preparations, ſailed to Finica, a city in Caramania, oppoſite to Cyprus: here they met with the troops intended for the expedition, and immediately began the embarkation.

WHILE the enemy were thus employed, the Venetians in vain expecting the arrival of the Spaniſh fleet, ſuffered extremely by a contagious diſtemper, which ſwept them off in heaps. The admiral, finding that a change of air was neceſſary to ſtop the progreſs of the diſeaſe, ſteered his courſe for Candia, by order of the ſenate, taking in a reinforcement of rowers at Zanti, Cephalonia, and Cerigo, and making a fruitleſs attempt upon the caſtle di Margariti. d

SEBASTIANI VENIERI was more happy in his expedition againſt the citadel of Soppoto in Albania, which, after a ſtout reſiſtance, he took and garriſoned. Marco Quirino likewiſe gained ſome inconſiderable advantages in the Morea, which ſerved no other purpoſe than to animate the troops. At length Colonna ſet ſail, and joined Don John of Auſtria, with the Spaniſh fleet, at Otranto; about which time the doge died.

LODOVICO MOCENIGO, Doge LXXXV.

HE was ſucceeded by Lodovico Mocenigo, whoſe abilities in the field and cabinet occaſioned his being raiſed on this emergency to the ſupreme dignity [g]. e

Lodovico Mocenigo, d. LXXXV.

PINALIS, the Turkiſh general, having taken all the troops, horſe and foot, on board, ſteered his courſe from Finica to Cyprus, with a fleet of two hundred and twenty ſail, where he arrived in the beginning of Auguſt. He put in, without any reſiſtance, at the port of Salini, where the troops were immediately landed. It was a great overſight in Dandolo, the governor of the iſland, and Singlitico, general of the forces, not to diſpute the debarkation, as was propoſed by Baglioni.

The Turkiſh fleet arrives at Cyprus.

THE firſt inconvenience which reſulted from Dandolo's omitting to attack the Turks on their landing, was the ſubmiſſion of Luſara to Muſtapha. This fort, deſpairing of ſuccours, capitulated, and promiſed an intire obedience, provided the lives and properties of the garriſon were ſecured, which Muſtapha granting, a Turkiſh garriſon was received into the caſtle. This example was followed by the neighbouring places, to prevent which, Dandolo detached Cæſar di Tieni, with a body of five hundred men, to lay waſte the country; and, by the ſeverity of the puniſhment, to terrify the inhabitants into their duty. f

IN the mean time, Pinalis reduced Cerines, a ſea-port of Caramania, extremely convenient for tranſporting proviſions to the army in Cyprus [h]. Then the Turkiſh generals held a conſultation on the neceſſary operations, when Hali's opinion was, that the firſt attempt ſhould be made on Famagoſta, which ſurrendering, all ſupplies would be cut off from the Venetians, and Nicoſia conſtrained to yield through deſpair. To this Muſtapha objected, g a propoſing to begin with the ſiege of Nicoſia, which was defended only by a ſlender garriſon, and ſlight unfiniſhed fortifications; whereas, if they began with Famagoſta, the other city might be fortified in ſuch a manner as to ſurmount all their endeavours, and baffle the power of Selim. This laſt opinion was embraced: Pinalis, with a fleet of one hundred and thirty gallies, was appointed to cruize off the harbour, and to watch the Chriſtian fleet; while Muſtapha took upon him to direct the ſiege of Nicoſia.

THE number of men at this time in the city conſiſted of fifteen hundred Italian foot, moſt of them ſickly; three thouſand iſlanders in the Venetian pay; one thouſand of the townſmen bearing arms at their own expence; five hundred Albanian horſe, and two hundred foot; two hundred bombardiers, gunners, and matroſſes of the natives, and forty Venetians; b five hundred noblemen and gentlemen of rank, volunteers in the ſervice, and five hundred peaſants at work on the fortifications; beſides tradeſmen, women, old men, and children, the whole amounting to upwards of fifty thouſand ſouls.

THE city had three gates, viz. Porta di Lalini, Porta di Troja, and Porta di Caſtello, each of which the Turks propoſed battering at the ſame time. Lines of circumvallation were drawn, batteries erected, and their different poſts aſſigned by Muſtapha to the ſeveral officers. A muſter of the army was likewiſe made, which, it was found, amounted to 51,000 foot, and 3,500 horſe, together with an infinite number of attendants on the camp [i]. Before the batteries began to play, Muſtapha ſet miners to work, in order to ſap the walls; by this means a breach was ſoon effected, which the Turks ſtorming with abundance of reſolu- c tion, the beſieged were at firſt put into confuſion; but ſoon rallied again upon the arrival of Andrea Spelio, who, leading them back to the breach, renewed the fight, and defeated the infidels with great ſlaughter. Then he ſet about repairing the breach with diligence; in which he was greatly diſturbed by the ſhowers of ſhot which came pouring in upon the workmen from the Turkiſh trenches. The beſieged, in a ſhort time, began to relax in in their duty, owing to the indolence of Dandolo the governor, who, inſtead of being the ſoul and ſpirit of the ſoldiery, did, by his own example, encourage them in riot and idleneſs. At laſt a dearth inſinuated itſelf into the garriſon; the ſoldiers were confined to a ſcanty allowance of bread, and, what they eſteemed a greater hardſhip, they were limited to a very ſmall portion of wine. Upon this it was reſolved to ſend to Baglioni, who preſided d at Famagoſta, for ſuccours; which were denied, the garriſon of Famagoſta preferring their own ſecurity to that of Nicoſia.

Now the beſieged began to murmur and complain, altho' the famine was owing to their own imprudence and want of frugality: they had hardly as yet ſeen the face of an enemy, except in one aſſault; yet did they vehemently exclaim againſt the ingratitude of the ſenate. At laſt the officers, perceiving that nothing, beſides keeping them in action, could prevent the ſoldiers from mutinying, reſolved upon a ſally. Two thouſand foot, and four hundred horſe, under the conduct of Cæſar Tieni, were appointed for this purpoſe. Tieni ruſhed out at the head of the cavalry with irreſiſtible fury, breaking through the files of the enemy, until he penetrated into the heart of the Turkiſh camp, where he made a halt for e the infantry, and defended himſelf with incredible valour; but Dandolo had changed his purpoſe, and countermanded the foot, which was attended with the loſs of Tieni, and his whole corps of horſe, who were all cut in pieces, after a reſiſtance hardly to be paralleled in hiſtory, having ſlain near two thouſand of the enemy. From this time the garriſon, by order of Dandolo, contained themſelves within the walls, although Bocaſio, general of the Albanian horſe, conſtantly affirmed, that the only probable means of ſaving the city, was by briſkly repeating the ſallies [k].

PINALIS, with the fleet, ſteered his courſe to Rhodes, whence he diſpatched five gallies in queſt of the Chriſtians: they returned with intelligence, that the Venetian admiral lay with his diviſion at Candia, waiting to be joined by the Spaniſh and eccleſiaſtical ſquadrons, f whoſe arrival was very uncertain; that he was greatly weakened by a ſtorm and contagious diſeaſe, which had cut off great numbers of the ſoldiers and mariners. This advice he received by means of ſome priſoners the gallies had brought back with them; upon which he immediately returned to Cyprus.

ANDREA DORIA, the Spaniſh admiral, was all this while collecting his fleet, after which, ſeveral delays obſtructed his departure from Otranto. The pope uſed the moſt preſſing inſtances that he would ſet ſail and join the Venetians; but they availed nothing, until he received poſitive orders to that purpoſe from Philip. Thuanus attributes this dilatory proceedings to the envy of the Spaniards, who with pleaſure beheld the inactivity of the Venetian admiral, and the decreaſe of his ſtrength by ſickneſs. Certain it is, that, before g the junction of the fleets was effected, the Venetians were rendered almoſt unfit for ſervice, ſo much were they diminiſhed in number by the long and violent contagion which prevailed in the fleet. At length Doria weighed anchor, and joined Colonna with the pope's gallies: a they ſailed in company to Candia, where, after a proſperous voyage, they joined the Venetians. Then a council being held, the Venetian admiral propoſed, that the enemy ſhould be attacked, and by that means the ſiege of Nicoſia raiſed. Colonna acceded to this opinion; but Doria finding he could not, agreeable to the articles of the league, refuſe his aſſent, threw ſo many obſtructions in the way, as rendered ſo ſalutary a meaſure ineffectual. In ſhort, ſo artfully did he manage matters, that neither the pope or republic had cauſe of complaint, at the ſame time that Doria adhered to his own opinions. Sickneſs ſtill prevailing in the Venetian fleet, the admiral was forced to leſſen the number of his ſhips, in order to man thoſe that remained; after which, the whole combined fleet amounted to one hundred and ſeventy gallies, eleven galeaſſes, four galleons, and ſeven men of war. A ſmall ſqua- b dron was ſent out to gain intelligence of the enemy's ſtrength, and their account was, that it conſiſted of one hundred and fifty gallies; upon which Doria diſſuaded his colleagues from any attack, for the following reaſons, which, at the deſire of the other admirals, he couched in writing; becauſe the Chriſtians were inferior in ſtrength to the enemy, on account of the mortality that had ſwept off ſuch numbers of their troops; and becauſe the rowers were in particular greatly diminiſhed, there was no probability of ſucceeding in their deſign, ſince the principal buſineſs of a ſea-fight depended upon rightly working the veſſels.

Doria's excuſes for declining to fight the enemy.

To thoſe excuſes and pretences Colonna anſwered with great ſpirit and truth, that the Chriſtians were not inferior in ſtrength, and, admitting they were, that this difference was c more than compenſated by their ſuperior ſkill: he then proteſted againſt Doria's conduct, and called the Venetian admiral to witneſs, that the misfortunes which might enſue were to be attributed to Doria only, for whom he had waited the whole ſummer; by whoſe malconduct the fleet had been weakened, many opportunities loſt, and the Chriſtian arms diſgraced. He ſcrupled not to declare to Doria, that he muſt anſwer with his head the loſs of Cyprus, which would be the infallible conſequence of his meaſures. To this the Venetian admiral added, that to the loſſes already ſuſtained from delay, ſtill greater might be added by the unſteadineſs of Doria's conduct; that former misfortunes, before the junction of the fleets, might be attributed to the wrong meaſures of individuals; but that falſe ſteps now would neceſſarily redound to the diſcredit of the whole confederate powers. Victory, he d ſaid, depended not upon the number of ſhips and troops, but upon the diligence, the ſkill, and the reſolution of the commanders: it was, therefore, his firm opinion, that they ſhould follow the only meaſure conſiſtent with honour, reputation, religion, duty, and their engagements: this was fighting the enemy, and not ſtanding idle ſpectators of the loſs of Cyprus, and infamy of the Chriſtian arms.

DORIA, perceiving that he could no longer oppoſe without endangering both his honour and life, conſented they ſhould proceed to attack the Turkiſh fleet; but this reſolution was too late, for Muſtapha had actually reduced Nicoſia [l].

Muſtapha ſummons Nicoſia to ſurrender.

AFTER the walls had been a long time battered, and a number of little ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the garriſon and beſiegers, Muſtapha ſhot, by an arrow, a letter into the city, e acquainting the beſieged, that, from his regard to the lives of ſuch a number of people, he had abſtained from ſtorming the city, although he had it wholly in his power for ſix days paſt; but now the ardour of the ſoldiery could not be any longer reſtrained: he therefore adviſed them, if they regarded their own ſafety, to come to a ſpeedy reſolution of ſubmitting to the power they could not withſtand. Immediately after this notice, he ordered the walls to be ſcaled in four different places, which accordingly was executed with the utmoſt fury; but he met with a very unexpected reſiſtance, the beſieged, as if in a fit of deſpair, behaving with an intrepidity which aſtoniſhed the Turks. The fight continued for two hours with great vigour, both ſides continuing to relieve thoſe who were fatigued or wounded, with freſh ſupplies. At laſt night put an end to the battle, in which above fifteen f hundred Turks were ſlain upon the ſpot, five hundred priſoners made, and about one thouſand carried off wounded [m].

Is defeated in an aſſault.

THUS diſappointed, Muſtapha began to play again upon the walls with redoubled vigour: he took every meaſure to diſtreſs and diſpirit the beſieged, and to inſpire his own army with hopes, while Dandolo committed the care of the city to ſubordinate officers. At laſt the beſieged were quite ſpent with the tediouſneſs of the ſiege, the ſcarcity of proviſions, and the inactivity and indolence that prevailed among them: to this was added, the want of unanimity and harmony in their councils. To remedy thoſe evils, a third meſſage was ſent to Baglioni at Famagoſta, to come with a reinforcement, and take the command. He was inclined to accept the invitation; but the inhabitants of Famagoſta prevented him, g threatening, if he retired, to make their own terms with the enemy. Muſtapha had now a battered the walls with all his heavy cannon for ſeveral days; breaches began to appear; and the townſmen had no further hopes of relief, either from Famagoſta, or from the inhabitants of the mountains, all their letters to whom had been intercepted. Muſtapha denounced the utmoſt ſeverity of war, if they did not ſurrender before he ordered the town to be ſtormed. No anſwer being returned, every thing was prepared for a general aſſault. After the ſoldiers had refreſhed themſelves with ſufficient reſt, he ordered the four towers and baſtions to be ſtormed with ſo much fury, and in ſuch a diſpoſition, that the front ranks could not poſſibly give way by the numbers pouring in on the rear. The diſpute was ſharp for ſeveral hours, both ſides ſeeming determined to conquer or die; but night a ſecond time interpoſed, and ſeparated the combatants. The enemy left the greater number of b dead in the breach; but the loſs of the beſieged was likewiſe conſiderable, ſome of the beſt officers being either killed on the ſpot, or mortally wounded. Among the former was Phœbus Zapha, killed after greatly diſtinguiſhing himſelf, and the count de Tripoli, who was the ſoul of the action.

MUSTAPHA, perceiving that the city was not to be ſtormed with his preſent force, ſent to Pinalis for a reinforcement, by means of which, he aſſured him, the ſiege would not continue above one day longer. The admiral, certain of the deſigns of the Chriſtian fleet, was unwilling to weaken himſelf by a ſtrong detachment; however, yielding to Muſtapha's arguments, he draughted from the ſeveral gallies a body of 20,000 men, which he ſent to Nicoſia, under the command of Hali. Muſtapha, upon receiving this augmentation to his c ſtrength, reſolved upon another aſſault: at day-light, the army was drawn up in the trenches; he bent his main ſtrength againſt the fortreſs of Podocatora, where, he imagined, it would leaſt be expected. In this he was not deceived; for the ſoldiers, who ſcaled the walls, found the guard ſecurely aſleep, the motions of the Turks the preceding night having poſſeſſed them with a full aſſurance that they intended raiſing the ſiege. Here the greater number were killed without reſiſtance; others, alarmed with the noiſe, deſerted their poſts in the utmoſt conſternation. The count de Roccas, whoſe quarters were at a little diſtance, upon the firſt notice of the attack, armed himſelf, and, with a few attendants, flew to the place of action, where plunging into the midſt of danger, he was killed upon the ſpot, after having conſiderably retarded the enemy, and given the garriſon leiſure d to recollect their ſpirits. His death damped the ardour of the ſoldiers; they immediately gave way, and at laſt fled with precipitation into the midſt of the city. Upon their retreat, the Turks entered in great numbers, reſolving, before they advanced farther, to ſecond the other aſſaults, by attacking the garriſon in the rear. The Italian foot, who defended the three remaining baſtions, behaved with incredible intrepidity: their number was ſmall; but that defect was amply compenſated by ſkill and courage: they every where defeated the enemy; but no ſooner had they cut off one line, than it was replaced by freſh troops; when at laſt they were forced to retire, exhauſted and fatigued. They had defeated and repulſed the enemy repeatedly, though abandoned by the Cypriots, who fled in the utmoſt trepidation to their own houſes. Dandolo had, upon this occaſion, ſhewn extraordinary activity, e courage, and conduct: had the reſt of his carriage been of a piece, the Turks would probably have been foiled in their attempt; but now his endeavours were too late: they were maſters of all the outworks, the chief ſtrength of the city: nothing remained but an ineffectual effort to defend themſelves in the market-place, where Dandolo had drawn up the garriſon. There an obſtinate fight continued, until, oppreſſed with numbers, Dandolo retired to the town-hall, where he made a ſtand, and ſeemed determined to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity. Upon this, the chief officer of the Turks ſummoned the garriſon to ſurrender, promiſing thoſe their lives who would ſubmit before the artillery was brought; but, during this parley, the Turks had broke open the gates, pouring in crowds, putting all to the ſword, and among the reſt Dandolo, who now found that his abilities were exerted f too late to be of uſe to himſelf or his country. The biſhop alſo was among the ſlain, together with a number of gentlemen of the firſt rank in the iſland. Many, however, breaking ſword in hand through the Turks, eſcaped to the adjacent mountains.

The whole garriſon ſlain; and Nicoſia taken.

Thus, after a ſiege of forty-eight days, the city of Nicoſia was taken and plundered, owing chiefly to the indolence, inactivity, and want of vigour in the governor and garriſon. There was no ſpecies of cruelty, barbarous luſt, inſatiable avarice, or brutality, which the Turks did not commit here: matrons, young women, and children, were violated in the moſt ſcandalous and open manner; old men were murthered in their beds, ſome in churches, and others in the arms of their wives or children, where they ſought for protection, and meant to excite compaſſion. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſword, were reſerved for a more g miſerable death, being dragged in chains over heaps of their relations, kindred, and countrymen, to periſh in deplorable dungeons. Thus did Nicoſia, in one day, feel the moſt extreme calamity, after having for a ſeries of years rouſed, by its affluence, pomp, and magnificence, nificence, the jealouſy and envy of the Othoman emperor, as well as of many Chriſtian potentates. a

MUSTAPHA putting a ſtrong garriſon in Nicoſia, ſent back the reinforcement lent him by Pinalis, and begun his march to Famagoſta, carrying with him ſeveral engines and inſtruments for a ſiege, which he had erected at Nicoſia. News of the taking of Nicoſia being received at Famagoſta, the governor got every thing in readineſs for a ſiege, ordering all thoſe who were unfit to bear arms to depart the city. Muſtapha, in order to ſtrike terror into the garriſon, ordered Dandolo's head to be placed on a ſpear, and ſhewn to them; but this had no other effect than to inſpire the garriſon with an eager deſire of revenge. As no intelligence of the Chriſtian fleet had been lately received, the Turks began to apprehend that ſome fatal ſtroke was meditated: they determined to ſend Coccialobin, a noted pirate and expert ſeaman, in queſt of them to procure the beſt information poſſible. He ſoon returned, after having taken a ſmall Chriſtian bark, which informed him of the fixed reſolution of the admirals to fight. Upon this advice Muſtapha called a council, where Pinalis was of opinion that a general engagement ought by all means to be avoided: Muſtapha and Hali were of a contrary opinion, regarding this prudent advice as one of thoſe minute maxims which meaſures every thing by its immediate utility. All their views centered in the glory of their prince, to whom they thought it a diſhonour that his fleet ſhould decline battle: their motion was carried, and the fleet accordingly cleared of every thing which could poſſibly impede the mariners in action [n]. b

THE Chriſtian fleet was at Candia, where new contentions aroſe among the commanders: theſe terminated in a ſeparation of the fleet, Doria remaining at Candia, while the Venetian and eccleſiaſtical fleets ſailed to Caſtel-Roſſo, where they received the firſt advice of the reduction of Nicoſia: upon this the fleets joined again, and a council of war was called to deliberate on the neceſſary meaſures Sebaſtiano Venieri, Franciſco Duodo, and Marco Quirino, three officers of diſtinction in the Venetian diviſion, were for attacking the Turks, which they aſſerted would have the ſame conſequences now, as to the ſafety of Cyprus, as before the loſs of Nicoſia. Theſe officers had the liberty of ſitting and giving their opinions in council, but not of voting, which was confined to the three admirals. Hieronimo Zani and Sforza Palavicini, were of a contrary opinion: they ſaid, that their ſailing now to Cyprus would only be loſing time, which might be uſefully employed againſt Negropont. This difference among the Venetian officers was referred to Colonna; but the artful conduct of Doria perplexed the council ſo much, that it broke up without coming to any determination So high had their diviſions run, that Doria again parted from the other confederates, and retired with the Spaniſh fleet to Sicily, leaving the Venetians, with a ſlender ſquadron under Colonna, to oppoſe the powerful armament commanded by Pinalis. c d

THE Venetians determined upon ſending ſuccours to Famagoſta, the manner of doing which was entruſted to the conduct of M. Quirino and Lodovico Martinenga; and Zani, leaving a body of two thouſand men in Candia, repaired with the fleet to Corfu: here Colonna, after having loſt half his fleet by ſickneſs, parted with the Venetians. e

PINALIS, being eaſed from all apprehenſions of an attack, ſet ſail to Conſtantinople, leaving twelve gallies for the defence of the iſland, and to prevent Famagoſta receiving ſupplies. In his courſe, falling in with two Venetian gallies, commanded by Angelo Suriano and Vincenti Priuli, he attacked them, and their brave defence produced an obſtinate and bloody engagement. At laſt Priuli, after having for ſeveral hours withſtood the utmoſt efforts of five Turkiſh gallies, was killed; but the lieutenant, emulating the ſpirit of his ſuperior, broke through the enemy's fleet, and joining Suriano, they both arrived ſafe in Candia.

MEAN time Muſtapha, who ſtaid behind with the Turkiſh army in Cyprus, reſolving not to attempt the ſiege in form before the ſpring, contented himſelf with blocking up the city by little forts he had erected at proper diſtances. The beſieged, taking advantage of this circumſtance, ſallied out with great vigour, forced the enemy's works, putting the garriſons in the forts to the ſword, and totally razing them before ſuccours from the camp could arrive. This noble enterprize they effected with the loſs of ten men only, that of the enemy amounting to three hundred killed, an equal number of priſoners, and many wounded: but the Turks ſuſtained a ſtill more grievous loſs in the burning of a yacht, laden with rich cloaths, jewels, and other things of great value, beſides many noble priſoners, whom Muſtapha was ſending as a preſent to Selim. The misfortune was occaſioned by the courage, as it is ſuppoſed, of a captive Cyprian lady on board, who preferring death to ſervitude, fell upon this expedient [o]. f

THE next endeavour of the beſieged was to requeſt ſupplies from Venice. This was a matter of the utmoſt difficulty, as the Turks were in poſſeſſion of all the ports and paſſes: g a but Raguzoni, biſhop of the city, willing to riſque his own life for the preſervation of his country, bravely undertook, and happily effected the enterprize.

THE following year Quirino and Martinenga, to whom the care of ſupplying Famagoſta had been committed, draughted out of all the troops in Candia a body of eight hundred men, which, with proviſions and ſtores, they ſhipped on board thirteen tranſports under Quirino. After a ſhort and happy voyage, he arrived in Cyprus, and had the good fortune to throw the ſupplies into the city. The Turkiſh fleet did all in their power to prevent it; but Quirino attacked them ſo vigorouſly, and they were plied ſo hotly with the cannon of Famagoſta, that, after the loſs of four gallies, they were forced to retire. Soon after this exploit, Quirino took two veſſels laden with proviſions for the Turkiſh camp, deſtroyed b ſome works which Muſtapha had erected, and then returned to Candia. The ſenate having diſgraced Zani for the opinion he had given in the council of war, promoted Venieri in his room; Quirino and Zacharia Salamone being appointed proveditors. Zani was ſent in chains to Venice to take his trial; but he anticipated by a natural death an ignominious ſentence. A. D. 1571.

MEAN time Venieri, as ſoon as he found himſelf inveſted with the command, reſolved to omit no opportunity of diſtinguiſhing himſelf, and ſerving his country: nor was Selim idle. To divide her forces, and diſtreſs the republic, he ſent Achmet, baſhaw, with an army of ſeventy thouſand men into Albania and Dalmatia: Hali, at the ſame time, was detached with a ſquadron of forty ſail to harraſs the iſlands of the Archipelago, and ſcour the Ægean ſea; after which, joining the reſt of the fleet, he was to proceed directly to give c battle to Venieri, Muſtapha, all this while, being employed in the ſiege of Famagoſta[p].

AS to the confederacy entered upon the preceding year by the king of Spain, the pope, and the republic, ſo many difficulties had occurred, that it was hitherto of little prejudice to the common enemy, and now was like to be entirely diſſolved, in deſpite of all the endeavours of his holineſs to cement and reconcile the parties. So far did the pontiff carry his zeal, that he declared, if it ſhould be found neceſſary, he himſelf would embark in the fleet, and expoſe his perſon to all dangers. At length his mediation had the wiſhed for effect; the treaty was renewed between Spain, the holy ſee, and the republic, each agreeing to furniſh a certain force, until the whole fleet ſhould amount to two hundred gallies and one hundred tranſports: the army to fifty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, Don d John of Auſtria being appointed commander in chief. The only contention was who ſhould have the command in the abſence of Don John: Philip's party aſſerted, that the choice ſhould be left to the diſcretion of the prince; but the Venetians, ſuſpecting this to be an artifice to bring Doria, whom they juſtly hated, again into office, determined to refer the diſpute to his holineſs, with whoſe diſlike to Doria they were acquainted. The pope's deciſion was, that the three ſuperior officers ſhould ſhare the command; but that the chief direction of affairs ſhould reſide in Colonna; a determination that was perfectly agreeable to the Venetians, who had an entire confidence in the abilities and integrity of that officer[q].

THIS point being ſettled, other difficulties ſoon occurred; among theſe was one of the utmoſt conſequence, viz. in what part their operations ſhould commence, whether in the e Venetian or Spaniſh dominions. Philip inſiſted, that as he ſupported the greater part of the expence, he had a right to expect the firſt fruits of the league. This the Venetians warmly oppoſed, affirming, that by this means the league would be a prejudice to their affairs, if, by giving up Cyprus, they ſhould go in queſt of conqueſts which could never produce any benefit to the republic. Here the pope interpoſed, ſending his legate into Spain to prevail on Philip to recede from ſo unreaſonable a demand, and to ſend Don John of Auſtria to take upon him the command. Pompey Colonna was pitched upon for this ambaſſy, who having laid his inſtructions before Philip, was anſwered with proteſtations of his great zeal for religion, and affection for the head of Chriſt's church: his late conduct, he ſaid, was ſufficient to evince his inclinations, as he had, at a prodigious expence, fitted out a great f fleet, with ten thouſand Germans, eight thouſand Spaniards, and an equal number of Italians on board, to oppoſe the enemy of Chriſtianity: but he feared that thoſe mighty armaments were to little purpoſe, as he could not help ſuſpecting the ſincerity and good faith of the Venetians. In the firſt place, he was aſſured that they had never given up thoughts of peace, and that perpetual couriers paſſed between Venice and Conſtantinople: he had therefore reaſon to believe that their only deſign in propoſing this treaty, was to obtain more eaſy terms from Selim, by forming a ſtrong combination againſt him. And as to the emperor, his inclinations might be good; but his ability was too ſlender to ſuffer him to declare againſt ſo potent an enemy as the Grand Signior. Colonna, returning with this anſwer, found that new obſtructions on the ſide of his holineſs had ariſen. In the former g league with Charles the fifth, it was ſtipulated, that the emperor ſhould bear half the expence, the Venetians two-thirds of the remaining half, and his holineſs one-third. Now the exchequer of the holy ſee was ſo exhauſted, he ſaid, as to be able to bear only a ſixth of the expence, the reſt muſt be ſupplied by Philip and the republic. Againſt this Suriano and Soranzo, the Venetian ambaſſadors, exclaimed, ſaying, that at firſt no more than a fourth was demanded of the Venetians, though, by the force of entreaty, and for the honour of the Chriſtian arms, they were induced to advance a third. In fine, it was ridiculous, they affirmed, for his holineſs to pretend the want of money, which he had ſo many eaſy methods of procuring; as it was a proverbial ſaying, that the pope's quill was a rich mint, by one ſtroke of which he could coin what ſums he thought proper. But this point the ambaſſadors were conſtrained to yield, the league being eſtabliſhed upon the ſame footing as the preceding [r].

The doge, and a party in the republic, are for making peace with Selim.

HOWEVER, this was no more than an agreement which Philip had it in his power to perform or not, as he pleaſed; and indeed it was apparent, by the little preparation he made, that his quota would fall greatly ſhort of his engagements. From hence, Mocenigo the doge, who had always been averſe to breaking with the Turks, found an opportunity of more ſtrongly recommending pacific meaſures: he affirmed, that the republic was only the tool of Spain, to make a diverſion which ſhould withdraw the Turkiſh forces from aſſiſting the Moors in Granada. It ſeaſonably fell out alſo, that Mahomet the grand vizier, who had always given proofs of his regard for the Venetians, had upon this occaſion ſignified, that Selim was diſpoſed to liſten to reaſonable propoſitions. This notice was joyfully embraced by the greater part of the ſenate; and it was reſolved, that Jacobo Raggozini, a man well ſkilled in the Turkiſh conſtitution, ſhould be ſent to Conſtantinople, under pretence of ſettling a cartel for the exchange of priſoners. Now the face of affairs took a different turn; thoſe who thought they could make ſome advantage of the neceſſity of the republic, ſaw plainly, from the ſpirit of her ambaſſadors, that her whole views centered not in the league. Accordingly the pope diſpatched an envoy to Venice, who, from his integrity, ability, and public character, he doubted not would be able to mend the late breach, and reconcile the differences between the confederates. Colonna was introduced into the ſenate; he began his diſcourſe with exhorting that punctilio, pride, and an undue warmth, might not break off a league ſo neceſſary, ſo advantageous to the republic and to Europe; he proceeded to palliate the conduct of his holineſs and Philip; he ſaid, that the declaration made by Granvelle, of the number of ſhips which Spain propoſed furniſhing, was of little conſequence, ſince the republic could eaſily ſupply the deficiency by their own ſhipping, to be paid by Philip: many other arguments he urged. To all which a ſenator anſwered, that they could not longer adhere to a treaty ſo ill performed, without evident danger to the ſtate; and that it was more adviſeable to ſtrike up a peace with Selim, before their mutual reſentments were aggravated, than rely upon an alliance productive of nothing but feuds and diſſentions. Colonna replied, that no ſafe peace with the Turks, whoſe perfidy they had lately experienced, could be concluded: this he proved by a variety of arguments; and added, that things were now come to that paſs, as to render it impoſſible for the Venetians to defend themſelves by their own fleets, which were greatly inferior to the enemy's. It, therefore, was expedient to renounce timid meaſures, which were ſeldom ſecure, and heartily embrace the more generous and liberal views of revenging the injuries they had ſuſtained; of oppoſing that haughty enemy, who was ready to trample upon the neck of liberty; and of driving back to Aſia a power, that had inſinuated itſelf into the very bowels of Europe. In ſhort, with this addreſs Colonna removed all the ſcruples of the ſenate; only they repreſented, that as the war would render it neceſſary to augment their garriſons, it was but reaſonable the allies ſhould ſhare the expence. Colonna was of the ſame opinion; but ſaid his inſtructions contained nothing upon that head. It was afterwards referred to the pope; but he put it off to ſome other occaſion, being unwilling to enter upon any terms which ſhould draw money from the church: however, as this obſtacle remained, nothing was determined, a reference being made to the doge and council. After warm debates, peace with the Turks was again reſolved upon; but thoſe who oppoſed this meaſure inſiſted it ſhould be ratified in full ſenate. Accordingly the affair was remitted to this aſſembly, when Paulo Tiepolo, by a long, ſenſible, and laboured diſcourſe, refuted the arguments alleged in favour of peace, and confirmed thoſe Colonna advanced in favour of the league. Tiepolo was anſwered by Nicolao di Ponti, eſteemed the firſt orator of his age: Ponti, with great ſpirit, aſſerted, that all the arguments of thoſe who promoted the war, were founded on profound ignorance of the conſtitution and circumſtances of Venice, as well as of her allies. This he demonſtrated with the utmoſt perſpicuity, oratory, and elegance: he then laid open the views of Spain, the intereſt of the republic, what prudence, juſtice, and even neceſſity required of

a her: he gave a sketch of the languiſhing ſtate of commerce, by which alone the republic could preſerve her weight in the ſcale of Europe: he ſet forth the decay of manufactures, the diſtreſs of the poor, and total inanition of the treaſury; drawing the whole picture with ſuch height of colouring, juſtneſs, and energy of expreſſion, as well as propriety of diſpoſition, that the ſenate was greatly moved with the pathetic deſcription. For ſome time their minds fluctuated between doubts; but at length the oppoſite party prevailed: in conſequence the league was agreed to, and ſoon after concluded [s].

THIS treaty ſet forth, that a perpetual league and alliance, offenſive and defenſive, ſhould take place between his holineſs Pius the fifth, his catholic majeſty Philip of Spain, and his ſerene highneſs Mocenigo doge of Venice, againſt Selim emperor of the Turks. Here it was b ſtipulated, that the allies ſhould not only attack the common enemy in the dominions immediately in his poſſeſſion, but likewiſe Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, and other cities tributary to the Turks on the coaſt of Barbary; that when no expedition for the common benefit was intended, the Venetians ſhould aſſiſt Philip in Barbary with fifty gallies, well provided; that, in the ſame circumſtances, he ſhould ſupply the republic with an equal number, upon any attack within the gulph of Venice, from La Valora extending along the coaſt to the city of Venice; that the ſeveral proportions and quotas for general expeditions, ſhould be ſuch as we have ſpecified above. And it was further agreed, that the operations of every campaign ſhould be ſettled the autumn preceding, the pope being appointed arbiter in all differences which might ariſe. Laſtly, it was ſtipulated, that none of the allies ſhould even hint at a c ſeparate peace, without the joint conſent of all the parties. A place was left for the emperor, the kings of France and Portugal, to embrace the league, if they choſe it [t].

The conditions of the treaty between Philip, the pope, and the Venetians.

THIS treaty of alliance was made public on the eleventh of June, with the uſual formalities: then the ſenate entered upon conſultations with the allies, concerning the operations of the war, and what inſtructions ſhould be given to their admirals; it being a maxim with the republic to limit them with particular orders, the tranſgreſſion of which is capital. This practice, at the ſame time that it has its advantages, is alſo ſubject to many inconveniencies, as by it many happy opportunities are loſt of annoying the enemy, and ſerving the ſtate. In this conſultation, it was determined immediately to hazard a battle, the iſſue of which would probably alter the ſentiments of thoſe, who attributed the long continuance of the d war to the delays of the Spaniards, and likewiſe eaſe the allies of the heavy burthen of new levies, and augmentation of ſtores and ſhipping. It was likewiſe decreed, that the war ſhould be conducted with ſpirit, with bold puſhes and activity; and that the hurry of intrepidity, which in other caſes might probably precipitate into deſtruction, would in this war be the ſureſt means of ſafety, and the only road to victory. It was further determined, to give Venieri orders to omit no opportunity of fighting the enemy, and even before the junction of the allies, provided they were not unreaſonably ſuperior in ſtrength: the ſame orders were ſent to Colonna by the pope. Ambaſſies were diſpatched to the emperor, to the kings of Poland and Portugal, to invite them into the league; which negotiations the pope took upon himſelf.

e AMIDST theſe preparations, Muſtapha was not idle in Cyprus: having ſent to Nicoſia for his cannon, he broke up winter-quarters, and removed his camp to Famagoſta. Forty thouſand ſoldiers, labourers, and pioneers, were employed in repairing the works deſtroyed by the beſieged: he alſo drew trenches round the city, raiſed batteries of bombs and cannon, with which he played vigorouſly on the garriſon. The number of the beſieged amounted to four thouſand foot, and eight hundred horſe, beſides three thouſand of the townſmen and peaſants in arms, and two hundred Albanians, who performed notable ſervices. Antonio Bragadino had the ſupreme direction: Baglioni was the next in command. The former was governor of the citadel: Neſtor Martinenga was general of the artillery; and Laurentio Tiepoli had an honourable rank, and great authority. Under the conduct of theſe officers were
f the efforts of the Turks to be oppoſed, and the city defended againſt a powerful army, without any immediate hope of relief from the allies. The Turkiſh works went on with ſpirit, and daily approaches were made towards the ramparts. As ſoon as they had compleated ten little forts round the city, in which were placed their heavieſt cannon, they played with fury on the walls, battering the whole ſouth ſide of the city for ſeveral days without intermiſſion. Over this attack Muſtapha preſided in perſon: nor did the garriſon oppoſe him with leſs vigour; their ſucceſs was greater, four thouſand Turks having already been killed by the artillery. For four days both ſides continued to fire with irreſiſtible fury, when the beſieged made a partition of the command, aſſigning certain diſtricts to each of the ſuperior officers. The Turks ſent a trumpet with letters to the garriſon; but Baglioni returned him g with an anſwer full of reſolution and courage. On the following day, after a warm action ſupported with vigour, thoſe letters were found in the foſſe, ſummoning the inhabitants to ſurrender, and promiſing them full ſecurity of their freedom and property: but, inſtead of complying, the garriſon exerted themſelves with redoubled efforts, and ſo hotly charged the enemy with great and ſmall arms, that it was ſaid their loſs amounted to thirty thouſand men, beſides ſeveral batteries diſmounted. However, apprehending a ſcarcity of ammunition, they limited the number of charges to every gun, hoping by this means to make their powder laſt, until they could receive ſupplies from Candia. a

At length, after great ſlaughter, the Turks carried their approaches to the bottom of the walls; upon which, they ſet about filling the ditch with the utmoſt diligence, which the beſieged left no means untried to oppoſe. A kind of ſconces were contrived by Joannes Mormeri to defend them from the ſhot of the enemy; but he being unfortunately killed, the Turks became maſters of the ditch: here they erected works to ſkreen them from the fire of the garriſon, placing before them large ſacks of wool and earth. Thus covered, they began to ſap the walls, and to open mines, which the beſieged often rendered uſeleſs by countermines, at the ſame time retarding the operations of the beſiegers by perpetual ſkirmiſhes, ſallies, and a continued fire of muſquetry and cannon. Baglioni exerted himſelf in a manner altogether incredible; his reſolution and courage ſurmounted every hazard and fatigue; in body and mind he ſeemed invincible, being every where preſent, and directing the vigour and intrepidity of the ſoldier with the conduct, magnanimity, and preſence of mind of a general. He animated, exhorted, and ſpirited his men to action by his voice and example: the languid he excited, comforted the oppreſſed with wounds or wearineſs, and praiſed and rewarded the brave and perſevering. b

At length the mine under the parapet was fired, which blew up with ſo terrible an exploſion, as equally terrified the beſiegers and beſieged. A breach was made in the walls, which the Turks ſtorming, met with a reſiſtance they little expected. Baglioni, aſſembling his men, attacked the Turks with ſuch fury, that they were driven headlong from the breach. They renewed the aſſault, and were a ſecond time repulſed. Not diſcouraged, they mounted the breach in greater numbers, imagining their perſeverance would tire out the beſieged: but in this they were deceived; for Baglioni had ſo well concerted his meaſures with the other officers, that the fatigued and wounded were carried off, and their places ſupplied with freſh troops from the other quarters. By this means, after five ſucceſſive attacks, all the endeavours of the Turks were fruſtrated, and they were compelled to abandon the breach with prodigious ſlaughter. The loſs on the ſide of the beſieged was inconſiderable, had it not been for the death of two brave officers, the count Giovanno Franciſco Goro and Bernardino Eugebino: their greateſt diſtreſs aroſe from the fatigue endured from the time the Turks became maſters of the ditch. In the day, they were continually employed in diſturbing the operations of the enemy, and at night in repairing the breaches made by the miners, and furious diſcharge of heavy cannon. In doing this, the moſt precious carpets, tapeſtry, and other houſhold furniture, were uſed without repining; and the proprietors beheld them blown up into the air, crumbled by cannon balls, or deſtroyed by loads of earth and ſand, happy in the conſideration that they prolonged the date of their liberty. To this was added, the fatigue of being conſtantly under arms from the frequent alarms. On the eighth day after the laſt aſſault, a new mine was ſprung, which blew up with ſo much ſucceſs, that ſeveral yards of the wall were intirely carried away, and a breach made ſufficient to admit twenty men a-breaſt. To this both the aſſailants and defendants flocked with a fury almoſt incredible; hope ſpurring on the former, while deſpair, and the laſt efforts of expiring liberty, animated the latter. The combat was incredibly obſtinate and bloody, both ſides exerting a power more than natural; when at length the Turks gave way, and were ſoon after totally routed, and driven before the garriſon: here the women, children, and clergy fought like ſoldiers, annoying the enemy with ſcalding water, burning ſulphur and pitch, with a fury not to be paralled in hiſtory. The biſhop of Lemiſſo, with a croſier in his hand, ſtood in the breach, exhorting, entreating, and animating the troops with temporal and ſpiritual arguments. In ſhort, their enthuſiaſtic courage ſurmounted every difficulty; and the Turks, aſtoniſhed at ſo much bravery, found the garriſon impregnable againſt human ſtrength, and to be conquered only by delay. For this reaſon, they determined to be leſs frequent in aſſaults, which had coſt them the lives of ſo many thouſand ſoldiers, with a loſs altogether inconſiderable on the ſide of the beſieged. However, after their artillery had played for ſeveral days with ſome ſucceſs upon the walls, another mine was ſprung, by which the counterſcarp was totally demoliſhed. A body of four thouſand janiſſaries was choſen to enter the breach, which they did with great intrepidity, being ſupported by another corps of ſix thouſand ſelect ſoldiers. The reſiſtance of the beſieged was equal to what might be expected from their former valour; but the event did not correſpond. After a violent conflict for three hours, the Turks remained in poſſeſſion of the counterſcarp, the beſieged being forced to abandon it through wearineſs and want of numbers: their retreat, however, was made with ſuch order, after ſo obſtinate a reſiſtance, that the victors had little c d e f g a to boaſt of an advantage gained with terrible ſlaughter. To the number of two thouſand had been blown up by the ingenious but horrible contrivance of Baglioni, who ſprung a countermine, as ſoon as the enemy had in ſufficient numbers mounted the breach.

By loſing the counterſcarp, the garriſon was forced to perpetual watchings, with which they were already harraſſed, to raiſe new defences againſt the beſiegers, and to maintain conſtant ſallies to impede their progreſs. The Turks were indefatigable; they had now brought their whole camp to the very walls; they were induſtriouſly raiſing works to cover their farther approaches; and conſtructing batteries for driving the beſieged from the poſts they poſſeſſed. Nor were the defendants leſs aſſiduous in filling up all the breaches with hides, wet earth, wool, and other materials. In this employment, the induſtry, vigilance, b and ſpirit of the women were amazing: they divided themſelves into troops, and, without regarding quality or age, ſtood up in the defence of liberty, by labouring in the moſt ſervile occupations. Females of the firſt faſhion might be ſeen ſweating under loads of earth, heavy ſtones to repair the walls, or water to extinguiſh the flames kindled by the bombs thrown into the city. After ſeveral fruitleſs attempts upon the gates, the enemy took a ſhorter method, by throwing, with great force, burning torches into the town, which ſeizing hold of the houſes, took off the attention of the beſieged from the out-works. So dreadful a ſmoke was raiſed, that the Turks, unſeen, began to open another mine; but ſtill the vigilance of Baglioni prevailed; ſpringing another ſucceſsful countermine, he fruſtrated the attempts of the Turks. At length famine was like to effect what foiled all the endeavours Famine in the city.
c of the beſiegers. Corn, wine, and proviſions having long been conſumed, the garriſon had, for ſeveral days, drank vinegar mixed with water, inſtead of wine, and eat the moſt nauſeous animals in the place of their uſual proviſions. Theſe inconveniences were chearfully ſupported: the ſoldiers murmured not, becauſe their officers ſet the example by ſharing every hardſhip; but now every kind of proviſions were exhauſted, and they muſt either ſubmit or ſtarve. The Italians in garriſon were reduced from four thouſand to one-fourth of that number, moſt of them having died, not by the ſword, but of loathſome diſeaſes, the conſequence of bad living. The Greeks were proportionably diminiſhed; which at laſt began to ſtagger the reſolution of the inhabitants, who had hitherto remained firm. In this extremity, they preſented a petition to Bragadino and Baglioni, requeſting of them not
d to carry their obſtinacy to the total deſtruction of the city, maſſacre of their wives, children, and all that was dear to them. They remonſtrated, that their fidelity or conſtancy could never be accuſed, as they had ſupported every evil, braved every danger, as long as the leaſt hope of relief or liberty remained: but that now theſe were extinguiſhed, and it was unreaſonable to purſue a conduct that muſt, in a few days, terminate their lives by famine or the ſword. At preſent, it was probable that Muſtapha would grant honourable terms, which was more than they could poſſibly expect after the garriſon was weakened with ſickneſs, famine, and fatigue.

To this petition Bragadino anſwered in a courteous and obliging manner. He commended their courage, ſoothed their deſpair, and aſſured them, that if the ſuccours he exe pected did not ſoon arrive, he would take every precaution to ſave the lives and freedom of men deſerving of the higheſt honours. Thus all again determined to wait the event of the general's promiſe.

The Turks having now finiſhed their works, ſprung a mine under the citadel, by which a conſiderable opening was made, which they attempted to ſtorm; but were ſoon repulſed by the ſuperior courage of the beſieged. Next day another aſſault was given, in which, after a ſharp conflict of ſix hours, the Turks were again defeated with great loſs. At laſt powder failed the beſieged, and they were reduced to a few charges only: proviſions had long been wanting; and they now had intelligence, that Barzotti Barbaro, coming with ſupplies from Candia, was ſhipwrecked. In ſhort, every thing contributing to conquer the f ſpirit of this brave garriſon, they were finally compelled to enter upon terms of capitulation. Accordingly a treaty was ſet on foot, and hoſtages exchanged. Commiſſioners for ſettling the articles having met, the following terms were agreed to by both parties: viz. That the Capitulates on honourable terms. officers and ſoldiers ſhould march out with all the honours of war, drums beating, colours flying, five pieces of cannon, all their baggage, and be conveyed in ſafety to Candia, under an eſcort of three Turkiſh gallies; and that the inhabitants ſhould remain in the free uſe of their religion, untouched in their property, and in full poſſeſſion of their freedom. Theſe conditions having been mutually ſigned, the garriſon marched out, and the ſoldiers embarked on board the ſhips provided for them by Muſtapha. Next day Bragadino went to pay his compliments to Muſtapha, attended by Baglioni, Martinenga, and ſome of the chief g officers. At firſt they met with a civil reception, Muſtapha ordering a ſeat to be placed for Bragadino on his own right hand. They ſoon entered into diſcourſe about the priſoners; and Muſtapha taxing Bragadino with ſome violences committed by the garriſon during the ſuſpenſion granted for ſettling a capitulation, Bragadino, with a generous diſdain, denied the charge, calling it falſe and deſigning. Upon which Muſtapha, riſing up in a fury, ordered him to be bound hand and foot, and the others maſſacred before his face, without regard to hoſpitality, their bravery, the treaty ſubſiſting, or their being unarmed. Bragadino was reſerved for a more cruel treatment; after being inſulted with the moſt vilifying and opprobrious language; after undergoing the moſt excruciating tortures; after having his ears, noſe, and lips ſlit, his neck was ſtretched upon a block, and trampled upon by the daſtardly Muſtapha, who aſked him where was now that Chriſt whom he worſhipped, and why he did not deliver him out of his hands? At the ſame time the ſoldiers on board the fleet were deſpoiled of every thing, and laſhed to the oars, This day's work being finiſhed, Muſtapha entered the city, where he gave immediate orders that Tiepolo ſhould be hanged upon a gibbet. A few days after, before Bragadino had recovered from the wounds he had received, he was carried in deriſion to all the breaches made in the walls, loaded with buckets filled with earth and mortar, and ordered to kiſs the ground as often as he paſſed by Muſtapha; a ſpectacle that raiſed pangs of pity in the callous hearts of the meaneſt Turkiſh ſoldiers, but could not move compaſſion in the obdurate breaſt of Muſtapha. Afterwards the brave Bragadino was cooped up in a cage, and ignominiouſly hung to a ſail-yard in one of the gallies, where his intrepid ſoldiers were chained to the oars. This ſight rendered them almoſt furious: they exclaimed againſt the baſeneſs, the treachery of Muſtapha: they called aloud for revenge, and deſired to be ſet at liberty that they might, even without arms, reſcue their brave general, and inflict the deſerved puniſhment upon their mean, daſtardly, and cowardly foes. Their requeſt was anſwered with cruel laſhes; Bragadino was taken down, conducted to the market-place, amidſt the din of trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, where he was flayed alive, and a period put to his glorious life. His ſkin was hung, by way of trophy, to the ſail-yard of a galley ſent round all the coaſts to inſult the Venetians. In which manner periſhed the intrepid Bragadino, who ſuffered equally by the dilatorineſs of the republic, and the barbarity of an haughty enemy (A). His head, with thoſe of Andrea Bragadino his brother, Lodovico Martinenga, and the brave Quirino, were ſent as preſents to Selim. As for Hercules Martinenga, he unhappily, ſay our hiſtorians, eſcaped the firſt fury of Muſtapha, renounced his religion, and entered into the ſervice of Selim, where he in a ſhort time arrived at high honours (B).

THE taking of Famagoſta was an advantage of high conſequence to the Turks; and had they not ſullied their victory with the treacherous and barbarous maſſacre of ſo many heroes, poſterity would have done juſtice to their perſeverance, and deemed them deſerving of the conqueſt. By poſſeſſing Famagoſta, they became abſolute maſters of the rich, fertile, and famous iſland of Cyprus, for which they had ſo eager and long a deſire. It coſt them from their firſt landing about an hundred thouſand lives, and many officers of the firſt rank and merit in the Turkiſh ſervice.

DURING theſe tranſactions in Cyprus, that the Chriſtians might not be leſs employed in other parts, the baſhaw of Negropont put to ſea in June with a formidable fleet, and arrived in the night at Malacca, a port of Candia, unperceived by the inhabitants. Another Turkiſh fleet ſailed to the gulph of Suda, where they waſted, burnt, and deſtroyed all the neighbouring villages, carrying off a great number of the inhabitants into ſlavery. Upon this the Venetians collected about thirty gallies to oppoſe the enemy, from which deſign they were diverted by a ſtorm. In the mean time, Hali Uluzzali, ſeizing the opportunity, ſent forty gallies towards Rattimo, where landing the troops, the moſt beautiful of cities was taken and burnt, after the conquerors had loaded themſelves with rich booty. Leaving this place, they made an attempt, with very different ſucceſs, upon Canu, a port in Candia, where they

(A) He bore his ſufferings with ſuch an admirable conſtancy, that with great calmneſs he reaſoned with Muſtapha upon the duties of honour, virtue, and a ſoldier. He then taxed him with perfidy, cruelty, and cowardice, qualities the leaſt becoming a general of all men. After his skin was pulled down to his navel, the force applied by the executioner made the blood ſtream out; upon which, with amazing firmneſs, he cried out upon *Chriſt*s ſufferings. But theſe are ſcenes we cannot deſcribe without horror. The reader may ſee them at large in Paruta, Mauroceni, and other Venetian hiſtorians.

(B) We cannot avoid taking notice of the fate of the famous Maggi. This gentleman was of a good family, had been early tinctured with ſcience, which he improved with great application and force of genius, having made an amazing progreſs in philoſophy, mathematics, and the liberal arts, of which he left many monuments uſeful to poſterity. His profeſſion was the civil law, in which he was deeply skilled. This he practiſed in Cyprus, till he had raiſed himſelf from a ſlender fortune to opulence and the ſummit of his profeſſion. Among other Venetians he fell on the taking of Famagoſta into the hands of the Turks, by whom he was enſlaved, and employed in the moſt laborious and ſervile occupations. He often comforted himſelf by reflecting on the circumſtances of Eſop, Menippus, Epictetus, and other ancient philoſophers. At length, oppreſſed by toil and ſickneſs, he became unfit for labour, and was knocked by his cruel maſter on the head, without regard to his ſervices or merit (1).

a were ſo warmly attacked by Franciſco Juſtiniano, that they retired with the loſs of four thouſand men. Hence the ſquadron ſteered to the iſland of Cerigo, which was deſolated with a barbarous fury; as if to revenge their late diſgrace, they would commit the moſt enormous barbarities on the weak and defenceleſs. Motions of the Turkiſh fleet.

ALL this while Venieri lay with the bulk of the Venetian fleet at Corfu, waiting to be reinforced, and impatient of delay. From hence he detached ſome gallies to bring him advice of the motions and ſtrength of the enemy. They returned with intelligence that the Turks were ſailed to Zacyntho. Afterwards Troni was ſent out to bring farther advice; but being driven out of his courſe by a ſtorm, he fell into the hands of the enemy. As ſoon as the Turks had learnt of Troni that the Venetian fleet lay at Corfu, they determined to ſail in b queſt of it: but Venieri, knowing his inferior ſtrength, retired to Meſſina, in order to be joined by the confederates. After this, the Turks making a deſcent on the iſlands of Zacyntho and Cephalonia, carried off priſoners to the amount of ſix thouſand ſouls; ſteering from thence to Batrinto, where they expected to overtake Venieri[a]. Diſappointed in this expectation, the fleet ſteered to Albania, whither Achmet, the beglerbeg of Greece, had come with numerous forces, to ſuppreſs ſome inſurrections which appeared among the Stradiots in favour of the republic. Achmet marched to Scutari at the head of a choice body of infantry: finding himſelf too weak to enter upon action, he ſent for a reinforcement to the fleet. Accordingly forty gallies filled with ſoldiers were detached to his aſſiſtance. In their way, this ſquadron met with two Venetian gallies, whom they took after a warm

c conteſt. Soon after ſome Venetian tranſports fell in their way, and became an eaſy prey. They lay waſte Cephalonia, &c. A Turkiſh army enters Albania.

HAVING received this reinforcement, Achmet marched to Delvino, to which he laid ſiege with a numerous army and train of artillery; the fleet alſo was detained to block up the harbour, and a galley diſpatched to Uluzzali to aſſiſt his ſquadron. This officer, after having ſeized upon ſome of the republic's merchantmen, ſailed in company with Hali to the coaſt of Dalmatia, where the latter landing with a ſtrong corps, attacked Soppoto and took it, after a very gallant reſiſtance, in which he loſt a great number of men: here the whole garriſon was put to the ſword, the town plundered, and then deſerted. Emanuel Mormori, by whoſe bravery the city had been taken from the Turks the preceding year, became now their priſoner and ſlave. From hence Hali went to Durazzo, where he was joined by Uluzzali.

d SARRA MARTINENGA commanded in Delvino: he had long ſerved in a conſiderable capacity in the French army, where he acquired great reputation; but peace with Spain enſuing, and the civil wars being compoſed, he returned to Venice, and was appointed to the government of this city. He now ſhewed himſelf deſerving of the truſt repoſed in him: with a ſlender garriſon, ill provided with water, ſtores, and proviſions, he ſtood a ſiege of thirty days againſt a potent enemy. The intrepid conduct of Hermalao Tiepolo had twice, with great hazard, relieved him with ſcanty ſupplies of water. After having fulfilled every duty which his country, his honour, and courage required, he was at length forced to yield to numbers, and the extremity to which he was reduced: but he capitulated upon honourable terms, having ſtipulated for all the honours of war, the effects of the ſoldiers, e and hoſtages for the ſecurity of the liberty and property of the citizens. Theſe articles were kept no better than thoſe at Famagoſta, although the breach of them aroſe from no treachery of Achmet. The naval officers had claimed a ſhare in the reduction of Delvino, which ſo highly incenſed Achmet, who alone had undergone all the fatigue of the ſiege, that he admitted his troops within the walls, where they immediately fell to plundering, with an eagerneſs peculiar to the Turks. The naval officers, equally deſirous of ſharing the booty as the glory with Achmet, landed a large body of ſeamen, who joined in ſacking the town and maſſacring the garriſon, until not a ſoul eſcaped alive beſides Martinenga and Hieronymo Venieri, who were ſaved by the humanity of the baſhaw[b]. Martinenga has been

f blamed by ſome hiſtorians for ſurrendering the town ſooner than his ſituation required, but unjuſtly, as at the time of capitulation he was confined to his bed, and when aſked concerning the capitulation, ſaid that a man deprived of the ability of fighting had no opinion.

IN the mean time the Turkiſh officers conſulted whether ſo late in the ſeaſon they might venture upon the ſiege of Catharra; but as they could come to no reſolution, they ſent to Conſtantinople, for the Grand Seignior's orders. That the intermediate time might not be waſted, Caracoſa, a captain of pirates, and Uluzzali, baſhaw of Algiers, were ſent with a ſquadron of forty gallies to make an attempt on Caſtlenuovo, and then on Carzola. The former of theſe towns was commanded by Antonio Balbi, who, upon ſight of the enemy, offered to ſubmit, for which he was deſervedly ſtigmatized with perpetual baniſhment. What rendered his diſgrace the more remarkable was, that the women of the place, per-

g ceiving his and the garriſon's intention to ſurrender, ſeized upon their arms, ſhields, and coats of mail, and mounting the ramparts, headed by Roſſello Dalmatin, a prieſt, by their hoſtile appearance, ſaved the city from an attack, the Turks turning their courſe to Leſſina, a which was deſerted by the governor, who retired into the citadel on the enemy's approach.

The Turks ſet fire to the town, and ran about pillaging the iſland; but they were attacked by the inhabitants, who formed themſelves into a body, and driven with ſlaughter to the fleet, many of them being drowned in the tumult [c].

A. D. 1571. In this manner ended the operations of the campaign. By the enſuing ſpring, Colonna had got in readineſs his complement of twelve gallies, with which he ſet ſail to Meſſina:
here waited Venieri, with intention of joining him; but that officer was detained at Corfu by various accidents. Colonna, underſtanding that the Venetian fleet was in great danger from the vicinity of the Turkiſh admiral, and their inferiority, ſent repeated meſſages to Venieri to ſet ſail for Sicily, which he did as ſoon as the ſituation of affairs would admit. In the mean b while, Don John of Auſtria, having finiſhed the war in Granada, arrived at Barcelona, and there embarking two regiments, he ſet ſail for Genoa. After aſſembling ſome troops here, and getting ready a number of gallies and tranſports, he ſteered for Meſſina, to join Venieri and Colonna, leaving Doria and the marquis of Santa Cruz to bring up the remainder of the army and fleet. He arrived at Meſſina after a ſhort and proſperous voyage, and was welcomed by the two confederate admirals, and the loud acclamations of the ſoldiers and mariners [d]. Next day he called a council of war, at which were preſent himſelf, Venieri, Colonna, Lodovico Requeſnes, lieutenant in the abſence of Doria, Pompey Colonna, and Agoſtino Barba- rigo. He opened the council with a ſhort apology for the delays on the part of his Catholic majeſty; laid before them the number and condition of his forces, which conſiſted of twenty-two thouſand foot, of which eight thouſand eight hundred were Spaniſh, eleven thouſand c Italians, and the remainder Germans, with a numerous artillery, ninety gallies, and twenty-two tranſports. He then lamented the ſtate of affairs; complained of the ſurmiſes which had been ſpread, equally injurious to Philip and his own honour. He ſaid, that the deſire of avoiding battle was not the cauſe of the delays, but real and inſurmountable difficulties; that the moment theſe had ceaſed, the fleet and army were got with the utmoſt expedition in readineſs, and now it was their buſineſs, he ſaid, to recover the loſt time by a double portion of induſtry, activity, and zeal. Venieri and Colonna returned him thanks for his obliging apology; and the former imagining there was no other impediment, propoſed that they ſhould immediately ſeek the enemy. To this Don John objected, under the ſame pretexts offered d the year before by Doria, although he was ſenſible that the harbours, towns, and territories of the republic were groaning under all the ſeverities of a cruel and rigorous war. He ſaid, that it would be folly to leave Meſſina before the whole fleet was united, as the enemy were greatly ſuperior in ſtrength and number of ſhips; nor would he permit the Chriſtian fleet, in which conſiſted the public ſecurity, to be precipitated into manifeſt danger.

Don John of Auſtria joins the combined fleet.

As ſoon as the Turks underſtood that the combined fleet was at Meſſina, they weighed anchor from Catharra, and ſailed to Corfu, where they continued fifteen days, plundering the villages and ſuburbs of the towns, without attempting to lay ſiege to any fortified places.
Towards the beginning of September, they ſteered for Conſtantinople, ravaging Cephalonia a ſecond time with all the horrors of war. Stopping in the gulph of Lepanto, they ſent to e Selim for further inſtructions; and in the mean while ſent out the famous pirate Caragiali in queſt of the Chriſtian fleet, to procure the beſt intelligence poſſible; but, after his return, the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, that, imagining no ſteps would for this year be taken by the confederates, the corſairs of Barbary were diſmiſſed, to the number of forty gallies, well armed and provided. After which the baſhaw, leaving Hali in the gulph of Lepanto with one hundred and fifty gallies, went to Conſtantinople to ſpend the winter [e].

Mean while the ſixty gallies, left in Candia for the relief of Famagoſta, hearing of the fate of that unhappy city, ſet ſail for Meſſina, agreeable to Venieri's orders. Upon their arrival, the whole Venetian fleet amounted to one hundred and nine gallies, and ſix men of war.
Then the admirals met to conſult on their operations: Venieri preſſed Don John of Auſtria, f that, laying aſide all heſitation and delay, the Turkiſh fleet might be attacked, ſaying, that if they avoided battle, they ſhould by all endeavours be reduced to the neceſſity of fighting.
Here Don John again raiſed doubts and ſcruples; and though he did not openly oppoſe the propoſition, yet he waſted the time that might have been better employed in action. He made ſuch objections, ſowed ſuch diſſentions among the officers, and ſo confounded their meaſures, that no plan could be propoſed, that did not meet with its cavillers and opponents.
Some, magnifying the ſtrength of the Turkiſh fleet, recommended caution, circumſpection, and deliberate councils; others, on the contrary, were for giving battle at all events; and this opinion they ſupported with arguments drawn from the neceſſity of affairs, the circum-ſtances of both ſides, the honour of the Chriſtian fleet, the intention of the confederacy, and g the articles of the treaty. To what purpoſe, ſaid they, have fleets and forces been collected

a together from ſo many different countries? Is it that the Venetians, who were always ſuperior to danger while they confided in their own courage and virtue, ſhould be ruined by repoſing truſt in the moſt ſolemn engagements with their allies? Is it that they may become the jeſt of Philip, of Don John, and of mankind? They were therefore for fighting at all hazards:

THESE ſentiments were frequently repeated in council before a full aſſembly of general officers, and they were ſupported by the earneſt exhortations of the pope's legate on board, who gave them the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of victory, through the mediation of the prayers of his holineſs. At laſt, overcome with ſhame, Don John of Auſtria publicly gave orders that every thing ſhould be got ready for engaging. This order was received with the joyful Don John reſolves to fight.
b acclamations of the whole fleet, eſpecially of the Venetians, who wanted nothing ſo much as to revenge the many barbarities committed by the infidels. The prince examined the condition of every ſhip, the number of her crew, and the ſtate of her ſtores, arms, and proviſions, with a minute exactneſs. The Venetian fleet was found well provided in every thing, beſides men, of whom a great number had periſhed by ſickneſs. To remedy this deficiency, four thouſand of his troops, of whom fifteen hundred were Italians, were diſtributed among the Venetian gallies. The fleet was then drawn up in order of battle, in which manner it proceeded againſt the enemy, with all poſſible caution, in four diviſions, each diſtinguiſhed by a flag. Three diviſions compoſed the van: the fourth continued in the rear, ready to aſſiſt and ſuccour the parts hardeſt preſſed. The diviſion on the right, com-
c poſed of fifty gallies, was commanded by Doria: that on the left, conſiſting of an equal number, by Agoſtino Barbarigo: Don John himſelf kept the center; and the rear, conſiſting of thirty gallies, was committed to the conduct of Alvaro Baſſiano. Six large Venetian men of war were towed in front, two being placed before each diviſion to break the firſt effort of the enemy, and annoy them by their heavy artillery: ten gallies beſides were kept without the line, to provide for all ſudden emergencies, and againſt all accidents; and eight gallies were diſpatched, under Colonna, to reconnoitre the enemy, and bring advice of their diſpoſition [f].

IN this order the Chriſtian fleet arrived, on the eighteenth of September, at Capo delle Colonne, where they were detained for three days by contrary winds. Venieri propoſed they
d ſhould ſteer for Cephalonia, in order to intercept the Turkiſh fleet, which, from the lateſt accounts, was at Corfu, and by that means force them to engage. Don John was of a contrary opinion: he preferred ſailing directly to Corfu with the whole fleet; and his opinion prevailed. Accordingly Baſſano was diſpatched to Tarento, and Canalis to Gallipoli, with orders to take ſome troops on board at thoſe places, and proceed directly to Corfu. Then weighing from Capo delle Colonne, the fleet arrived in four days at Corfu. Thence proceeding to the continent, they put into the port of Gominezze, where they were joined by Andrada, who returned with advice, that the Turks were in the gulph of Lepanto, and had detached ſixty ſail either to Conſtantinople or the coaſt of Barbary, for corn and other proviſions.

e ALL this time the infidels exerted the utmoſt diligence in procuring intelligence, and Preparations of the Turks.
ſtrengthening their fleet for action. Having ſome advice of the motions of the Chriſtians, the baſhaw returned to the fleet, recalled the piratical auxiliaries which he had diſmiſſed, and all the other ſquadrons detached on different purpoſes. Caragiali was intrepid enough to ſail in the night, with a ſmall ſquadron, through the combined fleet, to examine their number, ſituation, and deſigns. He even had the preſumption to land within ſhot of the allies, and take priſoners a body of ſoldiers, who ſtrolled about the ſhore, little ſuſpecting an enemy. From them the neceſſary intelligence was procured; upon which it was debated whether or no battle ſhould be offered. Hali, who was young, full of courage, ambitious f of glory, and eager for an opportunity of diſtinguiſhing himſelf, adviſed, that the Chriſtians ſhould be attacked at all events. This opinion was ſupported by a great majority; but oppoſed by Parthi, whoſe age and experience rendered him more circumſpect. Uluzzali ſeemed neuter, fearful of diſobliging either of the commanders: his cunning, plauſibility, and ambiguous diſcourſe, ſtill more confounded the Turkiſh counſels, and fomented the diviſions among the admirals. Sometimes he would ſeem to incline to Hali's opinion, as moſt becoming the dignity of ſo potent an emperor as Selim: again he would appear doubtful whether their force was equal to the importance and danger of the enterprize. This, he would ſay, was not his own opinion, but that of ſome experienced officers in the fleet, whom he did not chuſe to name: that the ſhips under his own conduct were well provided with men, arms, ammunition, and every thing fit to engage; but he was told it was not ſo in ſome
g other diviſions. He then added, that if his conduct hitherto was not a ſufficient ſecurity for his fidelity, he was willing now to give more ample teſtimony in battle. After he had a thus twiſted his ſentiments into all the circumvolutions and ambages of a ſly courtier, Barbaroſſa, the young dey of Algier, was called upon for his opinion. When this prince ſpoke, he magnified the vaſtneſs, power, and fortune of the Othoman empire; the diſcipline of the troops; the excellency of the officers, exalting them greatly above the effeminate, luxurious, emaſculated, and contentious Chriſtians, who were ſplit into various monarchies of ſeparate and contrary intereſts; and concluded with adviſing battle, with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of victory. This, he ſaid, the emperor deſired; this at leaſt became his potency and grandeur; nor was it lawful to heſitate a moment where the honour of their great monarch was concerned: his moſt diſtant hints were to be regarded with that reverence and reſpect due to the Deity. b

BARBAROSSA's ſentiments were ſeconded by thoſe of the greater number of the officers; but oppoſed by Parthi, ſangiack of Negropont, an officer who had gained great experience in naval affairs, and was poſſeſſed of an exquiſite judgment, devoid of all oſtentation, deceit, and vanity. He was an honeſt, virtuous, and brave mariner, who freely ſpoke his ſentiments, without regarding how they might be received by his ſuperiors. After refuting every thing advanced by Barbaroſſa, he aſked, Whether the Chriſtians had given any proofs of their effeminacy, debility, and cowardice, at Famagoſta, Malta, and other places? He aſked him, Whether the taking of the former was to be attributed to the Turkiſh bravery, or to the famine, ſickneſs, and every other evil that prevailed within the walls? He ſaid, that the Chriſtians had there exhibited proofs of intrepidity and conduct altogether amazing, c and which ought to immortalize the memory of thoſe unfortunate heroes, who met with a fate which they ill merited. An overweening pride, a contempt of the enemy, he ſaid, and a ſelf-ſufficiency, were not the paths to victory and glory; but a true eſtimation of each, a judicious, impartial, and diſpaſſionate compariſon, which was the duty of a true general. The Chriſtians, he ſaid, were not ſo contemptible as to be overawed by the formidable name of the Othoman arms; they muſt be conquered by dint of ſuperior courage and ſtrength: nor was Parthi ſo to interpret his inſtructions, as raſhly to engage on unequal terms; a defeat was leſs for the honour of the great monarch than a prudent reſerve, and cautious refuſal of battle, the event of which might probably be diſgraceful and ruinous. A prince, he ſaid, could not be diſhonoured but by the raſhneſs or timidity of his generals; but theſe d differed widely from true courage and prudence. A defeat would now ſully the glory of Selim, and rob him of the fruits of ſo many victories: he, therefore, adviſed that battle might be declined, as leſs hazardous and injurious to their affairs than inactivity, which was no more than a neceſſary relaxation after the toils of war. However, as this prudent advice was ſupported but by a few voices, Parthi ſaw himſelf under the neceſſity of taking meaſures, from which he perceived deſtruction would enſue: he remembered the diſgrace of Pinalis for a more trivial offence; and, with many ſobs and wailings, gave up his own judgment to the raſh impetuous torrent of juvenile councils, ſaying, he had rather periſh in the field than fall a ſacrifice to obloquy, the arts of envy, and the detraction of malevolence. To this he was the more induced by Selim's laſt inſtructions, read by Uluzzali in council, e for ſeizing the firſt opportunity of fighting the enemy [g].

This reſolution being formed, Mahomet, who had ſtrenuouſly diſſuaded them from battle, was diſpatched into the inner parts of the gulph of Lepanto, to collect as many troops and ſhips as could poſſibly be got together. He drew from the neighbouring garriſons about four thouſand horſe, whom he diſmounted, and put on board the fleet. Mahomet, ſangiack of Morea, ſent fifteen hundred more horſe, after having diſmounted them, and altered their arms to that of infantry. After this Caracoſa, a renowned pirate, was ſent for intelligence.

The confederacy among the Chriſtians almoſt broke off by a trivial occurrence.

In the mean time, a trivial occurrence had like to have diſſolved the league, and given the Turks all the advantage they could deſire. One of the commiſſioners, a Spaniard, ap- f pointed by Don John of Auſtria, for victualling the fleet, had conducted himſelf with great arrogance and ill manners towards many of the Venetian officers: upon which Venieri reprehended him gently; but the fellow retorting abuſe and ſcurrility, Venieri gave orders he ſhould be ſeized. The commiſſioner, aſſiſted by ſome other Spaniards, not only reſiſted, but ſlew the officer in the diſcharge of his duty, which ſo highly incenſed Venieri, that he ordered the commiſſioner and his accomplices immediately to be hanged at the yard-arm, without conſulting Don John. The Spaniſh general regarded this conduct as an inſult upon his authority; and his indignation received additional fuel from the remonſtrances of the Spaniſh officers, eſpecially Doria, who hoped from thence to breed ſuch diſſentions as might fruſtrate the reſolution of the council, and even diſſolve the confederacy. They inſiſted g upon ſatisfaction; but the moderation and prudence of Colonna and Barbarigo healed the a wounds made by the impetuous and warm temper of Venieri, and baffled all the endeavours of Doria to bring this affair to an open rupture. They ſo ſtrongly recommended the neceſſity of unanimity to Don John, that he was reconciled to Venieri, and determined to proſecute the plan laid down in council [h].

But the Spaniſh officers, who were ever averſe to coming to a battle with the Turks, raiſed new cavils, by propoſing that the fleet ſhould inveſt ſome of the cities lately taken by the Turks on the coaſt of Dalmatia. This, they ſaid, would draw Parthi out of the gulph of Lepanto to the ſuccour of the place, when they could engage him to more advantage than in a narrow channel. Although this advice was plauſible, the Venetians eaſily perceived that the ultimate intention of it was to avoid battle: they therefore inſiſted on purſuing the former re-
b ſolution, and ſailing immediately to the mouth of the gulph, when, beyond doubt, the impatient and haughty diſpoſition of the Turks would induce them to come out and engage. A third propoſition was, that they ſhould lay aſide all contention about things of little importance, and unanimouſly attack Navarra and Modon, by the taking of which they would reap real utility and glory. It was probable that the Turks would attempt the relief of thoſe towns: if they did, there would be an opportunity of fighting; if not, the ſurrender of places ſo important would pave the way for an inſurrection in the Morea, where the inhabitants were quite oppreſſed with the galling yoke of ſervitude [i].

Agreeable to this propoſal, a reſolution was formed of ſailing directly to the Morea, and there determining operations by circumſtances. All things being got in readineſs, the c fleet weighed from the coaſt of Albania, and ſailing in the order we have before deſcribed, purſued her courſe to Cephalonia, where the allies arrived about the time that Hali, carrying all before him in council, had gained a majority againſt Parthi, and carried the reſolution of fighting the Chriſtians. The ſame miſtake prevailed in both fleets, each imagining that the other would decline coming to action. When the Turks were at Santa Maura, the confederates lay at Curſolari; ſo that the enemy could be deſcried from the tops. Upon this Don John of Auſtria, by the advice of Doria, gave ſtrict orders to Baſſano, who commanded the reſerve ſquadron in the rear, by all means to avoid joining battle, until it was certain that the enemy had no ſeparate diviſion in reſerve. Then Doria extended his line on the right, Barbarigo doing the ſame on the left, and going as cloſe to the ſhore as the d ſounding would permit it. The center was ranged by Don John, and the whole fleet diſpoſed in order of battle, without the leaſt confuſion or tumult. Immediately on the right of the royal galley which carried John of Auſtria, were ſtationed Colonna and the pope's ſquadron: on the left ſtood the Venetians, with two large Venetian men of war placed before each diviſion [k].

On the other hand, the Turks, ſeeing the Chriſtian fleet making ſail towards them, inſtantly cleared the ſhips, and made every thing ready to engage, with the greateſt alacrity, expedition, and good order. In the center Parthi, the high admiral, took his ſtation, having on both ſides one hundred and thirty gallies ranged in line of battle. At the diſtance of ſixty ſhips from his right, Hali took poſt with eighty gallies, which he drew up
e cloſe to the ſhore, to oppoſe Barbarigo. The ſangiack of Alexandria commanded in the right wing, and Uluzzali on the left, the whole fleet being ranged in a ſtraight line, contrary to the uſual cuſtom of the Turks, who generally form a creſcent. Both ſides appointed a certain number of light veſſels to ſail conſtantly round the fleets, to bring intelligence to the admirals of the ſtate of affairs. When the fleets approached within a ſmall diſtance, Don John, taking the confederate ſtandard in his hand, accompanied by Venieri and Colonna, went into a barge, and rowed round the fleet, exhorting and animating them to an exertion of their abilities and courage, which was anſwered by cheers over the whole line. Returning to his own ſhip, he made a ſhort ſpeech to the crew, of which they teſtified their applauſe by chearful ſhouts, which were ecchoed back by the fleet.

f On a ſudden the wind, which was hitherto adverſe to the Chriſtian fleet, ceaſed, and a perfect calm enſued: now it was that Doria was diſcovered to have changed the order of battle preſcribed. Inſtead of keeping the line, agreeable to orders, he turned the ſtems of his diviſion towards the ſhore on his right, to prevent being ſurrounded. This diſpoſition of Doria's had almoſt been attended with ruinous conſequences, as it gave the Turks an opportunity of breaking the line, although his hiſtorian attributes it to the ſuperior abilities of his hero. The centers joined battle, the firſt onſet being ſuſtained by the large ſhips in front, who played furiouſly with their heavy artillery on the Turkiſh gallies. Venieri ſent ſome large gallies to ſupport them, and his example was happily followed by Colonna; for the enemy, unable to bear this vigorous charge, divided to the right and left, the greater
g part going to the right, which was oppoſed to Barbarigo, on whom they diſcharged ſhowers of arrows, which darkened the ſky, attended, after their barbarous manner, with ſhrieks

and ſhouts. Getting between Barbarigo and the ſhore, with ſome light gallies, they furiouſly attacked him in rear, front, and flank. This brave officer oppoſed them with equal courage, and ſuperior abilities, having often repulſed, broke, and put them in confuſion. Victory had like to have declared for him, when, after an obſtinate conflict, during which he diſtinguiſhed every quality of a great commander, he was ſhot in the eye, of which wound he died the following day [l]. a

In his place ſucceeded Marino Contareni, his nephew, and the rival of his virtues, who, after puſhing the advantages gained by Barbarigo, and putting the enemy to flight; after having driven ſome on ſhore, ſunk and diſabled others, was ſlain by an arrow; and with him fell Viſconti Quirino, and Andrea Barbarigo. Purſuing the victory, the next in command kept ſo conſtant a fire upon the enemy, that, deſerting their ſhips, they fled on ſhore, many being drowned endeavouring to eſcape, and the veſſels daſhed in pieces againſt the rocks. The ſame good fortune attended the center of the combined fleet, where hardly a Turk eſcaped, no friendly ſhore being near to afford them refuge. On the right, the battle was ſupported by Doria on the one ſide, and Hali on the other. The Turks, by his wrong diſpoſition, got between him and the center of the fleet, where a violent conflict enſued, Doria reſolving to cloſe the line, and prevent his being ſurrounded, which he effected after a hard ſtruggle, and great loſs on the ſide of the enemy. Two gallies, in which the ſons of the Turkiſh general fought, were taken. Notwithſtanding this deſign was fruſtrated, the battle was renewed with freſh vigour by Venieri, ſeconded by Colonna, Matharin de l'Eſcut (A), a Frenchman, and ſeveral other commanders, flying to his ſupport. Don John at the ſame time, chuſing four hundred of the flower of the regiment of Sardinia, and accompanied by Lupo Fagoeroa, and a body of the young grandees of Spain, made an attack on Hali, ſurrounded by four hundred janiſſaries, and one hundred archers. The charge was given and received with great vigour; the diſpute was long, obſtinate, and bloody; victory for a long while appeared doubtful, and both fleets ſeemed to refer the iſſue of their differences to the event of the engagement between the two admirals. All beſides Venieri were idle ſpectators; and both parties laboured under the moſt terrible anxiety and fear for their commanders, while none thought of ſupporting them, ſeeming to look upon it as a trial of valour. At length Hali was killed, and his galley taken by Don John; but not without very conſiderable loſs of officers and ſoldiers [m]. b c

Now the ſea, diſcoloured with blood, was covered with floating mangled bodies. The ſhips on both ſides were filled with the dreadful ſpectacle of heads, arms, and legs ſevered from their bodies. The ſky was darkened with clouds of ſmoke; and the ears ſtunned with the dreadful roar of cannon, the ſhrieks of miſerable wretches periſhing by fire, by water, and the ſword. d

PARTHI, who had all this while been engaged in the hotteſt of the fight, was at laſt ſeparated from his diviſion, and ſingly encountered by four Venetian gallies. After he had maintained a ſharp conteſt till almoſt his whole crew was killed, he retired into a ſmall yacht he had prepared againſt extremities, and went off from the battle, leaving all his valuable effects a prey to the conquerors, and throwing out terrible execrations againſt Hali, and thoſe raſh counſellors who had reduced him to the neceſſity of flight. Of all the Turkiſh diviſion now only that under Uluzzali remained. This cunning officer, paſſing by Doria into the middle of the Chriſtian fleet, ſo contrived matters, that he could either engage or retreat at pleaſure. But when he perceived, by the imperial ſtandards being taken down, that Hali and Parthi were defeated, when the clouds of ſmoke were diſpelled, that he could plainly ſee the Turkiſh fleet deſtroyed, and the Chriſtians every where victorious, he then retired with precipitation. Some Venetian gallies that lay next him, obſerving his deſign, attacked him with great courage, imagining they ſhould be ſupported by Doria. They were greatly inferior in number and ſtrength to Uluzzali, having loſt more than half their complement of men in the former part of the action. However, determined to make up with courage what was wanting in power, the fight was maintained with fury, Uluzzali determining, at all hazards, to eſcape, and the Venetians fighting with expectation, that the arrival of Doria would ſoon relieve them: in which they were deceived, that treacherous admiral taking deſignedly a long ſweep, did not return, until he thought the Venetians muſt have been defeated, or the enemy ſo weakened as to become an eaſy prey. Obſerving this conduct, the Venetians placed their whole confidence in their own bravery, and determined rather to die than either yield, or leave an open paſſage to Uluzzali. The efforts they made were incredible, and ſuch as the Turks could not have withſtood, had they not been greatly ſuperior in number to their fatigued enemies. At length Uluzzali broke through, juſt as e f a Doria came up with a ſerious intention of attacking the enemy; but it was too late: a high ſea riſing prevented his purſuing them; however, after recovering two Venetian gallies, which Uluzzali's ſquadron was towing a-ſtern, he ſtood for the reſt of the fleet, having ſhamefully ended a battle, otherwiſe the moſt glorious upon record [n].

Such was the battle of Lepanto, in which it is difficult to ſay whether Don John of Auſtria, Colonna, or Venieri, proved themſelves the greateſt ſoldiers and commanders. Certain it is, that nothing could exceed the vigilance, conduct, and intrepidity of each. The Venetian diviſion had, indeed, ſupported the greater burthen of the engagement; but that was owing not to the fault of Don John or Colonna, but to the treachery of Doria, who almoſt the whole time kept aloof.

b The Turks likewiſe fought with incredible bravery, many gallies continuing the fight after almoſt the whole crews had been killed: others ſunk and periſhed by fire rather than ſtrike to the conquerors, and their fierceneſs remained after their power was extinguiſhed. About one hundred and thirty of their gallies were taken; the reſt of their fleet was either daſhed upon rocks, ſwallowed by the waves, or deſtroyed by fire, excepting about thirty ſhips, which Uluzzali carried back to Conſtantinople. Twenty-five thouſand of their men were killed, among whom were their two chief admirals, with many other officers of the firſt diſtinction; many were drowned, and about three thouſand five hundred were taken priſoners. On the ſide of the confederates, fifteen gallies were loſt, of which ten were Venetian; ten thouſand were ſlain in the action, or died of their wounds, which were unſkilfully
c treated. Among the latter was Agoſtino Barbarigo, whoſe prudence, experience, moderation, and courage, could not exempt him from that fate which his country and allies greatly lamented. His death, ſays Thuanus, was more than an equivalent for the liberty reſtored by his bravery to one thouſand two hundred Chriſtian captives in the Turkiſh fleet. Other officers of note likewiſe fell; but the grief on their account was abſorbed in the general joy for the victory, and mourning for the loſs of Barbarigo [o].

Next day, while the confederates were buſied in taking care of the wounded, a terrible ſtorm aroſe, which muſt have been attended with diſmal conſequences, had not Providence further diſplayed her goodneſs in ſecuring a ſafe harbour for the Chriſtian fleet, owing to a groſs miſtake the enemy committed in the beginning of the action. A perfect reconcilia-d tion between Don John and Venieri was effected: theſe warriors had diſplayed to each other ſo many virtues and noble actions in the courſe of their late operations, that they were fired with a mutual eſteem, which buried their former animoſities in oblivion. Upon this occaſion a council of war was ſummoned, in which it was reſolved, that, conſidering the number of the wounded, the ſcarcity of proviſions, and the ſeaſon of the year was now far advanced, the moſt adviſeable meaſure was to lay up the fleet to the enſuing ſeaſon, when they could return with redoubled vigour upon action, after the ſeamen and ſoldiers were refreſhed, and their ſhips refitted. This reſolution was by many people condemned as imprudent and unſeaſonable. All was in confuſion at Conſtantinople; the Turkiſh navy was intirely ruined; their coaſts and iſlands naked, deſerted, and in the utmoſt conſternation, while the confedee rates rode triumphant in the Archipelago [p]. By purſuing their advantages, the haughty Selim, it was confidently aſſerted, muſt have ſued for peace before the ſpring: nothing could have withſtood an armament fluſhed with ſo glorious a victory, much leſs an enemy drooping under their defeat, and deſponding in adverſity as much as they tyrannized in proſperity. The chief blame fell upon Venieri, as the republic was the moſt intereſted in terminating the war: he ought, with all his might, to have oppoſed a meaſure ſo pernicious to his country, inſtead of ſupporting Don John, who was the great promoter. His unwillingneſs to keep the ſea was, by the ill-natured, attributed to his great tenderneſs and care of a ſlight wound received in the leg, which, ſaid they, made him tremble with horror at the ſight of a weapon: but ſuch reproaches were equally invidious and unjuſt. Venieri too well knew f the grudge the Spaniards bore the Venetians; the unwillingneſs with which they were brought to engage; and that nothing beſides a prevailing notion that the Turks would refuſe battle, could have induced them to advance as far as the gulph of Lepanto. He now ſaw with what emulation they beheld the glory the republic acquired, and with what joy they would embrace any opportunity of obſcuring the luſtre of her reputation. Such allies were not greatly to be relied on; and to this rather than to his wound was the conduct of Venieri to be aſcribed: indeed it muſt be acknowledged, that his conduct in another reſpect is leſs excuſeable. Filippo Bragadino had been ſent by the ſenate, before they were informed of the victory, with thirteen large gallies, to reinforce the Venetian ſquadron; upon his arrival, he found that the Turks were utterly defeated. Lamenting his misfortune in loſing his ſhare
g in ſo glorious a victory, he requeſted of Venieri that he would permit him to purſue the flying enemy with fifty ſail, promiſing to give a good account of them, and likewiſe of ſeveral

Turkiſh provinces, which would probably be in the utmoſt conſternation after ſuch a defeat. a
He ſtrongly repreſented the advantages of ſuch an enterprize, and the probability of its ſucceſs; but Venieri was deaf to his remonſtrances, either from an apprehenſion of the dangers of the ſeaſon, or an unwillingneſs to commit that to the conduct of another, which he knew to be a duty incumbent on himſelf. Thus, between caution and envy, the faireſt opportunity for ending the war that ever could offer itſelf was loſt [q].

Don John having reſolved, agreeable to the reſolution of the council of war, to ſeparate from the Venetians, was intreated by Venieri, that an attempt ſhould firſt be made on Santa Maura. In compliance with this remonſtrance, he diſpatched certain gallies to examine the ſtrength and ſituation of the place, and in what ſpace of time it might probably be reduced. The captains of the gallies reported on their return, that probably fifteen or twenty b days would finiſh the enterprize; upon which he dropt the deſign, ſaying that it was a paultry iſland, of too little conſequence to the confederates to merit the expence and trouble. His influence prevailed; and the whole fleet, without any further undertaking, ſet ſail in company for the iſland of Corfu, where they divided their plunder and conqueſts (B). From thence the eccleſiaſtical and Spaniſh fleets retired to Meſſina, which port they entered in triumph. After their departure, Venieri took Margarit near Corfu, granting their lives and liberty to the inhabitants, but burning and deſtroying the citadel. Soppoto was likewiſe ſeized by the Albanians, and put under the government of Venice; but it was ſoon recovered by Selim [r].

These places were of little conſequence; the opportunity of ſtriking a deciſive blow was c
now loſt. Had the combined fleet but appeared off the Morea, the Greeks would have been delivered from ſlavery: a general diſaffection to the Turkiſh government appeared among them, and they expected nothing leſs than the recovery of their liberty, as an immediate conſequence of the victory of Lepanto. They requeſted Don John that he would but approach ſo near the ſhore as to let his ſhadow be ſeen in the Morea, which, they ſaid, was ſufficient to terrify the Turks into ſubmiſſion, and reſtore them to their priſtine happineſs. Certain it is, that great advantages might have been gained by a vigorous proſecution of the terror they had ſtruck all over the Othoman empire. Inſtead of this, the time was conſumed in vain-glorious triumphs, ovations, and ambaſſies [s] (C).

But the winter was employed on both ſides with freſh preparations for the enſuing cam- d paign: Selim was at Adrianople when the news of the defeat arrived; upon which he ſet out with the utmoſt expedition to Conſtantinople, to prevent all tumults and diſturbances, the ſure conſequence of diſappointments in the Othoman empire. Here he conducted, with the aſſiſtance of the wiſe Mahomet his grand vizier, every thing with ſuch prudence, ſpirit, and reſolution, that all was quiet; no revolts appeared among the janiſſaries, and nothing but a ſpirit of revenge, and the utmoſt diligence in equipping a new fleet, in augmenting the garriſons on the coaſts, caſting of ordnance, and other military preparations, was beheld. Uluzzali's reception was, contrary to expectation, extremely gracious: Selim thanked him for his bravery in the action, and prudence in bringing ſafe back the diviſion of the fleet under his care. In this he acted like a ſound politician; for Uluzzali's influence and character e were at leaſt equal to his abilities; nor could any thing more encourage the troops than to have the commander applauded, whoſe conduct had ſaved the only remnant of the Turkiſh power [t].

Great preparations made on both ſides.

His holineſs and the republic, on the other hand, omitted nothing which could unite more ſtrongly the preſent confederacy, as well as increaſe its power, by the addition of new allies. The cardinal Alexandrino had conſtantly reſided at the court of Philip, to keep him ſteady to his engagements, and to his weight was joined that of the Venetian reſident. As ſoon as advice of the victory arrived, they both waited on his catholic majeſty, to congra-

(B) The ſpoils were divided in the following manner: Philip, for his ſhare, had fifty-eight gallies, ſix galliots, ſixty-eight large cannon, eight bombs, and one hundred and twenty-eight light artillery, with one thouſand ſeven hundred and thirteen priſoners. To the Venetians was given a portion agreeable to the number and ſtrength of their ſhipping. They had for their ſhare forty-four gallies, a number of galliots and galeaſſes, one hundred and thirty-one pieces of cannon of various ſizes, with one thouſand one hundred and ſixty-two priſoners. That of his holineſs was the ſmalleſt, but the moſt honourable, as among his priſoners he reckoned Achmet and Mahomet, the ſons of Hali. The eccleſiaſtical ſhare amounted to twenty-one gallies, with a proportion of ſmaller veſſels, fifty-four pieces of artillery of different ſizes, and eight hundred and eighty-one priſoners. Vide Paruta, loc. cit. Thuan.

(C) The ſophi of Perſia ſeemed to entertain no unjuſt notion of the mutual loſſes of the Turks and Chriſtians. When the pope's ambaſſador acquainted him of the total deſtruction of the Turkiſh fleet, he asked if there were no more trees in the Othoman dominions? The ambaſſador anſwered there were; but ſtill enlarged on the irreparable damage Selim had ſuſtained, thinking thereby to induce the ſophi to invade his dominions. To all which this ſagacious prince anſwered, that by deſtroying Selim's fleet the Chriſtians had cut off his beard; but they had loſt an arm in loſing Cyprus. Baron. ſub hoc Ann.

a tulate him on ſo glorious an event, owing chiefly to the irreſiſtible power of his majeſty's arms. Thence they proceeded to lay before him how ſoon the Othoman empire might be cruſhed by a ſeaſonable and vigorous exertion of the confederate power; but Philip was ſtill ſlow in his meaſures, and ready of his promiſes. The war in the Low Countries, a threatening rupture with France, as well as a general diſlike and jealouſy of the Venetians that prevailed in his army, raiſed numberleſs difficulties, which all the addreſs of the pope and ſenate found no eaſy matter to remove. Venieri, that no diſpute on his account might ariſe, was deprived of his command, and Foſcareni appointed by the ſenate in his room. Immediately after his promotion, he was diſpatched into Spain, with full powers to ſettle what plan of operations was thought neceſſary by Philip and Don John of Auſtria. But the b firſt ſtep was to engage the Spaniards heartily in the alliance; in which Suranza laboured with the diligence and addreſs of an able and honeſt miniſter [u]. An ambaſſador was likewiſe ſent to the emperor, to try, if poſſible, to move him to break the truce with Selim. The Venetian was ſoon followed thither by the pope's legate, who was no leſs aſſiduous than the ſenate in ſtirring up a formidable confederacy againſt the Turks; but their zeal was not attended with the expected ſucceſs: the emperor had too often experienced the power of the Turks, to imagine it would ſink under one defeat, and the deſtruction of a ſingle fleet. Their great ſtrength, and vaſt reſources of men and money, conſiſted in the prodigious extent of their dominions on the continent, and not in their commerce, fleets, or iſlands. He therefore anſwered the ambaſſadors with aſſurances of a ſincere regard for the pope and c republic; but that his circumſtances would not admit of exhibiting proofs detrimental to his own intereſt, and the good of the empire. His treaſury, he ſaid, was low; breaking with the Turks would give the Proteſtants an opportunity of raiſing new diſturbances: in ſhort, engaging in the confederacy would equally, he alleged, expoſe his own dominions to Turks and Chriſtians, and at a time when he was leaſt able to reſiſt either. He therefore adviſed the ambaſſadors to apply to other princes, and particularly to the king of Poland, whoſe vicinity to the Othoman empire and power would render his alliance more valuable. Their endeavours he promiſed to ſecond with all his influence; for which purpoſe he ſent an ambaſſador to Warſaw: but neither in Poland nor Ruſſia were their negotiations ſucceſsful [w].

d At this time pope Pius the fifth died, and was ſucceeded by Gregory the thirteenth, whoſe inclinations to the confederacy were not yet known. This was a real affliction to the Venetians: it diſconcerted their meaſures, as his holineſs had warmly eſpouſed their cauſe againſt the Turks, and left nothing uneſſayed to humble the pride, and reduce the power, of that empire. Colonna had quitted Rome, to get the fleet in readineſs, when an expreſs was ſent after him to acquaint him with the pope's death, and the expiration of his commiſſion. Upon this, he returned to congratulate Gregory upon his acceſſion, and had the addreſs to procure himſelf continued in the command, and the former meaſures embraced, of which he immediately ſent notice to Venice: however, it was the month of June before theſe armaments were ready to put to ſea from Meſſina. Here too John of Auſtria, having aſſembled
e certain Italian, Spaniſh, and German regiments, embarked them in a ſquadron of twenty-two gallies, which he diſpatched to Corfu. They were ſoon joined by twenty-five gallies under Suranza, whom Foſcareni the admiral had ſent for the execution of ſome enterprize. Suranza, agreeable to his orders, laid his inſtructions before Colonna, and Andrada the Spaniſh admiral. He found Colonna eager to enter upon action; but Andrada full of grave excuſes, and wiſe maxims on the neceſſity of deliberation. At length, being hard preſſed by Colonna and Suranza, he replied, that his inſtructions forbad him to leave Corfu without further orders: he expected to be reinforced by the fleet collecting by Alvaro Baſſano at Meſſina, after which he muſt wait the iſſue of the troubles in Navarre [x].

Upon this, the Venetians exclaimed loudly againſt the Spaniards: they complained of f being ſacrificed to the pride, the politics, and the jealouſy, if not the hatred, of Philip and his miniſtry. Upon their great promiſes, they ſaid, they had engaged the republic in this war; yet, as ſoon as the ſeaſon for action arrived, their dilatorineſs and treachery left her to ſhift for herſelf. Under Doria, the firſt year of the war, this was apparently the caſe; nor were affairs altered much for the better the following: Famagoſta was loſt, and in conſequence the kingdom of Cyprus, before they were ready to put to ſea; and afterwards they were, in a manner, compelled and deluded into the moſt glorious victory that had ever been obtained over the Turkiſh power. The Venetians even aſſerted, that Don John's conduct had been blamed by the miniſtry, and greater part of the Spaniſh nation: they ſaid, that no arguments, no proſpects, no ambition, or thirſt of glory, ought to have induced him to hazard a fleet, g upon the ſafety of which ſo much depended. So far did ſome perſons carry this notion, as to aſſert, that he ought to have been puniſhed for his temerity: but now, cried the Venetians, the Spaniſh conduct is too barefaced to leave any doubts of their inclinations to ſee the republic impoveriſhed and reduced by a war, of which ſhe is the chief ſupport, and in which ſhe is the chief ſufferer. Their pretended apprehenſions of diſturbances in Lombardy were too groſs to impoſe on the ſenate; nor were thoſe other excuſes better founded, which ſet forth the neceſſity of preparing againſt a change of meaſures in the conſiſtory, by the acceſſion of a new pontiff: his holineſs's views were obvious from his conduct. Upon the whole, the Venetians concluded, that jealouſy was the only ſpring of action in the Spaniſh cabinet: it was therefore high time to regard their own ſecurity, and break off an alliance productive of nothing but infamy, treachery, and poverty. For theſe reaſons it was propoſed, and ſoon carried in the ſenate, that M. Antonio Barbaro ſhould again renew his negotiations of peace with Mahomet the grand vizier, and bring things as near a criſis as he poſſibly could, without actually concluding the treaty, until he had acquainted the republic with the terms granted. At the ſame time it was decreed to ſend John Michaeli into France, and Antonio Tiepoli into Spain, both men of experience and great eloquence. The buſineſs of the firſt was to diſſuade his Chriſtian majeſty from breaking with Spain, as it was currently believed he intended, both by aſſiſting the Proteſtants in the Netherlands, and by entering with an army into Lombardy. As for Tiepoli, his inſtructions were to excite Philip to perform his engagements, and not to ſuffer a war, begun with great expectations, and conducted with ſome ſucceſs, to languiſh through indolence and inactivity [x].

Negotiations for a peace between the ſenate and Selim.

BARBARO entered immediately upon the ſubject of his inſtructions with Mahomet: he found that ſage miniſter equally inclined to peace, as he had always been averſe to a war with the republic. Theſe, notwithſtanding the great preparations, were the general ſentiments of the divan and the whole Turkiſh empire: however, Mahomet deferred giving a concluſive anſwer, until the arrival of the French ambaſſador, the biſhop of Aix. The truth was, the Turkiſh miniſtry carefully watched the progreſs of the confederacy, determining to take their meaſures either hoſtile or pacific accordingly. Before it was known that the emperor had refuſed to break the alliance; that the Spaniſh councils were as dilatory and ſluggiſh as formerly; that the Poles, the Portugueſe, and the Ruſſians, had declined entering upon any engagements; they ſeemed to liſten with pleaſure to the reſident's propoſals. Afterwards, when the ſentiments of thoſe different courts came to be known, and that the Venetians alone muſt ſupport the whole war, they roſe in their demands, talked with the imperious air of conquerors, and in a ſtrain ſo big, that they ſeemed to have forgot their late diſgrace. The conſequence was, that every proſpect of peace vaniſhed, and the ſenate again determined to proſecute the war with all poſſible vigour [y].

In the beginning of July, Colonna was joined at Corfu by the reſt of the eccleſiaſtical fleet, on board of which were ſeveral of the young nobility of France, who deſired leave to ſerve againſt the Turks under ſo diſtinguiſhed an officer as Colonna. Among others was Charles Lorraine, marquis de Mayenne, brother to the duke of Guiſe. This volunteer the Venetians complimented with the honour of nobility, the higheſt mark of diſtinction the republic ever confers on a foreigner. The whole fleet being joined, they ſet ſail for Gomminize, where a ſurvey was taken of their ſtrength, which was found to amount to one hundred and forty gallies. Don John had in the mean while left Meſſina, and arrived at Palermo; whence he diſpatched letters to the confederates, acquainting them, that his inſtructions were to join them as ſoon as the ſtorm apprehended from France was blown over. He ſtrongly recommended to Colonna to enter upon no enterprize before the whole allied fleet was united. Again the Venetians uttered loud complaints againſt this extraordinary method of proceeding: new obſtructions were eternally raiſing, and by that means the ſacred faith of treaties, if not openly broken, were at leaſt rendered unfruitful. It was now full time that the fleets ſhould be joined, if Don John did not deſire that Candia ſhould ſhare the ſame fate as Cyprus. Andrada himſelf was ſo confounded with their reproaches, and the barefaced conduct of the Spaniſh miniſtry, that he propoſed the fleet ſhould ſail to join Don John.

Mean time Tiepoli, finding that the intention of his inſtructions was effected before he arrived in France, ſet out without delay to the court of Philip. As all apprehenſions of an attack from France were removed, he imagined Philip would now be aſhamed longer to defer the junction of the fleets. When he waited on the monarch, he laboured with all the arguments of reaſon and oratory to quicken the meaſures of the court, and procure orders for Don John's entering upon action, and eſtabliſh a footing for the winter in the Turkiſh dominions. To all this the king anſwered with ſmooth ſpeeches and ſoothing promiſes. As to the wintering, it required deliberation, he ſaid; but he would return an anſwer in a few days, which accordingly he did in the negative, calling it a raſh, precipitate, and imprudent meaſure.

No ſooner were the Venetians apprized of Philip's anſwer, than their inclinations to peace grew ſtronger, and were increaſed by the ambiguous reply with which their ambaſſador Michaeli was diſmiſſed by the king and queen of France, viz. that the king beſt knew his own affairs; however, that he would act no ways prejudicial to the common intereſts of Chriſtendom, or the particular intereſt of the republic, whom he greatly valued and eſteemed.

a This was in anſwer to the public inſtructions of Michieli; but the real motive of his ambaſſy was to procure the king's mediation with Selim, by means of his miniſter at the Porte; in which he ſucceeded, his majeſty promiſing to engage heartily in the buſineſs, but with the neceſſary delicacy and ſecrecy, to avoid giving umbrage to Philip.

DURING theſe negotiations, the fleet, as had been propoſed by Andrada, ſet ſail from Corfu for Candia. When they arrived at Cephalonia, ſome ſcouts were ſent to bring intelligence of the enemy: theſe ſoon returned, with advice of their being in the gulph of Napoli, in the Morea, to the number of two hundred and twenty ſail. Upon this, the confederates ſteered to Cerigo, where the enemy were deſcried from the tops, and the fleet in conſequence drawn up in order of battle. When they had approached ſo near as to diſcover each other
b diſtinctly, the Turks ſuddenly changed their courſe, and, tho' greatly ſuperior in ſtrength, declined battle, after ſome ſhot had been exchanged: nor did the confederates care to purſue, contenting themſelves with the glory of having offered battle to Uluzzali. The Turks ſteering weſterly, the confederates ſent an expreſs to Don John, who, it was ſuppoſed, muſt be arrived at Corfu, to requeſt that he would immediately join them with his fifty-three gallies, which would give the Chriſtians a ſuperiority over the enemy. To haſten this deſign, they turned their courſe towards Corfu, in order to meet him on his way. Next day, off Capo Motapan, they were again ſeen by the Turks, who leaving off watering, immediately prepared for battle. The combined fleet did not decline action; for crowding ſail, they bore down on the enemy with a favourable breeze, which ceaſed before they came within c ſhot: upon this the gallies were ordered to uſe their oars, and take the heavy ſhips in tow. Uluzzali, in order to ſeparate the combined gallies from the heavy ſhips, made a feint as if he declined battle: this had its effect; for Suranza ordered the gallies to part with the ſhips in tow, and purſue the enemy. As ſoon as Uluzzali perceived them to be at a ſufficient diſtance for his purpoſe, he ordered his rowers to puſh with all their might, which they did ſo effectually as actually to divide the fleet. Suranza now perceived his error, and endeavoured to retrieve it: both he and Colonna attacked the Turks with ſuch fury on one ſide, while the heavy ſhips kept a briſk fire on the other, that Uluzzali did not think fit to hazard a general action, or wait the fruits of his ſtratagem: he ſtood aloof, and both the fleets continued for the ſpace of two hours cannonading at a diſtance, without coming to cloſe fight, after which d they ſteered a different courſe, as if the engagement had broke off by mutual conſent.

BY this time Don John was arrived at Corfu, from whence he ſteered to Lepanto; but the wind proving adverſe, he returned again to Corfu, where he met with the expreſs from Colonna. Pardo, who bore this commiſſion, acquainted his highneſs of the combined fleet's having met Uluzzali, and offered battle, which, he believed, they had ſince accepted, from a briſk diſcharge of artillery he heard at ſea, on his courſe to Corfu. Don John was greatly diſturbed at this account, to bring certain advice of which he diſpatched Baſſano with two galliots. Baſſano ſoon diſcovered a fleet a-head, and miſtaking it for the Turkiſh, returned with the utmoſt precipitation to Corfu, where he put every thing in commotion by a falſe alarm, which was in vain contradicted by the Venetian pilots on board, until the arrival of the Chriſ-
e tian fleet next day confirmed the pilots aſſertion, to the great confuſion of Baſſano. Foſcareni had now joined the fleet with a reinforcement; ſo that the confederates were equal in every reſpect to the enemy. He and Colonna were for going in queſt of the Turks; but Don John, as if he had direct orders to oppoſe every propoſition for the honour and intereſt of the confederacy, was perpetually raiſing new obſtructions. Among others, he alledged, the Venetian diviſion was unfit for action, on account of the ſmall number of mariners on board. To this Foſcareni replied with indignation, that it would not appear to be ſo from their having twice, without his aſſiſtance, offered battle. Colonna's interpoſition and prudence prevented the breach from becoming wider, and obtained a reſolution in a council of war, that they ſhould look out for the enemy; that, for the greater expedition, the heavy f ſhips ſhould be ſent to Zant, there to wait further orders; and, in ſhort, that every expedient ſhould be uſed to redeem the time loſt, and reſtore the credit of the Chriſtian arms.

Don John joins the confederate fleet, and takes the command.

ACCORDINGLY the whole fleet weighed anchor, and ſteered for Cephalonia. Here they were informed, that ſickneſs prevailing among the Turks, had compelled Uluzzali to put into the port of Quaglia in a diſtreſſed condition. Foſcareni and Colonna were for attacking them without loſs of time, and the propoſal was ſo reaſonable, that Don John could not refuſe his aſſent. However, he found means to fruſtrate the intention of the reſolution, by conſuming two complete days in making unneceſſary diſpoſitions, and examining minutely the condition of each veſſel. In vain did the other officers repreſent that the opportunity would be loſt; Don John calmly replied, that the events of battle were ſo precarious, that g too much caution could not be uſed in guarding againſt them. At laſt he weighed, and the pilots had orders to ſteer to Modon; but whether by ſecret directions or miſtake is uncertain, they brought the fleet to Rodona. Here they were wholly expoſed to the enemy's view, which put them upon uniting their fleet, which before lay in two different harbours; providing every thing againſt an attack, and taking ſuch meaſures as muſt greatly diſconcert the a Chriſtians. Colonna was the firſt who diſcovered the miſtake; upon which, without ſtaying for orders, he bore down upon a part of the Turkiſh fleet that fell about a mile a-ſtern.

Colonna's bravery, and the miſconduct of the other confederate officers.

Here he began an engagement, imagining he ſhould be ſupported by the reſt of the fleet;
but finding no proſpect of relief, he retreated. Foſcareni did all in his power to prevail on Don John either to permit him with his diviſion to aſſiſt Colonna, or to advance with the whole combined fleet; both which he peremptorily refuſed. In this manner was the happy occaſion loſt of ruining the Turkiſh navy; after which, warm diſputes aroſe concerning the plan of their future operations [z]. It was on all hands agreed that Modon was to be attacked; but Colonna and Doria differed in the manner: the former was for attacking it both by ſea and land; the latter with the land-forces only. Each ſupported their ſentiments with ſtrong b arguments, and equal vehemence: with Colonna ſided the Venetians; and with Doria all the Spaniſh officers. In theſe debates ſo much time was loſt, that Don John propoſed returning to winter at Meſſina. This drove the Venetians into deſpair: they railed, without moderation or caution, againſt the treachery of the Spaniards; they ſaid they were betrayed to the enemy, and made the tools of their allies. Don John was cut with theſe reproaches, which he could not avoid, although he knew them to be juſt. In his heart he approved the conduct of Colonna and the Venetians; but his inſtructions tied him up from entering upon ſuch enterprizes as were ſuitable to his own ſpirit, and the common intereſt. At laſt the fleet was brought before Navarrino, which he determined to batter, rather for want of any other reaſonable meaſure, than that he thought the place of conſequence enough. The troops and c cannon were landed, batteries were erected under the conduct of Bonello, a celebrated engineer of Florence, and every thing diſpoſed for a cloſe aſſault; but, by an omiſſion of the beſiegers, a body of five hundred choſen troops were thrown into the town.

THIS miſconduct on the ſide of the Chriſtians was compenſated by other blunders, no leſs groſs, committed by the Turks. Cuſhain baſhaw, and the beglerbeg of Greece, having been apprized by Uluzzali ſome months before of the probability that the Chriſtians would make a deſcent on this place, neglected, notwithſtanding, to aſſemble an army for its protection.
They had now made ſeveral forced marches to relieve the garriſon; but they were retarded by the difficulty of the roads, and a variety of councils. Theſe two generals blamed Uluzzali for not covering the place with his fleet; and this, he knew, would be ſufficient to diſ- d grace him with Selim. At length Navarrino was reduced to the laſt extremity, when ſuddenly a violent ſtorm of rain came on, which continuing for three days, greatly harraſſed the beſiegers. This incident afforded the Spaniards an opportunity of abandoning an enterprize, in which they were never hearty. A council was called, and Don John remonſtrated, in the ſtrongeſt terms, the neceſſity of raiſing the ſiege, before ſickneſs, the natural conſequence of lying upon wet ground, and under deluges of rain, ſhould ſeize the troops. The Venetians, on the contrary, oppoſed this reſolution with all their power: they ſaid it would bring eternal diſgrace on the confederacy to raiſe the ſiege, when the town was ready to ſurrender for want of neceſſaries, and while the beſiegers abounded with proviſions, men, and ammunition: but Don John perſiſted in his reſolution, which was accordingly e put in execution. What adds to the diſgrace of the confederates is the diſtreſs to which the army under the baſhaw, the fleet commanded by Uluzzali, and the town, were reduced.
So far had Uluzzali's apprehenſions of receiving condign puniſhment carried him, that he went off to Barbary with twenty-five ſail, leaving the reſt of the fleet to ſhift for themſelves.
So ill informed was he of the Chriſtian councils, that he imagined nothing could ſave the place, for which he doubted not but his head muſt be anſwerable. In this manner ended a campaign, which produced nothing but diſgrace, altercation, and a prodigious expence, though the allies might eaſily have terminated the war, had they acted according to their ſtrength, ſkill, and with the requiſite harmony and unanimity [a].

As ſoon as the ſiege was raiſed, the fleets ſeparated: Don John, with the Spaniards, re- f tired to Meſſina: Colonna, with his diviſion, ſet out directly for Oſtia; while the Venetian admiral ſailed to the gulph of Catharra, to make an attempt upon a magazine the Turks had erected upon that coaſt. It was given out on all ſides, that the war would be reſumed with the utmoſt vigour early in the following ſpring, at the ſame time that negotiations for a peace were going on between Selim and the republic, by means of the French ambaſſador. The Venetians had now too many aſſurances of the inclinations of Philip, to heſitate longer upon ſecuring the beſt terms they could with the Grand Seignior. This point was therefore diligently laboured for the whole winter, and at length brought to an iſſue leſs conſonant to the ſpirit and juſtice of the republic, than to the circumſtances of her affairs. Peace was concluded, upon condition that Cyprus, as by right of conqueſt, Antivari, Delvingo in Albania, and Soppoto, by treaty, ſhould for ever be ceded to Selim. It was further articled, that thirty thouſand crowns in gold ſhould, at certain inſtalments, be paid to Selim, to reimburſe

a him for the expences of the war; after which, each ſhould be reſtored to all their former poſſeſſions, the priſoners exchanged, and the merchants reinſtated in their former privileges of commerce. Andrea Badoario was ſent in quality of ambaſſador from the republic to Conſtantinople, to confirm the treaty, which was ratified without conſulting his holineſs, and carefully concealed from Philip, until it was finally concluded. In their own defence, the Venetians urged the neceſſity of a meaſure wholly owing to Philip, and the reluctance he had ever ſhewn to comply with his engagements. This apology was ſent to their ambaſſadors at different courts; in which they warmly exclaimed againſt the inactivity, and even the treachery of Philip, which had rendered neceſſary a ſtep equally prejudicial to them, and ignominious to the Chriſtian arms. They affirmed, that inevitable ruin hung over their b heads, after having long ſupported ſingly an unequal war againſt the moſt powerful monarch on earth; their treaſury was now exhauſted; their men worn out by fatigue and ſickneſs; their ſhips diminiſhed in number, and the greater part unfit for ſervice; while the poverty of the people, from a ſtagnation of commerce, rendered them unable to bear further aſſeſſments. They even endeavoured to prove the expediency of this peace to the ſafety of Italy, and of Europe in general; arguing that, if the republic was deſtroyed, Selim would then have the key of Chriſtendom in his own hand, and eaſily extend his conqueſts to the utmoſt of his ambition [b].

In order to quiet the pope's clamours, Nicholao Ponti, a man of conſummate wiſdom, eru- dition, and eloquence, was ſent to Rome; but his holineſs, after denying him a private au- c dience, diſmiſſed him with a ſharp reprimand delivered in the conſiſtory. However, Suranzo, the Venetian miniſter at Madrid, had better fortune. Either the politics of Philip required his being upon good terms with the republic, or his conſciouſneſs of giving birth to the meaſures they were excuſing, made him willing to admit of their apology. After receiving Suranzo with the greateſt affability, he told him, that only his attachment to religion, his affection for the republic, and regard to the pope's entreaties, had induced him to take arms againſt the Turks: that it was but reaſonable the republic ſhould be permitted to know her own intereſt. She was principal in the war, and he, as an ally only, ought to be ſatisfied with ſuch terms as ſhe choſe to accept. Sufficient it was for him, he ſaid, that he had given proofs of his friendſhip to Venice, and of his zeal for the ſupport of the Chriſ- d tian religion. With this anſwer Suranzo was diſmiſſed, his Catholic majeſty conducting himſelf upon this occaſion with an uncommon moderation, ſcarcely conſiſtent with the high hand he bore during the war [c].

In this manner was the year 1573 conſumed in negotiations and treaties, while the repub- lic was at all the expence of a vigorous war, by maintaining large fleets, and numerous gar- riſons. The conjectures of the divan upon the ſudden reſolution of the ſenate to ſue for peace, were various. Some imagined that a deep deſign lay concealed under the pretence of moderation; and that nothing leſs than an intention of ſeizing the firſt opportunity of glutting their revenge could oblige the ſenate ſo eaſily to part with Cyprus, and the cities ceded by the treaty. Rumors of this nature prevailed for ſeveral months, and forced the e republic to repoſe little confidence in a peace ſo ill founded.

At length they were eaſed of their apprehenſions by diſpatches from Badoario, with a full confirmation of all the articles of the treaty, ratified by the hand and ſeal of the Grand Seignior. Upon this the ſenate aſſembled, and reſolved to acquaint all their reſidents at foreign courts of the event. An immediate reſpite from the fatigues of war, and preparations for a vigorous reſiſtance, enſued, and the republic was once more reſtored to tranquility; yet did Selim continue augmenting his armies and fleet, which gave umbrage and ſuſpicion to ſome of the more cautious members of the ſenate: others, indeed, imagine, that Selim pro- poſed renewing the war with Spain in Africa. The ſecret grudge he bore to Philip, both on account of his perſecuting the Moors, and acceding to the late alliance to oppoſe him, ren- f dered this opinion extremely probable. It was ſoon confirmed by the arrival of a Turkiſh ambaſſador, who, in a ſecret audience, acquainted the doge and council, that his inſtruc- tions were to make an offer of all the Othoman forces to curb the inſolence of Philip, revenge the affronts ſuſtained by the republic, and reduce that haughty monarch within reaſonable limits. He then launched out into ſevere invectives againſt the Catholic king, bitterly re- proaching him with perfidy, ambition, and tyranny: 'Who,' ſaid he, 'can doubt that the 'Turkiſh empire muſt have ſuffered greater damages from the Venetian bravery, unleſs it had 'been ſapped, betrayed, and checked by the policy and envy of Philip? Who doubts but 'the ultimate views of his cabinet terminate in univerſal monarchy, and the deſtruction of 'Chriſtian liberty? This, ſaid he, Selim perfectly well knows, and generouſly offers g 'himſelf to ſtem the torrent of ambition, and ſhield innocence and freedom. The virtue 'of the Venetians has made him forget that they were lately his enemies. Great minds are 'ſoon united, and their differences, like the quarrels of lovers, ſerve only the more firmly

'to rivet their affections. Selim wants not to enlarge his territories; he aſpires not after 'conqueſts. The burthen of his dominions, ſo widely extended from weſt to eaſt, is already 'too great for mortal man to ſupport. Whatever his arms ſhall ſubdue, the Venetians may 'look upon as the property of the republic: their wiſe government merits more extenſive 'diſtricts, if it were only to encreaſe the happineſs of mankind.' He then exhorted them not to loſe ſo favourable an opportunity of glory, of wealth, and of eſtabliſhing their government on the moſt ſure foundation; of trampling upon uſurpation, and ſtanding up in defence of freedom [d]. With ſuch blandiſhments did the Turk endeavour to flatter her paſſions, and lead the republic into his maſter's views by a gentle compulſion; but the ſenate was not to be catched by ſweet words, and ſoothed into meaſures ruinous of the peace they had ſo lately purchaſed; for by them the affair was referred to the council of ten (A). It was not doubted but the intention of this ambaſſy was to ſound the inclinations of the republic towards Philip; to ſow the ſeeds of diſcord among the Chriſtian powers; and cut off all hopes of any future confederacy againſt the Porte. The ſenate, therefore, reſolved to couch their anſwer in as obliging but general terms as poſſible: they expreſſed their warm ſenſe of the honour done them by the friendſhip of ſo mighty a prince; but they ſaid, that the grievances againſt Philip were not ſufficient ground for a rupture, to which they could have no other inducement than their deſire of complying with every requeſt of Selim. It was evident, from the reply of the ambaſſador, that he was little ſatisfied with the iſſue of his miſſion: however, the ſenate adhered to their anſwer, and he was diſmiſſed with a magnificent preſent.

SOON after his departure, it was known, that Selim had reſolved upon an expedition into Africa; upon which orders were ſent to Marco Quirini the admiral, not to augment the fleet in Candia, and only to retain ten gallies in commiſſion for the ſecurity of commerce. All the new levies were diſbanded, and every poſſible ſtep taken to eaſe the oppreſſion under which the poor had long groaned.

PHILIP, in the mean while, was making mighty preparations, which created ſuſpicion that he would attempt ſomething againſt the republic, in revenge of the ſeparate peace made with Selim. John of Auſtria had paſſed from Genoa to Milan in a ſecret manner, where he held frequent conſultations with Alexander Farneſe duke of Parma; in conſequence of which ſoldiers were levied, cannon caſt, and other warlike preparations ſet on foot in the heart of Italy, which could not fail of exciting the jealouſy of the ſenate. To ſhew they were not ignorant of the tranſaction, inſtructions were ſent to Contareni, governor of Verona, to go directly to Milan, and compliment Don John in the name of the republic. Every precaution for the ſecurity of the Venetian territories was taken: the garriſons of the Bergameſe were augmented, and ſtores laid in of proviſion, ammunition, and other neceſſaries. Governors, in whoſe fidelity the ſenate might confide, were appointed, and the ſafety of Bergamo in particular provided for by a body of the rich citizens, who had ever ſhewn their affection and loyalty to the republic, by new fortifications and other alterations, ſufficient to evince that it could not be attacked in a defenceleſs condition; yet were theſe preparations made with ſo much prudence as gave no cauſe of offence [e].

PHILIP, in the mean time, had the melancholy proſpect of two formidable wars: one againſt the Moors in Africa, ſupported by the whole ſtrength of the Othoman empire; and the other with his own ſubjects in the Netherlands. Hence proceeded his inability to diſturb the peace of Italy, whatever might be his inclinations to revenge himſelf on the republic. To quiet the apprehenſions of the republic, he therefore ſent orders to his reſident at Venice, Guzman de Silva, to give the moſt ſolemn aſſurances to the doge and ſenate, that the levies in Lombardy were not intended to deſtroy the repoſe of Italy, of which he was at this time particularly deſirous: that Don John's negotiations at Milan related ſolely to the diſturbances in the Low Countries: that no credit was to be given to the reports of thoſe who, from a buſy diſpoſition, were always blowing up the embers of contention among princes: that his affection for the republic was confirmed by numberleſs teſtimonies of hearty friendſhip, and her ſecurity at this time inſured by the circumſtances of his affairs, ſince nothing could be more impolitic then encreaſing the number of his enemies. To this he added, that ſound policy required a mutual confidence, ſince nothing could be more prejudicial to both than a ſuſpicious and lukewarm friendſhip. De Silva enforced his inſtructions with all the graces and power of oratory, in a laboured oration he delivered to the council; to which a ſuitable anſwer was returned.

a WHEN Charlemagne put an end to the dominion of the Lombards in Italy, by taking Desiderius their last king prisoner, he at the same time obliged the Lombard dukes of Friuli, Spoleto, and Benevento, to acknowlege him as king of Italy; but allowed them to exercise the same power and authority which they had enjoyed before his conquest[a]. Of these three dukedoms Benevento was by far the most powerful and extensive, as it comprehended almost all that part of Italy which is at present known by the name of the kingdom of Naples[b], the Greek emperor possessing only the islands in the bay of Naples, that part of farther Calabria beyond the rivers Savuto and Peto, a few maritime cities in hither Calabria, with the city Acripoli, and the promontory in its neighbourhood, called b Capo di Licosa; and lastly the dukedoms of Gaeta, Naples, and Amalfi, which were very inconsiderable, and extended along the shore only about a hundred miles, and were interrupted by the Gastaldate or county of Capua[c]. These small territories excepted, all the rest of Italy, on the south side of the rivers Garigliano and Fruento, was distinguished with the name of the dukedom of Benevento, which comprised none of those twelve provinces into which the kingdom of Naples is at this day divided; namely, Terra di Lavoro, Contado di Molise, The hither Apruzzo, Capitanata, Terra di Bari, Basilicata, The hither Calabria, and both the principalities.

The extent of that dukedom.

THIS flourishing and extensive dukedom was at this time governed by Arechis, who had married one of the daughters of the last king of the Lombards, and had submitted and taken c the oath of allegiance to the conqueror Charles. However, a few years after, he renounced his allegiance to the Franks, and declared himself an independent sovereign, and was acknowleged as such by all the inhabitants of the duchy. To strengthen himself against Pepin king of Italy, who resided at Ravenna, he enlarged and fortified the city of Benevento, and likewise built the city of Salerno, on the sea-coast, which he surrounded with a very strong and high wall. He was greatly beloved by his subjects, and during his reign he was engaged in several wars with the subjects of the Greek empire in the duchy of Naples, who were sometimes obliged to give him hostages[d]. He likewise made several incursions into the territories of the pope, who not being able to oppose him, and receiving no as- d sistance from Pepin, prevailed on Charlemagne to return to Italy[e]. That conqueror accordingly, in the end of the year 786, repassed the Alps with a powerful army, and proceeded to Rome.

Arechis renounces his allegiance to Charlemagne. A. D. 781.

ARECHIS was then at war with the Neapolitans, about the fields of Nola; but, being apprehensive lest they should join the Franks, he immediately concluded a peace with his neighbours, and granted them some diaria, or subsidies, in the contested fields[f]. He sent his eldest son Romuald also to Rome, with an offer of submission: Charles, however, at the instigation of the pope, rejected his offer, and, detaining his son prisoner, proceeded with his army into Campania; and, after ravaging the country, made himself master of Capua. e Arechis, not thinking himself safe in Benevento, went immediately to Salerno, from whence he again sent deputies to Charles, to sue for peace. These deputies were his other son Grimoald, with the Beneventan bishops, who were so successful as to prevail with Charlemagne to grant a peace, which was concluded on these conditions: That Arechis and the Beneventans should renew their allegiance to the Franks; that he should pay a yearly tribute to Pepin; should deliver up all his treasure; and give his son Grimoald and his daughter Adelgisa, with twelve others, as hostages for his fidelity[g]. The conditions of the treaty being executed, Charlemagne returned to Rome, where he celebrated the feast of Easter; but, after many intreaties, he restored Adelgisa to her father.

AFTER the departure of Charles into France, Arechis entered into a negociation with the f empress Irene and her son Constantine, for expelling the Franks entirely from Italy. He sent ambassadors to Constantinople, to desire the honour of patriciate, and the dukedom of Naples, with all its dependencies, promiſing to acknowlege the emperor as his ſovereign, and to live after the manner of the Greeks; but requiring to be ſupported by a Greek army, and that his brother-in-law Adalgiſus, ſon of the late king Deſiderius, ſhould be ſent over to Italy to raiſe a party among the Lombards. The emperor readily agreed to theſe propoſitions, on condition that Arechis ſhould give his ſon Romuald as an hoſtage. Ambaſſadors were accordingly ſent to Naples with the enſigns of the patrician order; namely, the mantle of cloth of gold, the ſword, the comb, and the ſandals [h]: but before the ceremony could be performed, the young prince Romualdus died, which haſtened the death of his father, who

His death. died the ſame year, in the end of Auguſt, in the 30th year of his reign, and the 54th of his age. He was greatly regretted by the Beneventans, and is ſaid to have been a prince endowed with a great many royal virtues. He publiſhed ſeveral good laws, built ſeveral churches, and erected two ſtately palaces, one at Benevento, and the other at Salerno. He was a lover of learning, and greatly careſſed the learned men of thoſe times, particularly Paul Warnefride, or Paulus Diaconus, who had been ſecretary to Deſiderius, and had eſcaped to Benevento from Tremiti, whither he had been baniſhed by Charlemagne, on a ſuſpicion of intriguing in favour of Adalgiſus (A).

His ſon Grimoald ſucceeds him. AFTER the death of Arechis, the Beneventans ſent ambaſſadors to king Charles, demanding Grimoald with great ſubmiſſion and intreaties. Charlemagne, for what reaſon is uncertain, made no difficulty of granting their requeſt; perhaps he thought it was beſt to allow Grimoald to depart, and to truſt to his gratitude, as the Grecks were making preparations to invade Italy, and the Beneventans threatened to revolt if their prince was denied them [i]. He therefore allowed Grimoald to depart, after he had agreed to theſe conditions: That he ſhould oblige the Lombards to ſhave their beards; that in writings and on the money, the name of the king ſhould be put before that of the prince; and that he ſhould cauſe the walls of Salerno, Acerenza, and Conſia, to be entirely demoliſhed. At his departure he made him ſeveral preſents, and ſent with him two of his nobles, Anetharius and Panlipert, who afterwards received from Grimoald conſiderable poſſeſſions, and contracted noble alliances in the principality [k]. Grimoald was received by the Beneventans with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy, and for ſome time after his return, he cauſed the writings and money to paſs with the name of Charles; but he neglected to fulfil the laſt article [l], though the author of the chronicon of Salerno gives us an account how he rather eluded it, by transferring the cities to other ſtronger places, and then deſtroying the old fortifications [m]. As the Greeks ſtill continued their preparations againſt Italy, Grimoald gave intelligence thereof to Pepin, and, inſtead of following the maxims of his father, and giving aſſiſtance to his uncle Adalgiſus, he raiſed an army to oppoſe him, and being joined by Hildebrand duke of Spoleto, and Vinigiſe the general of Pepin, he attacked the Greeks in Calabria, ſoon after they had landed, and after a moſt obſtinate battle, entirely defeated and took his uncle priſoner, who, according to Sigonius, was put to a cruel death by torture [n] (B).

He renounces his allegiance to Charlemagne. GRIMOALD, ſoon after, began to follow the maxims of his father, and having contracted an alliance with the Greek emperor, by marrying his niece Wanzia, he renounced his allegiance to Charlemagne, and reſolved to ſupport his independence againſt the efforts of Pepin king of Italy. Accordingly, in the fifth year of his reign, a war broke out betwixt him and Pepin, which continued for upwards of twelve years, with very little intermiſſion. This year Pepin, being joined by his brother Lewis king of Aquitaine, with an army of Franks, they marched into the principality of Benevento, which they ravaged in a hoſtile manner. Before the commencement of hoſtilities, Grimoald endeavoured to avert the war, by renouncing his alliance with the emperor, and divorcing his wife Wanzia, whom, under a pretence of her barrenneſs, he ſent back by force to Conſtantinople. The French, however, advanced into his territories, but they were not able to make any conqueſts, and the plague ſeizing their army, they were obliged to return home towards the end of the winter. Erchempertus informs us, that the war ſtill continued with great obſtinacy; the French, however, for ſeveral years, were repulſed by the Beneventans; and even a in the beginning of the century, when Charlemagne had returned to Rome, and received the new dignity of emperor from pope Leo III. Grimoald refuſed to acknowlege him as ſuch, and braved his power when at its height. The following year, indeed, the French made themſelves maſters of Chieti, and ſome other places in that Gaſtaldate, which they united to the duchy of Spoleto. They alſo took Lucera in Puglia, but it was quickly retaken by Grimoald, who made Guinigiſe, or Vinigiſe, lately created duke of Spoleto, and the whole garriſon of Franks, priſoners of war. Sigonius tells us, that, two years after, Pepin agreed to a truce with Grimoald, when Vinigiſe was again ſet at liberty; Erchempertus, however, ſays, that, during the whole reign of Grimoald, there was not a moment of peace betwixt him and Pepin, as they were both young and warlike princes. Grimoald at laſt, after hav-who conquer the Gaſtaldate of Chieti. A. D. 801.

Death of Grimoald.

GRIMOALD's only ſon, Gothofred, dying before him, he was ſucceeded in the principality by one Grimoald, who had been his treaſurer. The author of the chronicon of Salerno repreſents this prince as cruel and tyrannical; but, according to Erchempert, he was of a mild diſpoſition, and inclined to peace. In order to free his ſtate from the continual incurſions of the French, he ſent ambaſſadors to Charlemagne, after the death of Pepin, and propoſed a peace with him, which the emperor agreed to, on condition that Grimoald ſhould c pay a yearly tribute of ſeven thouſand crowns, but, according to others, of twenty-five thouſand[q]. From this time the principality of Benevento became tributary to the emperors of the Weſt as kings of Italy. Grimoald likewiſe concluded a peace with the Neapolitans, which was not of long continuance; for Theodore the patrician, who then governed the dukedom of Naples, under the emperor Leo, ſurnamed the Armenian, granting protection to Dauferius, a noble Beneventan, who had been concerned in a conſpiracy againſt his prince, Grimoald marched againſt the city of Naples, and inveſted it by ſea and land. Theodore, however, ſtill refuſed to deliver up the Beneventan traitor, and a general engagement enſuing, both by land and ſea, the Neapolitans were entirely defeated with ſo great a ſlaughter, that, for upwards of ſeven days, the water on the ſea-ſhore was ſtained with d the blood of the dead. Erchempertus informs us, that five thouſand men were killed on the ſpot, and that, in his time, the graves, where the heaps of the ſlain had been laid, were ſtill to be ſeen. Theodore and Dauferius made their eſcape into the city, where they were again in great danger of their lives from a tumult of the Neapolitan women, whoſe huſbands had been ſlain in the action. Theodore having found means of quelling the tumult, immediately ſollicited a peace from Grimoald, who had approached with his army to the very gates of the city. He was ſo ſucceſsful as to prevail upon the Beneventan prince to agree to a treaty, on condition of delivering up Dauferius, and giving eight thouſand crowns for the expences of the war. Grimoald was ſo merciful, as not only to pardon Dauferius, but to receive him into his former favour; the traitor, however, reflecting upon the heinouſ-
e neſs of his crime, was ſeized with remorſe, and went a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, carrying a large ſtone in his mouth, by way of penance, which he never took out but at his meals[r].

and inveſts the city of Naples.

THOUGH Grimoald happily put an end to this conſpiracy, yet, a few years after, another was formed, which proved fatal to him. The chief conſpirators were Radechis, or Radelchis, count of Conſia, and Sico, Gaſtald of Acerenza, who, during the reign of Arechis, had fled from the duchy of Spoleto, where he had lived in great authority. As he had offended Pepin, he durſt not return to his own country: Arechis and his ſon Grimoald had heaped a great many favours upon him, and his power and authority became ſo great, that he began to aſpire to the ſucceſſion. Grimoald II. however, being preferred to him, his ambition
f prompted him to conſpire againſt his life. He accordingly, together with Radelchis, and the other conſpirators, murdered him, when he had juſt completed the eleventh year of his reign[s].

He is murdered by the count of Conſia. A. D. 871.

SICO, though a ſtranger, ſucceeded to the principality, by the intrigues of Radelchis, the following year renewed the treaty with Lewis the Good, which his predeceſſors had concluded with the French. Radelchis, ſoon after his acceſſion to the throne, repenting of his villainy, became a monk in Monte Caſſino, where he lived in great auſterity. Sico, in the mean time, aſſociated his ſon Sicardo with himſelf in the government, and, being of an ambitious and reſtleſs diſpoſition, ſought a pretence for attacking the Neapolitans. As they, about that time, expelled their duke Theodore, and elected one Stephen in his room, Sico is ſaid to have declared war againſt them, on account of the injury done to his friend Theodore.

He inveſted the city of Naples both by ſea and land; and, having beat down a part of the wall, was preparing to make a general aſſault, when duke Stephen ſubmitted; but, to prevent the pillaging of the city, begged of him to delay his entry till to-morrow, and in the mean time ſent out his mother and his two children as hoſtages. Sico conſented to his requeſt; but next morning he found the breach built up, and the Neapolitans prepared for a defence. Exaſperated with their perfidy, he renewed his attacks with greater fury, but without ſucceſs, as the Neapolitans defended themſelves with great obſtinacy. The emperor of the eaſt neglecting to give them any aſſiſtance, they had recourſe to the emperor Lewis, who ſent them ſome ſmall reinforcements, which enabled them ſtill to hold out againſt the attacks of the beſiegers. Sico, however, ſtill continued the ſiege with great ardour; and the Neapolitans, conſidering the precarioufneſs of foreign aſſiſtance, and finding themſelves, at laſt, unable to oppoſe his aſſaults, they prevailed upon him, by the mediation of their biſhop Orſo, to agree to a peace. The treaty was accordingly concluded on theſe conditions, That the Neapolitans, for the future, ſhould pay a yearly tribute to the princes of Benevento, which was called Collata, and ſhould conſent to the tranſporting of the body of St. Januarius from his church, without the walls of Naples, to Benevento. [t]. Theſe conditions being ratified, and hoſtages given by the Neapolitans, Sico returned with great honour to Benevento, carrying with him the ſacred relics, which were long worſhipped in that city. A few years after, Sico, under pretence that the Neapolitans neglected paying the tribute, renewed the war againſt them, which continued during the remaining part of his reign. He died at Benevento, after he had reigned fifteen years, and a magnificent tomb was erected to him before the door of the cathedral church of that city, with a pompous inſcription, which is ſtill extantu.

He obliges the Neapolitans to pay him tribute.

His death. A. D. 833.

His ſon Sicardo V. ſucceeds.

After the death of Sico, his ſon Sicardo poſſeſſed the government. He had, during the life of his father, married the daughter of the infamous Dauferius, and now delivered himſelf up entirely to the counſels of his wife's brother Roffrid, by whoſe bad advice he oppreſſed his ſubjects in ſo miſerable a manner, that they at laſt conſpired againſt his life. In the beginning of his reign, he made war upon the Neapolitans, under pretence that they did not pay the tribute. He beſieged the city of Naples with a powerful army, and took poſſeſſion of Acerra and Atella, which he fortified. But Bonus, the Neapolitan duke, defended the city with ſuch vigour, that the Beneventans were obliged to retire, being even forced to abandon Acerra and Atella, the fortifications of which places were razed by the Neapolitans. According to the author of the chronicon of Salerno, Sicardo was perſuaded to raiſe the ſiege by his favourite Roffrid, who had been bribed by the Neapolitans [w]. However, he ſoon renewed his hoſtilities; but upon the interceſſion of Lothaire, emperor and king of Italy, and of John biſhop of Naples, he agreed to a peace for five years. The Saracens, whom Andrew the then duke of Naples called over from Africa to his aſſiſtance, ſeemed chiefly to have induced Sicardo to agree to a peace: for they were no ſooner ſent back to Africa, than he ſought to delay the concluſion of the treaty; but the emperor interpoſing his authority, a peace was at laſt ratified in the third year of his reign, after the war had continued, with very little intermiſſion, for ſixteen years x.

He concludes a peace with the Neapolitans. A. D. 836.

Soon after the concluſion of this peace, the Saracens from Sicily landed at Brindiſi, and having made themſelves maſters of the place, ravaged all the neighbouring country. Sicardo marched againſt them with a numerous army, but was at firſt repulſed with great loſs by the Saracens, who, apprehenſive of the number of his men, had recourſe to a ſtratagem, and drew them into a diſadvantageous ground, where they had dug a great many ditches, which they had ſlightly covered over. The Beneventans, during the action, were thereby thrown into great confuſion, and were afterwards entirely routed. Sicardo, after having reinforced his army, marched again to attack them: but they, deſpairing of being able to reſiſt him, pillaged and burned Brindiſi, and retired with their booty, and a great

In the year 820 they came from Africa, like ſwarms of bees, into Sicily, took poſſeſſion of Palermo, and ravaged a great part of that iſland. a great many captives, to Sicily [y]. They were no ſooner gone than Sicardo marched with his army againſt Amalfi, for what reaſon is not mentioned, though it would appear from the chronicon of Salerno, that his chief motive for attacking that city was his great deſire of poſſeſſing relics, which were then ſuperſtitiouſly believed to be a greater protection to a city, than ſtrong fortifications or a powerful army, and which he ſpared no pains to acquire, ſending about this time for the body of St. Bartholomew from one of the iſlands of Lipari. He accordingly, without any bloodſhed, ſurpriſed and took poſſeſſion of Amalfi, which he entirely ſtripped of all its wealth, carrying off with him to Benevento the body of their ſaint Triphomen. He likewiſe ordered the walls of the city to be levelled, plundered the neighbouring country, tranſported a great many of the inhabitants to Salerno, and, by b promoting alliances between the inhabitants of both places, endeavoured to unite it thoroughly to his principality [z].

and reduces Amalfi.

During theſe tranſactions, his own ſubjects continually felt the effects of his cruel and tyrannical diſpoſition. He allowed his favourite Roffrid to ſtrangle an abbot, Alphanus, whom he had perſecuted for ſeveral years, with great malice and enmity, and who came to Salerno, under an oath of ſecurity granted him by his prince. He robbed a great many churches and monaſteries of their wealth; impriſoned and put to death many Beneventan nobles, whoſe eſtates he ſeized; depoſed and impriſoned the famous Deuſdedit, abbot of Monte Caſſino; and, being jealous of his own brother Siconolphus, he compelled him to turn prieſt, and afterwards ſent him bound to Tarento, where he ſhut him up in an old c tower, that had been built for a ciſtern. Theſe, and many other acts of tyranny, at laſt rendered him odious to all his ſubjects; and ſome nobles, who had received perſonal injuries from him, entered into a conſpiracy againſt him, and murdered him in his tent, in the ſixth year of his reign.

Is murdered by his nobles. A. D. 839.

As Sicardo left only one daughter, and a baſtard ſon, and his brother Siconolphus was a priſoner at Tarento, Radelchis, who had been his treaſurer or ſecretary, was unanimouſly elected prince of Benevento, upon his death [a]. A few months after his acceſſion, the Amalfitans who lived at Salerno, deſpairing of receiving the ſame favours from him as from his predeceſſor, burnt their houſes in that city, and returned to Amalfi. Radelchis, or Radelchiſus, who, before his election, had acquired a great reputation for his juſtice and prod bity, began his reign with baniſhing Dauferius, with his ſons Romuald, Arechis, and Grimoald, and ſome other Beneventan nobles. Theſe exiles privately ſollicited the Salernitans to revolt in favour of Siconolphus, brother of the deceaſed prince, and were joined by Landulph, Gaſtald of Capua, who, being apprehenſive of the reſentment of Radelchis, on account of the cruelty of his government, had renounced his allegiance to him, and retired to Sicopolis, a ſtrong city in his Gaſtaldate, lately built by prince Sico. [b]. Several other Beneventan lords entered into this conſpiracy, among whom was Orſo count of Conſia, a relation of Siconolphus, who at this time had eſcaped from his priſon at Tarento, and concealed himſelf at the caſtle of Orſo. The Amalfitans were likewiſe prevailed upon to eſpouſe the cauſe of Siconolphus, who, the following year, was conducted to Salerno, and declared by

who is oppoſed by Siconolphus. A. D. 840.

RADELCHIS immediately raiſed an army to oppoſe his competitor, and an obſtinate and moſt ruinous civil war enſued. The party of Siconolphus was at firſt the moſt ſucceſsful; for, having entered into an alliance with the Neapolitans, he received ſuccours from them, by which means he defeated the army of Radelchis, reduced great part of Calabria and Puglia, and marching towards Benevento, took ſeveral places in its neighbourhood, and at laſt inveſted the city itſelf; but by the bravery of the Beneventans, he was quickly obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and withdraw his army. The Saracens, in the mean time, taking advantage of the inteſtine diviſions of the Beneventans, again landed in Italy, and ſeized Tarento and ſeveral places in Puglia [c]. Radelchis, finding the party of his competitor was becoming f every day more powerful, deſired Pando governor of Bari to invite the Saracens to his aſſiſtance, not reflecting on the dangerous conſequence of ſuch an alliance. The Saracens readily embraced the offers made them by Pando, and encamped without the walls of Bari; but, a few days after, they deceitfully ſurpriſed the garriſon, and making themſelves maſters of the city, made a terrible ſlaughter of the inhabitants, and threw the governor into the ſea. Radelchis, not being in a condition to puniſh their perfidy, condeſcended ſtill to court their alliance, and is even ſaid to have robbed the church of St. Mary in Benevento of its treaſure, to hire them as auxiliaries [d]. In their firſt irruption into the territories of Siconolphus they were defeated and repulſed with great loſs [e]. But not long after, in conjunction with SICONOLPHUS, perceiving the advantage which his competitor gained by his alliance with the Saracens who had come from Africa, moſt imprudently followed his example, and ſent for thoſe Saracens who had ſettled in Spain, inviting them to come to his aſſiſtance. In imitation of Radelchis likewiſe he robbed the church of St. Mary at Salerno of its treaſure [g]; a particular account of which we have in Leo Oſtienſis [h]. The whole duchy of Benevento then became a ſcene of blood and devaſtation. Though Siconolphus, by the aſſiſtance of his new allies, gained ſeveral advantages over his rival, yet their barbarity and inſolence ſoon made him ſenſible of the imprudent ſtep he had taken. He therefore reſolved to have recourſe to the French: and hearing that the emperor's eldeſt ſon Lewis had arrived b at Rome, he went thither, after having a ſixth time robbed the monaſtery of Caſſino, and purchaſed his friendſhip, at the expence of an hundred thouſand crowns [i]. We do not read, however, of any aſſiſtance given to him at that time by Lewis, for the war continued for ſeveral years after, almoſt to the intire deſtruction of the principality, the Saracens, as it ſerved their intereſts, ſometimes acting as auxiliaries, and at other times as declared enemies to both parties.

The emperor divides the principality between the two competitors. A. D. 851.

At length the emperor Lewis, at the earneſt intreaties of the abbot of Monte Caſſino, marched with an army from Breſcia to Benevento, and having obliged the Beneventans to deliver up the Saracens, with their prince Maſſar, who were put to death without the walls, made a partition of the duchy between the two competitors, allowing Radelchis to retain Benevento, with a certain part of the ancient duchy, c and aſſigning the remaining part to Siconolphus, under the title of prince of Salerno; but at the ſame time obliging both princes to acknowlege him as their ſovereign, and to ſwear fealty to him, thereby declaring themſelves not only tributaries but feudatories to the French [k] (E). Such was the conſequence of this moſt ruinous civil war, which had continued, with great animoſity, for near twelve years. The emperor Lewis, who had arrived at Benevento about Whitſuntide, after the concluſion of the treaty, returned with his army to Mantua. But the two princes, who were now reconciled, did not long enjoy the fruits of the peace, both princes dying the ſame year, Siconolphus leaving an infant ſon, named Sico, to the care of one Peter, his godfather, and Radelchis, who, by his wife Caretruda, had twelve children, appointing his ſon Radelgarius as his heir [l], whom he had aſſociated with himſelf in the d principality before his death [m].

Radelcar ſucceeds to the principality of Benevento.

RADELGARIUS, or Radelcar, ſoon after the death of his father, ſent his forces, in conjunction with thoſe of the prince of Salerno, againſt the Saracens, who were ſtill in poſſeſſion of Bari. He was not, however, able to reduce the city or expel the Infidels. On the contrary, they repulſed his forces, and afterwards made an irruption into Apulia and Calabria, and even advanced to the neighbourhood of Benevento and Salerno. The Beneventans, not able to put a ſtop to their ravages, ſent the abbots of Monte Caſſino and St. Vincent to beg the protection of the emperor, offering to ſubmit themſelves, as faithful ſubjects, to the meaneſt officer he ſhould put over them [n]. The emperor Lewis, by his father's deſire, immediately returned to Italy, and marched directly, with a conſiderable army, to- e wards Capua, in expectation of being joined by the inhabitants. But they only granted him a few auxiliaries; ſo that, although he defeated the Saracens in ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, he was not able to drive them out of Italy [o]. Erchempertus ſays, that, on this account, Lewis was offended with the Salernitans, baniſhed their young prince Sico, that is, ſent him to France, and conferred his principality on Ademarius, ſon of Peter the regent [p]. But the author of the chronicon of Salerno, who wrote ſoon after this period, affirms, with more probability, that Peter betrayed his truſt, and, in favour of his own ſon Ademarius, ſet

(E) This partition treaty, which conſiſts of twenty-eight articles, is publiſhed by Peregrinus and in the collections of Muratori. Radelchis thereby promiſed to acknowlege Siconolphus and his ſucceſſors as lawful princes of the principality of Salerno, which was declared to contain Tarento, Latiniano, Caſſano, Coſſenza, Laino, Lucania, Conſia, Montella, Rota, Salerno, Sarno, Ciraterium, Furculo, Capua, Feano, Sora, and the half of the Gaſtaldate of Acerenza, where it joins Latiniano and Conſia. The boundary between Benevento and Capua was fixed at St. Angelo ad Cerros, extending to the rock of Monte Virgine, and to the place called Feneſtella. Alli Peregrini was made the boundary betwixt Benevento and Salerno, and Staffilo betwixt Benevento and Conſia. The monaſteries of Monte Caſſino and St. Vincent were declared to be immediately under the protection of the emperor. Both princes ſtipulated that no hoſtilities for the future ſhould be committed by either againſt the ſubjects of the other, and promiſed to join their forces to drive the Saracens entirely out of their dominions. The author of the chorographical deſcription of Italy juſtly obſerves, that the terms of the treaty are not ſo explicit, as to enable us to mark out diſtinctly the limits of the two principalities (4).

During theſe tranſactions Radelcar prince of Benevento died, in the third year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by his brother Adelchis, or Adelgiſe, a prince of a mild diſpoſition, who was engaged for ſeveral years in hoſtilities with the Saracens, to whom he was obliged at length to give hoſtages and a yearly ſubſidy[r].

He is ſucceeded by his brother Adelchis. A. D. 854.

Two years after his acceſſion to the principality of Benevento, Sico the young prince of Salerno returned to Italy, and was poiſoned at Sicopolis, by Lando count of Capua, who the ſame year removed from Sicopolis, which had been built upon the top of a hill twenty-five years before, and, in conjunction with two of his brothers, Landulph the biſhop, and Landulph the count, built New Capua, on the plain near the bridge of Caſſilino. About the

b ſame time they likewiſe revolted from Ademarius, then prince of Salerno, and declared themſelves independent. Their father count Landulph, who had been Gaſtald of Capua, c put moſt of his own relations to death, and about the beginning of the civil war between Radelchis and Siconolphus, began to govern his Gaſtaldate in an arbitrary manner. His ſons ſeeing the principality of Benevento ravaged by the Saracens, and that of Salerno poſſeſſed by one whom they looked upon as an uſurper, took that opportunity of renouncing their allegiance to Ademarius, who was no ſooner informed of their revolt than he marched againſt them with an army, in order to reduce them; but after ſeveral unſucceſsful ſkirmiſhes, he was obliged to retire. Lando governed his new county (F) with an independent ſway for five years, and, dying, left his children to the care of his two brothers Pando and Landulph the biſhop, who betraying their truſt, baniſhed their nephews, and ſeized the county, which occaſioned a civil war betwixt the favourers of the uncles and nephews.

The counts of Capua declare themſelves independent. A. D. 856.

DURING the government of Lando at Capua, Ademarius prince of Salerno, by his cruelty and rapaciouſneſs, entirely alienated the affections of his ſubjects. Guaferius the ſon of Dauferius, who was then in exile at Naples, being encouraged by the malecontents, and privately aſſiſted by the Capuan counts, returned to Salerno, and ſeizing Ademarius, ſhut him up in a cloſe priſon, a few months after the death of Lando[s]. Adelgiſe, prince of Benevento, in the mean time, was engaged in repelling the incurſions of the Saracens; though he had received, at different times, conſiderable ſuccours from the emperor Lewis, he was unable to oppoſe the ravages of the Infidels. He therefore entered into alliance with Gua-

d ferius prince of Salerno, and, in conjunction with him, ſent an embaſſy to the emperor, intreating his protection in a moſt humble manner. Lewis, in the mean time, received an embaſſy from the emperor of Conſtantinople, propoſing a junction of their forces to expel the Saracens entirely from Italy; he therefore reſolved upon an expedition againſt them, and gave orders for aſſembling a formidable army, ſending likewiſe to his brother Lotharius, king of France, deſiring him to march with ſome troops into Italy[t]. The Saracens, in the mean time, continued their incurſions, and ſome authors ſay, at the inſtigation of Adelgiſe, who had made peace with them, they invaded the county of Capua, which they ravaged in a moſt barbarous manner, and from thence proceeded to the dukedom of Naples, which they likewiſe plundered. The Neapolitans aſſembling an army, and hiring the e troops of the duke of Spoleto, and Gerard count of Marſi, endeavoured to oppoſe them; but the Saracens gaining the victory, they turned more inſolent, and ravaged the duchy of Benevento, making themſelves maſters of Venafro, plundering the monaſtery of St. Vincent the martyr, and raiſing a contribution of three thouſand crowns from the monaſtery of Caſſino; and retired undiſturbed with ther booty to Bari[u].

A FEW months after the emperor Lewis arrived with his army at Sora, and proceeding from thence to Caſſino, was received with great reſpect by the abbot and monks. Upon his entering the county of Capua, he was joined by Landulph the biſhop and count, with a body of Capuans; but Landulph ſoon after perſuading the Capuans to deſert, the emperor immediately marched againſt that city, which he made himſelf maſter of, after a ſiege of f three months. Having almoſt totally deſtroyed that city, he marched from thence, in the end of the year, towards Salerno, and was met by Guaferius, who marched out with his quota of troops, having ordered the eyes of Ademarius to be put out in his abſence. Lewis confirmed him in the principality, and marched with his army to Benevento, where he was received with great reſpect by Adelgiſe. Early the following ſpring he ordered his army to aſſemble at Lucera, and proceeded from thence to inveſt Bari. Finding the city ſtrongly fortified and garriſoned, and having ſuffered ſome conſiderable loſſes in ſkirmiſhes with the Infidels, he withdrew his army, and marched againſt Matera, which he made himſelf maſter of, and, after permitting his ſoldiers to plunder it, ſet it on fire. He likewiſe reduced ſeveral other inconſiderable places belonging to the Saracens, to whom he gave no quarter; and having placed garriſons in Venoſa and Canoſa, and ſent for aſſiſtance from his brother Lotharius and the Greek emperor Baſilius, he returned, upon the concluſion of the campaign, to Benevento. As the Saracens were continually reinforced from Palermo and Africa, and were beſides protected by the Neapolitans, Lewis did not reduce the city of Bari till three years afterwards, though he received a conſiderable reinforcement from his brother Lotharius, and was aſſiſted by upwards of two hundred ſail of Greek ſhips[x]. He is ſaid by ſome authors to have put Seodan or Soldan, the Saracen prince, and all the garriſon to death[y]; but the author of the chronicon of Salerno relates, that the emperor, at the interceſſion of Adelgiſe, ſpared Soldan and two others, whom he delivered as priſoners to the Beneventan prince[z].

He reduces Bari. A. D. 871.

AFTER the reducing and demoliſhing of Bari, the French and Lombards marched againſt the Saracens in Puglia and Calabria, and laid cloſe ſiege to Tarento, from whence, about Auguſt, Lewis returned with great glory to Benevento, reſolving, after having totally expelled the Saracens from Italy, to make a conqueſt of Sicily[a]. His future ſchemes of conqueſt were however fruſtrated by a ſingular accident. The empreſs Engelberga, who attended her huſband, had, on ſeveral occaſions, behaved in an inſolent manner to Adelgiſe; and the French army, elated with their ſucceſs, had of late begun to oppreſs the Beneventans, and to treat them with contempt. On theſe accounts, and ſome ſay at the inſtigation of Baſilius, Adelgiſe ſurpriſed Lewis in Benevento, and kept him in priſon for forty days; the Beneventans, at the ſame time, plundering the retinue of the emperor, and expelling them the city. During his impriſonment a new body of Saracens arrived from Africa; and being joined by thoſe in Italy, they beſieged the city of Salerno with an army of thirty thouſand men, ravaging the neighbouring country with great barbarity[b]. This new invaſion greatly alarmed Adelgiſe: however, reſolving to free his principality from the oppreſſion of the French, before he would give the emperor his liberty, he obliged him to ſwear upon the ſacred relics not to revenge the inſult he had received, and never to return to Benevento. After his departure Adelgiſe joined his forces to thoſe of Guaferius prince of Salerno, to oppoſe the Saracens, who ſoon after raiſed the ſiege and marched into Calabria, which they intirely deſtroyed; leaving it as deſolate, ſays Erchempertus, as it was at the flood[c].

Is impriſoned at Benevento by Adelgiſe, who ſoon after ſets him at liberty.

THE emperor Lewis, in the mean time, had advanced to Capua, where by the perſuaſion of Landulph the biſhop and count, who had become his favourites, he put nine thouſand Saracens to death, and detained two ambaſſadors, who had been ſent by the prince of Salerno, during the ſiege, to deſire his aſſiſtance. A few weeks after he proceeded to Rome, where he was crowned by the pope; and from thence, according to a certain author, marched with his army towards Benevento[d]. Other authors, however, place this expedition in the following year, when he received abſolution from his oath from pope John VIII.; and ſome ſay, that he did not go himſelf with his army, but gave the command of it to his empreſs; and that, though a body of Greeks had landed at Otranto to ſupport Adelgiſe, that prince, deſpairing of being able to defend himſelf, left Italy and fled to Corſica. The accounts of authors, concerning theſe tranſactions, are very different, and impoſſible to be reconciled. We find that this ſame year Adelgiſe, by the interceſſion of his countryman pope John, was reconciled to the emperor, and reſtored to his principality, which he enjoyed till his death, which happened five years afterwards, when he was murdered by his own relations[e]. The emperor Lewis, ſoon after his reconciliation with Adelgiſe, reſtored the county of Capua to the biſhop Landulph: however, he refuſed to erect Capua into a metropolitan ſee, and to ſubject it to the ſee of Benevento, which the ambitious biſhop ſolicited with great earneſtneſs[f].

Adelgiſe is reconciled to the emperor. A. D. 873.

LEWIS immediately left Capua, and died the following year in France, while the Saracens were ſtill continuing their ravages in Benevento, which induced the inhabitants of Bari to deliver their city to Gregory governor of Otranto, who took poſſeſſion of it with a Greek garriſon. At the ſame time, the Salernitans, Neapolitans, Cajetans, and Amalfitans, having made peace with the Saracens, were compelled to agree to their propoſal of attacking the Roman dukedom; and accordingly fitted out a fleet of ſhips, with which they infeſted the a coasts of the territories belonging to the pope[g]. His holiness earnestly sollicited assistance from Charles the Bald king of France, whom the year before he had created emperor, and wrote to Guaferius prince of Salerno, dissuading him from an alliance with the Infidels[h]. In the beginning of the following year he again sollicited the emperor's assistance, and excommunicated Sergius duke of Naples, who was the most zealous friend of the Saracens. He likewise wrote to the prefect of Amalfi, to Landulph bishop of Capua, and to Clio bishop of Benevento, desiring them to exert themselves against the Infidels. He even went himself at the head of an army to the neighbourhood of Gaeta, in conjunction with Vido and Lambert dukes of Spoleto, and prevailed upon Guaferius prince of Salerno to renounce his alliance with the Infidels, and to declare war against the Neapolitans. Guaferius accordingly at-b tacked the Neapolitans, and took twenty-two prisoners, whom the pope ordered to be beheaded. Sergius duke of Naples, being privately supported by Lambert duke of Spoleto, and Adelgise prince of Benevento, refused to abandon the Infidels; but soon after he was sent a prisoner to Rome by his brother Athanasius bishop of Naples, who, after apprehending him, ordered his eyes to be put out. The pope, however, being disappointed of the assistance of the emperor, who came no farther than Pavia, and was cut off by poison, was therefore obliged to purchase a peace from the Infidels, and to promise to pay them a large annual tribute[i].

By the death of the emperor Charles, all Italy was thrown into the greatest confusion. Several competitors claimed the imperial dignity and the kingdom of Italy; and as the c pope's suffrage now appeared of great consequence, Lambert duke of Spoleto entered Rome, with an armed force, to compel the pope to declare for him. John, provoked by this outrage, left Rome; and, the following year, went by sea to France. During his absence, Adelgise prince of Benevento, as we mentioned above, was murdered by his own nephews; one of whom, Gaideris, seized the principality, to the prejudice of Radelchis, the son of the deceased. John returned, towards the end of the year, to Rome, when he declares, in a letter to the king of France, that he found all the coasts of the Roman dukedom, towards Fundi and Terracina, in the possession of the Saracens. Five days after his arrival he assembled some troops; and marching against the Saracens, recovered six hundred captives, and took eighteen of their ships[k]. A few months after, Landulph bishop of Capua
d dying, that county was divided, according to his will, betwixt his three grandchildren. Pandonulphus, besides Capua, possessed Tiano and Lasamirta; Lando, Berolassi, and Suessa; and the other Lando, Calinio, and Cajazetta. At the same time, Landulph the son of Lando was chosen bishop. These dispositions, however, continued only two months; for the brothers invaded each other's inheritance; and, to support their party, some had recourse to Guaferius prince of Salerno, others to Lambert duke of Spoleto, and others to Gaideris prince of Benevento, and Gregory governor of Bari and Otranto. To complete the confusion, Landulph the new bishop was expelled, and Landenulph the brother of the governor of Capua, though a layman, was chosen in his room, and even consecrated by the pope[l], who wrote to Guaferius, prohibiting him, under pain of excommunication, from attacking
e Capua. Though Guaferius is said to have shewn himself always submissive to the pope, yet he seems not to have regarded the present threatening; for we find from Erchempertus, that he besieged Capua both this year and the following. That miserable province was at the same time obliged to support the armies of the prince of Benevento and the duke of Spoleto.

Gaideris succeeds to the principality of Benevento. A. D. 878.

A civil war in the county of Capua.

The Saracens in the mean time seized the favourable opportunity for strengthening their power in Italy. Athanasius, bishop and duke of Naples, notwithstanding the great commendations he had received from the pope, for putting out the eyes of his brother, now consented to an alliance with the Infidels, in conjunction with whom he ravaged the pope's territories, and those of Benevento and Spoleto, plundering all the churches, monasteries, towns, and cities, through which they passed[m]. The Saracens about the same time over-f ran the principality of Salerno, and obliged the Salernitans to conclude a peace with them, and to grant them a settlement in the neighbourhood of their city[n]. At the invitation of Docibilis, duke of Gaeta, who was oppressed by the count of Capua, they likewise sailed from Agropoli, and landing in the neighbourhood of Gaeta, plundered the province to a considerable distance. The pope used his utmost endeavours with the Cajetans to dismiss them: and by going himself to Gaeta, prevailed upon Docibilis to renounce his alliance with them, and to attack them; but as he quickly found them too powerful, he was obliged to conclude a peace with them, and to grant them a settlement on the north side of the Garigliano, where they fortified themselves, and continued for more than forty years[o]. The pope, to put a stop to the confusion which overwhelmed Italy, thought proper about this Guaferius, prince of Salerno, is ſucceeded by his ſon Guaimarius. A. D. 880.

THE following year Guaferius, prince of Salerno, died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Guaimarius. He had not held the principality of Salerno many months, when Gaideris, prince of Benevento, was taken priſoner by Lando, one of the counts of Capua, becauſe he had eſpouſed the cauſe of count Pandonulph, and had given his daughter in marriage to his ſon. In room of Gaideris, the Beneventans choſe Radelchis, the ſon of their former prince Adelgiſe, who was ſoon after informed that Gaideris had made his eſcape from France, whither he had been ſent as a priſoner, and had put himſelf under the protection of the Greeks at Bari. From thence he proceeded to Conſtantinople, where he was received in an b honourable manner by the emperor Baſilius, who conferred upon him for life the government of Oria, an inland city betwixt Brindiſi and Tarento[p]. In the mean time Athanaſius, biſhop of Naples, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the pope, continued his alliance with the Saracens, in conjunction with whom he ravaged the territories of Benevento. Being in hopes likewiſe of making a conqueſt of Capua, he fomented the diviſions among the brother counts, and ſent troops to the aſſiſtance of Pandonulph. The pope, not being able to prevail with him to renounce his alliance with the Infidels, though he had even gone to Naples for that purpoſe, returned to Rome, and in the month of March denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt him. This cenſure, however, ſeemed to have no effect; Athanaſius united himſelf more cloſely than ever to the Saracens, and ſent to Sicily, c deſiring king Suchaim to come over and command a great body of his countrymen, who had ſettled at the foot of mount Veſuvius. He likewiſe continued his army in Capua, where it committed great diſorders; and this year, among other priſoners, took the hiſtorian Erchempertus, then a youth, and ſtripped him of all that he had[q]. Suchaim, in the mean time, who had taken the command of the Saracens, began hoſtilities againſt his ally Athanaſius, and allowed his troops to live at diſcretion in the territory of Naples, where they raviſhed the women, and plundered the inhabitants of their effects. The Neapolitans, thinking theſe calamities were a conſequence of the ſentence of excommunication, prevailed on Athanaſius to conclude an alliance with Guaimarius, prince of Salerno, againſt the Infidels. The biſhop, accordingly, receiving a conſiderable body of troops from Guaimarius, and drawing reinforcements from the cities and maritime towns of Capua, obliged d the Infidels to quit Naples, and retire to Agropoli.

The pope excommunicates the biſhop of Naples; A. D. 881.

AFTER their expulſion from his territories, he declared againſt Pandonulph, count of Capua, and beſieged that city in conjunction with the ſons of Lando and Landonulph. Pandonulph had recourſe to his kinſman Radelchis, prince of Benevento, for aſſiſtance, who marching with his brother Aio to his relief, was admitted into the city, and ſoon after attacked the beſiegers, who were at that time aſſiſted by the Amalfitans. Both parties fought with great obſtinacy, but neither ſide could claim a victory. Radelchis not long after returning to Benevento, Athanaſius perſuaded Pandonulph to an accommodation with his brothers; which was accordingly agreed to, and confirmed by an oath. But he and his party e were no ſooner admitted into the city, but they ſeized Pandonulph, and his brother Landonulph the biſhop, with all their friends, and ſent the count and the biſhop priſoners to Naples. The Saracens in the mean time ſtill continued their incurſions, and ravaged the provinces in ſuch a manner, that the lands and fields became intirely deſolate, and, for want of being cultivated, began to be covered with brambles and thorns[r]. About this time they aſſembled a powerful army from Garigliano and Agropoli, and marched to the relief of their countrymen, who were beſieged by the Greeks in Santa Severina. They were, however, very unſucceſsful in this expedition; for Erchempertus relates that they were all cut off by the Greeks, who immediately after made themſelves maſters of Santa Severina and Amantea, and recovered all Lower Calabria. f

IN the midſt of theſe confuſions, the Beneventans expelled their prince Radelchis in the third year of his reign, and choſe his brother Aio in his room[s]. Aio had not enjoyed the principality many months, when he was taken priſoner by Guido, duke of Spoleto, at Capua. When the Saracens drew their chief force into Calabria againſt the Greeks, Guido, or Vido, attacked their ſettlement at Garigliano, which he took and plundered. Being afterwards met by Aio at Capua, he detained him a priſoner, and proceeded to Benevento, where he diſpoſed of every thing according to his pleaſure, and afterwards marched quite through the principality to Siponto, now Manfredonia, on the Adriatic ſea. The Sipontins, being informed that their prince was a priſoner, ſurpriſed Guido in one of their churches, and obliged him to ſet Aio at liberty. As a ſecurity for his engagements to Athanaſius, he ſent his ſon a hoſtage to Naples; and to prevail with pope Stephen IV. to countenance his uſurpation, he ſent the abbot of St. Vincent, and Dauferius, a deacon, to Rome, offering to ſubmit himſelf to the pope, to reſtore Gaeta to him, and to aſſiſt him againſt the Saracens, who were ſettled at Garigliano; which pro-

Some time before this revolution in Capua, Guaimarius, prince of Salerno, not being able to oppoſe the Saracens, who, in conjunction with Athanaſius, ravaged his principality, went to Conſtantinople, to aſk aſſiſtance from the Greek emperors Leo and Alexander, who the ſame year had ſucceeded their father Baſilius, received him with great honour, created him a patrician, ſupplied him with money and proviſions, and, upon his return, ſent with him a conſiderable body of Greeks, who were put in garriſon at Salerno[w]. Pellegrinus informs us likewiſe, that they granted him a charter, which is recorded by Summontes[x], confirming to him the principality of Salerno, according to the treaty of partition made betwixt Siconolphus and Radelchis[y].

Soon after his return, Aio, prince of Benevento, renounced his allegiance to the Greeks,

c and attacked their garriſon in Bari. The biſhop of Naples in the mean time attacked his territories, and thoſe of Atenulphus, count of Capua. In ſhort, all thoſe provinces, which compoſe the preſent kingdom of Naples, were engaged, about this period, in continual civil wars, and with great animoſity contributed to their mutual ruin. They concluded ſolemn treaties, which they violated within ten days after; and preferring their private reſentment to the good of the public, and inſtead of uniting to expel the Saracens, they continually aſſociated themſelves with the Infidels, who made no ſcruple of ſerving in oppoſite armies[z]. The anarchy which prevailed at this time in Italy was greatly increaſed by the death of the emperor Charles the Groſs, without male iſſue. The Italians, on this occaſion, reſolved no longer to be governed by a foreign prince, and accordingly choſe Be- d rengarius duke of Friuli, for their king, who, by the mother's ſide, was great grandſon of Charlemagne. He obtained the kingdom peaceably, as he had entered into a previous compact with another ambitious great grandſon of Charles the Great, namely, Vido, or Guido, duke of Spoleto, who, in his choice of the kingdoms of the late emperor, thought proper to prefer France. The French, however, having conferred their kingdom on Otho, count of Paris and Orleans, Guido returned diſappointed to Italy, and immediately formed pretenſions to his native kingdom; in which he was ſo fortunate, as to be countenanced by pope Stephen, who had adviſed him to his French expedition. A civil war enſuing, Guido defeated his competitor, and, after much bloodſhed, having intirely reduced all thoſe of the oppoſite party, he was crowned emperor by pope Formoſus, in the firſt year of his pon-

At the commencement of this deſtructive civil war, which continued four years in the northern parts of Italy, Leo, emperor of Conſtantinople, reſolving to puniſh the revolt of Aio, prince of Benevento, made great preparations for an expedition into Italy. Aio, however, died before the arrival of the Greek army, and left his principality to his ſon Orſo, then a boy of ten years of age. Gaideris, the exiled prince, who ſtill reſided at Oria, urged the emperor to ſeize that opportunity of making a conqueſt of Benevento. Leo, accordingly, the follow-

f emperor, after it had been governed by the Lombards about three hundred and twenty years[a]. Simbaticius remained in Benevento about two years, and afterwards delivered up his government to George the patrician, who treated the Beneventans with great mildneſs and humanity, in hopes of reconciling them to their new maſter. In the mean time Guaimarius, prince of Salerno, governing his ſubjects in a tyrannical manner, many of them fled to Benevento, where they entered into a conſpiracy againſt their prince, and offered to deliver up Salerno to the patrician. George accordingly aſſembled an army, under pretence of attacking the Saracens, and marched to the very walls of Salerno; but, though the gates were opened by the conſpirators, he was diſſuaded from marching into the city by the biſhop of Benevento, who pretended to propheſy, that if they entered Salerno, they would

This treacherous proceeding of the patrician intirely alienated the Beneventans from the Greeks. They therefore privately desired Guaimarius, prince of Salerno, to invite Guido, prince of Spoleto, whose sister he had married, to come into their neighbourhood with an army, promising to deliver their city to him. Guido, whose elder brother Lambert was then emperor and king of Italy, quickly arrived with an army in the neighbourhood of Benevento, were he was joyfully received by the inhabitants, who had been for some time greatly oppressed by the Greek governor Theodore Turmaca, the successor of the patrician George, who had died a little before of a palsy [b].

GUIDO allowed Turmaca to depart, upon paying five thousand crowns; and, after he had held the principality near two years, he resolved to return to Spoleto, and to put Guaimarius, his brother-in-law, in possession of Benevento. Guaimarius accordingly proceeded with a numerous retinue to Avellino, within fourteen miles of Benevento, where he was surprised at night by the Gastald Adelpherius, who immediately put out his eyes. Guido nevertheless left Benevento, which, after his departure, was governed a few months by Peter the bishop, who, finding great difficulty in repulsing the Greeks, invited the mother of the emperor Lambert to come to the city. She soon after arrived at Benevento, and restored the principality to her brother Radelchis, who had been expelled about 14 years before by Aio [c]. As he was of a soft and indolent disposition, and had no talents for government, he suffered himself wholly to be directed by the councils of one Virialdus, who excited him to harrass his subjects, and to banish several of the Beneventan lords. These exiles, with many others who voluntarily banished themselves, retired to Capua, where they were honourably entertained by Atenulphus. In resentment of the severity of Radelchis, they formed a design of again expelling him, and conferring the principality on their protector Atenulphus, who willingly hearkened to their proposal, and, to strengthen his interest, immediately sent an embassy to Guaimarius, prince of Salerno, begging the prince's daughter for his son Landulph, and offering to be subject to him, as his predecessors had been to the Salernitan princes. Guaimarius, at the instigation of his wife Jota, and the Capuan exiles Lando and Landulph, rejected the proposed alliance in a disdainful manner, which obliged Atenulphus to have recourse to the friendship of Athanasius, the bishop and duke of Naples, who, without any difficulty, consented to a firm alliance with him, and to give his only daughter Gemma to Landulph, the young count of Capua [d].

ATENULPHUS, strengthened by this alliance, hastened the execution of the design formed by the exiles, and proceeding with them towards Benevento, surprised the city during the night, and seized Radelchis. He was instantly proclaimed prince by the nobles and people, whose affection he afterwards studied to secure by liberal gifts and a mild administration. This great revolution was very unacceptable to many Beneventans, who could not forbear repining at finding themselves subjected to the dominion of a stranger, who was not descended of the race of their antient dukes and princes [e]. During these transactions at Benevento, Guaimarius, or Waimar, who had rendered himself odious to his subjects by his cruelty, was deposed by his son Guaimarius II. whom he had a few years before associated with himself in the government [f]. Atenulphus, in the mean while, to secure the possession of the principality to his family, associated his son Landulph with himself as prince, and, appointing Peter the bishop as governor of Benevento, returned to Capua, where he fixed his residence, to the irrecoverable loss of the city of Benevento, which from that time began to lose its splendor, and decay. After his return to Capua, the Beneventans, prompted by their bishop Peter, formed a design of a revolt; but the conspiracy being discovered to Atenulphus, he marched back to Benevento, seized the chief rebels, and expelled the bishop, who retired full of shame to Salerno, where he was kindly received by Guaimarius II. at that time greatly jealous of the power of the prince of Benevento (G). Atenulphus, having established his authority in Benevento, was afterwards engaged for several years in opa posing the incursions of the Saracens, who had fortified themselves strongly on the Garigliano. He was assisted by the Amalfitans, and by Gregory duke of Naples, who had succeeded Athanasius; but finding their joint forces unable to suppress the Infidels, he applied for assistance to the emperor Leo, and sent his son Landulph to Constantinople. Leo, desirous of recovering the authority of his predecessors in Italy, received Landulph with great kindness, created him a patrician, and ordered a powerful army to be transported into Italy. During the absence of Landulph, Atenulphus associated his other son, of his own name, in the principality, and died in a few months after, having governed the Beneventans ten years and six months, and been count of Capua twenty-three years and an half[g]. His death. A. D. 910.

(G) Atenulphus comprehended both the principality of Benevento and the county of Capua under the same government; and, according to Pellegrinus, they continued so united during the reigns of his sons and grandsons. For though, soon after this period, in some antient records, mention is made of the princes of Capua, yet that is only in compliance with the vulgar speech, because the princes of that family resided at Capua. It is evident from many proofs, that Atenulphus did not erect Capua into a new principality, distinct from that of Benevento. We shall particularly mention the following words in an agreement made betwixt the princes Landulph and Atenulph, and Gregory, duke of Naples; which was afterwards renewed in the year 933. The words are these: "In toto principatu vestro Beneventano, cum omnibus suis pertinentiis, nec in toto comitatu Capuano, nec in Teano, cum pertinentiis suis" (1).

LANDULPH hearing of the death of his father, who was greatly regretted, immedib ately left Constantinople, and returned to Capua, where he was received with great affection by his brother; and together with him assumed the government, both of them agreeing not to separate the principality from the county, as had been proposed by their father. His two sons govern conjointly. Mean while the Greek army arrived in Italy, under the command of Nicholas Picigli, a patrician, who brought with him the dignity of patriciate from the emperor Constantine VIII. for Gregory, duke of Naples, and John, duke of Gaeta, in order to detach them intirely from the Saracens. Nicholas having drawn considerable reinforcements from Puglia and Calabria, which were then almost intirely under the dominion of the Greeks, and being joined by auxiliary troops from Naples, Gaeta, and Salerno, besides those of the Beneventans and Capuans, he marched to the Garigliano, and sat down before the fort of the Saracens.

c John X. likewise joined in this alliance, and also the Spoletans, and inhabitants of Camerino, and together with Alberic, marquis of Tuscany, invested another side of the fort. The Saracens, after a siege of three months, despairing of being able to defend the place, set fire to several parts of the town, and sallied out to the neighbouring woods and mountains; but being pursued and surrounded by the Italians and Greeks, they were almost intirely cut off[h]. The Saracens are entirely defeated at Garigliano. A. D. 915.

Though by this celebrated victory, obtained by the allies, Italy was intirely freed from the Saracens, yet, soon after, another body of Moors arriving from Africa, and being joined with those who had saved themselves from Garigliano, they ravaged Puglia and the territories of Benevento. The tranquility of the provinces was likewise soon disturbed by the d Greeks, who governing the Apulians and Calabrians with great severity, obliged them to revolt. They accordingly put themselves under the protection of Landulph, prince of Benevento, who willingly espoused their cause; and being in hopes, by that opportunity of recovering Bari, and many cities of Puglia, he immediately began hostilities against the Greeks. The event of the war at first, however, was contrary to his expectation; for the Apulians and Calabrians were quickly reduced by the Greeks, whose resentment was so great against them and Landulph, that they invited the Saracens again from Africa, and hired them as auxiliaries. Though the Greeks, in the beginning of the war, made considerable progress, yet, in the third campaign, Landulph gained a complete victory over them at Ascoli, when the Greek general was slain. About eight years afterwards, according to Lu-

e pus, Protaspata, Landulph being assisted by Guaimarius, prince of Salerno, at last wrested Puglia from the Greeks, and kept possession of the province seven years[i]. The war, however, seems still to have continued, for we read the following story in Luitprand, which is placed by Sigonius four years after the conquest of Apulia. The Greeks continuing their hostilities with great vigour, Landulph called in Theobald, marquis of Spoleto and Camerino, to his assistance. Theobald having gained some advantages over the Greeks, ordered the prisoners he had taken to be castrated, and sent them back in that condition to the Greek general, with orders to tell him, that as he knew his emperor was a great lover of eunuchs, he had sent him these few, but he hoped to be able to send him a much greater number in a short time. A certain woman, whose husband had been taken prisoner, hearing of the f intention of the marquis, came to his camp, and being admitted to his presence, made loud complaints against his proceeding, and accused him of base cowardice, for making war upon helpless women, by depriving their husbands of what gives them health, pleasure, and children. If he had a mind to punish them, they had eyes, a nose, and hands, which were their own: but what he had hitherto deprived them of was the property of their wives, and ought not to be injured. This woman's ingenuous declaration had such an effect upon Theobald, that her husband and all that she had lost were immediately restored to her[k]. Two years after this transaction, it appears that the Beneventan princes had returned to their obedience to the Greeks; for Peregrinus mentions a charter which is dated in the thirty-fifth year of the reign of Landulphus, to which is added likewise the years of the reign A war betwixt Landulph and the Greeks.

of the emperor Constantine [l]. This peace, however, continued but a few years; for Lupus, Protaſpata, mentions a battle fought betwixt the Lombards and the Greeks at Matera, in which the Greek general was killed [m]. This action happened about three years before the death of Landulph, who died in the forty-third year of his reign, after he had again been obliged to ſubmit to the Greeks, as appears from the words of a charter produced by Baronius and Peregrinus [n]. About ten years before the death of Landulph, died Guaimarius II. prince of Salerno, leaving his principality to his infant ſon Giſulphus, whom a little before he had aſſociated with himſelf in the government. Guaimarius had married Gaitelgrima, the daughter of Atenulphus II. prince of Benevento; who being expelled in the twenty-ſecond year of his reign, by his brother Landulph, retired to Salerno [o]. UPON the death of Landulph II. his two ſons, Pandulph Iron-head and Landulph III. made a diviſion of his territories, Landulph having the principality of Benevento, and fixing his reſidence in the ancient capital, while Pandulph reſided at Capua, and governed that county. In the ſecond year of their reigns, Otho the Great, king of Germany, upon the invitation of the pope and the Italians, arrived with a powerful army in Italy againſt Berengarius III. and marching to Rome, received the imperial crown from the pope. Otho, in imitation of Charlemagne, immediately applied his thoughts to the eſtabliſhing his authority in Italy; and the following year, in the month of Auguſt, he proceeded to Capua, to receive the homage of the Lombard princes [s]. Their power and influence, ſince the time of Arechis and Grimoald, were greatly decayed; they could not therefore imitate thoſe princes, and oppoſe the arms of the new conqueror. Pandulph and his brother being ſenſible of their own weakneſs, ſtrove to procure the favour of Otho by their obſequiouſneſs and reſpect, and being informed of his march towards Capua, they went out to meet him with a great retinue, and conducted him and his empreſs Adelaide to the city, with great demonſtrations of joy. They acknowleged him as their ſovereign, declared themſelves his vaſſals and feudatories, and ſubjected their ſtates to him in the ſame manner as their predeceſſors had done to the antient Lombard kings. Pandulphus particularly having acquired his favour, obtained from him an imperial decree, erecting the county of Capua into a principality, and that he ſhould for the future have the title of prince of Capua [t]. Otho during his reſidence at Capua ſent an ambaſſy to Giſulphus, the brother of his empreſs, inviting him to come and ſee his ſiſter. The Salernitan prince was very apprehenſive of a ſiniſter deſign; but after having in a ſolemn manner implored the protection of the Virgin Mary, and having obtained the bleſſing of his biſhop, he ſet out with his attendants for Capua, and was met at ſome diſtance from the city by the princes Pandulph and Landulph, who preſented him to the emperor. According to our author, Otho ſtepped down from his throne to receive him, and his ſiſter Adelaide ran to him, and falling on his neck, kiſſed him ſeveral times, reproaching him in a tender manner for not coming to ſee her without being invited. Giſulphus, after receiving ſome valuable preſents from the emperor and empreſs, returned with great joy to Salerno [u].

OTHO in the mean time reſolved to recover Puglia and Calabria from the Greeks; but was at that time recalled from Campania by a rebellion of the pope and the Romans. He was employed ſome time in reducing the rebels; and having re-eſtabliſhed his authority at Rome, went back to Germany. The Italians during his abſence revolted, and the Romans expelled pope John XIII. becauſe he refuſed to join in their rebellion. Theſe commotions obliged the emperor, about two years after, to return to Italy, where he puniſhed the chiefs of the rebellion with great ſeverity; and ſending for his young ſon Otho, then about thirteen years of age, cauſed him to be crowned emperor by the pope. Soon after he again proceeded to Capua, where he received an ambaſſy from the Greek emperor Nicephorus, who being apprehenſive of his power, profeſſed a deſire of living in friendſhip with him. Otho propoſed an alliance betwixt his young ſon and Theophania, the daughter of the late ema peror Romanus, whose wife had poisoned him, that she might marry Nicephorus. He required likewise the provinces of Puglia and Calabria as a dowry with the young princess; and to negotiate the affair, he sent Luitprand, bishop of Cremona, as his ambassador to Constantinople, being firmly resolved to commence hostilities if Nicephorus refused to agree to his proposal, as appears from his letter to his generals Herman and Theodoric, whom he had left in Germany [w]. Luitprand wrote a curious account of his ambassy, which is still extant [x]. He says, he was received at Constantinople with the greatest inhumanity, and almost starved; that Nicephorus in his discourse treated Otho and the Germans with great contempt and ridicule, and refused to consent to the match, unless Otho would restore to him Rome and Ravenna, and all that part of Italy betwixt those cities and Sicily: though the match should

b not take place, he required Otho to leave Rome free, and to renounce all pretensions to the sovereignty over the Beneventan and Capuan princes, who were his subjects. Otho in the mean time had returned to Rome, together with the pope, who, while he was at Capua with the emperor, erected that see into a metropolitan, and created John, the brother of Pandulph, the first archbishop [y].

He sends an ambassy to Constantinople. A. D. 968.

Before the return of Luitprand from Constantinople, Otho, when at Rome, received an ambassy from Nicephorus, who desired him to send some of his chief men to Apulia, to receive Theophania. The emperor accordingly sent some of his nobles, with a large escort, to receive the princess; but instead of finding Theophania, they were unexpectedly attacked by the Greeks, and almost all killed or taken prisoners. This perfidious action immediately
c determined the emperor to declare war. He accordingly, in the month of March, laid siege to Bari; but the Greeks defended themselves with such resolution, that he was obliged to withdraw his army. The rest of the campaign was spent with various success; for tho' the emperor ravaged some of the Greek territories, yet Pandulph, prince of Capua, who invested Bovino, was defeated in a sally, and taken prisoner by the Greeks, who immediately sent him to Constantinople. A little before this campaign, Landulph, prince of Benevento, dying, Pandulph had succeeded him in that principality, to the prejudice of the son of the deceased, and had associated his own son Landulph IV. in the government. After his defeat before Bovino, the Greeks, elated with their success, invaded the territories of Benevento, took Avellino, and advancing towards Capua, plundered all the country through d which they marched, and at last invested the city. They were joined on their march by Marinus, then duke of Naples, with a great body of Neapolitans, who neglecting the siege, employed themselves wholly in ravaging the country. Eugenius, the Greek commander, finding that he made no progress in the siege, and being informed that Otho was assembling a powerful army for the relief of the city, raised the siege, which had continued about six weeks, and retired with his troops, ordering the greatest part of them to march through the duchy of Benevento, while he with the rest went to Salerno, where he was received with the utmost civility by the prince Gisulphus, who was secretly in the interest of Nicephorus [z].

OTHO in the mean time arrived with his army at Capua, and being joined by the Capuans, advanced into the duchy of Naples, ravaging the country, and at last sitting down bee fore the city. Finding himself unable to get possession of the place he decamped, and marched to Avellino, which he burnt, because the inhabitants had voluntarily submitted to the Greeks. He afterwards marched to Benevento, which that same year had been erected into an archbishopric; and designing an expedition into Apulia, he and his nobles heard mass, which was celebrated by the new archbishop Landulph, after which they received the eucharist under both kinds, according to the practice then in use [a]. The archbishop then giving his benediction to the whole army, they immediately marched into Puglia, where they defeated the Greeks; and towards the end of the campaign returned to Avellino. The following year Otho again marched into the Neapolitan territories, from whence f he carried off a great number of cattle, and then proceeded into Puglia, ravaging the country, and burning the suburbs of Bovino, which city his troops again invested. While he was on his march thither, he was met by Alvara, the wife of prince Pandulphus, with her son, who requested him in the most earnest manner to procure the liberty of her husband, who was treated with great inhumanity by Nicephorus. The Beneventan prince soon after recovered his liberty, by a revolution which happened at Constantinople, Theophania, who had poisoned her first husband, Romanus, this year murdered Nicephorus, and promoted her confidant, John Zimisceus, to the empire; who, to quiet the murmurs of the people, resolved to make peace with Otho, and immediately set Pandulph at liberty. Resolving to use him as a mediator, he soon after sent him to Bari, and desired him to inform Otho that he would agree to the marriage betwixt his step-daughter Theophania and his son Otho II. Pandulph, upon his return to Italy, was received with great affection by the em-

Giſulphus prince of Salerno is depoſed by his uncle;

About the time that Otho left Italy, Giſulphus, prince of Salerno, was baſely ſurpriſed by his uncle Landulph, the ſon of the baniſhed prince of Capua, Atenulphus II. Giſulphus, by the perſuaſions of his mother Gaitelgrima, who was ſiſter to Landulph, had laviſhed a great many favours upon him, and had created him count of Conſia, from whence, however, he was ſoon expelled on account of his cruelty, and obliged to retire to Naples, with his four ſons, Guaimarius, Indolf, Landulph, and Landenulph. By the intereſt of his ſiſter he was ſoon after recalled to Salerno, reſtored to the county of Conſia, and promoted to ſuch a degree of favour, that, according to the cotemporary hiſtorian, he was next in authority to the prince [b]. His promotion only ſerved to diſcover his ingratitude and ambition; for ſoon after, by the aſſiſtance of his ſons, he ſurpriſed Giſulphus and his princeſs in their palace, and publiſhing to the people that they were murdered, he prevailed upon them to acknowlege himſelf as their prince. He was aſſiſted in eſtabliſhing his authority by Marinus, duke of Naples, and Manſo, duke of Amalfi, to which laſt city he had privately removed Giſulphus and his princeſs. But a difference happening betwixt him and his ſon Indolf, who expected to have been aſſociated into the principality, the enraged ſon began to concert means of reſtoring his lawful prince, and perſuaded the Salernitan nobles to ſecure the caſtles, and to apply to Pandulph Iron-head, prince of Capua, for his aſſiſtance. Pandulph hearkened to their requeſt with great joy, and aſſembling ſome troops, quickly reduced all the cities and towns in the principality of Salerno, except the capital, which was ſtrongly garriſoned by the Amalfitans. After a conſiderable time ſpent in the ſiege, he at length made himſelf maſter of Salerno, and having expelled the uſurper, reſtored Giſulphus, who had been near two years a priſoner. Giſulphus having no children himſelf, ſoon after his reſtoration, from gratitude to his reſtorer, adopted his ſon Pandulph, and made him his co-partner in the government. With him he reigned four years, and at his death he left Pandulphus, the father, as his ſucceſſor; who accordingly united all the three diviſions of the antient principality of Benevento, being called prince of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua. Pandulphus enjoyed the principality of Salerno about three years, and at his death very imprudently made a diviſion of his territories. He left his ſon Pandulphus prince of Salerno, and another ſon, Landulph IV. as prince of Capua and Benevento. Beſides, he gave ſeparate fiefs to his other ſons Laidulph, Giſulph, Landenulph and Atenulph; but no mention is made how he diſpoſed of the duchy of Spoleto, and marquiſate of Camerino, which he was likewiſe in poſſeſſion of for twelve years [c] (H). b c d

A few weeks after his death Otho II. arrived with an army at Benevento, with the intention of expelling the Greeks and Saracens entirely from Puglia and Calabria. His army was reinforced by Romans, Neapolitans, and Beneventans; and he was likewiſe joined by prince Landulph IV. and his brother count Atenulph; though it appears that Landulph was, about this time, diſpoſſeſſed of Benevento by his couſin Pandulph; who, upon his father's death, had been deprived of his inheritance by Pandulph Iron-head. Otho, we are informed by Sigonius, made great progreſs at firſt in Puglia and Calabria, and advanced with his army as far as Tarento: but the following year, on the 15th of July, he was entirely defeated, in a general engagement, by the Greeks and Saracens of Baſentello, a ſmall town on the coaſt of Calabria. His defeat was owing to his Italian auxiliaries, who being diſguſted with his cruelty, deſerted in the beginning of the action, by which means his army was almoſt entirely cut to pieces, and he himſelf, with great difficulty, eſcaped in diſ- e

(H) The learned and accurate Giannone relates, that from the great number of fiefs and counties which now began to be turned into hereditary lordſhips, and were poſſeſſed by nobles who lived abſolute and independent in fortified caſtles, ſurnames began about this time to be reſtored in theſe provinces, for the better diſtinguiſhing thoſe princes who had the ſame name, and were deſcended from the ſame family. The ſurnames were generally taken where they or their forefathers had fixed their reſidence. They were alſo taken from magiſtracy and office, ſuch as Maſtrigiudice, Doci, Conti, Cavaleanti, Filaſtoppa, &c. Sometimes, though rarely, from the names of their forefathers, as the family of Atenulpho, and ſome others; but afterwards, from an infinite number of occaſions and accidents. Thoſe ſurnames began to be uſed about the end of the tenth century; yet they are rarely found in the charters and other writs of thoſe times. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries they began to be a little more frequent among the Normans; and in the thirteenth and fourteenth they were ſo diffuſed and eſtabliſhed, that commonly every body, though of mean extraction, had ſurnames, and tranſmitted them to poſterity (1).

guise. The prince Landulph, with his brother Atenulph, and many other persons of distinction, were slain in the battle; and though the Greeks did not pursue their victory as might have been expected, yet Sigonius relates, that they recovered all Calabria and Puglia, over which they placed a new governor, under the title of Catapan, with greater authority than formerly; and the author of the chorographical description of Italy thinks that at this time they conquered the greater part of ancient Lucania, which they annexed to their other Italian provinces, under the name of Basilicata, in honour of the emperor Basilius II. who was then reigning [d].

OTHO having saved himself with the remains of his army at Capua, conferred that principality on Aloara and her son Landenulph, the brother of the deceased Landulph, who governed the principality ten years; but Aloara dying, Landenulph, about four months after, was cruelly murdered by his own subjects [e]. The emperor, who, according to some authors, was wounded with a poisoned arrow during the battle, soon after caused his son Otho III. then about ten years of age, to be declared king of Italy and Germany; and having recruited his army, the following year he marched to Benevento, which city he allowed his soldiers to pillage, in resentment of the treacherous behaviour of the Beneventans at Basentello. We do not find, however, that he attacked the Greeks, but returning to Rome, he died in that city in the beginning of December.

Otho dies. A. D. 983.

The death of Otho occasioned great disturbances in Italy. About four months after, Peter, bishop of Pavia, his chancellor, was elected pope by the name of John XIV. and did his utmost to secure the Romans to the interest of the young Otho. Boniface, in the mean time, who had been expelled as an intruder into the Roman see by the former pope Benedict, hearing of his death, and of the death of Otho, returned from Constantinople to Rome; where, by bribing the Romans with those treasures which he had formerly taken from the Vatican, he raised a strong party, who imprisoned John, and declared him pope. John, after four months imprisonment, died of hunger. Boniface, however, did not long enjoy the papal dignity, but died suddenly, about four months after. The Romans then chose John XV. but he was soon after expelled by Crescentius Numentanus, who seized the castle of St. Angelo, and assumed the government of Rome, under the title of consul. John retiring into Tuscany, and pressing the young Otho to come into Italy, the Romans, who began to be apprehensive of the emperor's resentment, immediately invited the pope back to the city, and upon his return received him with the greatest respect; Crescentius, however, still retaining the government of the city, and keeping possession of the castle of St. Angelo.

Is succeeded by Otho III.

During these proceedings several revolutions had happened in the principality of Salerno. Before the death of the late emperor, Pandulph had been expelled from Salerno, by Manso duke of Amalfi, who associated his son John with him in the principality, which he held for two years, till the emperor's death. After the death of Otho the Salernitans expelled Manso and his son, and chose one John, called di Lamberto, to distinguish him from the emperor John. He associated his son Guido with him in the government, and upon his death, which happened about five years after, he conferred the title of prince upon his other son Guaimarius, with whom he reigned six years [f]. The year before his death, Landenulph, prince of Capua, as we mentioned above, was murdered by his subjects, and his brother Laidulph, who was concerned in the murder, was chosen as his successor.

Revolutions in Salerno, and in Capua.

While Laidulph held this principality, and Guimarius or Guaimarius III. reigned in Salerno, and Pandulph II. with his son Landulph V. governed Benevento, Otho III. in the twelfth year of his reign, arrived with an army in Italy, to establish his authority in that kingdom, and particularly to reduce Crescentius, who still kept possession of the castle of St. Angelo, and governed with a despotic authority in Rome. John XV. dying about the time the emperor arrived at Ravenna, he ordered the Romans to elect his nephew Bruno, who took the name of Gregory V. and proceeding to Rome received the imperial crown from his hands, after which ceremony he returned, in the end of the year, to Germany. Before he had quitted Italy, Crescentius, whom he had pardoned at the intercession of the new pope, again assumed his former authority, expelled Gregory, and substituted the bishop of Placentia as pope, who took the name of John XVI. Gregory retired to Germany, and intreated Otho to return to Italy with a powerful army to reduce the Romans. The emperor accordingly repassed the Alps the following year in the month of April; and having obliged the Romans to deliver their city, seized the antipope, whose eyes he ordered to be put out, and his ears and hands to be cut off. He likewise, after a vigorous siege, reduced the castle of St. Angelo, and put Crescentius to death. About two years after, he again returned to Italy, and his nephew Gregory being dead, he nominated to the pontificate the famous Gerbert, archbishop of Ravenna, who had come into Italy with him about three years before, and now assumed the name of Silvester II. Soon after, being informed that Laidulph, prince of Capua, had been concerned in the murder of his brother, he expelled him from that principality, banished him from Italy, and bestowed his government upon Ademarius a Capuan, who had been educated from his infancy with himself, and enjoyed a great share of his favour [g]. a

The Saracens in the mean time still continued to make irruptions into these provinces. About three years before, they took and plundered Matera, after a siege of four months; and this year, immediately after the departure of the emperor for Germany, they invaded Campania, and made themselves masters of Capua. Otho returned to Italy the following year with a powerful army, recovered Capua, and all the other places of Campania, from the Infidels, and, after visiting Monte Cassino and Monte Gargano on a religious account, he marched with his army to Benevento, from whence, in resentment for the treacherous behaviour of the Beneventans to his father, he carried off the body of S. Paulinus. He survived this expedition only a few months; and dying in the end of the following January without any issue, gave a new opportunity to the Italians of claiming the empire and kingdom of Italy. The Italian nobles accordingly assembled at Pavia, and conferred the kingdom of Italy on Ardoin, the son of Dodo, marquis of Ivrea: but the archbishop of Milan and the Italian clergy, thinking themselves injured, because they were not called to the election, assembled at Lodi, where they deposed Ardoin, and declared Henry, duke of Bavaria, king of Italy, who had already succeeded Otho in the kingdom of Germany. This imprudent and impolitic conduct of the clergy occasioned a civil war betwixt the two competitors and their adherents, which continued about ten years. At length pope Benedict VIII. being expelled by a faction at Rome, retired to Germany; and having persuaded Henry to enter Italy with a powerful army, to establish his own authority, and to restore him to his see, the year after conferred upon him the imperial crown.

The Greeks strengthen themselves in Italy.

During these transactions, the Greeks, who, after the defeat of Otho II. at Basentello, had enlarged their dominions in Italy were endeavouring to establish their authority upon solid foundations. Besides appointing a new magistrate, with unlimited power, called catapan (I), who fixed his residence at Bari, they put strong garrisons into the cities of Puglia and Calabria, and founded several new cities, such as Draconaria, Cividade, Firenzuola, and Troja, the last of which only remains at this day. They had extended their bounds about this time so far, that they were in possession of more than two-thirds of the present kingdom of Naples. The three dukedoms of Amalfi, Naples, and Gaeta, indeed, were governed in the form of commonwealths, and frequently elected their magistrates, and even their dukes out of their own body: the Greek emperors, however, still preserved in these dutchies the shadow of supreme dominion, and particularly were wont to confirm the dukes of Amalfi, which city, about this period, by its extensive commerce, had raised itself to a great degree of grandeur and opulence (K). Though the Greeks had so far extended their territories in Italy, yet being unacquainted with the nature of fiefs, they did not erect any dukedoms, counties, or baronies, in Puglia and Calabria; these dignities, however, were soon after introduced by new conquerors. d

The first arrival of the Normans in Italy.

The Normans, who had invaded France during the reigns of several princes, at last, about the beginning of the former century, concluded a peace with Charles the Simple,

[g] Peregrin. in Stem. Princ. Cap. Leo Ost. l. ii. cap. 15. Sigon. in regn. Ital. l. vii.

(I) Some authors think that the title Capitain or Captain, used by the Franks and Italians, was derived from the name of this Greek magistrate; but the name of Captain appears to have been used among the Italians and Franks 200 years before the Greeks sent any Catapan into Italy (1). Besides, their office was very different; the Greek Catapan was a supreme governor, formerly called Patricius, Strategus, Anthypatus, Protospatha, &c. (2); whereas Captain among the Franks denoted nothing else than one who was invested in a small fief by a sovereign prince, and was anciently called Valvasor Major (3).

(K) Amalfi is generally supposed to have been founded about the year 600. At first it was subject to the dukedom of Naples, and was governed by annual prefects; but being afterwards erected into a duchy, it extended its territory, which reached eastward to Vico Vecchio, and westward to the promontory of Minerva, including likewise the island Caprea and the two islands of the Galli. Towards the north it comprehended the cities of Lettere, Gragnans, Pimontio, and Casule di Franchi; and, towards the south, Scala, Ravelli, Minori, Majuri, Atrani, Tramonti, Agerula, Citara, Prajano, and Rosilano (4). The laws, which this republic made with regard to trade and commerce, afterwards had the same authority in the kingdom of Naples as the Rhodian laws had among the Romans (5).

a and, having embraced Chriſtianity, turned very zealous in their new religion. They placed great devotion in viſiting ſacred places, particularly Rome, and the holy ſepulchre at Jeruſalem; and, not diſcouraged by the length and danger of the journey, they joined in bands, and forced their way thro' all obſtacles, frequently routing great bodies of Greeks and Saracens, who endeavoured to oppoſe them. About the time of the death of the emperor Otho III. forty of theſe Normans, as Leo Oſtienſis writes [h], or, according to other authors, 100, returning from Jeruſalem by ſea, landed at Salerno in the habit of pilgrims, where they were honourably received by Guaimarius. During their reſidence at Salerno, a great body of Saracens landed, and inveſted the city. Guaimarius, not being in a condition to repulſe the invaders by force, was preparing to pay them a large ſum of money, b which they demanded, when the Normans propoſed to attack them, and having got horſes and arms from the prince, engaged them with ſuch fury and bravery, that they intirely defeated them, and obliged them to fly to their ſhips. This complete victory filled Guaimarius with admiration of the ſtrangers, whom he intreated to remain in his country, offering them lands, and the moſt honourable employments; but not being able to prevail with them to ſtay in Italy, or even accept of his preſents, at their departure he ſent ſome ambaſſadors with them to Normandy, with veſſels loaded with exquiſite fruits, rich furniture for horſes, and precious garments of gold and ſilk, with the deſign to allure the Normans to come into Italy; and it appeared, a few years afterwards, that he was not diſappointed in his expectations.

c THE Saracens in the mean time continued their incurſions in different parts of Italy with various ſucceſs, as the Greeks were continually ſending reinforcements to Puglia. About three years after the departure of the Normans, they beſieged Bari, and reduced the city to great extremity; but the beſieged being at laſt relieved by a Venetian fleet, Gregory, the firſt catapan whom we find mentioned, obliged the infidels to raiſe the ſiege and retire [i]. Gregory was ſucceeded the following year by Xipheus, who died the year after, and had for a ſucceſſor Curcua, in the ſecond year of whoſe government the Saracens broke the peace which they had concluded with his predeceſſors, and ſeized Coſenza. As Curcua governed in a very arbitrary and oppreſſive manner, he raiſed a general diſaffection among the Apulians againſt the Greeks, ſo that about the time that the Saracens ſeized Coſenza, the inhabitants of Bari open-
d ly revolted, and put themſelves under the conduct of Mello, who was deſcended of an ancient Lombard family, and had great power and authority in in their city [k]. Mello, with his kinſman Datus, had excited them to throw off the Greek yoke, and defended them againſt the attempts of Curcua; but he dying the following year, and Baſilius Bajanus arriving as his ſucceſſor with a ſtrong reinforcement of Macedonians, the Bariſians thought of a ſubmiſſion, and, to procure their peace with the Greeks, promiſed to deliver up Mello and Datus. The two chiefs, being informed of their deſign, fled from Bari to Aſcoli, from whence Mello went to Benevento, afterwards to Salerno, and at laſt to Capua; while Datus retired with his wife and children to Monte Caſſino, from whence he was invited by pope Benedict, and made governor of Garigliano. MELLO was received at Capua with great kindneſs by Pandulph II. who had then aſſociated his ſon and grandſon with himſelf in the government. About a year after his arrival at Capua, or, according to ſome authors, five years after, a company of Norman adventurers arrived at Rome, and offered their ſervice to the pope, who, ſtruck with their military appearance, propoſed to them to give their aſſiſtance to the Lombard princes againſt the Greeks, who had lately incroached greatly on the Roman empire [l]. The chief of theſe Normans was one Oſmond Drengot, who, having ſlain another lord in a duel, was obliged to leave his own country, to ſhun the reſentment of his prince duke Robert. The reputation his countrymen had acquired a few years before at Salerno, and the kind invitation of Guaimarius, f perſuaded him to come to Italy; and, having had great authority and influence in Normandy, he was attended by four of his brothers, with their ſons, nephews, and many other friends, who were reſolved to ſhare his fortune. Mello, who was waiting for an opportunity of delivering his country, immediately engaged the Normans to aſſiſt him; and, having drawn together a conſiderable army from Benevento and Salerno, marched againſt the Greeks, whom he entirely defeated, and obliged to abandon their camp. In this engagement the Normans, and particularly one Rodolphus, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their bravery; and the news of their ſucceſs arriving in Normandy, an innumerable company, with their wives and children, left their native country, and, croſſing the Alps, after a long and hazardous march, joined their countrymen in Apulia. After the arrival of this reinforcement, Mello again engaged g Bajanus, and gained another victory, though with conſiderable loſs. The Greeks were a

THIS defeat obliged Mello and Rodolphus to apply to the emperor Henry for aſſiſtance, who received them very graciouſly, promiſed to ſend an army into Italy, and gave ſeveral rich preſents to Rodolphus. During their abſence, ſome Normans entered into the ſervice of Atenulph, abbot of Monte Caſſino; and, ſettling in the neighbourhood of St. Germano, defended the territories belonging to the monaſtery from the incurſions of the counts of Aquino. Others of them had retired to Datus at Garigliano, and engaged to defend that citadel. Bajanus, in the mean time, having no enemy to contend with, and receiving large ſums of money from Conſtantinople, prevailed on ſeveral cities to ſubmit to the Greek emperor. He b brought over the abbot Atenulph to his intereſt, by making a donation of a forfeited eſtate to the abbey of Caſſino, and prevailed on Pandulph, prince of Capua, to ſubmit to Baſilius, and to grant him a free paſſage thro' his territories againſt Garigliano [n]. He accordingly ſurpriſed Garigliano, took Datus and the Normans priſoners, after they had defended themſelves two days, and, pardoning the Normans at the deſire of Atenulphus, put Datus to death as a traitor, by ſewing him in a ſack, and throwing him into the ſea (L).

The emperor marches into Apulia. A. D. 1022.

THIS ſurpriſing progreſs of Bajanus at length awakened the emperor, eſpecially as he was earneſtly preſſed to march into Italy by Mello, who had gone a ſecond time into Germany, and by the pope, who had likewiſe paſſed the Alps. Mello died while the emperor was preparing for the expedition; but ſoon after Henry marched with a powerful army into c
Italy, dividing his troops into three bodies, and giving the command of one diviſion to Poppo, patriarch of Aquileia, of another to Belgrimus, archbiſhop of Cologne, and marching with the third himſelf through Lombardy [o], he wanted to ſeize the abbot of Caſſino; but Atenulphus, being informed of his deſign, embarked at Otranto with the intention of ſailing to Conſtantinople, but was ſhipwrecked during the voyage. Capua being ſurrounded by the diviſion of the archbiſhop of Cologne, Pandulph ſurrendered to the prelate, on condition of being carried to Henry, before whom he promiſed to prove his innocence. The emperor was then beſieging Troja, which had been rebuilt by Bajanus a few years before. The city ſurrendering a few days after, Pandulphus was tried by all the barons, and unani-

As his army ſuffered greatly by the exceſſive heats of Apulia, he marched back to Rome, after he had taken Troja, and ſeveral other cities, from the Greeks, and according to ſome authors, gained a complete victory over them in the neghbourhood of Salerno, on which account he dedicated a church to the Holy Virgin [p]. At his departure, he left ſeveral of his officers to aſſiſt the counts of Tiano in recovering Bari, and recommended the Normans to them and to the princes of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua. He left Italy the following year; and, dying the year after in Many of them, however, ſtill remained in Campania, where they were treated with great contempt, and even inhumanity, by the inhabitants, who, forgetting their obligations to them, ſuffered them to wander in the woods, without allowing them any place for ſhelter. The Lombard princes likewiſe, paying no regard to the emperor's recommendation, denied them their wonted pay and ſubſiſtence.

(L) Bajanus, by this great ſucceſs, having almoſt intirely re-eſtabliſhed the affairs of the Greeks in Italy, made a ſeparate province of the weſtern part of Puglia, by the name of Catapanata, which is at this day called Capitanata. There is a frivolous diſpute among ſome authors, whether it ought not ſtill to retain its firſt name, or whether the name of the province was not originally derived from the Latin Capitaneus. According to the expreſs teſtimony of Romuald the Salernitan, the province received its name from the office of Catapan (1).

upon the ſucceſſion of the emperor Conrad. The Normans were particularly oppreſſed by Pandulph, the new prince of Capua, who was likewiſe deteſted by his own ſubjects on account of his avarice. Guaimarius III. prince of Salerno, who had married the ſiſter of the baniſhed prince, and had gained the favour of the new emperor, being likewiſe offended with him, prevailed on Conrad to ſet his brother-in-law Pandulph IV. at liberty, and ordered him to be reſtored to his principality. Pandulph accordingly, ſoon after arriving in Italy, was immediately joined by the Normans under Rainulphus; and receiving troops from his brother-in-law Guaimarius and the catapan Bajanus, inveſted Capua, which he made himſelf maſter of, after a ſiege of eighteen months. The other Pandulph, the count of Tiano, found means, however, of getting the protection of Bajanus, who ſent him and his ſon John to b Naples, where he was kindly received by the duke Sergius. Pandulphius IV. having recovered his principality, about twelve months after declared war againſt Sergius, on account of the protection he afforded to the count of Tiano; and marching ſuddenly againſt Naples with an army, obliged the city to ſurrender, which none of the Lombard princes his predeceſſors had been able to effect. Pandulph of Tiano made his eſcape to Rome, where he ſoon after died. Sergius fled before the taking of the city; and, being informed that Rainulphus the Norman was greatly diſſatisfied with the Capuan prince, who, ſince his reſtoration, had neglected to perform his engagements to him, he applied to him for aſſiſtance to recover his dukedom. Rainulphus was then building the city of Averſa, about ten miles diſtant from Naples; and, embracing the offers made to him by Sergius, immec diately commenced hoſtilities againſt Pandulphus, who was at length obliged to quit Naples, after he had been about three years in poſſeſſion of the city. Sergius, being ſenſible that he owed his reſtoration to Rainulphus, entered into a ſtrict alliance with him, and married one of his relations; and, to ſhew his gratitude to his benefactor, he created Rainulphus a count, and erected the territory of Averſa into a county. Rainulphus, in order to people his new city, ſent ambaſſadors to the duke of Normandy, giving him an account of his ſucceſs, and inviting his countrymen to come and partake of his good fortune. In conſequence of this invitation, great numbers of Normans a few years after came into Italy, among whom were William, Drogo, and Umbert, three of the ſons of Tancred, duke of Hautville, from whoſe poſterity thoſe princes were deſcended who firſt conquered Sicily from the *Sa*d racens, and formed the kingdom of Naples (M). Theſe three ſons of Tancred, upon their arrival in Italy, fixed themſelves at Salerno, and offered their ſervice to Guaimarius IV. who, about four years before, had ſucceeded his father in the principality. They were received by him with great regard, and employed him in all his affairs.

PANDULPHUS, prince of Capua, in the mean time, after he had been obliged to reſtore Naples to Sergius, had turned his arms againſt the monaſtery of Caſſino. He impriſoned the abbot Theobald, and obliged the monks to chuſe another of his own nomination; and, beſides robbing the treaſury, he ſeized ſeveral poſſeſſions belonging to the monaſtery. The monks made great complaints againſt him to the emperor, who, being likewiſe informed that the Italians were forming the deſign of a general revolt, entered Italy
e with a powerful army; and having quieted the diſturbances in Lombardy, and puniſhed the rebels, proceeded to Rome. From thence he ſent ſome of his officers to Capua, ordering Pandulph to reſtore all that he had taken from the monaſtery of Caſſino; but no regard being had to his officers he proceeded with his army to Caſſino, and from thence to Capua. Pandulphus, afraid of the emperor's reſentment, had left the city and fled to the caſtle of St. Agatha, which was very ſtrongly fortified. However, thinking it moſt prudent, if poſſible, to make the emperor his friend, he offered for his pardon three hundred pounds of gold; one half to be immediately paid, and his ſon and nephew to be given as hoſtages for the ſecurity of the payment of the reſt. This offer was accepted by the emperor; but Pandulphus ſoon after repenting of what he had done, and refuſing to fulfil his engagef ments, in hopes that, after the departure of the emperor, he would eaſily recover the poſſeſſion of Capua, Conrad, by the advice of his barons, and the noblemen of Capua, deprived him of his principality, which he conferred on Guaimarius IV. prince of Salerno, who, being in great favour with him, prevailed upon him to give the inveſtiture of the county of

(M) Tancred was deſcended from Rollo the famous Norman pirate, who ravaged the coaſts of France in the time of the emperor Lewis II. but afterwards embracing Chriſtianity, took the name of Robert, and married Giſla the ſiſter of Charles the Simple. Tancred married two wives, Moriella and Fredeſiana, by whom he had twelve ſons and three daughters. By his firſt wife he had William, ſurnamed Bracchio di ferre, or Iron-arms, Drogo, Humphrey, Geoffrey, and Serlo. By his ſecond, Robert, Guiſcard, Malger, William, Alfred, Umbert, Tancred, and Roger. Ten of theſe ſons came as adventurers into Italy, and one of the daughters married a count of Averſa (1).

Aversa to Rainulphus the Norman. The emperor, at the same time, restored Atenulphus a bishop of Capua, who had been imprisoned by Pandulphus; and, having returned to Ger- many with his army, died the year following [s]. After his departure, Pandulphus left one of his sons in the castle of St. Agatha, and went to Constantinople to desire the assistance of the Greek emperor to recover Capua; but Guaimarius had such influence at that court, that Pandulphus was immediately ordered into banishment, where he continued two years, till the emperor's death; and though the succeeding emperor restored him to liberty, he would not grant him any assistance.

GUAIMARIUS, in the mean time, by means of the Normans, made himself master of Sorrento, which he gave to his brother Guido, reserving only the title to himself. By their assistance likewise he conquered Amalfi, which he annexed to his principality; and soon after b
he assumed the title of duke of Puglia and Calabria; so that no prince in those provinces equalled him in power and grandeur. However, the great authority and influence which he saw the sons of Tancred had acquired, beginning to give him some uneasiness, he seized the first opportunity of dismissing them. About the time that Conrad marched into Italy, the Greek emperor Michael Paphlagon, to secure the esteem of his fickle subjects, resolved to endeavour the recovery of Sicily from the Saracens; and for that purpose, sent the catapan tation of the Normans, before he transported his troops from Calabria, sent to Guimarius, intreating him to grant him some of those warriors. His request was most willingly hearkened to by the prince of Salerno, who, to encourage the Normans to engage in the expedi- c tion, promised them some additional rewards besides the emperor's pay. William, Drogo, and Umbert, accordingly marched from Salerno with three hundred of their countrymen; and passing over into Sicily, distinguished themselves most remarkably by their valour in the conquest of that island. Maniacus acknowledged that the recovery of Messina was chiefly owing to their bravery; and William, with his Normans, gained a signal victory over the Sa- racens before Syracuse, and killed the governor of the city with a lance. Maniacus made himself master of Syracuse, and entirely reduced almost the whole island; but, being accused of treason, was conducted the following year a prisoner to Constantinople [t]. Some authors assert, that he was murdered at Syracuse [u]; and others, that he still continued in the command [w]. His successor, according to Cedrenus and William of Puglia, was Doceanus, a man d of no abilities, who quickly lost the whole island, except Messina, and treated his Norman booty, and even ordered one Ardoin, a noble Lombard, and associate and interpreter of the Normans, to be whipt round the camp, because he refused to part with the horse of a Sa- racen whom he had slain in single combat.

THE consequences of this tyrannical behaviour were very fatal to the Greeks; for Ardoin and the Normans took a most severe revenge. At that time they dissembled their resentment; but Ardoin soon after obtaining leave to return to Italy, under pretence of going to Rome on account of a vow, he and all the Normans embarked at night, and crossed the Pharo to Reggio. Ardoin, instead of going to Rome, went immediately to Aversa, and persuaded e count Rainulphus to join with him in the design he had formed of attacking the Greek provinces in Italy, which he shewed would be an easy conquest, as the inhabitants submitted with great reluctance to the Greeks, and the provinces were at that time almost entirely defenceless. Rainulphus, approving of his scheme, raised three hundred soldiers, whom he sent under twelve officers to join the other Normans under the sons of Tancred; and made an agreement with Ardoin, that the conquests should be equally divided among the chief cities in Puglia, which presently surrendered. They increased its fortifications so as to render it impregnable. They soon after made themselves masters of Venosa, Ascoli, and La- vello, with very little opposition. Doceanus, alarmed with the conquests of the Normans, f immediately left Sicily, and marched with his army into Puglia, where he attacked the invaders near the river Oliviento; but, after a fierce engagement, he was obliged to retire and in a third engagement, which happened near the river Ofanto, the army of Doceanus victories, chose Atenulphus, the brother of Pandulph III. prince of Benevento, for their leader, that they might secure the affection of the inhabitants. The court of Constantinople, in the a was reſtored to her former dignity by the people, and married Conſtantinus Monomachus, who became her partner in the empire, while Calaphates had his eyes put out, as a puniſhment for his ingratitude. During theſe domeſtic diſturbances, Doceanus received orders to return to his command in Sicily; and ſent another army to Puglia, under the command of Exauguſtus, or, according to Cedrenus, of Bajoannes, ſon of the late catapan Bajanus. This commander had no better ſucceſs than his predeceſſor; for engaging with the Normans, near Monte Piloſo, his army was entirely routed, and he himſelf taken priſoner. Atenulphus, however, without conſulting the Normans, ſoon after ſet him at liberty, on receiving a conſiderable ſum of money; which action ſo offended the adventurers, that they deprived him of the chief command, and conferred that dignity on Argyrus, the ſon of the late Mello, b who had eſcaped from Conſtantinople, and, according to Lupus, protoſpata, now aſſumed the title of prince and duke of Italy [y]. The ſame author relates, that before this engagement, Maniacus had returned to Italy; and, to ſtrike a terror into the revolted cities, executed a great many perſons of all ages and ſexes with great inhumanity [z]. As the emperor Conſtantinus ſucceeded to the throne ſoon after his arrival in Italy, he openly rebelled againſt him, and prevailed upon his own army to proclaim him emperor, beginning hoſtilities immediately againſt the Greek cities. Argyrus, at the ſame time, took Giovennazzo, and beſieged Trani, and ſoon after beſieged Maniacus in Tarento, where he had fixed his chief reſidence. Maniacus, afraid of falling into the hands of the Normans, left Tarento, and went to Otranto; from whence he croſſed the Adriatic, and engaged Stephanus Sebaſtophorus in *Bul*c garia, where he was intirely defeated; and, being taken priſoner, had his head ſtruck off [a].

THE Normans, in the mean time, having made many conqueſts, and being ſenſible of their own ſtrength, reſolved to render themſelves more independent; and reflecting, that they owed a great deal of the reputation they had acquired to the valour of William Bracchio di Ferre, they aſſembled the following year at Matera, and unanimouſly elected him their commander in chief, honouring him likewiſe with the title of count. They then agreed to make an equal partition of their conqueſts, and for that purpoſe appointed a diet to be held in Melphis, to which they invited Guaimarius and Rainulphus. By the diviſion which was made, the city of Siponto and Monte Gargano, with all the villages and places belonging to them, were given to Rainulphus count of Averſa; the city of Aſcoli was conferred on *Wil*d liam the count; Drogo, Arnolinus, Hugh, Peter, Walter, Rodolphus, Triſtian, Erveus, Aſclittinus, Rainfrid, and Ardoin, all had their diſtinct ſhares; but the city of Melfis was left common to all, and reſerved as a place for aſſembling to conſult about the moſt important affairs of their nation. Though Argyrus was neglected in this diviſion, yet, by having expelled the rebel Maniacus from Italy, he found means of acquiring the favour of the emperor Conſtantine, who, as a check upon the power of the Normans, conferred upon him the dignity of patrician; and likewiſe gave him the city of Bari and its territory, with the title of prince and duke of Puglia.

THE Normans, having now acquired great power, began to behave with great inſolence to their neighbours. During the war in Puglia, thoſe of Averſa had uſurped ſeveral terrie tories belonging to the abbey of Caſſino, which the abbot finding impoſſible to recover, contented himſelf with receiving from them the oath of fidelity as vaſſals. They, however, did not ceaſe their uſurpations; but took poſſeſſion of ſeveral other territories belonging to that monaſtery, and built a fort in the neighbourhood, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the abbot, whom Rainulphus endeavoured to ſeize by a ſtratagem; but was himſelf taken priſoner with his men. Upon his return to Averſa, he was reſolved to revenge the affront by declaring war againſt the abbot, but was prevented by the authority of Guaimarius, who about the ſame time aſſiſted count William in an expedition againſt the Greeks in Calabria [b]. Rainulphus did not long ſurvive the peace; but dying, about a year afterwards, without any ſons, was ſucceeded in the county by Aſclittinus de Quadrellis, f who had married his ſiſter. The death of Rainulphus was preceded by that of William Bracchio di Ferre, who was ſucceeded in the county of Puglia by his brother Drogo, or Drago. In the beginning of his government, all the reſt of his brothers, except two, left their native country, and came into Italy, with many other Norman gentlemen, in the habit of pilgrims, that they might not be oppoſed by the Italians, who began to be very jealous of the power of theſe ſtrangers. Drogo joyfully received theſe new adventurers, cauſed his brother Unfred to be created a count, and conferred the government of the caſtle of St. Mark, on the frontiers of Calabria, on his brother William, who, on account of his great prudence, was ſurnamed Guiſcard.

MEAN

The emperor Henry comes to Italy, A. D. 1046.

MEAN while the great confuſions in Italy, particularly in Rome, where three popes had divided the pontificate among themſelves, brought the emperor Henry II. with an army, into Italy. Before his arrival, Gratian, a Roman prieſt, had prevailed on the three popes to reſign, in conſideration of receiving a yearly penſion from the revenues of St. Peter; and by that means procured the pontifical dignity for himſelf, and took the name of Gregory VI. The emperor, however, diſapproving of his intruſion, called a council at Sutri, in the neighbourhood of Rome, where Gregory was depoſed; but, according to ſome authors, was only prevailed upon to reſign. Henry received the imperial crown from the ſucceeding pope Clement II. and after this ceremony diſmiſſed part of his army with the empreſs, proceeding with the remaining part to Monte Caſſino, accompanied with the pope. Having given ſeveral preſents to the monaſtery, he marched to Capua, where he prevailed on Guaimarius to reſign that principality, which he again conferred on Pandulphus, in conſideration of a large ſum of money [c]. He was there viſited by Drogo count of Puglia, and Rainulphus II. count of Averſa, who a little before had ſucceeded Aſclittinus. Theſe princes were very deſirous of ſecuring the favour of the emperor, who as willingly received them as his vaſſals; and having been preſented by them with ſome fine horſes, and a large ſum of money, gave them the inveſtiture of all thoſe territories they were then in poſſeſſion of. Afterwards proceeding to Benevento, Pandulph III. who, with his ſon Landulph, then governed that principality, ſhut the gates againſt him, being apprehenſive that he would imitate the examples of the emperors Otho II. and III. who had allowed their army to plunder the inhabitants. Henry, in reſentment of this affront, which he was not then in a condition to revenge, prevailed on the pope to excommunicate the city, and gave all the territory of that principality to the Normans. He then returned with his army to Germany, taking pope Clement along with him, who died that ſame year, in the month of October, of poiſon, which he is ſaid to have received, while he was in Italy, from the antipope Benedict [d], who again ſeized upon the Roman ſee. The emperor, in the mean time, at the deſire of the Romans, ſent Poppo biſhop of Breſcia, or Brixen, to Rome, as ſucceſſor to Clement II. who was accordingly crowned the following year in the month of July, when the antipope Benedict was prevailed upon to reſign. He took the name of Damaſus II. but dying twenty-three days after his elevation, the emperor about three months after, ſent Bruno biſhop of Toul, his own relation, to be his ſucceſſor, who was perſuaded by Hildebrand, afterwards the famous Gregory VII. not to accept of the pontifical dignity upon the nomination of a layman. He therefore laid aſide his pontifical robes; and aſſuming the dreſs of a pilgrim, proceeded with Hildebrand to Rome, where he was unanimouſly elected by the people, and took the name of Leo IX. being greatly diſtinguiſhed for his piety and the innocence of his life.

THE Greek emperor, in the mean time, hearing that Henry had granted the inveſtiture of Puglia to the Normans, and that there were no hopes of expelling them by force, ſent Argyrus with large ſums of money from Conſtantinople, which was to be diſtributed among them, if they would engage in his ſervice in a war which he was reſolved to declare againſt the Perſians. The Normans perceiving the ſnare, and anſwering, that they were determined not to leave Italy, unleſs expelled by force, Argyrus, by means of the ſame money, bribed the Puglians that were moſt intimate with count Drogo to aſſaſſinate him. The chief of the conſpirators was one Viſo, who, when the count was going in the morning to the church at his caſtle of Montoglio, ſtabbed him, while his aſſociates attacked and killed a great many of his guard, and made themſelves maſters of the fort. Many more Normans were, about the ſame time, maſſacred in the other cities of Puglia; ſo that a greater number of them periſhed by this conſpiracy, than had been killed in the late wars. Umfred, who had been declared count before the death of his brother, immediately aſſembled his countrymen, and retook the caſtle of Montoglio, and likewiſe defeated Argyrus, who with ſome troops endeavoured to take the advantage of the confuſion occaſioned by the maſſacre. Argyrus, beſides bribing the Puglians, had recourſe likewiſe to Leo IX. intreating his holineſs to deliver Italy from the cruel Norman tyrants; and the inhabitants, who were now treated with great ſeverity by the Normans, privately ſollicited his holineſs to march with an army into their country againſt their oppreſſors.

Leo IX. marches againſt the Normans. A. D. 1053.

LEO willingly hearkened to their complaints, as the Normans, beſides continuing their hoſtilities againſt the Greeks, had of late made ſeveral incurſions into the territories of the church; and, being then in Germany, he made an exchange with the emperor of ſeveral patrimonies belonging to the holy ſee in Germany, for other places in Italy ſubject to the emperor [e]. The biſhopric of Bamberg particularly was, at this time, exchanged for the city of Benevento [f]; and the emperor, at the deſire of Leo, granted him a powerful army to recover the territories of the church, which had been ſeized by the Normans. However, after a the army had advanced into Italy, Henry, at the perſuaſion of Geberard biſhop of Eichſtet countermanded a great part of it. Many German voluntiers, and people of deſperate fortunes, nevertheleſs, continued with the pope, who, by his military preparations, greatly aſtoniſhed all Italy. As he had a great reputation for ſanctity, and was at the head of a body of Germans, and had a correſpondence with Argyrus and the Greeks in Apulia, the Normans began to be very apprehenſive, and ſent a ſubmiſſive embaſſy to him, offering to hold all their conqueſts as vaſſals of the Roman ſee. Leo neglecting their offer, and refuſing to grant them peace, unleſs they firſt reſtored all their conqueſts, the Normans unanimouſly agreed rather to part with their lives than the territory they had acquired; and attacking the pope's army, gained a complete, though bloody, victory: and a few days after beſieging the city

b of Civitate, where Leo had fled, obliged him to abſolve them from the ſentence of excommunication, and to ſurrender himſelf their priſoner[g]. This military expedition of Leo is greatly cenſured by his cotemporaries Herman the hiſtorian and the famous Peter Damian; but Baronius is at great pains to defend his proceeding, and to prove, that the biſhop of Rome has both the power of the temporal and ſpiritual ſword[h].

He is defeated and taken priſoner;

THE Normans received Leo with the greateſt reverence; and having ſet him, and all the other priſoners, at liberty, conducted him to the city of Benevento, where he arrived about the end of June. He was ſo pleaſed with the veneration ſhewn to him by the Normans, that in a letter, which he ſoon after wrote to the Greek emperor, he declared he would have been ſorry to have obtained a victory; and, according to Malaterra, he granted
c them, as an hereditary fief of the holy ſee, all the conqueſts they had already made, or ſhould make for the future, in Calabria and Sicily[i]. The learned Giannone aſſerts, that this conceſſion of the pope was nothing elſe but a teſtimony of his friendſhip for the Normans, who wanted him only to bleſs their arms, as a pretence to vindicate their acquiſitions, and juſtify all their future undertakings; for they reſtored nothing to his holineſs of what he pretended to in Benevento, but gave that city to the prince Pandulph with his ſon Landulph, who had been expelled upon the approach of the German army, and ſerved them as auxiliaries[k]. Pandulph, about four years after, forſook the world, and turned monk; but Landulph held the principality till his death, which happened about twenty-four years after[l]. The pope, however, ſeems not to have acted with good faith towards the Normans; for it appears, d from his letter to the Greek emperor, that he had not laid aſide his deſign of extirpating them from Italy, which, he ſaid, he hoped quickly to accompliſh by the aſſiſtance which he ſhould receive from him and from his couſin Henry[m]. Death prevented the execution of this deſign; for he ſickened ſoon after at Benevento; and proceeding to Rome, died there the nineteenth of April. Count Umfred, in the mean time, intirely reduced all the cities of Apulia, and afterwards puniſhed the authors of his brother's murder with great ſeverity. The death of Leo freeing him from a watchful and zealous enemy, he propoſed to enlarge his dominions by the conqueſt of Calabria, where, by the valour of his brother Robert Guiſcard, he quickly made a conſiderable progreſs. The Normans, about the ſame time, granted their aſſiſtance to Giſulphus II. in recovering the city of Salerno, which had been ſurpriſed
e by ſome Amalfitans and Salernitans, who the year before the expedition of Leo IX. had murdered his father Guaimarius IV. After the war had continued about two years in Calabria, count Umfred died; leaving only two young ſons, Bacelardus and Hermanus, whom he committed to the care of his brother Robert, who immediately, upon his deſire, aſſumed the government of Puglia.

THE ſhort reigns of the two ſucceſſors of Leo IX. contributed greatly to the eſtabliſhment of the power of the Normans in Calabria. Geberard biſhop of Eichſtet, who, after a vacancy of near twelve months, ſucceeded Leo, and took the name of Victor II. regretted his former oppoſition to the expedition of his predeceſſor; but was prevented by death from forming any deſign againſt them. After he had enjoyed the pontifical dignity two years,
f he was ſucceeded by Frederic abbot of Monte Caſſino, and brother of Godfrey the huſband of Beatrice counteſs of Tuſcany, betwixt whoſe family and that of the emperor there was a kind of hereditary animoſity. The new pope, who took the name of Stephen X. ſoon after his elevation, reſolved upon an expedition againſt the Normans; and as the emperor Henry had died the year before, and left his dominions to his infant ſon Henry IV. he propoſed to confer the imperial dignity on his own brother Godfrey duke of Tuſcany, and afterwards, in conjunction with him, to march into Puglia: but before he could bring his ſchemes to maturity, he died ſuddenly at Florence, in the eighth month of his pontificate[n]. After his death a ſchiſm enſued at Rome, which continued for ten months, when Benedict the ſchiſmatical pope reſigned, and Nicholas II. who had been legally elected, obtained the peaceable poſſeſ-

DURING theſe confuſions at Rome and Conſtantinople, Robert Guiſcard made great progreſs in Calabria. After making himſelf maſter of almoſt all the cities and places of ſtrength in that province, he at laſt reduced Reggio, after which conqueſt he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed duke of Puglia and Calabria [p]. The year before he had divorced his firſt wife Alberada, who was too nearly related to him, and had married Sikelgaita, one of the ſiſters of Giſulphus II. prince of Salerno [q]. About the ſame time he gave aſſiſtance to his brother Geoffry count of Capitanata, and granted a ſhare of his conqueſts to his youngeſt brother Roger, who had been very active in robbing and plundering the inhabitants of Calabria, which the hiſtorian Malaterra ſays he does not mention to his reproach; but takes notice of, expreſly by his own deſire, to ſhew from what poverty he arrived at the greateſt honour. While the ſons of Tancred were thus extending their dominion, the Norman counts of Averſa were likewiſe enlarging their territory. Richard I. the ſon of Aſclittinus, invaded the principality of Capua; and beſieging the city, obliged the inhabitants to ſurrender, and Landulphus V. to quit the government. After cauſing himſelf to be crowned prince of Capua, he reduced all Campania; and returning to the city, obliged the inhabitants to deliver up to him the gates and towers of the city, which at firſt he had left in their poſſeſſion. Thus ended the dominion of the Lombards in Capua, which had continued in an uninterrupted ſeries of 160 years from Atenulphus to this Landulphus V. whoſe children the abbot Deſiderius mentions he ſaw going about as vagabonds, begging bread to ſupport their miſerable lives [r]. b c

NICHOLAS II. finding the power of the Normans continually increaſing, immediately after his acceſſion denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt them, under pretence that they had ſeized ſome territories belonging to the holy ſee. Notwithſtanding this ſentence, Robert Guiſcard abſolutely refuſed to part with the diſputed territory; however, as he was by many of the Puglians looked upon as an uſurper, and his nephew Bucilardus had prevailed upon ſome cities to revolt in his favour, he thought it moſt prudent to procure, if poſſible, the friendſhip of the pope. He accordingly ſent a ſubmiſſive embaſſy to him, intreating him to come into Apulia, and promiſing to give him ſatisfaction if he would reſtore him to the communion of the church. Nicholas willingly agreed to this propoſal, being ſenſible, by the misfortune of his predeceſſor Leo, that the Normans could not be eaſily extirpated out of Italy; and after Whitſuntide he proceeded to Melphis, where he held a council for reforming ſeveral eccleſiaſtical abuſes, and had a conference with the Norman princes. d

Both parties being ſenſible that they needed each others aſſiſtance, they ſoon came to an agreement; and Robert reſtoring what he had taken from the church, and conſenting to hold all his conqueſts as a fief of the holy ſee, Nicholas abſolved the Normans from the ſentence of excommunication, and ſolemnly gave the inveſtiture of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily, to duke Robert, and the principality of Capua to Richard, count of Averſa, both princes taking the oath of fidelity to the pope, and promiſing to pay a yearly acknowlegement of twelve pence of Pavia, for every yoke of oxen in their dominions. This agreement was probably made without much difficulty, as both parties had nothing in view but to rob their neighbours of their rights, and to make their advantage by the bargain (N). The pope in particular immediately made uſe of his new friends to quell the inſolence of the e

(N) About this period, nothing was more dreaded than the cenſures of the church, which the popes perverted from their primitive uſe, and applied them to ſecular matters, uſing them chiefly for the defence and recovery of temporal poſſeſſions; the people believing, that if uſurped territories and goods were not reſtored after the ſentence of excommunication was denounced, the poſſeſſors were irrecoverably damned, imputing the damnation more to the cenſure than to the ſin. Officers and ſoldiers, who did not ſtand in awe to offend God by robbing their neighbours, were ſo overawed by the dread of excommunication, that they abſtained from the poſſeſſions of the church with great reſpect; ſo that thoſe who were not able to preſerve their effects from being ſeized by force, a thing too common in that age, were induced to make them over to the church, on condition that they ſhould ſtill be maſters of their eſtates, and hold them of the church in fief, for a ſmall acknowlegement. This cuſtom contributed greatly to the enlargement of the church; for when the male iſſue of the feudatories failed, which often happened in thoſe times, by reaſon of the continual wars and popular ſeditions, the eſtates devolved to the church. Neither princes nor people were at pains to enquire into the authority aſſumed by the popes in creating dukes and counts, and of obliging them to ſwear fealty to them. They were contented to be protected from the rapacity of their neighbours by excommunications, which were then ſo terrible. The Normans then very politically declared themſelves vaſſals of the popes, that none might pretend to make war againſt them, without expoſing themſelves to the cenſures of the church. Upon this weak and tottering foundation, the popes have built their claim of ſupreme dominion over the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily (1).

counts of Tuſculum, now Freſcati; and upon his return to Rome, took with him a great number of Normans, who, at his deſire, ravaged the territories belonging to the Tuſculan family, on the ſouth ſide of the Tyber; and afterwards paſſing that river, deſtroyed all the caſtles of count Gerard, as far as Sutri. Nicholas ſurvived this tranſaction about two years, and died at Rome, in the third year of his pontificate. The Normans aſſiſt the pope againſt the counts of Tuſculum.

ROBERT, in the mean time, continued the war againſt thoſe cities which ſtill held for the Greeks, while his brother, count Roger, paſſed over with an army into Sicily againſt the Saracens. The duke made himſelf maſter of Brindiſi, Tarento, and Matera, and a few years after beſieged Bari, both by ſea and land. This city was ſuperior to all the reſt in Puglia in wealth and greatneſs, and had been ſtrongly fortified by the Greeks, who had ſent thither a numerous garriſon, under the command of the catapan Stephen Pateranus, or Sebaſtophorus. Robert, however, perſevering in the ſiege, at laſt made himſelf maſter of the place, which had been defended by the inhabitants and garriſon for more than three years [s]. After the reduction of this city Robert embarked, and ſailed with a fleet of fifty-eight ſhips for Sicily, in order to aſſiſt his brother Roger in the conqueſt of that iſland. In the mean time great confuſions had happened at Rome, where Alexander II. had been elected pope, without the conſent of the emperor, who, to ſupport his prerogative, had nominated one Cadolus to the pontificate. This antipope was condemned in two or three councils, while Alexander was ſupported by Godfrey, marquis of Tuſcany, who protected him againſt the other faction, and marched with an army as far as Aquino againſt Richard, count of Averſa, who endeavouring to take advantage of the diſturbances in Rome, hoped by force to cauſe himſelf to be elected a patrician. Godfrey had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the Normans; but at laſt having received a large ſum of money from Richard, he retired with his army [t]. Alexander II. at laſt obtaining the quiet poſſeſſion of the Roman ſee, by the death of his competitor, confirmed the inveſtiture of Puglia and Calabria to duke Robert, and ſent a bleſſed ſtandard to count Roger, to teſtify his approbation of his Sicilian expedition. Roger, before the arrival of his brother Guiſcard, had almoſt intirely conquered the iſland of Sicily; and being joined by his forces, at laſt made himſelf maſter of Palermo, after a ſiege of five months. Robert gave the inveſtiture of the whole iſland to Roger, with the title of count, reſerving only to himſelf the half of Palermo, Meſſina, and the valley of Demona; and returning to Puglia ſtopped at Melphis, where he was received with acclamations by the greateſt part of the barons of Puglia and Calabria. The count of Trani, however, ſtill refuſing to acknowlege him as his ſovereign, Robert beſieged and took that city, with ſeveral other towns depending upon it, and ſoon after ſurpriſed his ſon; but as the young prince then conſented to take the oath of fealty to him, he generouſly reſtored all that he had taken from him, except Trani. Pope Alexander II. in the mean time died at Rome, and was ſucceeded the next day by the famous Hildebrand, who took the name of Gregory VII. whoſe turbulent and ambitious ſpirit firſt gave riſe to thoſe imperial and papal factions, which diſturbed the peace of Italy for ſeveral hundred years after. In the beginning of his pontificate, a difference happened betwixt duke Robert and his brother-in-law Giſulphus, prince of Salerno, which gave a new opportunity to the Normans of extending their conqueſts. The Amalfitans being treated with great rigour and ſeverity by prince Giſulphus, in reſentment for their diſloyalty to his father, had recourſe to the interceſſion of Guiſcard, who accordingly ſent an embaſſy to his brother-in-law in their behalf. Giſulphus, who did not deſire his interceſſion, treated his ambaſſadors with great coldneſs, and remonſtrated to them, that the duke had ſeized Areco and Sancta Euphemia, with ſome other places belonging to his principality, which he inſiſted ſhould be immediately reſtored. Robert propoſed to accommodate the difference amicably; but Giſulphus obſtinately refuſed to treat, probably truſting to the aſſiſtance of Richard, prince of Capua, who was then at variance with Robert, and had eſpouſed his intereſt. Robert, finding that a rupture was unavoidable, privately adjuſted his difference with the prince of Capua, who even agreed to aſſiſt him againſt Giſulphus; and having made a treaty with the Amalfitans, and put a garriſon into their city, he prepared to attack Salerno. Giſulphus, notwithſtanding the intreaties of the pope and Deſiderius, abbot of Caſſino, ſtill obſtinately refuſed to hearken to an accommodation, though Robert had already advanced with his troops to the neighbourhood of Salerno. Robert at laſt commenced the ſiege, and by the aſſiſtance of his brother count Roger, in a few months made himſelf maſter of Salerno and San Severino, his two nephews Bucelardus and Hermannus, who had eſpouſed the cauſe of Giſulphus, being obliged to fly to Conſtantinople, and Giſulphus himſelf being compelled to put himſelf under the protection of the pope, who granted him a ſmall territory in Campania di Roma. Robert reſolving to purſue his enemy, marched with his army into Campania, and even ſeized ſome places belonging to the pope in the march of Ancona [u]. Gregory, provoked by theſe hoſtilities, immediately excommunicated him and prince Richard, with all their adherents, Robert Guiſcard conquers Salerno. and ordered a numerous army, which he had assembled for the assistance of the Greek emperor, to march against the Normans. Robert and Richard, finding themselves attacked both by spiritual and temporal arms, thought proper to retire with their troops from the church territories. Robert marched with his army and besieged Benevento, while Richard invested the city of Naples. Robert, however, finding his attempt fruitless, soon after retired. Richard continued before Naples, with great obstinacy, about two years, when having obtained absolution from the pope, he died during the siege, leaving his principality to his son Jordanus, whom, during his life-time, he had associated with himself in the government. a

The new prince immediately drew upon himself the resentment of pope Gregory, by plundering a bishop who was going to Rome, and by robbing the monastery of Cassino of a considerable sum of money; but from Leo Ostiensis it appears, that he afterwards gave several precious gifts to the monastery, to which he likewise afforded his protection. The year before the death of Richard, the succession of the princes of Benevento failed in Landulphus VI. who died without leaving issue, and the title of that principality became extinct. Gregory VII. immediately laid claim to the city, in consequence of the exchange formerly made betwixt Leo IX. and the emperor Henry; but Guiscard, without regarding his pretensions, renewed the siege, though he thereby drew upon himself a repetition of the sentence of excommunication [w]. The pope, however, having made Jordanus prince of Capua his friend, prevailed upon him to raise the siege of Naples, and while Guiscard was absent in Calabria, to withdraw his auxiliary troops from before Benevento, and to level the works, and destroy the machines, made for carrying on the attacks. Guiscard, provoked by this behaviour of Jordanus, returned with an army from Calabria, reduced a great many cities of the duchy of Benevento, and marched to the river Sarno, with the intention of attacking the Capuan prince. The abbot Desiderius, however, prevented an engagement, and not only reconciled the two princes, but also accommodated all differences betwixt duke Robert and the pope, who had a conference near the Garigliano; when the duke, being absolved by Gregory, took the oath of fidelity to him, and received from him the investiture of Puglia, Calabria, and Sicily. Gregory also gave him permission to hold Salerno, Amalfi, and part of the march of Ancona, which he said he had unjustly seized; but the duke consented to resign all his pretensions to the city of Benevento, which was then united to the dominions of the Roman see. The uncommon condescension of the pope, in allowing the duke to retain Salerno, and part of the church territories, was probably owing to the difficulties in which he found himself involved, by his dispute with the emperor, about the right of investitures. Henry having been excommunicated and deposed by him, in return assembled a council at Brixen, or Brescia, in which Gregory was deposed, and the archbishop of Ravenna elected, by the name of Clement III. As a powerful party in Italy, both of ecclesiastics and barons, favoured the emperor's cause, Gregory found the necessity of having a formidable protector; therefore being reconciled to the Normans without much difficulty, he immediately published a letter, declaring his intention of marching against the antipope at Ravenna, with the princes Robert and Jordanus. b c d e

Gregory is reconciled to the Norman princes, and gives them investiture. A. D. 1080.

This expedition, however, never took place, and perhaps was never intended, as Robert Guiscard at the same time had another in view, in which he was more personally concerned. Some years before he had given one of his daughters, named Helena, in marriage to Constantine, the son of the Greek emperor Michael Ducas, who was afterwards dethroned by Nicephorus Botoniates, and together with his wife, son, and daughter-in-law, thrust into a monastery. This year Michael, or, according to the Greek writers, an impostor who called himself Michael, arrived in Italy, and begged the assistance of the pope and duke Robert. Gregory received him in an honourable manner, and wrote to the archbishops and bishops in Puglia and Calabria, desiring them to encourage the people to assist him in recovering his throne, and to give absolution of sins to all those who would engage in that expedition. Robert likewise espoused his cause with great eagerness, and declared, that he would conduct him to Constantinople at the head of an army. f

Having prepared every thing for the expedition, he was informed that the usurper Nicephorus was expelled by Alexius Comnenus, who had been declared emperor by the army, and had taken Helena from the monastery, and treated her with great honour. Robert nevertheless, continued his design of invading Greece; and the following year, having declared Roger his eldest son, by his second wife Sikelgaita, heir of his dominions, and committed the government to his care, he embarked with his troops for the Greek territories, being accompanied by Sikelgaita, and his son Boemundus, whom he had by his first wife. The various incidents of this war are related by Malaterra, William of Puglia, and g a the famous princeſs Anna Comnena, the daughter of the Greek emperor [y]: but here we ſhall only obſerve, that though Alexius was aſſiſted by a Venetian fleet, Robert made himſelf maſter of the iſland of Corfu, reduced Durazzo, conquered a great part of Romania, and by the ſucceſs of his arms, and approach to the neighbourhood Conſtantinople, ſtruck an univerſal terror among the Greeks.

In the mean time the emperor Henry, having defeated and killed his rival Rodolphus, marched with a powerful army into Italy againſt the pope; and that he might deprive him of the aſſiſtance of the duke of Puglia, he propoſed a marriage betwixt his ſon and the duke's daughter, and to grant him the march of Ancona. The treaty, however, was rejected by Robert, who ſtill continued faithful to Gregory. Henry was more
b ſucceſsful with Jordanus, prince of Capua, who eſpouſed his cauſe, and granted him ſuccours both in men and money. He beſieged Rome the three following ſummers, and at laſt made himſelf maſter of the city, except the caſtle of St. Angelo, whither the pope retired, and preſſed duke Robert to return to his aſſiſtance. Robert's preſence in Italy was required on another account; for the inhabitants of Puglia, encouraged by the emperor's arrival at Rome, rebelled againſt duke Roger, in hopes of driving out their tyrannical maſters by the aſſiſtance of the imperial army. The duke therefore left the command of his army to his ſon Boemund, and the count of Brienne, and landing at Otranto with a ſmall body of his men, on board two ſhips, immediately attacked and diſperſed ſome of the rebels. He reduced Troja and Aſcoli, and entirely deſtroyed the city of Cannæ; by which
c means having quieted the commotions in Apulia (O), he marched againſt Jordanus, and beſieged Averſa. The city, however, making a vigorous defence, and the pope being reduced to great difficulties, he raiſed the ſiege, and proceeded to Rome. Before his arrival, Henry had left the city with his army; but the Romans, who were brought over to his intereſt, ſtill beſieged the pope in the caſtle of St. Angelo. Guiſcard ſurprized the city, and after ſeveral ſkirmiſhes in the ſtreets with the imperial party, he got poſſeſſion of the capitol, ſet the pope at liberty, and conducted him in triumph to the Lateran palace. Soon after, under pretence that the Romans were forming a conſpiracy againſt him, he ſet fire to the city, put a great many of the inhabitants to death, and obliged thoſe who were ſuſpected of diſaffection to the pope to give hoſtages for their good behaviour. Gregory, however, d finding the imperial faction too powerful in Rome, thought proper to quit the city; and at the departure of Guiſcard, went with him to Salerno, where he continued till his death, which happened the year after.

GUISCARD in the mean time, made great preparations to return to Greece to ſecond his ſon Boemund, who, during his abſence, had gained a remarkable victory over Alexius. He embarked a large body of troops, and being accompanied with his ſon Roger, put to ſea in the end of autumn. Alexius being aſſiſted by the Venetians, endeavoured to oppoſe his paſſage, but was intirely defeated, with the loſs of a great many gallies. After Guiſcard landed, he was prevented that winter from undertaking any enterprize, by a contagious diſtemper which ſeized his army and carried off upwards of 10,000 men. Boe-
e mund was likewiſe ſeized with the diſtemper, and obliged to return to his native air in Italy; though ſome authors allege, that his illneſs was the effect of poiſon, adminiſtered to him by his ſtepmother Sikelgaita, who was afraid leſt, after his father's death, he ſhould ſeize on Puglia and Calabria, to the prejudice of her ſon Roger [z]. After the departure of Boemund, Guiſcard the following year ordered his ſon Roger to beſiege Cephalonia, which had revolted; but while he was intent on this expedition he was ſeized with a violent fever, and obliged to retire to Caſopolis, a ſmall caſtle in the iſland of Corfu, where he died in the month of July, in the 60th year of his age. The news of his death ſtruck his army with conſternation, and retreating immediately in a great panic, they embarked with great precipitation for Italy; thoſe that could not be taken on board ſurrendering themſelves priſoners to the Greeks [a]. Sikelgaita carried her huſband's corpſe with her to Italy; but the ſhip in which it was carried being wrecked, with many others, on the coaſts, the heart and bowels were obliged to be left at Otranto, but the body being a ſecond time embalmed, was interred at Venoſa.

to both the eaſtern and weſtern emperor (P). Some authors allege, that duke Robert made a partition of his dominions by a will, leaving Sicily to his brother Roger, his conqueſts in the eaſt to Boemund, and all that he poſſeſſed in Italy to his ſecond ſon. But he either did not make a will, or his ſons were not contented with it; for immediately after his death, Boemund and Roger both pretended to the ſucceſſion, and each of them raiſed conſiderable factions in their favour. Roger, by the addreſs of his mother, ſecured the intereſt of his uncle count of Sicily, and immediately took poſſeſſion of the Italian dominions, obtaining likewiſe from the count ſeveral places in Calabria, which had been ſubject to him during the life of Robert. Boemund, before his father's death, had returned to Greece, where being informed that his brother Roger had uſurped the whole dominions in Italy, he returned with his army and landing at Otranto, immediately began hoſtilities againſt his brother. The war continued for near three years, during which time Boemund conquered ſeveral cities, but at length an accommodation was effected between the two brothers by Urban II. who, upon the death of Victor III. the ſucceſſor of Gregory, had been elected pope. By this agreement Boemund was left in poſſeſſion of the places he had conquered, and had beſides Maida and Coſenza, which laſt city was afterwards exchanged for Bari. The following year Roger and Boemund again waited upon the pope at Melphis, where, in the month of September, he celebrated a council, and confirmed the agreement formerly made betwixt them [b].

A FEW months after Jordanus, prince of Capua, died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Richard II. then a boy, who being ſoon after expelled from Capua, by the Lombards of Campania, retired to Averſa [c]. In the mean time the city of Coſenza revolting from Roger, he had recourſe to his uncle the count, by whoſe aſſiſtance, having reduced the rebels, he reſigned to him the half of Palermo, which had been reſerved by his father, ſo that each of them having quitted the territories which they held in each other's dominions, the two ſtates began to be governed by their ſeparate laws and cuſtoms. After the quelling of this revolt, duke Roger married Adala, the daughter of Robert Friſius, marquis of Flanders, and niece of Philip, king of France, by whom he had two ſons, William and Lewis. While they were both infants, he was ſeized with a fever at Melphis, which reduced him to ſuch extremity that he was given over by his phyſicians; and a rumour prevailed that he was dead. Boemund, who was then in Calabria, immediately aſſembled ſome troops, and marching into the dominions of his brother, obliged ſeveral cities to take the oath of allegiance to him, pretending, however, that he intended to aſſume the government only during the minority of his nephews. The duke was greatly alarmed with this proceeding, and ſent to his uncle for aſſiſtance, who ſoon obliged Boemund to retire. The brother being now ſenſible of his raſhneſs, and hearing that the duke was recovered, contrary to expectation, came to Melphis, to congratulate him; and having excuſed his proceeding, and reſtored all that he had ſeized. offered him his aſſiſtance to reduce ſome cia ties that had revolted. Among theſe were Roſſana and Amalfi. William de Grantarul, who had married the duke's niece, had ſeized Roſſana; but being quickly reduced by the duke's forces, in conjunction with thoſe of Boemund and count Roger, he was obliged to fly with his wife to Conſtantinople. The count, however, ſoon after, on account of his affinity, was reconciled to him, and reſtored him all his territories, except the caſtle of St. Maur [d].

(P) Robert left two ſons, and ſeveral daughters, by his two wives. He governed Puglia thirty years, and Salerno ten, in which city he fixed the ſeat of his government, as it was then become very famous by its extenſive traffick, great wealth, and numerous ſchools for the ſtudy of philoſophy and phyſic. It is called by Romuald the Salernitan, Civitatem Medecinæ by way of eminence (1). The foundation of the Scholæ Salerni is erroneouſly attributed by ſome to Charlemagne, who never was in poſſeſſion of that city. It is more probable, that they owed their origin to the Arabs and Saracens, who, about 300 years before this period, had begun to ſtudy the philoſophy of Ariſtotle with great ardour, and had tranſlated many Greek books into their own language. The city of Salerno being ſeated on the ſea coaſt, was greatly frequented by theſe oriental people, whoſe learning had been for ſome time in great requeſt. The reputation of the ſchools was particularly raiſed by one Conſtantine, born at Carthage, who after ſtudying 39 years in the eaſt, was perſecuted upon his return to his native country, and took refuge in Salerno, where he remained privately in the diſguiſe of a beggar, till he was diſcovered by the king of Babylon's brother, who had come to pay a viſit to Robert Guiſcard, and had known him at Babylon. Conſtantine, after this diſcovery, was treated by Robert with great diſtinction, and continuing at Salerno, promoted the ſtudy of phliloſophy and phyſic with great zeal. Afterwards he became a monk, and retiring to Caſſino, ſpent his time in compoſing many treatiſes of phyſic, and in tranſlating books from different languages (2). The monks of Caſſino likewiſe contributed to raiſe the reputation of the Salernitan ſchools. During the time of pope John VIII. the abbot Baſſacio publiſhed a treatiſe on the qualities of medicines (3); Affano and Guarſa, archbiſhops of Salerno, were expert in phyſic, and the noble Salernitans were fond of ſtudying that ſcience (4). John de Procida, who afterwards promoted the Sicilian veſpers, was a noble Salernitan, and celebrated phyſician (5). Giannone likewiſe mentions, that a treatiſe on phyſic was publiſhed in the year 1100, and dedicated by the whole Salernitan ſchool to Robert, a Norman, titular king of England (6). The firſt that gave laws to thoſe ſchools was Roger I. king of Sicily. They were afterwards favoured by Frederic II. who prohibited any one to profeſs phyſic, till he had obtained a licence from the phyſicians of Salerno or Naples. Other princes likewiſe conferred honours and privileges on theſe ſchools; and at laſt they were raiſed to be an univerſity, and had the privilege of conferring the degree of doctor.

In the mean time he marched againſt the Amalfitans, who had deſtroyed the forts built in their city by Robert Guiſcard, and expelled all thoſe who favoured the Normans. The city was populous, and ſtrongly fortified; and the inhabitants were fond of liberty, which they had long enjoyed. The duke therefore, ſenſible that it would be difficult to b reduce them, inveſted the city with a powerful army, both by ſea and land. Beſides his own forces, his brother Boemund joined him with a large body of troops from Calabria, and his uncle Roger tranſported from Sicily an army of 20,000 Saracens, with an infinite number of other nations [e]. and beſieges Amalfi, but without ſucceſs. A. D. 1096.

The city was at laſt reduced to the greateſt extremity, when a very ſingular accident contributed to its preſervation. Urban II. by his pathetic diſcourſes the year before, in the council of Clermont in France, had raiſed a romantic and enthuſiaſtic ſpirit over all Europe, of undertaking an expedition into the Holy Land, for the recovery of Jeruſalem. During the ſiege, great numbers of the cruſards wandring in Puglia without a leader, Boemund, who remembered his former expeditions with his father in Romania, which he c was ſtill ambitious of conquering, immediately aſſumed the croſs; and, with great appearance of devotion and zeal, exhorted others to follow his example. He was ſo ſucceſsful, as to prevail on the beſt part of the allied army that was before the city to aſſume the croſs, and to make a vow not to attack any Chriſtians till after their return from the Holy Land. The duke being thus deprived of the flower of his troops, was obliged, to his great mortification, to abandon his enterprize, when at the point of ſucceſs [f].

BOEMUND ſoon after paſſed into Greece at the head of a formidable army, and was accompanied with his couſin the famous Tancred, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly in that ſacred expedition [g]. Before his departure he reſigned all his dominions in Italy to his brother Roger, who the following year aſſiſted Richard II. in recovering the principality d of Capua. Richard owed his reſtoration chiefly to the power of the count of Sicily, whoſe protection and aſſiſtance he purchaſed by ſubmitting to become his vaſſal, and promiſing him the city of Naples, though it does not appear what right he had to diſpoſe of that city, which was not at this time in his poſſeſſion, but was ſtill governed by its own dukes, in the form of a republic. Roger, in the ſpring, tranſported a very formidable army from Sicily, with which he ravaged Campania and inveſted Capua, which after a ſiege of forty days was obliged to ſurrender, and ſubmit to Richard upon his own terms. After the reduction of the city, the duke and count returned to Salerno, where they were viſited by pope Urban, who, in conſideration of the many ſervices rendered by the count to the apoſtolic ſee, granted a bull, appointing him, and the ſon that ſhould ſucceed him, e his legates in Sicily; from whence the princes, who have ſince ſucceeded to that iſland, have claimed the right of being ſovereigns both in ſpirituals and temporals; and though the church of Rome has made great oppoſition to their claim, they have, nevertheleſs, ſtill retained this eminent prerogative *. Boemund engages in the cruſade. Richard II. is reſtored to the principality of Capua. A. D. 1097.

In the mean time Boemund having taken Antioch, uſurped the title of prince of that city, which dignity he likewiſe tranſmitted to poſterity. About ſix years after he arrived in Italy, and had a conference at Rome with pope Paſchal II. the ſucceſſor of Urban, after which he proceeded to France, to marry Conſtantia, the daughter of king Philip [h]. Before his arrival in Italy, his uncle, the great count Roger, died, in the 70th year of his age, and was burried in the city of Melito in Calabria. He left behind him two f young ſons by his laſt wife, and two daughters, who were married to two Lombard counts. Simon, his eldeſt ſon, ſurvived only a few months, and it ſeems uncertain whether he was ever in poſſeſſion of the county of Sicily [i]; ſo that Roger II. afterwards king, may juſtly be reckoned his immediate ſucceſſor. A few years after his ſucceſſion, Robert, brother of the prince of Capua, endeavoured to ſeize that principality. Prince Richard, however, held it to his death, which happened two years after, when it was ſeized by Robert, who held it twelve months under the title of procurator, after which time he aſſumed the title of prince, the Capuans acknowleging him as their ſovereign, as his brother had left no iſſue. Soon after Henry V. who had rebelled againſt his father, and ſtripped him by force of his imperial ornaments, entered Italy at the head of a formidable army, to receive the imperial crown, and finally determine the diſpute concerning inveſtitures. As he had inſiſted upon retaining that right as peremptorily as his late father had ever done, the pope began to be greatly apprehenſive of his deſigns, and immediately upon the news of his march came to Capua, and ſolicited the aſſiſtance of prince Robert and duke Roger, in defence of the apoſtolic ſee. Having obtained their promiſe of aſſiſtance he returned to Rome, and took an oath from the Romans to the ſame purpoſe. Notwithſtanding theſe precautions, the following year, in the month of February, he was ſeized in St. Peter's church by the emperor, and kept a cloſe priſoner, and treated with great indignity for two months, till he conſented to confirm his claim of inveſtitures by a bull. Robert, prince of Capua, upon the news of his confinement, immediately ſent ſome troops towards Rome to his aſſiſtance; but the emperor by that time had left the city with his priſoner, and marched to the ſouth ſide of the Tyber; ſo that the Normans were obliged to return to Capua, having found all the nobles about Ferentino greatly in the emperor's intereſt. The pope was deprived of any aſſiſtance from Puglia, by the death of duke Roger, who, about the ſame time that he was ſeized at Rome, died at Salerno. This accident ſtruck the Normans with great conſternation, as the Lombard ſubjects ſeemed inclined to revolt; and they were conſcious they had incurred the reſentment of the emperor, who was at this time very formidable, had the pope in his power, and was ravaging the Roman territories in their neighbourhood. The Normans in Puglia and Calabria therefore, inſtead of marching to the relief of the pope, ſecured the fortified places in thoſe provinces for their own defence; and prince Robert, who was more expoſed to the emperor's reſentment, ſent ambaſſadors to him with offers of ſubmiſſion [k].

William ſucceeds to the dukedom of Puglia. A. D. 1111.

HENRY, after receiving the imperial crown, and obtaining the bull concerning inveſtitures from the pope, left Italy, without concerning himſelf with the affairs of the Normans, and had no ſooner paſſed the Alps, than the bull granted by Paſchal was annulled by ſeveral cardinals, who of themſelves had aſſembled at Rome. Duke Roger was ſucceeded by his only ſon William, who received the inveſtiture of Puglia and Calabria from pope Paſchal at Cepperano [l]. Paſchal, about four years after, was ſucceeded in the pontificate by Gelaſius II. born at Gaeta. The emperor was then in Italy, and the new pope refuſing to confirm the grant of inveſtitures made by Paſchal, Henry marched directly to Rome. The pope, being apprehenſive of the ſame treatment his predeceſſor had received, retired to his native city, where he was conſecrated, and granted the inveſtiture to duke William, and Robert, prince of Capua, who promiſed to aſſiſt him againſt the ſchiſmatics. Henry, in the mean time, appointed an antipope, who took the name of Gregory VIII, but being ſoon after informed that the Normans were conducting Gelaſius to Rome, he left the city and returned to Germany. Though Gelaſius ſoon after entered Rome with a conſiderable body of Normans, yet the imperial and antipapal party being more powerful than he expected, he was obliged a ſecond time to quit the city, and retired to France, where he died in the beginning of the following year in the monaſtery of Cluny. The cardinals who had attended him immediately elected Guido, archbiſhop of Vienne, who took the name of Calixtus II. At firſt there were ſome hopes of an accommodation betwixt him and the emperor, with regard to inveſtitures; but the propoſed conferences never taking effect, Calixtus returned the following year to Rome, where he was received with great reſpect. From thence, a few months after, he proceeded to Benevento, to deſire the aſſiſtance of duke William and the prince of Capua againſt the antipope, who was protected by the imperial garriſon at Sutri. Calixtus granted the inveſtiture to duke William; but before his arrival Robert, prince of Capua, died, and left his dominions to his ſon Richard III. who ſurviving him only two days, was ſucceeded by his uncle Jordanus II. who, according to the Norman cuſtom, was anointed with the holy oil on the 5th of July [m]. The pope, however, obtained a body of Normans, by whoſe aſſiſtance, the year following, he reduced Sutri, and ſeized the antipope, whom he impriſoned for life. He ſurvived this tranſaction about three years, and was ſucceeded by Honorius II. A few months after the emperor Henry V. dying, Lotharius, duke of Saxony, and Conrad, duke of Suabia, both pretended to be legally elected his ſucceſſor, and had recourſe to arms to defend their claims.

During this civil war in Germany, William, duke of Puglia, died at Salerno, in the 17th year of his reign, without leaving any iſſue [n]. Some time before his death he left his dominions, by his will, to his uncle Roger, count of Sicily, who immediately, without conſulting the pope, arrived at Salerno, and, confirming to the Salernitans their ancient privileges, was conſecrated prince by Alphanus, biſhop of Caput Aquenſe. a went to Reggio, where he was proclaimed duke of Puglia and Calabria, and, after making a progreſs through the provinces, returned to Sicily °. Roger at firſt met with ſome oppoſition from the Salernitans, who however were ſoon prevailed upon to ſubmit; but he had another enemy, who was greatly offended that he had preſumed to intermeddle in the ſucceſſion of his nephew William. This was Honorius II. who alledged that Roger, by taking poſſeſſion of Puglia and Calabria, had violated the rights of the church, which, upon a very falſe foundation, pretended to the ſupreme dominion of theſe duchies. He therefore refuſed to grant him the inveſtiture, though he deſired it in the moſt reſpectful manner, and offered, in return, the cities of Troja and Montefuſco. Roger ſent ſeveral embaſſies to him at Benevento; however, he would not hearken to his propoſals, but, returning to Ca- b pua, there held a convention compoſed of the prince of Capua and ſeveral barons of Puglia, whom he prevailed upon to enter into an aſſociation againſt Roger, in defence of the church. Roger, who had aſſumed the title of duke, ſtill continued to ſolicit an accommodation; but Honorius remained inflexible, declaring he would rather die than agree to his propoſals, and denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt him and all his adherents.

The pope oppoſes his claim.

The duke at laſt reſolved to defend his right by arms, and upon his return to Sicily, aſſembled a formidable army, which the following ſpring he tranſported into Italy, and quickly made himſelf maſter of Tarento, Otranto, Brindiſi, Oria, and ſeveral other places. Honorius in the mean time marched againſt him with the rebellious barons and their troops.
c Upon the approach of the papal army, Roger very prudently kept himſelf in his fortified camp, pretending that he declined an engagement from reſpect to the pope, but in hopes that his enemies, for want of unanimity and ſubſiſtence, would ſoon be obliged to diſperſe. The event juſtified his conduct; for many in the pope's camp were ſoon obliged to ſell their cloaths to purchaſe ſubſiſtence, which occaſioning a great deſertion, the pope, without the knowlege of the barons, ſent to Roger. offering him the inveſtiture of his nephew's dominions, if he would ſwear allegiance to the holy ſee. This negociation being diſcovered, the Apulian barons, in great indignation, immediately abandoned the pope, who returned to Benevento; and being followed by Roger, granted him the inveſtiture of Puglia and Calabria, in the neighbourhood of that city. Upon the news of this accommodation with d the pope, many cities immediately ſubmitted to Roger. Brindiſi, however, revolted; and Troja, which had been moſt active in the rebellion, inſtead of acknowleging the duke, ſent and begged the protection of Robert II. prince of Capua, who about two years before had ſucceeded his father Jordanus. Robert refuſing their requeſt, they ſubmitted to Rainulph, count of Avellino; but Roger, by threatening to invade his country, drew him from the city, which he afterwards inveſted, and, obliging it to ſurrender, ſtruck ſuch a terror into the malecontents, that they all ſubmitted P.

As he had now united a great many ſtates in his own perſon, upon his return to Sicily, he was earneſtly preſſed by many of his friends to aſſume the title of king. He very willingly attended to this propoſal; and returning to Salerno, aſſembled the barons of Puglia
e in that city, who unanimouſly urging him to the ſame purpoſe, he publiſhed a proclamation, ordering all his nobles and barons to appear at Palermo at Chriſtmas. As the authority of the popes was at that time ſo great, that princes did not think they could aſſume the royal or any other title without their conſent, Roger therefore judged it neceſſary to have the approbation of the apoſtolic ſee. It happened very fortunately for him that a great ſchiſm had ariſen in the Roman church. Innocent II. and Anaclet II. in the beginning of the year, had been both elected on the ſame day by oppoſite factions. Innocent was firſt elected by the minority in a ſecret manner, but was obliged to quit Rome, and to retire to France, where he ſoon prevailed on the emperor and the king of France to acknowlege him. Anaclet was ſupported at Rome by powerful relations, and a great many cardinals. Roger, from f what motive is uncertain, thought proper to declare for Anaclet, who was generally acknowleged in Italy. The antipope, in return for the protection of ſo powerful a prince, made no difficulty of granting him the royal title. He accordingly had a conference with Roger, in the month of September, at Avellino, where he ſettled the time and place of the coronation; and, returning to Benevento, cauſed the bull to be drawn up for that purpoſe, ſpecifying the rights and privileges of the kingdom. He then ſent cardinal Comes to Palermo, who, with great pomp and ceremony, crowned the king on the 25th of December [q] (Q). a

A FEW months after this ceremony, the new king inveſted the city of Amalfi both by ſea and land, and at length obliged it to ſurrender. After he had reduced this city, and had returned to Salerno, Sergius, duke of Naples, according to the abbot of Teleſe, came and ſubmitted voluntarily to his dominion. This ſubmiſſion, however, if there was really any ſuch, took no effect; for Sergius, the following year, aſſociated himſelf with a great many powerful barons, who revolted againſt the king. As Roger began to govern in a very arbitrary manner, and to diſcover every day more ambitious views, many of the Puglians fled to the emperor begging his protection, while others formed an aſſociation for their own defence. The Beneventans, finding that the king had corrupted their governor cardinal Creſcentius, and intended to make himſelf maſter of their city, expelled the cardinal, renounced their obedience to Anaclet, and acknowleged Innocent, who ſent one cardinal Gerrard as their governor. The count of Avellino likewiſe, though married to a ſiſter of the king, being ſtripped by him of part of his territories, immediately prevailed on Robert, prince of Capua, Tancred, count of Converſano, Grimoald, prince of Bari, with many other barons, to have recourſe to arms. Theſe malecontents, being aſſiſted by the Neapolitans and Beneventans, attacked the king near the river Sarno, where he was entirely defeated, and obliged to fly to Salerno, from whence, in the beginning of December, he returned to Sicily [r]. b

A dangerous rebellion in Puglia. A. D. 1132.

BEFORE his departure, the emperor Lotharius had arrived in Italy, and, after continuing ſome months in Lombardy, in the following ſpring marched towards Rome, to re-eſtabliſh Innocent, from whom he received the imperial crown in the Lateran church, as the church of St. Peter was ſtill in the poſſeſſion of Anaclet. The emperor's arrival gave great ſpirits to the Apulian rebels, many of whom reſorted to him at Rome, particularly Robert, prince of Capua, and count Rainulphus of Avellino. They were, however, diſappointed of aſſiſtance; for Lotharius had with him only about 2000 men, and the oppoſite faction being in poſſeſſion of all the places of ſtrength in Rome, he was quickly obliged to leave the city, and return to Germany. Roger, in the mean time, having returned to Puglia with a formidable army, chiefly compoſed of Saracens, reduced a great many of the revolted cities, and puniſhed the rebels with great ſeverity. The prince of Capua, who, with the count, had left Rome in order to oppoſe him, finding him too powerful, went to Piſa to aſk the aſſiſtance of that republic. Being ſeconded by the pope, who had conferred ſeveral privileges on the Piſans, he prevailed upon them to promiſe to ſend, in conjunction with the Genoeſe and the Venetians, a fleet of an hundred ſail againſt Roger in the following ſpring. During his abſence, the king had reduced almoſt all Apulia, and taken ſeveral of the chiefs of the rebels, ſome of whom he executed, and ſent others captive into Sicily. About the end of October he arrived at Salerno, with a great number of captives of all ages, and an immenſe quantity of booty in gold and ſilver, and valuable effects, which loaded twenty-three ſhips; and having ordered his army, during the winter, to ravage the territories of Benevento and Capua, he ſet ſail for Sicily, loſing, however, in his paſſage, almoſt all his ſhips by a violent ſtorm [s]. c d e

(Q) Roger at this time not only obtained the inveſtiture of Sicily, Puglia, and Calabria, but likewiſe of the principality of Capua, and the dukedom of Naples, tho' prince Robert was preſent at his coronation, and helped to place the crown upon his head, and the dukedom of Naples was then governed by its own duke, and depended on the eaſtern empire. He did not, however, obtain the inveſtiture of the principality of Salerno, which ſtate, for ſome time paſt, was claimed by the popes themſelves, probably by ſome pretended gift of Giſulphus II. who was expelled by Robert Guiſcard, and took refuge with Gregory the ſeventh. The inveſtiture was given to Roger, his children, and their heirs, jure perpetuo; and the quit-rent agreed upon was 600 ſcyfati yearly (1).

a with great kindneſs by Roger, who reſtored him his wife and ſon, and part of his territories. This reconciliation betwixt the king and his brother-in-law ſtruck a terror into the other rebels. Great part of their army diſperſed, and Robert, prince of Capua, returned immediately to Piſa, where he was received by Innocent, who had been obliged to leave Rome by the party of Anaclet, and earneſtly requeſted the emperor to return with an army to Italy, to oppoſe the Sicilian tyrant. Roger in the mean time reduced all Campania, and made himſelf maſter of Capua, where, according to the abbot of Teleſe, he received the ſubmiſſion of the duke of Naples. He afterwards took poſſeſſion of Averſa; and, having obliged the Beneventans to ſurrender at diſcretion, returned in a triumphant manner to Salerno, from whence, in the end of the year, he paſſed over to Sicily. Anaclet, in the mean time, ar-
b riving at Benevento, appointed new officers in the city, and puniſhed the authors of the revolt [t].

ROGER, upon his return to Sicily, fell dangerouſly ill; and, after he recovered, loſt his queen Alberia, by whoſe death he was ſo greatly afflicted, that for ſeveral weeks he did not appear in public, and was only ſeen by a few of his favourites. This occaſioned a report of his death, which gave freſh ſpirits to the malecontents on the continent, eſpecially as Robert, prince of Capua, in the ſpring, arrived at Naples with 8000 Piſans, and a formidable fleet. Count Rainulphus, prince Robert, and the duke of Naples, accordingly entered into a new aſſociation againſt the king; and Robert immediately marched with a numerous army towards Capua, to recover that city; but the place being ſecured by the c prudence of the king's chancellor Warinus, he was obliged to retire. Roger, at length, arriving about the beginning of June at Salerno, quickly aſſembled a formidable army, with which he reduced Averſa. As the city had been forward in this laſt revolt, after allowing his army to pillage it, he ſet it on fire, and, marching to Naples, beſieged it for nine days, burning the ſuburbs, and ravaging all the neighbouring territory. While he retired with his troops on account of the heat, the Piſan fleet ſurpriſed and took Amalfi, which they intirely ſtripped of all its wealth: but, before they could reimbark, Roger arrived with part of his army, and obliged them to abandon almoſt all their plunder, and killed and took about 1500 of their men.

The Puglians revolt a ſecond time. A. D. 1135.

AFTER the departure of the Piſans, the king again inveſted Naples, which was the head
d quarters of the rebels; but, finding he was not able to make an impreſſion on the city, he cut down all their vines, and retiring, encamped in the neighbourhood of Benevento, where, in the preſence of his army, he gave the inveſtiture of the principality of Capua to his third ſon Anfuſus; not allowing him, however, to govern it independently of himſelf or his eldeſt ſon Roger, whom he had declared his ſucceſſor in the kingdom. As the rebels had then no army to oppoſe him, he made a progreſs through ſeveral cities that he had lately reduced; and appointing governors for the places of ſtrength in Terra di Labor, returned in the beginning of winter to Sicily. Robert, late prince of Capua, in the mean time had left Naples, returned to Piſa, and was ſoon after followed by Sergius, the duke, who was apprehenſive that the city would be beſiged in the next campaign, as the officers of Roger then kept e it blocked up, and prevented any proviſions coming into it by land. Pope Innocent, who ſtill continued at Piſa, preſſed prince Robert to go into Germany to beg the aſſiſtance of the emperor, and ſent with him cardinal Gerard, late governor of Benevento.

Roger gives the inveſtiture of Capua to his ſon Anfuſus.

LOTHARIUS, who had been long intreated by many other exiles of Puglia to march againſt Roger, immediately promiſed to Robert to come with an army the following year to Italy. The prince returning with this news to Piſa, ſoon after ſailed from thence with five ſhips to the relief of Naples. The emperor accordingly, in the beginning of autumn, arrived with a powerful army in Italy; but, being detained by the affairs of Lombardy, could not proceed to Apulia till the year after, the city of Naples, in the mean time ſuffering the greateſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions. In the following March, Lotharius had a confe-
f rence with the pope at Viterbo, and granted him 3000 men, commanded by his ſon-in-law Henry the Proud, duke of Bavaria. Innocent, with his force, and a great number of malecontents who joined him, immediately recovered all Campania, reſtored prince Robert to the principality of Capua, reduced the monaſtery of Caſſino, and obliged the city of Benevento to ſurrender. Lotharius in the mean time had marched towards the Adriatic, and made himſelf maſter of Siponto, Monte Gargano, and Bari. He was there joined by the pope, with the other diviſion of his army, and marched in conjunction with his holineſs to Melphis, which quickly ſurrendered. Mean while the Piſans had arrived with a fleet of an hundred armed ſhips at Naples, and, having relieved that city, obliged the Amalfitans to ſubmit to g the emperor, and took and plundered Scala and Ravella (R). All the cities of Puglia having

ing now ſubmitted to the emperor, about the middle of July he inveſted the city of Salerno, a both by ſea and land, which, after ſome oppoſition, ſurrendered upon terms to the emperor, part of the garriſon retiring into the citadel. The Piſans, being greatly offended that they were not conſulted at the capitulation, with great difficulty were prevailed upon to continue with their fleet, which diſſenſion prevented the emperor from reducing the citadel. A greater diſſenſion, however, immediately followed betwixt the emperor and the pope, about the right of inveſtiture. Lotharius having propoſed, after his return with his army towards Benevento, to create a new duke of Puglia, was oppoſed with great vehemence by the pope, who alleged, that it was his prerogative to grant the inveſtiture of that dutchy. The diſpute continued for near thirty days with great animoſity; at length, leſt the common enemy ſhould take advantage of their diſſenſion, it was reſolved that the deciſion of their b claims ſhould be deferred, and that both of them ſhould give the inveſtiture together. cordingly Rainulphus, count of Avellino, was created duke of Calabria and Puglia, and in the preſence of the army received the ſtandard from the hands of the emperor and the pope, the upper part of which, however, was held by his holineſs [u].

LOTHARIUS, having thus diſpoſed of Puglia, returned with the pope to Rome, and from thence proceeded to Lombardy, where he was detained till the month of December in ſettling the diſputes betwixt ſome cities and nobles, and in a few weeks after died in his paſſage over the Alps. Roger, who had been waiting for his departure, was no ſooner informed that he had returned to Lombardy, than he arrived with an army at Salerno, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants. Having immediately reduced Nocera, and the territory be- c longing to Rainulphus, he marched to Capua, which he took and plundered, not ſparing even the churches and nunneries. Upon the news of this ſucceſs, the Beneventans, and Sergius, duke of Naples, came and voluntarily ſubmitted to him; but Rainulphus, reſolving to hazard all to return to his new dignity, marched againſt him with a ſmall army, which he had raiſed from Bari, Trani, Troja, and Melphis. tion; but his mediation being rejected, both parties came to an engagement on the 2d of October, when Roger was entirely defeated, with the loſs of all his baggage, and a great number of his men [w]. The king, however, did not appear diſcouraged with this great defeat; but, retiring to Salerno, made great preparations for recruiting his army, that he d might be again in a condition to take the field.

In order to amuſe his enemies, he ſeemed to hearken to the ſolicitations of St. Bernard, and agreed to a conference of three cardinals of either part, to examine into the merits of the election of Innocent and Anaclet. After the deputies had ſpent ſeveral days in diſputing at Salerno, Roger propoſed that their arguments ſhould be committed to writing, and that one cardinal of each party ſhould go with him to Sicily, to lay them before the Sicilian biſhops. This propoſal was accordingly agreed to; but Anaclet dying in the beginning of January, all further thoughts of a negociation were laid aſide. Roger by that time had reeſtabliſhed his affairs, while his competitor had ſpent the whole winter in ſome enterprizes of ſmall importance. To keep up the faction againſt Innocent, Roger perſuaded the ſchiſ- e matics at Rome to elect a ſucceſſor to Anaclet, and ſoon after landed with his army in Italy. Rainulphus in vain endeavoured to draw him to another engagement, for he cautiouſly ſhunned him during the whole campaign, by encamping on the mountains. Though he was continually followed by him, he was nevertheleſs ſo ſucceſsful as to reduce ſeveral towns, ſome of which he plundered and burnt, and, having obliged many of the rebels to ſubmit, he returned in the beginning of winter to Sicily.

INNOCENT, who had prevailed on the new antipope Victor to ſubmit, and had thereby put an end to the ſchiſm, endeavoured in the beginning of the campaign to march with an army to the aſſiſtance of Rainulphus; but after he had arrived at Albano, being prevented by ſickneſs, he returned to Rome, where, in a general council held in the month of April, f

as their own ſhare, the pandects of Juſtinian, which had been brought by an Amalfitan merchant from the eaſt (1). Angelus Politianus believes this copy to be that which had been compiled by order of the emperor (2). However that be, 'tis certain that all other copies are taken from it, as being the moſt ancient. The Piſans, having obtained their requeſt from the emperor, carried the volumes to Piſa, and for near three centuries they were known by the name of the Pandectæ Piſanæ. But about the year 1416, Piſa being taken by the Florentines, they were tranſported from thence to Florence, where they are now preſerved in the library of the Medici, and known by the name of the Pandectæ Florentinæ. Some authors allege, that Lotharius ordained by an edict, that the pandects ſhould be publicly read and explained at Bologna, and pleaded in the tribunals; but Corringius and Lindenbrogius fully refute their opinion (3).

a in the Lateran church, he denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt Roger, who, though he is ſaid to have acknowledged him as pope after the reſignation of Victor, ſtill continued the war againſt him as a temporal prince [x]. Innocent probably ſoon repented of this proceeding; for Rainulphus, on whom he chiefly depended as the inſtrument of his reſentment againſt the king, died a few days after at Troja, being greatly lamented by all thoſe of his faction. Roger is ſaid to have expreſſed immoderate joy at his death; and, immediately after, landing at Salerno, aſſembled a numerous army, part of which he put under the command of his eldeſt ſon duke Roger, who quickly reduced all the cities of Puglia except Bari, which at that time conſiſted of 50,000 inhabitants, and had a garriſon of 400 horſe. b tanata, and other cities. He was, however, obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Ariano, which was garriſoned with 200 knights, and about 20,000 foot. Soon after, while he was encamped before Troja, he was informed that the pope had arrived with a powerful army as far as St. Germano, to the aſſiſtance of the rebels. Roger immediately ſent ambaſſadors to him, offering to treat of peace; and, marching with his army towards St. Germano, conferences were held for ſeveral days by the deputies of both ſides. The negociation, however broke off, becauſe Roger abſolutely refuſed to part with the principality of Capua; and the king, withdrawing his army, beſieged ſome caſtles belonging to the rebels in that neighbourhood. The pope likewiſe began hoſtilities againſt the king, who, taking the advantage of the ſecurity of his enemy, ſurpriſed him on his march, and made him priſoner. Though he

c treated him with the greateſt reſpect, yet he abſolutely refuſed to grant him his liberty, unleſs he would abſolve him from the ſentence of excommunication, and conclude a peace. Innocent without much difficulty conſented to his requeſt; and accordingly, four days after, on the 25th of June, abſolved him and all his adherents, and granted him the inveſti-

ture of the kingdom of Sicily, of the duchy of Puglia, and the principality of Capua, on condition of his ſwearing allegiance to the holy Roman ſee, and paying a yearly quit-rent of 600 ſcyfati.

After this reconciliation, Roger accompanied the pope to Benevento, where he received the ſubmiſſion of the Neapolitans, who choſe his eldeſt ſon for their duke; and having reſtored Benevento to the pope, he marched to Troja, which ſurrendering upon his approach,

d he proceeded to Bari. After a ſiege of two months, he obliged this city to ſubmit; and having ordered prince Jaquintus, with ten other chiefs, to be hanged, and the eyes of many others to be put out, he returned about the end of October with his army to Salerno, where having confiſcated the eſtates of the chief rebels whom he baniſhed from his dominions, he ſet ſail a few days after for Palermo [y]. Early the following ſpring, he ſent prince Anfuſus with an army to reduce the province in the neighbourhood of Peſcara on the coaſt of the Adriatic; and duke Roger ſoon after marching thither with a ſtrong reinforcement, many cities quickly ſurrendered. As the pope made great complaint of theſe hoſtilities, Roger, who ſoon after arrived from Sicily, recalled his two ſons, and ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, earneſtly deſiring a conference with Innocent; who excuſed himſelf, by urging the neceſſity

e of his affairs. The king then went to Peſcara; and having viſited the places conquered by his ſons, he returned to Ariano, where he aſſembled for the firſt time the eſtates of his kingdom, namely, by the barons and prelates; and among other things ordained, that none of his ſubjects ſhould receive any Roman money, but ſhould trade with what he then coined, more than one half of which conſiſted of braſs. This edict occaſioned an univerſal murmuring over all his ſtates in Italy; but they had ſuffered ſo much by their late revolt, and his authority was now ſo fully eſtabliſhed, that any oppoſition would only have involved them in greater miſery. From Ariano Roger proceeded to Naples, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; and having confirmed to the inhabitants their ancient immunities, in the beginning of October he ſailed from Salerno to Sicily, leaving duke Roger in Puglia, and prince Anfuſus at Capua [z] (S).

About

(S) It is a diſpute betwixt the Sicilian and Neapolitan writers, whether the provinces of Italy were at this time formed into a kingdom by themſelves, independent on the kingdom of Sicily. The Sicilians ſay, that the Italian provinces depended on Palermo, where the chief officers of the crown, who had the government of them, reſided, and that the words of the bull of Anaclet are, Siciliam caput regni conſtituimus. It appears likewiſe from the conſtitutions of Frederic II. that by the kingdom of Sicily he not only meant the iſland, but the Italian provinces; and Clement IV. in his bull of inveſtiture to Charles of Anjou, called the kingdom, regnum Siciliæ citra & ultra Pharum. Gregory XI. in the year 1363, having reconciled queen Jean of Naples and Frederic III. king of Sicily, in his bull calls Naples the kingdom of Sicily, and Sicily Trinacria. The two kingdoms being afterwards united in the perſon of Alphonſus I. he uſed the title of Rex utriuſque Siciliæ. It is alleged by the Neapolitans, that when Roger was reconciled to Innocent, no regard was paid to the bull of Anaclet; and from cotemporary writers it appears, that the duchy of Puglia, meaning all the Italian provinces ſubject to Roger, was erected into a kingdom independent on Sicily, and that he and his ſucceſſors took the title of kings of Puglia or Italy.

The succeſſors of Innocent refuſe to acknowlege Roger as king. A. D. 1143.

ABOUT three years after, Roger was threatened with a war by Celeſtine II. the ſucceſſor of Innocent, who refuſed to ratify the peace concluded betwixt his predeceſſor and the king. The ſhortneſs of his pontificate, which continued only ſix months, prevented an open rupture. But his ſucceſſor Lucius II. being of the ſame ſentiments, Roger, who was deſirous of continuing in a good correſpondence with the holy ſee, had a conference with him at the monaſtery of Monte Caſſino. The pope, by the advice of the cardinals, refuſing to grant his requeſt, and parting in an abrupt manner, the king immediately entered the ſtate of the church with an army, and took Terracina, and many other places in the Campania di Roma. Roger by this means prevailed on the pope to agree to an accommodation; which was accordingly effected, the king granting to Lucius a large ſum of money, and reſtoring all the conqueſts he had made from the dominions of the church; and, on the other hand, receiving from the pope, a grant of the ring, the ſandals, the ſceptre, the mitre, and the dalmatic, and that no perſon ſhould be ſent into his dominions as a legate without his deſire, from whence the kings of Sicily value themſelves, as being both lords in ſpirituals and temporals in their dominions [a]. In the mean time prince Anfuſus dying, Roger created his fourth ſon William prince of Capua and duke of Naples; and ſoon after held a general convention of his ſtates at Capua, where ſeveral new laws were made, and many law-ſuits compounded. Roger, having now eſtabliſhed peace in Italy upon a ſolid foundation, turned his thoughts to a foreign expedition, and the following year invaded Africa with a powerful fleet. He quickly made himſelf maſter of Tripoli, Stace, and Caſſia, and ſo harraſſed the king of Tunis in other parts of his dominions, that he conſented to become his tributary [b].

He obtains privileges from Lucius II. A. D. 1144.

He ravages the coaſts of Greece. A. D. 1148.

ABOUT the ſame time he likewiſe carried his victorious arms into Greece, to puniſh the perfidy of the Greek emperor Emanuel, who, in the beginning of his reign, had ſent ambaſſadors to Sicily, with the propoſal of an alliance by marriage; which propoſal was embraced by Roger, and ambaſſadors were ſent by him to Conſtantinople for that purpoſe. The emperor, having changed his mind, after amuſing the Sicilian ambaſſadors for ſome time, put them in priſon; which indignity greatly exaſperating the king, he immediately fitted out a formidable fleet, the command of which he gave to George of Antioch, his high admiral. The admiral, after taking the city of Mutine, attacked the iſland of Corfu, and, ſailing to the Morea, ravaged all the coaſts of that iſthmus, and committed hoſtilities in all places of the Negropont and Bœotia, from whence, beſides the rich booty, he carried off with him the chief workmen of the ſilk manufactures, and brought them to Sicily and Puglia, where before this time that art was unknown [c]. The following year the admiral again entered the Archipelago, and advanced in a triumphant manner as far as Conſtantinople, burning and plundering the ſuburbs of that capital, and in a bravado ſhooting golden arrows into the emperor's palace. Upon his return, he fell in with ſome Grecian ſhips, which he attacked and made himſelf maſter of, thereby ſetting at liberty Lewis VII. king of France, whom they had taken priſoner in his voyage from the Holy Land [d]. Roger received Lewis, upon his landing in Italy, with the greateſt honours; and about the ſame time granted aſſiſtance to pope Eugenius againſt the Romans, who for ſome years had renounced the papal authority, and endeavoured to reſtore the form of the ancient republic. As his eldeſt ſon Roger had died the year before, he about this time created his only ſurviving ſon William duke of Puglia; and, two years afterwards, he aſſociated him with himſelf in the kingdom, cauſing him to be crowned and anointed in Palermo by the archbiſhop of that city [e]. Having thus nominated a ſucceſſor, he laid aſide all thoughts of war, and reſiding at Palermo, ſpent the two remaining years of his life in erecting monuments of his munificence and piety, and endeavouring to convert the Jews and Saracens in his dominions to the Chriſtian religion. Italy. In the third volume of Sicilia Sacra, a charter begins with theſe words, after the invocation, Rogerius Rex Apuliæ. Giannone mentions a diploma, dated 1130, wherein we read, Rogerius, Dei Gratia, Siciliæ, Apuliæ, & Calabriæ, Rex; and, in the charter mentioned by Falco of Benevento, Roger ſtiles himſelf, Dei Gratia, Siciliæ, Italiæ, Rex. Another argument for the diſtinctneſs and independency of the two kingdoms, is drawn from the peculiarity of their laws; for in Naples no other laws prevailed than the Lombard, which never were uſed, or had authority, in Sicily, where the Lombards never had any footing. Both kingdoms likewiſe had ſeparately their ſupreme officers of the crown, which were introduced at this time by Roger, after the manner of France. Theſe, according to Giannone, were the high conſtable, the high admiral, the high chancellor, the lord chief juſtice, the high chamberlain, the great prothonotary, and the high ſteward (1).

a reign (T). He was large and corpulent, had the face of a lion, and a very rough voice. He was wiſe, diſcreet, and provident, and depended more on prudent council than ſtrength. In amaſſing money he was very diligent, but in conferring benefits he was very ſparing. He was a great terror to the Greeks and Saracens, and was more dreaded than beloved by his own ſubjects. He was a great admirer of learned and brave men of whatever nation, many of whom upon his invitation, entered into his ſervice, and were raiſed by him to the firſt honours of his kingdom [f].

WILLIAM, upon the death of his father, aſſumed the whole adminiſtration of the government; and on the following Eaſter repeated the ceremony of his coronation, in the preſence of a numerous aſſembly of the prelates and barons of his kingdom. He quickly
b alienated the affections of his nobles, by baniſhing and impriſoning many of thoſe who had been eſteemed by his father, and by conferring the whole direction and management of his affairs upon Majone di Bari, a man of an obſcure birth (U) and deteſtable character, whom he had promoted to the dignity of high admiral. His wicked ambition ſoon diſturbed the peace of the kingdom, and occaſioned a civil war, which was alſo in ſome meaſure owing to a rupture betwixt pope Adrian and the king. Adrian, who in the end of December had ſucceeded to the pontificate, a few months after ſent cardinal Henry to the king at Salerno, with an apoſtolic letter; but having addreſſed his letter only to William, lord of Sicily, the king ordered the cardinal immediately to leave his kingdom without an audience, and com-
c manded the high chancellor and governor of Puglia to march with an army into the pope's territories. The chancellor accordingly ravaged the territory of Benevento; but not being able to make himſelf maſter of the city, he proceeded to Campania di Roma, where he took and burnt Cepperano, Bacueco, Fruſinone, Arce, and other neighbouring places, and in his return demoliſhed the walls of Aquino, Pontecorvo, and other places belonging to the monks of Caſſino.

THE pope, in reſentment for theſe hoſtilities, thundered a ſentence of excommunication againſt William, and excited the diſcontented nobles in Apulia openly to revolt. Though he was diſappointed of aſſiſtance from the emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa, who this year had entered Italy, and recovered the imperial crown, yet his intrigues in Puglia were very ſucceſsful; for d many of the moſt powerful barons, being intirely diſaffected to the prince on account of the power and inſolence of Majone, ſwore allegiance to the pope as their ſovereign, who, about the end of September, had arrived at St. Germano with a conſiderable army. Robert, formerly prince of Capua, with the other exiles, taking advantage of theſe confuſions, again recovered their eſtates. Robert, by the pope's aſſiſtance, conquered all the principality of Capua, as far as Naples and Salerno; and Robert, count of Loritello, upon a rumour that William was poiſoned by Majone, pretended to the kingdom, and ſeized Bari and all the coaſt of the Adriatic [g]. Mean while the Greek emperor, who had entered into a league with Frederic Barbaroſſa againſt William, ſeized Brindiſi, and ſent a fleet to Ancona with a large ſum of money for the pope, offering to expel the king entirely from Sicily, on cone dition of being put in poſſeſſion of three maritime cities in Puglia [h]. The Sicilians, on this account, believing the king dead, took arms in ſeveral parts of the iſland. Though the king ſent an ambaſſador to them, they refuſed to deſiſt from their enterprize, but declared that they had only taken arms againſt the admiral and archbiſhop, who they aſſured him conſpired againſt his life. Frederic,

Frederic, the conferences were broke off, and nothing concluded. The king, being disappointed in his hopes of a peaceable accommodation, attacked Brindisi with great vigour, which at length, in the month of May, he made himself master of, taking a great many Greeks and rebellious barons prisoners. Having likewise enriched himself by the booty and large sums of money which the Greeks had brought thither, he marched to Bari, which, after allowing the inhabitants to retire with their effects, he entirely destroyed, because they had demolished the castle. Thus this once flourishing city, by this misfortune, was reduced to a few villages, in which condition it continued for a long time after [i]. The king then went to Benevento, whither the greatest part of the rebels had repaired to the defence of the pope, who, soon finding himself closely pressed by the besiegers, thought proper, according to William of Tyre, to agree to a peace, without the least regard from the barons, whom he had involved in the rebellion [k]; though, according to Romuald the Salernitan, and the author of the Chronicon of Cassino, the pope prevailed on the king to allow them to depart the kingdom. By this peace the king was absolved from the sentence of excommunication, and obtained the investiture of the kingdom of Sicily, of the duchy of Puglia, and of the principality of Capua, with all their dependencies, by three different standards. The pope likwise granted him Naples, Salerno, and Amalfi, with their dependencies, and Albo la Marcha, on condition of paying for his last territory 500 syfati yearly, besides the 600 for Apulia. At the same time many articles were settled and agreed to concerning ecclesiastical polity. All the clergy on the continent, subject to the king, were allowed to appeal to the see of Rome, which might also send legates thither, who nevertheless should not be allowed to pillage the churches. Visitations and consecrations, and translations from one church to another, were also admitted, and in Sicily the church of Rome was allowed the same privileges as in the other part of the king's dominions, excepting as to appeals, and the right of sending legates [l]. After the conclusion of this peace, the king appointed Simon, the admiral's brother-in-law, governor of Puglia, and returned to Palermo with a great many prisoners, among whom was Robert, prince of Capua, who was betrayed by his vassal Richard, count of Fondi, and taken in his passage over the Garigliano, with his daughter and one of his sons, the other son having fled to Constantinople. Robert, upon his arrival at Palermo, had his eyes put out, and soon after died in that city, being the last of the descendants of the counts of Aversa, who held the principality of Capua, which was then united to the kingdom of Puglia [m]. William, having now no enemy but the Greek emperor, fitted out a powerful fleet, the command of which the high admiral gave to his brother Stephen, who engaging the Greeks on the coast of the Peloponnese, gained a most complete victory, and afterwards plundered several maritime cities belonging to the Greeks. Emanuel, struck by these losses, at last agreed to a peace, which was concluded for 30 years; and the Greek prisoners being restored, he consented to acknowlege William as king [n].

A. D. 1157. MAJONE in the mean time continued to govern with his usual insolence; and, having formed a design upon the crown, he endeavoured to represent the king as a lunatic. He first advised him to publish cruel and tyrannical orders, and then by his own authority stopped the execution of them. He conferred the highest employments upon his own relations, flattered the clergy with hopes of preferment, was bountiful to the indigent, and very kind to the foreign adventurers who served in the troops; so that his authority was already much more regarded than that of the king [o]. A few years after he allowed the Sicilian settlement on the coast of Africa to be taken by the Moors, by wilfully neglecting to assist the garrison; at the same time publishing, that the enemy had made themselves masters of the city by the king's connivance. His perfidy, however, which had long been the subject of popular discontent, was plainly discovered upon the arrival of the African garrison in Sicily. Other reports that prevailed at last excited the people openly to revolt. It was universally believed that Majone offered his assistance to Alexander, the successor of Adrian IV. against the antipope Victor, and endeavoured to corrupt him by a large sum of money, that he might transfer the crown from William to him, after the example of pope Zachary, who had conferred the crown of France on Pepin. As it was also known that he had corrupted the queen, and it was reported that he had already provided the ensigns of royalty, the city of Melfi, and many others of Puglia, immediately entered into an association not to receive any orders or officers that should come from the court, until he should be either put to death, or banished. A large body of armed men went through all Puglia, obliging almost all the cities to enter into this association.

MAJONE

a MAJONE endeavoured to pacify them by honourable embaſſies; but his firſt ambaſſador, the biſhop of Mazzara, encouraged them in their deſign, by giving them a fuller account of his villainy; and his ſecond ambaſſador, Matthew Bonello, a young nobleman, whom the admiral deſigned for his ſon-in-law, was perſuaded by the chiefs of the aſſociation to undertake his murder, in hopes of marrying the widow of the count of Moliſe, a natural daughter of the late king, which match the admiral had hitherto oppoſed. Bonello, upon his return to Sicily, was encouraged in his deſign by the archbiſhop of Palermo, who was then lying on his death-bed, having been poiſoned by the admiral, in conſequence of a diſpute betwixt them about the government of the king's children after his murder. Accordingly, Is murdered by Bonello; having aſſembled ſome armed mén, he attacked the admiral at night, upon his return from b the archbiſhop's palace, and murdered him with his own hand, after which he fled with his followers, and fortified himſelf in one of his caſtles. The king at firſt expreſſed great re-ſentment for the murder of his favourite: but finding, among Majone's treaſure, the ſceptre, the crown, and the other enſigns of royalty, he was at laſt convinced of his treaſon, puniſhed ſeveral of his accomplices, and recalled Bonello to court, who was welcomed at Palermo by the acclamations of the people.

THE king, however, a few months after, by the perſuaſion of ſeveral eunuchs and creatures of the late admiral, began to conceive a diſguſt againſt Bonello, who, he was made believe, aimed at the crown himſelf, and had murdered Majone on account of his fidelity to him.

made themſelves maſters of the palace, ſeized William without oppoſition, and proclaimed young Roger king. The Palermitans in general at firſt approved of the king's impriſon-ment; but, not ſeeing their favourite Bonello appear, they ſoon began to murmur againſt the conſpirators, and on the third day attacked the palace with ſuch fury, that the barons were obliged to ſet the king at liberty, and fly to the caſtle of Bonello. During the tumult, ſlight manner, but died ſoon after, being kicked in the breaſt, as it was ſaid, by his father, who was enraged that he had been preferred to him. William, having granted ſome immunities to the inhabitants of Palermo, as a reward for their fidelity, marched againſt the con-ſpirators, many of whom, at the interceſſion of Bonello, who profeſſed an ignorance of the plot, were pardoned, and others of them allowed to go into voluntary baniſhment. A new the towns that favoured them to purchaſe their pardon, by paying large contributions. He would not enter the city, but having exacted a large contribution from them, he ſailed for

A few months before his death, pope Alexander arriving from France at Meſſina, he ordered five of his gallies to conduct him and his retinue to Rome; and when he was on his death-bed, John of Saliſbury informs us, that he ſent him a preſent of 40,000 l. ſterling, to aſſiſt him in oppoſing the faction of the antipope [r]. At the ſame time, according to Falcand, he appointed his eldeſt ſon William as heir of his kingdom, declared his queen bailly or regent during his minority, and ordered his youngeſt ſon Henry to be content with the principality of Capua (W). On account of his indolence, avarice, and cruelty, he got the ſurname of Wicked from his ſubjects, his whole reign having been one continued courſe of tyranny and oppreſſion. He was of a noble and graceful aſpect, tall and corpulent, and very kind to his favourites. He was naturally inſolent, and very fond of vain applauſe. However, he ſhewed great reverence for the clergy, was very devout, and regularly attended divine ſervice [s]. a b

Dies at Palermo. A. D. 1166.

THE queen concealed the death of her huſband a few days, being apprehenſive of a popular commotion in Palermo: but many of the Sicilian barons, whom ſhe had ſent for, arriving at the palace, ſhe then publiſhed his death, which was ſolemnly lamented by the citizens for three days, during which time the women, noble matrons, and Saracens, went clad in ſack-cloth, howling through the ſtreets, to the tolling of the bells. This public mourning being concluded, William, then about twelve years of age, was conducted thro' the city on horſeback, and ſolemnly crowned in the cathedral church, by Romuald, archbiſhop of Salerno. The queen, to reconcile the people to her adminiſtration, immediately ordered all priſoners to be ſet at liberty, recalled the exiles, whom ſhe reſtored to their former eſtates, made ſeveral donations of lands to the churches, counts, barons, and knights, and entirely remitted the impoſition, which, under the title of redemption, had been laid upon the cities of Puglia by the late king. Though by theſe means the king's dominions, during the firſt years of his reign, remained in a ſtate of tranquility, yet great factions and quarrels diſturbed the court, which were chiefly occaſioned by the intrigues of cardinal John of Naples, the pope's legate in Puglia, who viſited Sicily ſo often, that one of the courtiers ſaid to him by way of reproof, that he imagined it was only twenty miles betwixt Palermo and Rome [t]. c d

William II. ſucceeds to the throne.

He aſſiſts the pope againſt the emperor. A. D. 1167.

WILLIAM, in the ſecond year of his reign, hearing that the pope was beſieged by the emperor Frederic in Rome, ſent two gallies thither with a large ſum of money to his aſſiſtance. Alexander received the money with great thankfulneſs, but deſiring ſtill to continue in Rome, ſent back the gallies. A few years after he received an embaſſy from the emperor Emanuel, to treat of a marriage betwixt him and his daughter Zura Maria. The alliance was accordingly concluded, and ratified both by the emperor and the king; and the time being fixed for conducting the young princeſs by ſea to Puglia, king William went to Tarento with his brother the prince Henry. The emperor, however, ſlighting his oath and promiſe, neglected to ſend the bride; ſo that the king, after continuing ſome time at Tarento, ſent his brother, who was taken ill, to Sicily, and went himſelf to Capua, and not long after ſailed to Palermo. Before his arrival in Sicily, his brother prince Henry died, in the thirteenth year of his age, and was interred in the ſepulchre of his grandfather Roger, from whence the body was tranſported ſome time after to the church of Monreale, built and endowed by William near Palermo [u] (X). e

THE king, about the ſame time, fitted out a formidable fleet, and ſent it under the command of Walter di Moac to Alexandria, to aſſiſt the Chriſtians againſt the Saladin of Egypt [w]. Soon after, the emperor Frederic, who was ſtill engaged in a ruinous war in Lombardy, and refuſed to acknowlege pope Alexander, offered his daughter in marriage to William, and propoſed to conclude a perpetual peace and alliance with him, in hopes by his aſſiſtance to humble the pope, and oblige the aſſociated cities to ſubmit to his deſpotic government. William, from his regard to the pope, and the good of the church, rejected this alliance; and ſoon after, by the advice of Alexander, ſent an embaſſy to Henry II. of England, to demand his f

The emperor Frederic in the mean time being highly offended that the king had rejected his offered alliance, ordered his chancellor, Christian, archbishop of Mentz, to march with the army he commanded in the neighbourhood of Ancona, and invade the kingdom of Naples. The chancellor's attempts, however, to invade the king's territories, were ineffectual; for being opposed by the Puglians, under the command of Tancred count of Lecce, Roger count of Andria, and many other barons, he was obliged to retire, after he had advanced as far as the village of Celle. Frederic, about the same time, being entirely defeated by the confederate army of the Lombards at Lignano, began seriously to think of an accommodation with the pope, who agreeing to a congress at Bologna, desired king William to send his deputies thither, as he was resolved not to agree to a peace unless he was likewise included. The king accordingly appointed the historian Romuald, archbishop of Salerno, and Roger, count of Andria, as his ambassadors, who, together with the pope and his retinue, embarked on board eleven gallies at Vesti, and arrived about the eighteenth of March, at Venice, whither the congress was transferred, at the desire of the emperor. The negociations continued for several months; at length, in the month of August, Frederic concluded a perpetual peace with the church, a truce for six years with the associated cities of Lombardy, and a peace for fifteen years with king William, who solemnly ratified the treaty in the beginning of the following year [y]. Concludes a peace with the emperor; A. D. 1177.

The remaining transactions of William's reign are buried in great obscurity. About three years after we find, by the chronicon of Monte Cassino, that he concluded a peace for ten years with the king of Morocco [z]. And about four years after, that he sent count Tancred with a great fleet and army to invade Greece, in resentment for the barbarities which the usurper Andronicus had committed against the Latins at Constantinople. The Sicilians took and pillaged Durazzo, Salonchi, and many other places, where they exercised great cruelty against the Greeks; and, in contempt of their religion, plundered and polluted their churches, which from that time raised an irreconcileable enmity betwixt the two people. The Constantinopolitans, enraged at their losses and disgrace, turned their resentment against Andronicus, whom they put to a most cruel death; and Isaacius Angelus seizing the empire, a powerful army immediately assembled under him, defeated the Sicilians, and retaliated the injuries they had suffered from them [a].

The king about the same time received an embassy from the emperor Frederic, who demanded his aunt Constantia for his eldest son, Henry king of the Romans. As William, tho' he had been nine years married, had yet no issue, and Constantia was the apparent heir of the crown, the match was opposed by many people in Sicily; but the king being at last persuaded by the archbishop of Palermo, gave his consent; and having obliged all the counts of the kingdom to swear, that, if he should die without heirs, they would continue faithful subjects to her and her husband, he sent her, accompanied with a great train of counts and barons, to Rieti. The emperor's ambassadors conducting her from thence to Milan, the marriage, which afterwards proved very fatal to Sicily, was celebrated the following January, in the gardens of St. Ambrose, with great splendor and magnificence (Y). William survived this marriage not quite four years, but died, without issue, at Palermo, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, and the twenty-fourth of his reign [b]. As he had a great regard for the laws and justice, and governed with great moderation, he was surnamed William the Good. Richard of S. Germano begins his chronicle with his elogium. According to him, William was endowed with all royal virtues, was the delight of his people, and the protector of strangers, the poor, and oppressed. During his reign there was peace and security through all and gives his aunt Constantia in marriage to his son Henry. A. D. 1185. His death. A. D. 1189.

(Y) Some latter historians have related that Constantia was a nun, at this time upwards of fifty years of age, and that the pope granted a dispensation of her vows: but these fabulous stories deserve no credit, as they are contradictory to the accounts of cotemporary historians. Geoffry of Viterbo, an eye-witness, says, she was born after the death of her father Roger, and consequently she was, when married, only in the thirty-second year of her age (1). Falcand and Richard of S. Germane say, that she was brought up in the royal palace, and not in a monastery (2). Arnold of Lubeck, who gives a particular account of the marriage, makes no mention of her having been a nun. Romuald, William Neubrigensis, the appendix to the abbot of Usperg, and pope Innocent, in his letters, are quite silent as to that fact; and so far were the popes from granting a dispensation, that they condemned the match, and afterwards gave the investiture to Tancred (3).

THE death of king William was followed by a most calamitous civil war. Many of the chief nobles who were allied to the blood royal aspired to the crown: but the two principal factions were those of the chancellor and the archbishop of Palermo. The archbishop and his party declared for Constantia, whose marriage with Henry he had promoted from his resentment to the chancellor, who had been a means of exempting the new church of Monreale from his jurisdiction. The chancellor, knowing the aversion of the Sicilians to the dominion of the Germans, and the great popularity of Tancred count of Lecce, bastard son of duke Roger, king Roger's eldest son, declared him king; and sending for him to Palermo, crowned him with his own hands, in the month of January, having obtained the approba- b tion of Clement III. who thinking it for the interest of the holy see that Sicily should not be united to the empire, very readily granted the investiture of the kingdom to the count [d]. Tancred immediately was almost universally acknowleged in Sicily, and reduced five chiefs of the Saracens, who, during the interregnum, had raised an insurrection in Palermo, from whence, however, they had been expelled by the Christians. Mean while Roger, count of Andria, who during the reign of the late king had been high justiciary and governor of Puglia, highly disgusted that Tancred was preferred to him, refused to acknowlege him as king, and writing to Henry to come into Italy, assembled an army in order to support the pretensions of Constantia. Henry immediately sent the marshal of the empire, with a consi- c derable body of forces, to Italy; but before their arrival, Tancred, by means of Richard count of Cerra, whose sister he had married, reduced all Puglia and Terra di Lavoro, and obliged the abbot of Monte Cassino to take an oath of allegiance. Richard, having received large sums of money from Tancred, and having got possession of the magazines in Puglia, raised a large army, and made an attempt upon Capua and Aversa: but the German army joining the count of Andria, he was obliged to retire, and stand on the defensive. He was, in his turn, besieged in the city of Ariano; but the excessive heats, and scarcity of provisions, occasioning a great sickness among the Germans, the marshal, to prevent the total ruin of his army, raised the siege, and returned to Germany. Roger, count of Andria, still continued the war; and having fortified the castle of St. Agatha, retired to Ascoli, in hopes of a new reinforcement from Henry. He was, however, soon after murdered by Richard, d who had prevailed upon him to come out of the city to a conference. After his death Richard again marched against Capua, which imprudently surrendered, when Henry, who by the death of his father in Asia was now emperor, had entered Italy with a powerful army.

DURING these transactions on the continent, Tancred received with great hospitality the kings of England and France, who had arrived with two formidable fleets at Messina, in their way to the Holy Land. Tancred, at the intercession of Richard of England, was reconciled to his sister, the widow of the late king William, and afterwards concluded a treaty for a marriage betwixt the king of England's nephew and one of his daughters, giving Richard at that time 20,000 ounces of gold as his daughter's portion; which money the English king promised to restore, if the marriage should never take effect [f]. A few months after, Tancred e passed over into Puglia, and having called a parliament of his barons at Thermula, went from thence to Abruzzo. Having defeated count Rainald, and reduced that province, he marched from thence to Brindisi, where he celebrated a marriage betwixt his eldest son Roger, and Irene, sometimes called Urania, daughter of the emperor of Constantinople. After the celebration of the marriage he caused his son Roger to be crowned king of Silicy, and then returned in a triumphant manner to Palermo.

THE emperor Henry in the mean time arriving at Rome, received the imperial crown from Celestine III. in the month of April, and then marched with his army towards Puglia. Having taken the strong castle of Acre by storm, he struck such a terror into the whole province, that, as he advanced all the cities submitted to him till he arrived at Naples, whither Richard f count of Cerra had retired with his army. As the city was strongly fortified, and open to the sea, it baffled all the emperor's attempts; who being seized with an epidemical sickness, which had carried off great part of his army, was at last obliged to raise the siege, which had continued near four months. At his departure he left the empress Constantia in Salerno; and placing garrisons in Capua, Acre, and Sorella, and taking the abbot of Cassino, and several citizens of S. Germano, as hostages, he returned to Germany. Henry was no sooner gone than the count of Cerra again took the field, reduced Capua, Atino, Aversa, Teano, and S. Germano. But he could not prevail with the dean of Monte Cassino to declare for Tancred, though he was excommunicated by the pope, and the monastery laid under an interdict. The dean, instead of acknowleging Tancred, exerted himself with great spirit in behalf of g a the emperor. Having concerted measures with Diepold, the governor of the castle of Arce, in January he retook the city of S. Germano, and all the other places belonging to his monastery. He likewise attacked many other cities, with various success; while the officers of Tancred in their turn invaded those places that held for the emperor. Tancred, in the mean time, at the intreaty of the pope, sent back the empress Constantia to her husband; and as count Berthold had arrived in Puglia with a strong reinforcement of Germans and Florentines, to support the imperial party, the following year he himself went over thither to stop their progress. He quickly assembled a powerful army, but was dissuaded by his officers from venturing an engagement with Berthold; who, though inferior to him in number, had marched towards him in hopes of a general battle. Berthold was obliged to retire to the b county of Molise, for want of provisions, where he was killed by a stone thrown from a castle. Tancred, in the mean time, took the castles of St. Agatha, Caserta, and Forsa, and soon after went over to Sicily, where he died in the end of this year, or, according to some authors, in the beginning of the following. His death is attributed to grief for the loss of his eldest son Roger, whom he survived only a few weeks, leaving the kingdom to his youngest son William, then a minor [g]. Tancred dies. A. D. 1193.

THE emperor Henry hearing of the death of Tancred and Roger, immediately made great preparations for an expedition to Sicily. About the month of June he arrived with a great army at Genoa; and having wheedled the Genoese and Pisans by large promises to fit out a fleet of upwards of an hundred sail, he proceeded to Campania, where he arrived about the c end of August, and was received by the abbot of S. Germano and many Puglian barons. The Genoese and Pisan fleets in the mean time took possession of Gaeta and Naples, upon a capitulation. He himself, after visiting Monte Cassino, and reducing almost all the cities of Puglia, proceeded to Salerno, which he took by storm. In resentment for the captivity of the empress, he allowed his army to pillage the city, ordered the walls to be destroyed, executed a great many of the inhabitants, and banished others. Having left this noble city almost wholly desolate, he then marched thro' Calabria, and passing the Faro, landed at Messina. The submission of the Puglians, and the formidable appearance of his fleet, struck a terror into the Sicilians, so that without any difficulty Henry made himself master of the whole island. As the queen Sibilla had retired with her children into an impregnable castle, the emperor, d not willing to lose time in a siege that perhaps would prove fruitless, prevailed upon her to submit voluntarily, by promising her, with the most solemn oaths, the county of Lecce for herself, and the principality of Tarento for her son. The emperor returns to Puglia. A. D. 1194.

HENRY having thus entirely reduced the kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, and got his competitor into his power, in order to establish his authority, most imprudently had recourse to perfidy, cruelty, and rigour. A few days after the submission of king William, having convened on Christmas-day a general assembly in the royal palace at Palermo, he pretended to have discovered a conspiracy formed against him by Sibilla and the friends of the late king Tancred. On this pretence he immediately imprisoned the queen, her son, and two daughters; and also the archbishop of Salerno, the bishops of Trani and Ostuni, with many other
e prelates and barons. He caused many of them to be hanged, some to be burned, and the eyes of others to be put out. The unfortunate William was castrated, and his brother and two sisters carried prisoners to Germany, with many of the nobles of the kingdom, whose estates Henry conferred upon those of his own party. Having likewise stript the royal palace of all its treasure and rich furniture, he set out on his return to Germany, leaving the exhausted and ruined kingdom to the administration of Constantia, who had come that year into Italy; and in her journey through the march of Ancona was delivered of a son, named Frederic Roger [h]. Having conquered Sicily he treats his new subjects with great cruelty. A. D. 1195. He returns to Germany. A. D. 1196.

HENRY, to establish his authority in Italy without any regard to the pope, created his brother Philip, who had married Irene, the widow of the late king Roger, duke of Tus-
f cany; and of the estates of Mathilda. He conferred the title of duke of Ravenna and marquis of Ancona on Marcoaldus, one of his generals, created Conrad, surnamed Musca in Cervello, duke of Spoleto, and left Diepold governor of Puglia. He however, neglected to fulfil his engagements to the Genoese, and paying no regard to their deputation to him at Pavia, in the beginning of the following year left Italy [i]. Upon his arrival in Germany he sent the bishop of Worms, as his lieutenant, to Italy, who ordered the walls of Naples and Capua to be entirely destroyed [k].

As the emperor found himself universally condemned for his behaviour to Richard Cœur de Lion king of England, whom he had unjustly detained in his return from the Holy Land, and as a great ſpirit appeared at this time in Germany, of undertaking a new cruſade, he likewiſe aſſumed the croſs, in hopes thereby of recovering his reputation. However, according to Arnold of Lubec, he had another deſign in view, and intended by means of the cruſards to extirpate the Normans entirely from Puglia and Sicily. Accordingly, one diviſion of the cruſards parting for the Holy Land, by the way of Hungary, and another taking ſhipping at Hamburg and Frieſland, Henry, in the beginning of November, marched into Italy, at the head of a third army, conſiſting of about 60,000 men. Upon his arrival at Capua he called a general aſſembly of the barons, and condemned Richard count of Cerra, who ſome time before had been made priſoner by Diepold. Richard after being tied to a horſe's tail, and dragged through the ſtreets of Capua, was hung up by the feet, and after he had been two days in torment, was at laſt put to death by means of a heavy ſtone hung to his neck by the emperor's buffoon [l]. Henry then creatod Diepold count of Cerra, ſent his brother Otho to beſige Roca Secca, where ſome Norman barons had fortified themſelves, and having laid a tax upon all the kingdom, in the beginning of January tranſported his army into Sicily. a b

He paſſes again into Sicily;

A. D. 1197. He immediately ſent an ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, ordering the emperor Alexius Angelus to reſtore all the coaſts of Greece, from Epidaurus to Salonichi, which had been conquered by king William, or to pay for thoſe territories a tribute of ſixteen talents of pure gold [m]. In the mean time he exerciſed all manner of cruelties againſt the Sicilian nobles. He ordered crowns to be nailed to the heads of thoſe nobles who had conferred the crown on Tancred, not ſparing even their children, who were put to death by various tortures; and upon a ſuſpicion of treaſon he caſtrated the high admiral Margaritone, and cauſed his eyes to be put out, though he had formerly for his ſervices created him duke of Durazzo, and prince of Tarento. Conſtantia, affected by the barbarity exerciſed by her huſband againſt her countrymen, was prevailed upon to enter into a conſpiracy againſt him; and while he was beſieging a caſtle, ſhe went to Palermo ſeized the treaſure, and openly declared againſt him; which encouraging the Sicilians, they ſurpriſed a great many Germans, and put them to death. The emperor immediately fled to a ſtrong caſtle; but being ſurrounded by the Sicilians, he ſubmitted to the terms of a capitulation preſcribed by the empreſs, and recovered his liberty, on condition of immediately ſending off his army to the Holy Land. The army accordingly embarked, and ſailed from Sicily on the firſt of September, under the command of Conrad biſhop of Hildeſheim, chancellor of the empire. Henry, who remained behind, fell ſick and died on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, according to ſome authors of poiſon, which was given him by the empreſs [n], though ſome attribute his death to his exceſſive exerciſe of hunting [o]. c where he is beſieged by Conſtantia. d His death.

As Henry died excommunicated, on account of the money he had extorted from the king of England, Conſtantia ſent the archbiſhop of Meſſina to Rome, to beg of the pope liberty to bury his body in holy ground; and, at the ſame time, demanded from Celeſtine the uſual inveſtiture for her infant ſon Frederic. The pope upon receiving a thouſand marks of ſilver for himſelf, and as much for the cardinals, granted the inveſtiture to Frederic, after Conſtantia had ſworn that he was her lawful ſon by her late huſband Henry; but he refuſed to allow the emperor's corpſe to be interred in holy ground, till all matters ſhould be accommodated with the king of England. The difference being at laſt adjuſted with king Richard, the corpſe was buried; and a few weeks after, Celeſtine was ſucceeded in the pontifical chair by Innocent III. e

A. D. 1198. Mean while Conſtantia ordered Marcoaldus, and all the Germans, to quit her dominions. As he was greatly deteſted on account of his cruelty and rapaciouſneſs, ſhe granted him a ſafe-conduct, and deſired two cardinals that were in Puglia, and the count of Celano, to protect him from the enraged natives. Marcoaldus having left Caſtellano and Bailies, in the county of Moliſe, which he had obtained from the emperor, on the death of Muſca in Cervello, proceeded from thence to the march of Ancona, where he was immediately excommunicated by pope Innocent, who being a man of great abilities, and in the vigour of life, reſolved to begin his pontificate with the recovery of the territories of Mathilda, which had been uſurped by the three late emperors, and given as fiefs to their friends. Philip, the late emperor's brother, who poſſeſſed great part of Tuſcany, and Conrad, who had been created duke of Spoleto, were likewiſe excommunicated. Theſe two immediately reſigned all the territories claimed by the church; Conrad from a principle of religion, but Philip, from policy, that he might procure the favour of the pope in his conteſt for the imperial crown againſt Otho of Brunſwick. Marcoaldus, however, finding that the inhabitants of Romaniola and the march of Ancona had an averſion to the Roman government, deſpiſed f

CONSTANTIA, in the mean time, ſent for her infant ſon Frederic from Ancona to Sicily, and earneſtly ſolicited the pope to grant him the inveſtiture. Innocent, who was wholly bent on enlarging the papal authority, both in ſpirituals and temporals, abſolutely refuſed to grant her demand, unleſs the four articles formerly ſtipulated with king William I. concerning the right of elections, legations, appeals, and councils were annulled. Conſtantia being perſuaded to agree to his demands, at length obtained the inveſtiture; but dying a few weeks after, on the 27th of November, moſt imprudently by her laſt will left the care and guardianſhip of her ſon and kingdom to Innocent, which deed gave an opportu- Her death.

INNOCENT gladly accepted of the guardianſhip, and immediately began to exerciſe it by ſending a cardinal legate to Sicily, to take the government of the kingdom, and to adminiſter the oath of fidelity to the prelates and barons in the name of the pope, as governor and guardian. The chancellor of Sicily, however, with a great party, refuſed to take the oath preſcribed by the legate, who, finding his authority oppoſed, ſoon after returned to Rome [q]. A great party in Puglia likewiſe diſreliſhed the adminiſtration of the pope, and invited Marcoaldus to aſſume the government, who, being defeated in Romaniola by the Bo-
c logneſe and papal troops, marched with all his Germans to the county of Moliſe; and pretending that the emperor had left him as guardian of his ſon, and governor of the kingdom, began to attack thoſe that adhered to Innocent. Having, in the beginning of the A. D. 1199.
following year, burnt ſeveral caſtles belonging to the monaſtery of Caſſino, in order to prevail with the abbot to acknowlege him as governor, Innocent ſent two cardinals, with a conſiderable body of forces, to the defence of the monaſtery. Marcoaldus, however, being joined by Diepoldus, and other Germans, to whom Henry had given eſtates and baronies in Puglia and Sicily, took St. Germano, which he pillaged and burnt, exerciſing likewiſe great cruelty upon the miſerable inhabitants. He then beſieged the monaſtery of Caſſino, whither the two cardinals, and many of the principal inhabitants of St. Germano, had retired.
d But as his camp was much incommoded upon the hill by ſhowers of hail and ſnow, he agreed to raiſe the ſiege, upon receiving a conſiderable ſum of money from the abbot; and marching with his army againſt Avellino, obliged that city to purchaſe its ſecurity by the payment of a large contribution. Notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the pope, he continued for more than a year his hoſtilities againſt the nobles of the oppoſite faction, many of whom condeſcended to buy their peace by baſe ſubmiſſions. Richard count of Fondi particularly gave his daughter in marriage to Sigisfrid, the brother of Diepold, whoſe daughter was likewiſe married to William count of Caſerta. Innocent, in the mean time, excommunicated Marcoaldus and his adherents, ſent money to the counts of Puglia to raiſe ſoldiers againſt him, ordered all the prelates of the kingdom to curſe him and his followers every e Sunday and holy-day, and even propoſed to cauſe a cruſade to be publiſhed againſt him.

Pope Innocent acts as regent of the kingdom of Sicily.

Is oppoſed by Marcoaldus;

MARCOALDUS, being ſenſible that the ſpirit and activity of the pope was the greateſt interruption to his ambitious deſigns, endeavoured, by ſeveral embaſſies and great promiſes, to make him his friend. By means of Conrad archbiſhop of Mentz, who about this time arrived at Puglia from the Holy Land, he propoſed to the pope, that if he would only not oppoſe him in his intended conqueſt of Sicily, he would immediately give him 20,000 ounces of gold, and after he had eſtabliſhed himſelf in Palermo, he would pay him other 20,000 ounces, would ſwear allegiance to him as his ſovereign, would double the yearly tribute, and would allow the apoſtolic ſee greater prerogatives than it had ever yet enjoyed in Sicily [r]; adding, that the pope ought not to make any ſcruple to agree to his propoſal, be-
f cauſe he was guardian of the young Frederic, as he was ready to prove that boy a ſuppoſitious child, and not the ſon of the late emperor and empreſs. Innocent paying no regard to theſe propoſals, and not allowing the birth of the prince to be called in queſtion, becauſe his predeceſſor had declared himſelf ſatisfied with the oath of Conſtantia, Marcoaldus had recourſe to another expedient; and pretending a great deſire to be reſtored to the communion of the church, prevailed with the pope to ſend three cardinals to treat with him at Veroli. Though nothing was concluded at the conference, yet Marcoaldus, having treated the cardinals with great reſpect, upon their departure immediately publiſhed by letters through the kingdom, and in Germany, that he was reconciled to the pope, who had appointed him governor of the kingdom, and had ſent two cardinals to exhort the Pugli-

THIS impoſture, however, being ſoon diſcovered by the letters of Innocent, which gave a particular account of the tranſactions at Veroli, Marcoaldus reſolved not to waſte more time in Puglia, but to make an attempt upon the capital. Accordingly, having left Diepoldus with his two brothers Otho and Sigisfrid, Conrad of Sorella, Otho of Laviano, Frederic of Malento, and many other Germans, to ſupport his party in Puglia, he embarked with a conſiderable army, at Salerno for Sicily. The guardians and preceptors of the young prince immediately wrote to the pope for aſſiſtance, who ſent them 200 horſe under the command of James his couſin and marſhal, who was accompanied with a cardinal legate, and with the archbiſhops of Tarento and Naples. Theſe troops, in their march through Calabria, defeated Frederic of Malento; and afterwards paſſing the Faro, landed at Meſſina, while Diepoldus with his Germans made a ſecond incurſion into the territories of Caſſino, and ravaged ſeveral places in that neighbourhood.

and paſſes over into Sicily.

A. D. 1200.

DURING theſe tranſactions, Sabilla, the widow of the late king Tancred, arrived at Rome. After the death of the emperor Henry, ſhe eſcaped from her impriſonment to France, where her eldeſt daughter Albinia had married Walter count of Brenna, a French nobleman. As the young king William died in priſon, the count of Brenna demanded of the pope the principality of Tarento and county of Lecce, in right of his wife Albinia, according to the ſtipulation made with the emperor Henry. Innocent was greatly embarraſſed with this demand; being apprehenſive, that, if the count met with a refuſal, he would join the Germans; and dreading likewiſe, that, if he ſhould acquire any power and authority in Puglia, he would revenge the injuries his wife and her friends had ſuffered from Henry upon his ſon Frederic. At laſt he conſented to his requeſt; and having taken an oath from him in a public conſiſtory, that, on no pretence, he would do any prejudice to Frederic, or diſturb the kingdom, he wrote to the governors of the king in Sicily, informing them of what he had done. Walter, the chancellor of the kingdom, and biſhop of Troja, was greatly alarmed with the proceeding of the pope. As he and all his party had been the greateſt enemies of Tancred, he dreaded the reſentment of the count of Brenna; and therefore, aſſembling the people of Meſſina, he condemned the grant in a vehement diſcourſe, cenſuring the pope with great freedom, as uſurping a power which he had no right to. The count, however, having ſecured the favour of the pope, reſolved to proſecute his deſign; and for that purpoſe returned to France, to raiſe a body of troops.

Walter count of Brenna claims the principality of Tarento.

MARCOALDUS, in the mean time, having prevailed with the Saracens in Sicily to eſpouſe his cauſe, reduced a great many cities and caſtles, and at laſt inveſted Palermo. The papal army immediately marched to the relief of the place; and being joined by the loyal party, under the command of the chancellor, and ſeveral other biſhops, encamped before the city. Marcoaldus, upon their arrival, raiſed the ſiege; and to gain time till he ſhould be joined by ſome reinforcements, endeavoured to amuſe them by a negociation for peace, which the chancellor and the archbiſhops of Meſſina, Monreale, and Ceffalu, had even agreed to: but the majority of the army declaring with great warmth againſt an accommodation, the conferences were broke off, and four days after a battle enſued, in which Marcoaldus was entirely defeated with the loſs of his camp and all his baggage. As the victory was chiefly owing to the valour and conduct of the marſhal James, the governors of the young king conferred upon him the county of Andria. However, from a mean jealouſy, they ſoon after began to deny his ſoldiers common neceſſaries; ſo that, many of them falling ſick and dying, the marſhal was obliged, about the end of Auguſt, to return to Puglia[s], where, during his expedition in Sicily, Diepoldus had gained a victory over the count of Celano near Venafro[t].

Marcoaldus is intirely defeated in Sicily.

ABOUT the ſame time a new difference happened betwixt the pope and the chancellor, who, upon the death of the archbiſhop of Palermo, had got himſelf elected his ſucceſſor, and obtained the confirmation of the legate without the knowlege of the pope. Innocent reprimanded his legate very ſeverely, but at the ſame time offered to allow the chancellor to retain the archbiſhopric under the title of procurator, or miniſter. The chancellor rejected that favour with diſdain, and both ſpoke and wrote againſt the pope with great bitterneſs and malice, particularly with regard to his grant in favour of the count of Brenna. The count mean while had arrived at Rome with a ſmall body of Frenchmen, on which account his intended enterprize became the ſubject of public ridicule. The pope, however, writing to the counts, barons, and caſtellans of Puglia, in his favour, and giving him 500 ounces of gold to levy more troops, he boldly entered Terra di Lavora, and was received by the inhabitants of Teano, where he was joined by the abbot of Caſſino with a good number of men, and Richard archbiſhop of Capua. From thence he marched to Capua; and having reduced the citadel, on the 10th of June he engaged and intirely

a defeated Diepoldus. He then entered into an alliance with the count of Celano; and having assisted him in reducing the county of Molise, he marched without opposition to Puglia, where Melphis, Veroli, Monte Piloso, and several other cities, put themselves under his protection. He likewise, in the beginning of the following year, reduced the castle of Lecce; A. D. 1202. and also Matera, Otranto, Brindisi, and many other cities of the principality of Tarento.

His surprising progress greatly alarmed the chancellor, who, notwithstanding the mandates of the pope, had assumed a most despotic authority. He disposed, in a most absolute manner, of the whole revenues of the kingdom, raised a powerful faction to countenance all his proceedings, by conferring counties, baronies, the government of cities and castles, and other offices and dignities, upon his creatures; and sending for his brother Gen-
b tile, count of Manopello, appointed him one of the king's council, and is said to have designed to have raised him to the throne. As a means to check the progress of the count of Brenna, he, with his brother Gentile, concluded a peace and alliance with Marcoaldus, who was still excommunicated; and Gentile's son having married a niece of Marcoaldus, it was agreed betwixt them that the whole administration should be divided betwixt Marcoaldus and the chancellor; the one to govern in Sicily, and the other in Puglia. This convention, however, never took effect; for both parties suspecting each other's treachery, renewed their former enmity, and publickly reproached each other with their villainy. The chancellor, in the mean time, who had dissipated the revenues of Sicily, trusted the care of the king and palace to his brother; went over into Puglia, where he raised large sums by exc tortion and exactions, robbing the churches of all their wealth and plate, not sparing even the shrines and images. As he still continued to rail against the pope, and endeavoured to raise an association against the count of Brenna, Innocent at length, provoked by his proceedings, thundered a sentence of excommunication against him, and deposed him from both his churches, which he conferred on other prelates.

He is excommunicated by the pope.

In consequence of this anathema, the chancellor immediately lost all credit with the people, who treated him with contempt and insult; so that he was fain to join himself to Diepoldus, who still commanded an army to oppose the count of Brenna. Innocent soon after, having written a long letter to the young king, justifying his transactions with regard to the count of Brenna, sent a cardinal legate into Puglia, charging the counts and barons to d join him and the count against Diepoldus. The chancellor, hearing of the arrival of the legate, came to him, and begged to be restored to the communion of the church; but the legate insisting upon his agreeing not to oppose the count, he broke out into blasphemous expressions, and returned to Diepoldus, who soon after marched against the count, and surprised him in the neighbourhood of the famous Cannæ. Though the count was greatly inferior to him in numbers, yet he attacked him with such fury, that he gained a most complete victory, and took a great number of prisoners of note, among whom were the two brothers of Diepoldus, the chancellor's cousin, and the archbishop of Salerno.

GENTILE, in the mean time, who had been left governor of Sicily, again renewed his friendship with Marcoaldus and was persuaded by him to resign the whole administration to e him, and to retire to Messina. Marcoaldus immediately made his authority be acknowleged almost over the whole island, and endeavoured, by large offers to the pope and the count of Brenna, to persuade the count to renounce his claim. It was generally supposed that he would then have put the young king to death and usurped the kingdom, if it had not been for his apprehensions of the count, who looked upon him as heir apparent of the crown. All his schemes, however, were interrupted by death, which happened to him towards the end of the year.

Marcoaldus dies. A. D. 1203.

Upon the death of Marcoaldus, William Capparo, or Capparore, a German, immediately seized the palace and the king, and assumed the title of governor of Sicily, and guardian of the king. The greatest part, however, of the followers of Marcoaldus refused to obey
f him, and formed a party in opposition to him. The chancellor, thinking this a fit opportunity of recovering his former authority, made a new offer of implicit submission to the holy see; and obtaining absolution from Innocent, passed over into Sicily, declared against Capparo, reassumed the office of high chancellor, and wrote to the pope, pressing him to send a legate into the island to overawe the different factions. Innocent immediately sent his nephew cardinal Gerardo thither, who, upon his arrival, received the submission of Capparo, and granted him absolution. He could not, however, reconcile Capparo to the chancellor; and Capparo still retaining his power and authority, and neglecting to fulfil his promises, Gerardo
g left Palermo, and retired to Messina.

INNOCENT, in the mean time, sent his cousin the marshal to the assistance of the count of Brenna, appointing them both high justiciaries of Puglia and Terra de Lavore. Towards the end of the campaign, it being reported that the pope was dead at Anagni, whither the count and the marshal had gone to visit him, several cities, particularly Matera, Brindisi,

A. D. 1204. and Otranto, revolted from the count; ſome of them maſſacring, and others expelling, his garriſons. Innocent, however, ſoon after recovering from a ſevere illneſs, that had occaſioned the report of his death, they returned to Puglia, and reduced ſeveral caſtles; but were not able to recover the above-mentioned cities. The marſhal reduced Adria, and took the title of count of that city; and James count of Tricarico, and Roger count of Chieti, joining him and the count of Brenna with their forces, they ſo harraſſed the Germans, that they were obliged to deſert the field, and ſhut themſelves up in their forts. The count of Brenna, however, becoming too ſecure and confident from the great ſucceſs of his arms, was ſurpriſed the following ſummer [u] by Diepoldus, whom he was beſieging in Sarno. The Germans, being informed of the great ſecurity of the beſiegers, ſallied out upon them at break of day; and, having forced their camp, attacked the count, who, after defending himſelf for a long time, and receiving a great many wounds, was at laſt taken priſoner and carried into the city, where he died a few days after, leaving his wife Albinia big with child [w]. She was ſoon after delivered of a ſon, named Walter, and then married to the count of Tricarico. a b

Diepoldus is reconciled to the pope.

THE unfortunate death of the count of Brenna ſo animated the oppoſite faction, that Innocent was obliged to conclude a peace with Diepoldus. Upon his ſwearing ſolemnly to ſubmit to the mandates of the holy ſee in every thing for which he had been excommunicated, to acknowledge the pope as regent of the king and kingdom, and not to favour the pretenſions of Philip duke of Suabia to the prejudice of Frederic, he abſolved him and all his followers from the ſentence of excommunication, and the year following received him very graciouſly at Rome [x]. Diepoldus, after ſeveral conferences with the pope, who continued him in command, returned to Salerno, from whence, in the month of November, he ſailed over to Palermo. Soon after his arrival, he prevailed with Capparo to deliver the king to the chancellor and the legate, and to promiſe likewiſe to deliver the palace. Having conducted the young king to Palermo, he invited the chancellor and legate to an entertainment; but a rumour ariſing, that he intended to ſeize them, they ſurpriſed him and his ſon, and impriſoned them both. He ſoon after eſcaped from priſon, and returned to Salerno; from whence, going to Terra di Lavore, he aſſembled an army, and in the month of May gained a victory over the Neapolitans, and took their general, Goffredo di Monteſuſculo, priſoner [y]. Goffredro and the Neapolitans, according to a certain author [z], about two months before, had taken and intirely deſtroyed the city and caſtle of Cuma, which for ſome years had become a receptacle for pirates and German deſerters, who infeſted both ſea and land, and plundered all parties without diſtinction. Diepoldus had perhaps privately favoured the inhabitants of Cuma, or received an inſult from the Neapolitans; for the authors who mention his victory give no reaſon for the hoſtilities: however, from this time the church of Cuma, with all its revenues, and prerogatives, was annexed to the ſee of Naples [a]. c d

A. D. 1206.

CUMA, however, was not the only neſt of robbers; for Conrad di Morlei, who was in poſſeſſion of Sora, Sorella, Rocca d'Arce, and ſeveral other places near the Garigliano, ravaged all the country round with great barbarity, and made frequent incurſions into the Campania di Roma. The pope, having in vain admoniſhed him for a long time, at length ordered the cardinal legate of Campania to attack him. He, being aſſiſted by the pope's brother Richard, and Roffred abbot of Caſſino, whom the inhabitants of Sora had privately admitted into their city, in the beginning of January took Sora, Blanello, a fort that overlooks the city, and Sorella, whither Conrad had retired. An accommodation was then agreed to, whereby Conrad, upon receiving a thouſand ounces of gold and twenty horſes, promiſed to deliver up Rocca d'Arce, with all the places he poſſeſſed upon the confines of the kingdom. This ſervice was ſo agreeable to the king, that he immediately granted the inveſtiture of all theſe places to the pope's brother Richard and his heirs, with the title of count of Sora [b]. é

The pope's brother is created count of Sora.

GREAT diſturbances, in the mean time, happened in Sicily. The chancellor continued at open enmity with Capparo, who ſtill remained in poſſeſſion of the palace, and had again got the king in his power. The Saracens in the mountains, encouraged by theſe diſſenſions, openly renounced their allegiance to the king, and began hoſtilities againſt the Chriſtians. To put a ſtop to theſe diſorders, Innocent, a few weeks after the accommodation with Conrad di Marlei, went, attended with a great many cardinals and prelates, to Palermo [c]. After ſome conferences with the king, to whom he propoſed an alliance with Conſtantia, the ſiſter of the king of Arragon, he left Sicily, and on the 23d of June arrived at St. Germano, where he aſſembled the counts and barons of Puglia, with the deputies of the cities, and prevailed with them to enter into an aſſociation for the defence of the king, to furniſh him with 200 f a horſe at their own charge, and to refer all their private quarrels to the determination of the two chief juſticiaries; namely, the count of Celano and the count of Fondi [d].

INNOCENT after this ſeems not to have intermeddled in an authoritative manner in the adminiſtration of the kingdom; Frederic, though only thirteen years of age, being declared major, as a moſt probable means of putting an end to thoſe factions, which had involved the nation in ſo many calamities for ten years [e]. The pope, however, ſtill continued his negotiations for the marriage of the king with Conſtantia, which was at laſt concluded, and celebrated the following ſpring at Palermo with great pomp and magnificence [f]. Mean while the two juſticiaries in Puglia, by their mutual animoſities, ſtill kept alive the diſturbances in that province. A few months after the convention held at St. Germano, the count

b of Fondi, by the aſſiſtance of Diepoldus, had expelled the count of Celano from Capua, being even aſſiſted by the Capuans, who had an averſion to his government on account of their hatred to his ſon, who was their archbiſhop. The count of Celano, however, a few months after, by means of the archbiſhop his ſon, recovered the city of Capua, obliged the count of Fondi to retire, and entered into a good correſpondence with Diepoldus, who was then governor of Salerno.

A. D. 1209.

DURING theſe diſturbances, Otho IV. who, by the death of his competitor Philip of Suabia, had ſucceeded to the German empire, entered Italy with a powerful army, and received the imperial crown from the pope in the church of St. Peter on the 2d of October. As Innocent had been his conſtant friend during his ten years ſtruggle for the empire, Otho

c made very large promiſes to him in behalf of the Roman ſee; but after his coronation, whether from ambition, or perceiving his engagements to the empire and the holy ſee were inconſiſtent, he declared his intention of maintaining the imperial rights in Italy; and marching from Rome, immediately ſeized ſeveral cities in Tuſcany belonging to the eſtates of Mathilda [g]. He likewiſe laid claim to Puglia, in conſequence probably of the conqueſt of the emperor Lotharius; for the pretenſions of the German emperors to this province could not be founded on the conqueſt of Charlemagne, who we have ſeen never was able to reduce the duchy of Benevento. Otho was invited to invade Puglia by the count of Celano and Diepoldus, who, in the end of the following year conducted him to Capua, when, according to Richard of St. Germano, he created Diepoldus duke of Spoleto. All the country, from d Sora to Capua, immediately ſubmitted to him except Aquino. Almoſt all the cities of Puglia likewiſe ſurrendered to him without oppoſition. The Neapolitans, from their hatred to the Averſans, opened their gates to him, and preſſed him to beſiege Averſa, which city, however, contrary to their expectation, ſurrendered upon a capitulation, and agreed to pay him a large ſum of money.

THE pope, who was greatly provoked with theſe proceedings of Otho, endeavoured by ſeveral embaſſies to perſuade him to deſiſt from his hoſtilities; but finding his remonſtrances had no effect, in the end of this year he denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt him and all his adherents, abſolved all his ſubjects from their allegiance to him, and wrote to the princes of Germany, exhorting them to elect another emperor. Otho, who was pere ſuaded that he was only aſſerting the juſt rights of the empire, paid no regard to this ſentence. Many of the princes of Germany, however, at the perſuaſion of the pope's legates and prelates, renounced their allegiance to the emperor; and on the 15th of December the king of Bohemia, the dukes of Auſtria, Bavaria, the landgrave of Thuringia, and the archbiſhops of Mentz and Triers, elected the young Frederic king of Sicily, who had been declared heir to the empire when an infant, even before the death of his father Henry VI. Frederic willingly accepted of the imperial dignity, contrary to the perſuaſions of Conſtantia and the Sicilian barons; and leaving his queen, and her infant ſon Henry, at Palermo, embarked for Gaeta, from whence he ſailed to Rome. After ſome conferences with the pope, he again embarked, and arrived at Genoa on the 1ſt of May; from whence he was eſcorted

f through Lombardy by the inhabitants of Padua, Cremona, and Mantua, who protected him againſt the Milaneſe, and other partizans of Otho. The revolt in Germany in favour of Frederic obliged Otho to leave Italy; but the wealth of the king of Sicily, and the excommunication of the pope, had ſuch an influence, that he ſoon found himſelf intirely abandoned. In the ſecond year of the war, almoſt all Germany acknowleged Frederic as emperor, who was accordingly crowned at Aix la Chapelle by the archbiſhop of Mentz, having, before his coronation, promiſed by an oath to allow the elections to churches to be made canonically; not to oppoſe appeals to the apoſtolic ſee; not to ſeize the effects of deceaſed prelates, nor the revenues of vacant churches; to defend and maintain the ſuperiority of the Roman ſee over both Sicilies, and the iſlands of Corſica and Sardinia; and to reſtore all the territories claim-

g ed by the popes in Italy [h]. Frederic, about two years afterwards, was again crowned at Aix

he took a vow of going to the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtians in the Holy Land; and, as a teſtimonths after he loſt his guardian and patron pope Innocent, who died the following year

FREDERIC, about the ſame time, ſent for his young ſon Henry to Germany, and ſoon after received a letter from Honorius III. the ſucceſſor of Innocent, who, during his minority, had been his tutor four years in Palermo. Honorius exhorted the emperor to continue in his

and to remove all grounds of jealouſy, offered, upon receiving the imperial crown at Rome, to declare his ſon Henry king of Sicily [l]. The year following, his rival Otho dying at Hartzburg, Frederic cauſed an aſſembly of all the princes and prelates of the empire to be convened in Mentz, to regulate the affairs of Germany, as he was determined, as ſoon as poſſible, to return to Italy to receive the imperial crown. While he was aſſembling his army for that purpoſe, he ſent for his queen Conſtantia to Germany, and ordered the count of St. Severino to ſeize and impriſon his father-in-law Diepoldus, who was endeavouring to raiſe diſturbances in Puglia.

AFTER Conſtantia had continued upwards of a year in Germany, Frederic ſet out on his ex- c pedition to Italy, and at St. Leo, in the duchy of Urbino, was met by the pope's legate, where he ſwore to preſerve the rights of the church, and to yield the kingdoms of Sicily and *Pu-the imperial crown from the hands of the pope, and renewed his vow of an expedition to the Holy Land, which he promiſed to undertake whenever his holineſs ſhould think proper.

After his coronation, Frederic ſent his chancellor, the archbiſhop of Spire, with full power to Lombardy, to prevail with Milan, and ſome other cities, which, from their averſion to the family of Barbaroſſa, had eſpouſed the cauſe of Otho, to acknowlege him as emperor. Many of theſe cities had long diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the diſputes betwixt the emperors and d popes, by their attachment to the latter; and though Frederic had hitherto ſhewn ſo much condeſcenſion to the pope, yet Honorius is accuſed at this time of privately preventing the emperor's orders from being received and executed by the Guelph faction, in order to depreſs, or at leaſt balance, his power.

THE emperor, however, not ſeeming to mind the pope's proceeding, left Rome, and went to St. Germano, where he was received with great honour and reſpect by the abbot of which he publiſhed ſeveral new regulations, which are contained in twenty chapters [n]. He particularly ordered all the forts and caſtles lately built by the barons to be demoliſhed; and by the advice of Andrea Bonello, a famous lawyer, and his attorney-general, he eſta- e bliſhed a new tribunal in Capua, called Corte Capuana. He commanded the barons, the corporations of the cities and towns, and all other perſons, to produce the grants and privileges of their caſtles, and other things which they held of him and his predeceſſors, to be inſpected by this court, whether they were valid, or had been illegally granted in time of troubles; declaring, that thoſe who did not produce their charters, ſhould forfeit their grants and privileges. In conſequence of this order, ſeveral grants, that had been ſurrep-titiouſly obtained, were revoked, and others were afterwards reckoned invalid, for not being produced in time, which occaſioned a general murmuring through the nation, and promptdiſmiſſing the parliament, went, in the beginning of the following year, to Seſſa, where a poſſeſſions, to be raiſed; which money, with forty-three gallies, he ſent under the command of Walter de Palear, the chancellor, and the count of Malta, to Dalmiata, which was then beſieged by the ſultan of Egypt. He himſelf, in the mean time, was engaged in reducing the Saracens in Sicily, on which account he excuſed himſelf from going in perſon to the Holy Land, though he was continually urged and ſollicited by the pope to fulfil his vow. Honorius, being greatly jealous of the emperor's power, was very deſirous that he ſhould leave Europe. He therefore inveighed bitterly againſt him for delaying his expedition, and, at the ſame time, accuſed him of oppreſſing the church, and violating the eccleſiaſtical liberty, by taxing the clergy, expelling prelates, and ſubſtituting others in their place. Frederic, in his own juſtification, alledged, that, from the time of Charlemagne, it had been b lawful for the emperors to give the inveſtiture of biſhoprics; that all princes might expel diſaffected prelates out of their dominions; and that, as king of Sicily, he had enjoyed the prerogative of giving inveſtitures to prelates, and of confirming their election by his aſſent, which right he was reſolved not to part with, though Innocent III. had violated it during his minority [o].

Differences betwixt him and the pope.

FREDERIC, however, to give ſome ſome ſatisfaction to the pope, who upon the news of the loſs of Damiata renewed his complaints againſt him, publiſhed ſome ſevere edicts againſt heretics, made a formal renunciation of the eſtates of Mathilda into the hands of the apoſtolic nuncio, and conferred the kingdom of Sicily upon his ſon Henry [p]. ſtanding theſe conceſſions, the miſunderſtanding betwixt him and the pope ſtill increaſed. As c he continued to raiſe the twentieth penny upon the eccleſiaſtics, and turned out ſeveral prelates in Sicily and Puglia, whoſe fidelity he ſuſpected, Honorius made loud complaints againſt him, and even threatened him with excommunication and depoſition. Frederic, to appeaſe the pope, impriſoned the count of Malta, and ſtripped him of all his lands and offices, the chancellor having fled to Venice, where, as there is no farther mention made of him, it is probable he died in exile. The king likewiſe, to prevent a rupture, left Sicily, and had a conference for fifteen days with the pope, who, in the month of February, had come to Veroli. He publiſhed an edict in that city in favour of the eccleſiaſtical liberty; and having obtained leave to put off his ſacred expedition ſome time longer, a general conference was appointed to be held, in the month of November, at Verona, to which all Chriſtian princes were d invited. Frederic then, taking leave of the pope, returned to Paglia; and having ordered the count of Acerra to beſiege the rock of Magenul, held by the count of Celano, he haſted over into Sicily to oppoſe Mirabet the Saracen prince, who ſtill continued his incurſions againſt the Chriſtians [q]. While Frederic was employed in defeating the infidels, his queen Conſtantia died in the city of Catania; and the count of Celano eſcaping from Magenul, ſurprized the imperial garriſon in Celano, and having over-run all the county of the Marſi, plundered Civita, and burned Paternum. The count of Acerra immediately beſieged Celano; but afterwards truſting the ſiege to the Neapolitans and Cajetans, he again inveſted Magenul which at length ſurrendered.

The queen Conſtantia dies in Sicily.

The emperor in the mean time, had intirely reduced the Saracens; and returning to e Puglia, propoſed another conference with the pope, which was prevented on account of the ſickneſs of his holineſs. A few months afterwards, however, the conference, which ſhould have been held at Verona, was transferred to Ferentino, where in the beginning of the following year, Frederic, at the ſolicitation of the pope, John de Brenna titular king of Jeruſalem, Hermannus Salza grand maſter of the Teutonic order, and ſeveral others, renewed his engagements of going to the Holy Land within two years. As a motive to intereſt him in that expedition, the pope negociated a marriage betwixt him and Jolanta, or Violanta, the only daughter of John de Brenna, who, in right of her mother, was heireſs of the crown of Jeruſalem (Z). The emperor, who had been ſome months a widower, willingly agreed to the match, upon condition that John de Brenna, as a portion for his daughter, ſhould immediately reſign his rights to the kingdom of Jeruſalem. As to the poſſeſſion of the kingdom, that was afterwards to be diſputed with the ſoltan, who, about thirty years before, had recovered the whole from the Chriſtians excepting a few places on the ſea-coaſt.

Upon the concluſion of the conference, the young bride was immediately ſent for from Ptolemais; and Frederic, returning to Puglia, made great preparations by ſea and land for the conqueſt of his new kingdom. Mean while, by the mediation of the pope, he allowed the count of Celano to depart the kingdom; and having got poſſeſſion of all his cities and caſtles, he ordered Celano to be intirely deſtroyed. built in Gaeta, Naples, Aversa, and Fogia, and returning to Sicily against the Saracens, who had again revolted, he conquered a great part of them, whom he transported to the continent, and allowed them to settle in Lucera and its neighbourhood. As the others had fled to the mountains, he sent for several Puglian barons to come to his assistance; but upon their arrival in Sicily, he ordered them to be imprisoned, and their lands upon the continent seized. These barons, however, the following year, at the intercession of the pope, and upon leaving their sons as hostages, were set at liberty, and went to Rome. Frederic, about the same time, sent the late inhabitants of Celano to Malta, exempted the clergy of Puglia from all taxes and impositions, and being greatly delighted with the situation of Naples, resolved to make it the chief place of his residence. For this purpose he enlarged and embellished the city, and this year erected the private schools, which had long flourished there, into an university (A).

Frederic embellishes Naples. A. D. 1224.

As the war still continued with the Saracens in Sicily, he renewed the taxes upon his subjects; but, to avoid disputes with the pope, he raised 300 ounces of gold from the lands of the monastery of Cassino, under the name of a loan. Soon after the titular king of Jerusalem arriving at Capua with his young queen, the sister of Castile, he sent him and the patriarch of Jerusalem to the pope to ask a prolongation of the time for his expedition to the Holy Land, urging the necessity of his continuance in Italy, on account of the rebellion of the Saracens, and the mutinous spirit of the Lombards, who, at the instigation of the inhabitants of Milan and Bologna, threatened a general revolt. His ambassadors receiving a favourable answer from the pope, in the end of July, he went to S. Germano, where he entered into new engagements to the pope's legates; and being absolved by them from the vow he had made at Veroli, he promised, under pain of excommunication, to go to Palestine within two years, counting from the month of August. The emperor soon after caused another loan to be raised from the clergy, by which he received 1300 ounces of gold from the monastery of Cassino; and, at the same time, refused to admit five prelates, whom the pope, without his knowlege, had nominated to some vacant benefices in Puglia. A few weeks after, the empress Jolanta, or Jole, arriving at Brindisi, Frederic solemnized his marriage with great pomp and magnificence; and in the beginning of the following year, he ordered his barons and knights to assemble at Pescara, and to accompany him to the diet of Cremona, having written to his son Henry king of the Romans, to pass the Alps with an army, and join him in Lombardy.

HENRY, who the year before had married a daughter of the duke of Austria, was prevented from advancing into Italy by the Lombards, who had seized the passes of the Alps; and Frederic upon his arrival at Cremona found no deputies from the cities of Milan, Verona, Placenza, Vercelli, Lodi, Alexandria, Treviso, Padua, Vicenza, Turin, Novara, Mantua, Brescia, Bologna, and Faenza, which cities, in the month of March, had entered into a new association for twenty-five years, in defence of their liberties [r]. The emperor, in resentment, put the associated cities to the ban of the empire, and having prevailed with the pope's legate to lay them under an interdict, he returned with his army to Puglia, and in his march had a conference with the pope at Reate. Tho' the pope and the emperor, during the whole summer, had been upon bad terms of correspondence, on account of the five prelates, who were kept out of the possession of their churches, and because Frederic had not only levied money upon the clergy, but had published an edict, ordering monks and priests guilty of homicide and other enormous crimes to be punished by the secular magistrate, yet at this conference they were again reconciled. Frederic consented to admit the prelates nominated by the pope, and Honorius, who was suspected of having promoted the association of the cities of Lombardy, promised to act as mediator betwixt them and the emperor.

(A) Richard of S. Germano tells us that the emperor dispatched letters, in behalf of the university of Naples through all the kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily. Some other letters concerning this university are extant in the six books of letters written by the famous Peter delle Vigne his secretary. By these letters it appears he prohibited all other schools in the kingdom, except Grammar schools. He invited able professors in all falculties from remote parts, and appointed them large salaries. He prohibited any person born in the cities of Lombardy, that had rebelled against him, from being received into the university; granted to the doctors and masters jurisdiction and power to take cognizance of the civil causes of the scholars; commanded all the governors of the provinces within their jurisdictions to go and study at Naples; and declared that he would take the scholars under his particular care and protection: that both in their journey to and stay in Naples, they should not be molested in their persons or goods; that they should have the best lodgings in that city at easy rates; that money should be lent them for their necessary occasions; and that they should be furnished with provisions at the same price with the Neapolitan citizens.

As the king likewise established his high court in this city, it immediately began to be much frequented, and to be distinguished above all other cities of the kingdom (1).

HONORIUS ſurvived this tranſaction a ſhort time, and died in March following. His ſucceſſor, Gregory IX. immediately after his election reminded the emperor of his vow. As infinite numbers of cruſards at this time were arriving in Italy, Frederic appeared as earneſt for the expedition as the pope; and in the month of Auguſt embarked at Brindiſi. However, three days after he had ſet ſail, returning to Italy, under pretence of ſickneſs, he was ſolemnly excommunicated by the pope at Anagni, on the twenty-ninth of September. Gre-

He likewiſe ordered all the juſtices of Sicily and Puglia to oblige the prieſts and monks in their provinces to celebrate divine ſervice as uſual; and afterwards holding a general meeting of the barons of the kingdom at Capua, he required from them a tax of eight ounces of gold, for every fief they held, and a ſoldier for every eight fiefs, to be ready againſt the month of May, when he intended to ſail

He likewiſe ſent an army into the duchy of Spoleto, and the march of Ancona; and notwithſtanding the rigorous prohibition of the pope, raiſed a large ſum of money from the clergy in his dominions. In the mean time the empreſs Jolanta, after being delivered of a ſon, who was named Conrad, died at Andria. Soon after her death, Frederic held a parliament at Barletta, and having regulated the ſucceſſion of his kingdom, in caſe of his death, and appointed Rainald, duke of Spoleto, regent during his abſence, on the eleventh of Auguſt he ſailed from Otranto with twenty gallies and a great
d number of tranſports for the Holy Land.

Frederic proceeds to the Holy Land.

GREGORY was highly exaſperated upon hearing that Frederic had preſumed to depart for the Holy Land, before he had made his peace with the church, and regarding his own private reſentment more than the advancement of the public cauſe, he, in great indignation, wrote to the patriarch of Jeruſalem and the maſter of the holy ſepulchre, to have no communication with the emperor, and to give him no aſſiſtance [s]. He likewiſe excited the aſſociated cities of Lombardy to violate the late pacification, and to attack thoſe of the imperial faction; and in order to force the imperialiſts to evacuate the march of Ancona, he aſſembled a large army, which in the beginning of January he ſent againſt the kingdom under the command of his legate Pandulph, and the exiled barons, Roger count of Fondi
e and Thomas count of Celano. The army, which was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the militia of Chriſt, quickly reduced ſeveral ſtrong caſtles on the frontiers. The ſoldiers, inſtead of a croſs, wore two keys upon their cloaths; and having but an inconſiderable army to oppoſe them, made themſelves maſters of many cities and towns; and in imitation of the Saracens of the imperial army, who the year before had committed great outrages in the march of Ancona, they burnt ſeveral places, and pillaged the inhabitants.

FREDERIC in the mean time finding it impoſſible to act with vigour againſt the ſoltan, becauſe the cruſards refuſed to obey him, and being informed that the papal army had conquered a great part of his dominions in Italy, concluded a peace with the ſoltan for ten years, and in the end of May returned with two gallies to Brindiſi. Upon his arrival he
f immediately propoſed an accommodation to the pope, and wrote to all his faithful ſubjects, promiſing to march directly to their aſſiſtance. His propoſal being rejected, he immediately began his march for Terra di Lavoro, and having many German cruſards in his army who had followed him to Italy, in leſs than three months he recovered almoſt all his dominions, with little or no oppoſition. His quick progreſs alarming the pope, he at laſt conſented to treat of peace; and the negociations being begun in the end of November, a ceſſation of hoſtilities in ſome meaſure took place. The principal negotiators were the archbiſhop of Reggio and the maſter of the Teutonic order, who, after ſeveral journies betwixt the emperor and the pope, compoſed certain articles for the treaty, which Frederic would by no means agree to, as the church pretended to retain Gaeta and S. Agatha. On this account g the peace was retarded ſeveral weeks; however, that article being left in ſuſpence, the em-treaty, and on the twenty-ſecond of July ſwore in the church of S. Germano to ſatisfy the pope in all the points for which he had been excommunicated. A few weeks after, he was ſolemnly abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication by the biſhop of Sabinæ; and on the firſt of September entered Anagni, where he had ſeveral conferences, for three days, with the pope, who entertained him with great kindneſs, and invited him to dine at the ſame table with himſelf (B).

FREDERIC having made a peace with Gregory, the following year publiſhed a volume of laws for the government of his hereditary dominions; which conſtitutions for a long time after were held in great eſteem. About the ſame time he ſent a ſmall reinforcement of troops to the Holy Land; ordered a ſtrict inquiſition to be made after a ſect of heretics b called Patareni, who held private conventicles, and were very numerous over all Italy, particularly in Naples; and ſeized all the poſſeſſions of the knights templars and hoſpitallers in his kingdom for his own uſe[t]. As the pacification betwixt him and the pope had not reſtored tranquility to Lombardy, but the two oppoſite factions ſtill continued their hoſtilities againſt each other with great animoſity, he prevailed on the pope to ſend two legates thither, to perſuade the rebellious Guelf cities to return to their obedience. He likewiſe appointed a general diet to be held ſoon after at Ravenna, whither he went attended only with his courtiers, to give no ſuſpicion to the Lombards; and having written to his ſon Henry to come to the diet, celebrated his Chriſtmas with great magnificence. Though the pope ſeemed to intereſt himſelf for the repoſe of Italy, yet the negociations of his legates were c ineffectual; for the aſſociatied cities not only neglected to appear at Ravenna, but aſſembling an army, oppoſed the paſſage of his ſon Henry, and attacked the cities of the imperial party. Frederic, on this account, laying aſide all thoughts of peace, went from Ravenna to Venice, and from thence to Aquileia, where, in a conference with his ſon Henry and the German nobles, he ſettled a plan for the operations of the war[u].

FROM Aquileia he returned by ſea in the month of April, to Puglia, and ſuſpecting, from the diſpoſition of the Lombards, that the peace with the pope would not be of long continuance, he cauſed all the cities on the borders of Campania to be ſtrongly fortified. In the mean time the city of Meſſina in Sicily revolted, on account of the oppreſſion of the chief juſticiary, and his army in Paleſtine was defeated by John de Baruch, who likewiſe made d himſelf maſter of Acon. As a means to prevent the progreſs of the infidels in Aſia, Frederic wrote to the pope, deſiring him to order the maſters of the knights templars and hoſpitallers to aſſume the chief command in Paleſtine, promiſing to reſtore all the poſſeſſions of theſe two orders that he had lately ſeized[w]. To quiet the diſorders in Sicily, he went over death, he reduced the caſtle whither the rebels had retired, which he intirely deſtroyed. In the mean time he cauſed the caſtles in Frani, Bari, Naples, and Brindiſi, to be fortified; ſent a governor to the city of Gaeta, which at laſt conſented to take the oath of allegiance to him and his ſon Conrad; and as the Saracens of Lucera had ſerved him with great fidelity in his war with the pope, he ordered that city to be enlarged and fortified, and even connived e at ſeveral outrages which the infidels committed, ſo far as to allow them to pull down a church, and carry off the materials, on which account he received a threatning letter from Gregory[x]. During his reſidence at Meſſina he publiſhed ſeveral edicts, one particularly appointing ſeven fairs to be held every year in different parts of his kingdom; namely, at Sulmo, Capua, Lucera, Bari, Tarento, Coſenza, and Reggio, prohibiting any merchandize to be expoſed to ſale in that province where the fair was held, while the fair laſted. He alſo ordered general courts and aſſizes to be held twice a year in different provinces of the kingdom, when it ſhould be lawful for any one to lay his complaints againſt the judges or any other magiſtrate, before the king's deputy.

HAVING ſettled the affairs of Sicily, he returned in the month of February to Italy, where f he applied himſelf to re-eſtabliſh the univerſity of Naples, the flouriſhing ſtate of which had been greatly interrupted by his war with the pope. About the ſame time Gregory

a being expelled by the Romans, who had aſſembled a moſt numerous army, and attacked ſome cities in the pope's intereſt, Frederic marched in perſon to his aſſiſtance; and having left a garriſon in Viterbo, inveſted the city of Raſpampano, which was held by the rebels. Two months after, however, he raiſed the ſiege, and returned in September with great part of his army to Puglia, being accuſed by ſome writers of having entered into a private correſpondence with the rebels [y]. Great numbers of Germans, nevertheleſs, continuing in the pay of Gregory, a few weeks after they ſurpriſed the Roman army, and gaining a complete victory obliged the rebels to ſubmit.

He aſſiſts the pope againſt the Romans.

FREDERIC in the mean time hearing of the rebellion of his eldeſt ſon Henry, went the following ſpring with his ſon Conrad into Germany. Having quickly obliged his ſon to b ſubmit and aſk his pardon, he carried him priſoner to Worms; where in the month of July he married Iſabel the daughter of the king of England. Soon after he ſent Henry priſoner into Puglia; and having cauſed Conrad to be elected king of Germany, and to be crowned in Cologn, he returned with him to Italy, and preſented him to the pope at Rieti, where he endeavoured to perſuade Gregory to aſſiſt him againſt the aſſociated cities of Lombardy. The pope's views were very different from thoſe of the emperor. He therefore diſſuaded him from bringing a German army into Italy, by promiſing to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for an accommodation, at the ſame time reminding him that the truce with the ſoltan was near expired, and that he intended another general cruſade to the Holy Land. Frederic, not ſatisfied with this diſcourſe, returned immediately to Germany, and in the beginning of the fol- c lowing year publiſhed a letter, appointing a general diet to be held in the month of July at Parma. Having aſſembled a formidable army at Augsburgh, in the month of June he paſſed the Alps, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the confederate army, and arrived at Verona; from whence he proceeded to Cremona. He then held the diet at Parma, and the confederates ſtill refuſing to ſubmit, it was reſolved to proſecute the war againſt them with vigour. After diſmiſſing the aſſembly, the imperialiſts ravaged the territories belonging to the allies; and on the firſt of November took Vicenza, which was pillaged and burnt. Frederic duke of Auſtria in the mean time raiſing a rebellion in Germany, the emperor repaſſed the Alps, and having reduced the duke, returned the following autumn to Italy; when being joined by 10,000 Saracens, he gained a complete victory over the allies at Cortenuovo; in conſe- d quence of which all the aſſociated cities ſurrendered to him, except Milan, Bologna, Alexandria, and Breſcia [z].

Returns to Lombardy with an army. A. D. 1236.

THE emperor after this victory returned in a triumphant manner to Cremona. The war, however, ſtill continued; for Gregory, who had long been jealous of the emperor's power, now openly attached himſelf to the aſſociated cities, and the following year ſent legates to the king of Arragon, inviting him to come to the relief of Italy, offering him 150,000 imperial pounds, and to declare him lord of Lombardy, if he would engage in the war againſt Frederic. This embaſſy to the king of Arragon proving ineffectual, and Frederic growing ſtill more formidable in Italy, Gregory the year after denounced a ſentence of excommunication and depoſition againſt him on Holy Thurſday, under pretence that he had violated the e rights of the church, by giving the iſland of Sardinia, with the title of king, to his natural ſon Henry or Hentius, though that iſland was known to be a fief of the ſee of Rome [a]. Frederic immediately wrote to the princes of Europe in his own juſtification, and publiſhed ſeveral other letters againſt the pope, whom he accuſed of many crimes. At the ſame time he renewed the war in Lombardy with greater fury, and recalling Hentius from Sardinia, ordered him to invade the march of Ancona. After ravaging the march of Treviſo and the Milaneſe, he left ſtrong garriſons in Lombardy, and marched in the beginning of the year towards Rome; but being prevented by the Romans from making himſelf maſter of the city, he ravaged their territory, and proceeded to Puglia.

He is excommunicated by the pope. A. D. 1239.

BOTH parties ſtill continued to reproach each other with great bitterneſs in their public manifeſtoes; but Gregory not receiving that aſſiſtance from the kings of France and England which he expected, publiſhed letters for convoking a general council the following Eaſter A. D. 1240. at Rome, as the moſt proper means for procuring a peace. Frederic, who had ordered Benevento to be beſieged, and was then inveſting Faenza, conſented to the calling of a council, and agreed to a truce with the pope till the concluſion of that aſſembly [b]; but refuſed to grant a ceſſation of arms to the confederates. A few weeks after, however, he thought proper to revoke his aſſent, and declared publicly by letters, that he would not grant his ſafe-conduct to any biſhops coming to the council, but would treat them as his enemies. This threatning he effectually fulfilled the following year, by taking three cardinal legates, and a great number of French and Engliſh archbiſhops and biſhops priſoners, who were going on board thirty Genoese gallies to Rome. About the same time he made himself master of Faenza, and likewise reduced Benevento, the fortifications of which he ordered to be entirely destroyed. Not contented with taxing the ecclesiastics, he seized on the treasure of all the churches of his kingdom, expelled all foreign monks, and ordered those that should be found carrying letters from the pope into his dominions, to be put to death. After taking Faenza, he ravaged the territories of Fano, Assisi, and Pesaro, took possession of Spoleto and Narni, and at the desire of cardinal Colonna, who had revolted from the pope, he again advanced towards Rome, putting a garrison in Tivoli, and seizing several castles in the neighbourhood of the city. a

The death of Gregory and of the empress. A. D. 1242.

His enemy Gregory in the mean time was so affected with the captivity of the prelates, and the bad success of the war, that he died at Rome on the twenty-first of August, being near an hundred years of age. His successor Celestin IV. survived his election only eighteen days. A few weeks after his death, the empress Isabel died at Foggia; and about two months after, Frederic lost his eldest son Henry, who, according to Richard of S. Germano, died in prison; but according to Boccace, he threw himself over a bridge, while he was on his journey to see his father, not knowing that he had sent for him with the intention of being reconciled to him. The cardinals at Rome, in the mean time, from mutual ambition, delayed the election of a pope, throwing the blame on Frederic, who still detained two legates prisoners. The emperor would not allow the justness of their excuse; and being in the neighbourhood of Rome, pressed them earnestly, by several letters, to proceed to the election, and as they assumed the supreme administration of ecclesiastical affairs, sent the master of the Teutonic order, and another ambassador, to them, to treat of peace. The cardinals paying no regard to his proposals, he ravaged the territory of Rome, while his army in the march of Ancona took Ascoli, and the army from Naples ravaged the territory of Rieti. At last he consented to set the legates at liberty; but the cardinals still delaying the election, he assembled an army the following spring, and in the month of May invested the city of Rome, ravaged its territory, and destroyed the country seats and estates belonging to the cardinals, who, alarmed with their particular losses, intreated him to withdraw his army, and promised to proceed immediately to the election. They accordingly on the twenty-fourth of June chose Innocent IV. a Genoese, who immediately after his election received an embassy from the emperor to treat of peace. b

Innocent IV. is elected; A. D. 1243.

By the pope's answer to Frederic's ambassadors, it was generally expected that a peace would soon be concluded; however, after Innocent had published his preliminary articles, the hopes of a negotiation vanished, as the emperor refused absolutely to agree to them. By this behaviour, having lost a great many of his friends, and disgusted several cities, which deserted his party, and declared for the church, the following year he again renewed his proposals for peace; and on Holy Thursday his ambassadors swore in his name, that he would refer himself entirely to the judgment of the pope, as to all the injuries that he had done to the church and the clergy. Reflecting, however, soon after, upon the extensiveness of this concession, and that he thereby put himself wholly under the power of the pope, he refused to be bound by the oath of his plenipotentiaries, and endeavoured to surprise and seize Innocent, who being informed of his design, left Rome, and went by sea to Genoa, from whence, in the end of the year, he went through Savoy to Lyons, where he appointed a general council to be held the following year, at Midsummer [c]. The council was very numerous, and Thaddeus de Sessa, one of the emperor's deputies, justified his master with great spirit and resolution (C). Nevertheless, Innocent, in the end of the third session, with great formality denounced a sentence of excommunication and deposition against Frederic, and ordered the electors of the empire to proceed to a new election, declaring that he reserved to himself the disposal of the kingdom of Sicily. Thaddeus appealed from this sentence to a future council and future pope; and Frederic, who was then at Turin, immediately wrote to the kings of England and France, proving the injustice of the sentence, offering at the same time to refer his dispute with the pope to the arbitration of St. Lewis and the peers of France. c d e f

Who excommunicates and deposes the emperor; A. D. 1245.

Tho' the pope, by his letters, had published the sentence to all the world, Frederic, nevertheless, was still acknowleged as emperor by the Christian princes. A small party in Germany, indeed, the following year elected the landgrave of Thuringia as emperor, who

[c] Idem ibid.

(C) The other deputy was the famous Peter de Vineis, who by his silence in the council lost the emperor's affections; and being soon after accused of a plot against him, had his eyes put out, and was deprived of all his wealth and honours. Peter, not able to support this misfortune, put himself to a violent death. Some write that he died innocent, and that the courtiers envying his greatness made the emperor believe, that at the instigation of the pope he had formed a conspiracy against him (1).

a was killed the year after; and, by the intrigues of two cardinals, whom the pope sent into Puglia, several barons had revolted, and taken possession of Capaccio, and other castles in that kingdom. Frederic, on that account, left his son Hentius in Lombardy, and marched into Puglia. The barons, who had conspired against him, had formerly been his most intimate friends; but being corrupted, as it was alleged, by the pope, they had formed a conspiracy in the spring of assassinating him at Grosseto, on the coast of Tuscany. Their plot, however, being discovered, many of them were immediately seized, and others of them fled to their associates in Puglia. Though they made a vigorous defence against the emperor's forces, yet about the end of July they were forced to submit; when many of them were put to most cruel deaths, and even their relations, within the fourth or fifth degree, b were punished as traitors [d]. Frederic immediately published an account of the conspiracy, which he attributed to the intrigues of the pope [e]; and in return, according to Matthew Paris, hired two assassins to murder Innocent.

and encourages a conspiracy against his life. A. D. 1246.

HAVING quieted the insurrection in Puglia, he returned the following year to Pisa, and went afterwards to Turin, with the design of proceeding to Lyons, to be reconciled to the pope, according to Sigonius and Collenutius [f]. But according to Matthew Paris, Blondus, Nauclerus, and other Italian and German authors, he intended to attack the pope, as the duke of Burgundy, and many French nobles, had then entered into an association in defence of their privileges, against the pope and clergy [g]. He had hardly arrived at the foot of the Alps, when being informed that the Guelph exiles had recovered Parma, he immediately re- c turned to besiege that important place. Before his arrival, the confederates, sensible of its importance, had repaired its fortifications, and strengthened it with a numerous garrison. The emperor invested the place about the middle of August, with an army of upwards of 60,000 men, and being fully bent upon ruining the besieged, he fortified his camp like a city, and gave it the name of Victoria. The following year, however, on the eighteenth of February, his new city was surprised and taken by the besieged, who having killed or taken prisoners the greatest part of his army, enriched themselves with the immense booty.

Parma is surprised by the Guelphs.

THE affairs of Frederic after this defeat quickly declined, for the papists and confederates were every day strengthened by new allies; his competitor in Germany, William count of Holland, took Aix la Chapelle from his son Conrad, where, on the first of November, he re- d ceived the imperial crown; and the following year, in the month of May, his son Hentius was entirely defeated and taken prisoner by the Bolognese, who after the victory reduced several cities and castles of Lombardy and Romagna, particularly the city of Modena. In order to repair these losses, Frederic the following year made great preparations for attacking the Bolognese. He called over a large body of Saracens from Barbary, and laid a heavy poll-tax upon his subjects, which they were obliged to pay under pain of being sent to the gallies. He was prevented, however, from executing his intended expedition by death, which happened to him on the thirteenth of December, at Fiorentino, a castle near Lucera [h]. According to Cuspinianus and others, it was supposed that he was poisoned by his natural son Manfred; who being afraid lest he should recover, smothered him with a bolster in the night time [i]. Upon his e death-bed he professed his sorrow for his breach with the church, and the injuries he had done to the ecclesiastics; having made a penitential confession to the archbishop of Palermo, he received from him absolution and the viaticum [k]; and, according to Matthew Paris, before his death assumed the habit of a Cistertian monk [l].

The affairs of the emperor decline.

He dies in Puglia. A. D. 1250.

FREDERIC by his last will left his eldest son Conrad heir of the empire, and of all his other dominions, particularly of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. If he should die without issue, Henry his other son was to succeed; in case of whose death, Manfred his bastard son was declared heir; who in the mean time was to enjoy the principality of Tarento, with the counties of Montescaglioso, Trecarico, Gravina, and Monte St. Angelo, with all the cities, towns, castles, &c. belonging to them. The duchies of Austria and Stiria, with 10,000 f ounces of gold, were given to Frederic, his grandson by his deceased son Henry. During the absence of Conrad from the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, Manfred was declared bailie or regent, with supreme power, and till the succession should be open for Henry, he was to enjoy the kingdom of Jerusalem [m].

UPON the death of Frederic, Conrad being absent in Germany, Manfred immediately assumed the administration of the government. The Neapolitans expressly declared, that they were tired of the war, and would acknowlege no king that did not come with the papal benediction and investiture. They were followed by the Capuans, some other cities, and many barons of the kingdom; so that immediately several parties appeared in arms for the pope, under the banner of the church. Manfred, however, making a progress through the kingdom, with a large body of Saracens, confirmed many cities in their allegiance to Conrad, took Nola and Aversa, ravaged the territories of Capua, and left Saracen garrisons in the cities of the Principato and Basilicata. a

A FEW months after, the emperor Conrad arrived with a powerful army at Verona. Having continued some time in Lombardy, and held a diet of the cities in his interest in the neighbourhood of Mantua, he embarked with his army on board a Venetian fleet at Friuli, and in the end of the year arrived at the ancient city of Siponto in Puglia, where he was met by his brother Manfred, whom he received in the most affectionate manner [o]. Soon after, however, he began to be jealous of his great abilities and authority; and in order to lessen his power he published an edict, revoking all the grants made by the last will of his father, or since his death, and persuaded Manfred, as an example to other barons, to resign the city of Brindisi, and the counties of Monte St. Angelo, Gravina, Trecarico, and Montescaglioso. He likewise impoverished the principality of Tarento by a heavy tax, turned out the justiciary appointed by Manfred, and allowed the prince the supreme jurisdiction in the principality only in civil cases. Manfred, pretending not to perceive his design, submitted to these edicts without opposition, and with the same zeal as formerly assisted his brother in reducing the counts of Aquino, who had declared for the pope. The Germans and Saracens acting in conjunction, quickly reduced the rebels in those parts; and having taken and burnt Aquino, Sessa, St. Germano, and several other castles in the neighbourhood, they proceeded to Capua, which immediately surrendered without resistance. After the submission of Capua, Conrad marched against Naples, and according to Spinello, a cotemporary writer, invested the city on the first of December. As the pope a few weeks after sent a nuncio to him, to intercede for the Neapolitans, Conrad, in contempt, desired him to concern himself with those who wore shaven crowns; and to encourage the Germans and Saracens to act with vigour, he promised three months pay extraordinary to that nation that should first enter the city. His army being reinforced by a great many Puglian barons, and the Neapolitans being disappointed of assistance from the pope, he at last made himself master of the city, in the end of September; and contrary to the capitulation, allowed it to be plundered by his soldiers, and ordered the fortifications to be entirely destroyed. After he had continued two months in the city, punishing the rebellious citizens with great severity, he appointed a parliament to be held the following year at Melphis, and went to Burletta, where he received the submission of the barons of Terra di Bari. b

MEAN while Innocent, who upon the death of Frederic had immediately returned to Italy, used his utmost endeavours to suppress the Gibelline faction, and oppose the pretensions of Conrad, both in Germany and Italy. He again excommunicated him and his adherents, ordered a crusade to be preached against him, in favour of William count of Holland, with greater indulgences than that for the Holy Land; and, persuaded that it would be impossible to unite the kingdom of the Two Sicilies to the possessions of the church, he resolved to oppose a powerful prince to him, and offered the investiture of the kingdom to Richard earl of Cornwall, brother to the king of England. His offer being rejected, he entered into a negotiation with the count of Anjou, brother of St. Lewis, who was then in the Holy Land; but though the count had ambitiously offered his service to the pope, he was prevented by his relations from concluding the treaty [p]. e

The pope offers the kingdom to the earl of Cornwall. A. D. 1253.

DURING these intrigues of the pope, Conrad, in the month of February, held a parliament at Melphis, when an edict was published for raising 30,000 ounces of gold, which the subjects submitted to pay rather than be oppressed with quartering the Germans and Saracens [q]. Whilst he continued at Melphis, he was visited by his brother Henry, then about twelve years of age, who died soon after, not without suspicion of being poisoned by his means [r]. Upon the death of Henry, who was the son of the empress Isabel, sister of the king of England, his uncle Henry III. entered into a negotiation with the pope, that if he would absolve him from his vow of a crusade, and confer Sicily on his son Edmund, he would employ all the forces of England against Conrad, whom he looked upon as the murderer of his nephew [s]. This second negotiation, however, had no effect; and Conrad in the mean time took and destroyed Ascoli, Garegnone, Celenza, and Bitunto; and if the prince of Tarento had not interposed, would have ravaged all Calabria, Basilicata, and Principato [t]. a to ſubmit by his ſeverity and cruelty, in the end of the year he ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, with a propoſal for an accommodation with the pope; which was rejected by Innocent, who ſoon after renewed the ſentence of excommunication againſt him. Conrad ſurvived this fulmination but a few months, and died of a fever near Lavello, on the 21ſt of May, in the twenty-ſixth year of his age. Villani, and ſeveral other hiſtorians ſay, that he was poiſoned by his brother Manfred; but Spinello and Nicolas de Jamſilla, cotemporary writers, are entirely ſilent as to that particular.

His death.

CONRAD by his laſt will left his infant ſon Conradin or Conrad, then in Germany, his heir; and during his minority appointed Berthold de Honebruch regent of the kingdom, deſiring him to uſe all poſſible means to procure for the young prince the favour of the apo-
b ſtolic ſee. Manfred, before the emperor's death, declined the office of regent, which he obſerved was coveted by Berthold, who, though a man of ſmall abilities, was ſupported by the intereſt of all the Germans. The new regent immediately ſent ambaſſadors to the pope, deſiring the protection of the apoſtolic ſee for the young prince. Innocent imagining this embaſſy was owing rather to the weakneſs of the party than to the will of the deceaſed king, anſwered peremptorily that he would be maſter of the kingdom, which by the ſentence of depoſition pronounced againſt Frederic at the council of Lyons had devolved to the church; but that Conradin nevertheleſs, when he came of age, ſhould be heard as to his pretenſions to that fief[u]. As Innocent at the ſame time made great preparations for invading the kingdom, to which he was encouraged by many exiled barons, and other male-contents, c Berthold in great terror reſigned the regency to Manfred, who at firſt made great difficulty of accepting of it; but being much intreated, and Berthold, with the Germans, and all the loyal party, taking the oath of fidelity to Conrad, and to him as regent, with this expreſs clauſe, that if Conrad were dead, or ſhould die without children, they would acknowlege him as king, he conſented to aſſume the adminiſtration, and immediately prepared to oppoſe Innocent. But as he received little or no aſſiſtance from Berthold, was excommunicated by the pope, and a general ſpirit prevailed both among Sicilians and Puglians of becoming ſubjects to the church, he thought it moſt prudent to make no oppoſition to the pope's army, and even invited Innocent to aſſume the guardianſhip of the young prince, and to enter the kingdom, without, however, doing prejudice to the rights of Conrad or of d himſelf.

INNOCENT, upon his arrival at Naples, paid no regard to this ſtipulation, but immediately publiſhed briefs, ordering all the barons and deputies of the cities in the kingdom to come to him, and take the oath of allegiance to the church[w]. Manfred, however, ſtill continued with him for ſome time; but at laſt, under pretence of going to meet the marquis of Honebruch, who was coming with ſome Germans from Puglia, he left the pope, and having on his journey killed Bunello di Anglone, who was way-laying him, and had obtained the inveſtiture of part of his principality from Innocent, he fled to Lucera, where, on the ſecond of November, he was received with great honour by the Saracens. He immediately began to aſſemble ſome troops; and great numbers of Germans flocking to him from all
e parts of Puglia, and even from the marquis Berthold, and from the army of the pope's legate, in a few weeks he found himſelf at the head of a ſmall army, with which he attacked and defeated the papal forces in Foggia, and ſtruck ſuch a terror into the legate, who was then at Troja, that he abandoned that city in great confuſion. Innocent dying at Naples a few days after, on the eighth of December, the papal party was thereby thrown into great confuſion; which Manfred taking the advantage of, reduced Rapollo, Bari, Trani, Melphis, and all Puglia, excepting ſome cities of Terra d'Otranto, which ſtill held out for the church.

The pope claims the kingdom as a fief devolved to the church.

Manfred attacks and diſperſes part of his army.

AT the intreaty of his friends he conſented, in the beginning of the following year, to ſend ambaſſadors to Alexander IV. the ſucceſſor of Innocent, to treat of peace. The conferences, however, had no effect; and Alexander giving the command of his army to car-f dinal Octavian, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a general in the wars in Lombardy, and retiring to Anagni, denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt Manfred, who, in the mean time, was reducing the cities on the coaſt of Otranto, and endeavouring to quell a revolt in Calabria, occaſioned by Peter Roſſo, who had been governor of Calabria and Sicily ſeveral years, but had lately been expelled by the Sicilians, on account of his inſolence and oppreſſion. Peter, who had hitherto refuſed to acknowlege Manfred as regent, now entirely abandoned the king's party: and in order to recover his former power, began to treat with the pope about putting Calabria into his hands. Manfred being informed of his deſign, ſent ſome troops to ſecure Calabria, and marched with his army from the ſiege of Oria towards Melphis, to oppoſe Octavian, before whoſe army he continued encamped ſeveral weeks, endea-g vouring in vain to draw him to a general engagement. Though his army was greatly inferior to that of the pope, yet he prevented the legate from advancing in the kingdom; but at length agreeing to a truce for a ſhort time, Octavian, while the prince had withdrawn his army, ſurpriſed Foggia. Manfred immediately returned and inveſted the city, which was quickly reduced to ſo great diſtreſs, that Octavian conſented to a peace, which was accordingly concluded on theſe conditions; that Manfred ſhould poſſeſs the kingdom for himſelf and his nephew Conradin, except Terra di Lavoro, which was to be yielded to the pope; but if Alexander rejected the treaty, it ſhould be lawful for Manfred ſtill to claim that province [x]. a

AFTER the concluſion of this treaty, Manfred, at the deſire of the legate, allowed all the baniſhed barons to return to the kingdom and enjoy their eſtates. Alexander, however, refuſed to ratify the treaty of his legate, and ſent the biſhop of Bologna to England, who upon b

The parliament being diſſolved, Manfred marched towards Naples, to recover Terra di Lavoro. The Neapolitans hearing of his approach, ſent meſſengers to him, inviting him to their city, and upon his arrival received him with great pomp and acclamations. The prince behaved to them with great generoſity, pardoned all thoſe who for ſeveral years paſt c had been enemies to the houſe of Suabia, repaired the public edifices at his own expence, and conferred honours and places on many of the chief men of the city. He immediately after made himſelf maſter of all Terra di Lavoro, from whence he marched to Capitanata, and then to Brindiſi. Having quelled a ſedition in this city, he took and deſtroyed Ariano, and then paſſed over to Sicily, which iſland, by means of one of his uncles, had been prevailed upon to declare for Conrad.

AFTER Manfred had continued ſeveral months at Palermo, a report was publiſhed, that Conradin was dead in Germany. This report, though falſe, prevailing over all the kingdom, the Puglian barons and prelates immediately repaired to Palermo, and unanimouſly elected of that city. This is the account of Nicholas de Jamſilla, a cotemporary writer; but Villani, and the authors of the Guelf faction, ſay, that Manfred, having failed in ſeveral attempts to cauſe his nephew to be poiſoned, employed pretended meſſengers to bring the falſe news of his death. However this be, immediately after his coronation he conferred offices and preſents on the barons, and advanced many of them to the honour of knighthood. Upon his return to Puglia, finding all the provinces in perfect tranquillity, he held a parliament in Barletta, where he created ſeveral knights and gave the inveſtiture to ſome counts. Soon after he held another parliament at Foggia, when he promoted many others to honours, and releaſed himſelf from the fatigues of war by magnificent feaſts, games, and illuminations. e ſends troops to Lombardy to the aſſiſtance of the Gibellines, A. D. 1259. As he had now repulſed the papal army, and intirely quieted the kingdom, which ſeemed to acquieſce with pleaſure under his government, as he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his clemency, generoſity, and love of juſtice, he reſolved to turn the ſeat of war into the territories of his enemy; and for that purpoſe, the following year, ſent a great part of his army to Lombardy and the march of Ancona, to ſupport the Gibelline faction, of which he openly declared himſelf the protector, appointing the marquis Pallavicini his vicar in Lombardy, Jordanus di Anglono, count of S. Severino, in Tuſcany, and Percival d'Orio in Ancona. Alexander, in the mean time, inceſſantly urged the king of England to ſend an army into Italy; but finding it impoſſible to engage England to eſpouſe his quarrel, and being f greatly galled with the proſperity of Manfred, he again excommunicated him, declared him a ſacrilegious uſurper of the rights of the church, and depoſed him from all his honours. He interdicted all the cities and caſtles that ſhould receive him, or acknowlege him as king, and excommunicated and depoſed all thoſe prelates that had aſſiſted at his coronation. Theſe thunderbolts, however, were not in the leaſt regarded, either by Manfred or his ſubjects. Manfred now lived at eaſe, and in great ſplendor, applying himſelf to embelliſh his kingdom, and diverting himſelf in the maritime cities of Puglia, particularly at Barletta, where he received an embaſſy from the duke of Bavaria, and Margaret, the mother of Conradin. The German ambaſſadors informed him that Conradin was ſtill alive, deſired him to lay aſide the title of king, and to puniſh thoſe who invented the news of the young prince's death. g Manfred received the ambaſſadors with great honour, and told them, that he himſelf had made a conqueſt of the kingdom from two popes, after it had been intirely loſt as to Con-

a rad; that to resign the title of king would be only strengthening the pope's party, as the Puglians had an aversion to the government of the Germans; that the queen ought to send young Conrad to be educated in Italy, and that upon his death he would leave the kingdom to him. Manfred dismissed the ambassadors with rich presents for Conradin and the duke of Bavaria; and soon after he received a visit from his relation the despota of Morea, who in the beginning of the following year went to Rome, to offer his medation for a peace betwixt the pope and Manfred. Alexander, finding the power and authority of Manfred daily increasing, offered a peace, on condition that he would restore the exiles to their estates, and dismiss the Saracens; which terms were rejected with disdain by the king, who even brought over other Saracens from Barbary, whom, in the month of July, he sent to ravage
b the Campania di Roma[z]. He began not only to be respected in Italy, but by foreign princes. James, king of Arragon, notwithstanding the opposition of the pope, entered into an alliance with him, and concluded a marriage betwixt his son Peter and Constantia his eldest daughter. Manfred married another of his daughters to the marquis of Montferrat, and, as a perpetual memorial of his name, founded a new city at the foot of Monte Gargano, on the Adriatic coast, which he called Manfredonia, ordering Siponto, on account of its unhealthy situation, to be destroyed, and its inhabitants to repair thither. About the same time his authority in Italy was more fully established, by a most complete victory which his forces in Tuscany gained over the Florentine Guelphs, in consequence of which the city of Florence, then remarkably rich and affluent, took the oath of allegiance to him.

who gain a signal victory in Tuscany.

c THE continual prosperity of Manfred greatly chagrined Alexander, who died the following year, in the month of May, at Viterbo. His successor Urban IV. was a native of France, a man of great abilities, and a zealous promoter of the pretensions of the court of Rome, consequently a bitter enemy to Manfred and the Gibellines. Soon after his promotion, he solicited the king of Arragon to break off the match already concluded betwixt his son and Manfred's eldest daughter. His endeavours, however, were fruitless; for as Manfred had no male issue, the king of Arragon hoped by the marriage to unite Sicily to his dominions; and sending his gallies to Naples, he conducted the bride to Montpellier, where, about the middle of May, the marriage was celebrated with great magnificence. Urban, in the mean time, was exerting himself to ruin Manfred. He summoned him to appear at the court of d Rome, to answer for his many crimes. Though this citation was not notified to him, but only affixed to the doors of the churches of Civita Vecchia, where the pope then was, Manfred, nevertheless, sent ambassadors to the pope to justify his conduct, and to ask a safe conduct for himself. Urban, without granting the demand of his ambassadors, or paying any regard to what they alleged in his vindication, solemnly excommunicated him, and published a general crusade against him; in consequence of which, a large body of French crusards entered Italy, and joining the Guelphs, defeated the marquis Pallavicina in Lombardy. Manfred, to oppose their entering into the kingdom, advanced with his army to Campania di Roma, from whence, however, he soon retreated beyond the Garigliano, to shun an engagement with the French, who were prevented from advancing by an insurrection at Rome, e whither they were recalled by the pope. Upon their retreating, Manfred repassed the Garigliano with the Saracens, to the assistance of the rebellious Romans, which obliged the pope to fly to Civita Vecchia, and the crusards not receiving their pay, returned discontented to France[a].

URBAN, in the mean time, had made an offer of the crown of Sicily to St. Lewis for one of his sons: but that conscientious prince refused to invade the right of another. Upon this refusal, the pope ordered his legate to enter into a negociation with St. Lewis's brother, Charles, count of Anjou, who in right of his wife was in possession of Provence, Languedoc, and great part of Piedmont. This ambitious prince even prevailed with St. Lewis at last
f to countenance his expedition. This remarkable treaty was immediately published in Italy, and greatly alarmed Manfred and the Gibelline party. Though it afterwards proved the ruin of the house of Suabia, yet it may likewise be affirmed, that it was the source of infinite miseries to France, which was thereby involved for several centuries in expensive and unsuccessful wars, their expeditions beng all blasted by the intrigues of the Italians and the popes, who, to suppress the power of the Neapolitan kings, invited one family to drive out the princes of another. Though Charles with great ardour, prepared every thing for his Italian expedition, yet his march was delayed for some time, by the death of Urban, which happened the following year, in the beginning of October. Clement IV. the successor of Urban, was born in the territories of the count of Anjou, and, before he had entered into sacred orders, had been privy counsellor to St. Lewis. He was therefore attached with great

Though Manfred had fitted out a fleet of 80 gallies to intercept him, he was ſo fortunate as to paſs unobſerved, and in the month of May arrived at Rome, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy, and continued ſeveral months waiting for the arrival of his army.

MANFRED, in the mean time, was preparing, with the utmoſt diligence, to oppoſe the invaders. He recalled his troops from Lombardy, made new levies in Puglia, ſent immediately for 2000 horſe from Germany, to whom he promiſed double pay for ſix months; and to ſecure the fidelity of the barons, aſſembled them at Benevento, where he repreſented to them that the French came not to ſave the nation, but to rob them of their properties [b]. The barons promiſed to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power; but upon the diſmiſſing of the parliament, they entered into ſecret correſpondence with count Charles, who aſſumed the ſupreme authority at Rome in quality of ſenator, to which dignity he had been promoted the year before by the Romans, who at this time governed their ſtate independently of the pope.

ABOUT the end of December, the French army arriving at Rome in a moſt miſerable plight to the number of 60,000 men [c], Charles borrowed large ſums from the Roman merchants for the relief of his troops, and likewiſe ſollicited the pope for further ſubſidies, though Urban had already granted him conſiderable ſums, which he had borrowed from the Florentine merchants, and raiſed by mortgaging the revenues and wealth of almoſt all the churches in Rome for three years. As his troops were eager to meet the enemy, in hopes of obtaining a victory or ending their miſeries, Charles, after being ſolemnly crowned with his wife on the feaſt of Epiphany, in St. Peter's church, began his march for Naples. The count of Caſerto, through treachery, abandoning the bridge of Ceperano, Charles entered the kingdom without oppoſition, and advancing to St. Germano, took the city by ſtorm, and put the greateſt part of the garriſon to the ſword. From thence he proceeded to Benevento, and on the 26th of February, in the neighbourhood of the city, engaged Manfred, who, after a bloody and obſtinate diſpute, was intirely defeated and ſlain, the greateſt part of the Puglian barons having treacherouſly deſerted him during the action. As he died excommunicated, his body was thrown into a ditch and covered with a great heap of ſtones; however, pope Clement, at the perſuaſion of the archbiſhop of Coſenza, ordered the corpſe to be dug up, and to be carried with extinguiſhed torches out of the kingdom, to the banks of the Marino, where it was left expoſed to the wind and rain [d]. Manfred for his liberality, gracefulneſs, and courteſy, has been compared to Titus, the ſon of Veſpaſian [e]. Though he raiſed himſelf to the throne by the moſt wicked and unjuſtifiable means, yet afterwards, by his affability, generoſity, mildneſs, prudence, and courage, he acquired the love and eſteem of his ſubjects. He was a patron of the ſciences and arts, which he ſtudied himſelf with great aſſiduity, and is ſaid to have been ſkilled in philoſophy and mathematics. By his beneficence and love of juſtice, he became extremely popular; ſo that he was able to ſtruggle againſt the reſentment and power of four ſucceſſive popes, who, piqued at the oppoſition he made to their uſurpations, endeavoured to repreſent him as the blackeſt monſter.

After Eaſter he ſent new juſticiaries, and other officers through all the provinces, who grievouſly oppreſſed the ſubjects with the vigorous exaction of a new tax, while the French ſoldiers, who were diſperſed through the whole kingdom, robbed and plundered the inhabitants with great inſolence. The poor people were ſo terrified with their new maſters, that at firſt they expreſſed their miſeries only by their groans. At length they began to complain and murmur, which encouraged ſeveral counts and barons to concert meaſures with the Gibellines in Lombardy, for a revolu-

b tion in favour of Conradin, the whole ſurviving branch of Frederic's poſterity. Many counts accordingly repairing to Germany, with the deputies of the Gibellines and imperial cities in Italy, prevailed upon Conrad to undertake an expedition againſt king Charles; which negociation the pope was no ſooner informed of, than he publiſhed a mandate about the middle of April, prohibiting every one to acknowlege Conradin as king of Sicily, or to diſturb Charles in the poſſeſſion of that kingdom.

CHARLES, in the mean time, contracted alliances with Baldwin, the late emperor of Conſtantinople, now only in poſſeſſion of Eubea, and with Willarduin, prince of Achaia. The emperor Baldwin, only ſon to Philip, who had the title of king of Theſſaly, married the daughter of Charles, and the only daughter of Willarduin was married to Philip, Charles's ſecond ſon. This Henry, with his brother Frederic, having been expelled Caſtile by their brother the king, on account of their frequent inſurrections againſt him, retired with a a few Spaniards to Barbary, where they continued ſeveral years in the ſervice of the king of Tunis, and acquired great wealth. Henry aſſiſted king Charles, who was his couſin, with large ſums of money; but being diſappointed in the rewards he expected for his ſervices, he d went to Rome, where he ſo ſoothed the pope and the conſiſtory by the ſchemes he propoſed to them, that they even thought of creating him king of Sardinia. But being diſappointed in this ambitious view, he left the court of Rome, which was then at Viterbo, and prevailed on the Romans to elect him ſenator [g].

A. D. 1267.

CONRADIN being preſſed by Henry to haſten his march into Italy, in the month of October arrived at Verona with 10,000 horſe, in contempt of the monitories and fulminations of the pope. Upon the news of his arrival in Italy, Capece a Puglian baron, with Frederic of Caſtile, immediately ſailed over from Tunis with 800 men to Sicily, where they were joyfully received, and prevailed on almoſt the whole iſland, except Meſſina, Palermo, and Syracuſe, to declare for Conrad. About the ſame time the Piſan fleet gained a victory over

CLEMENT, in the mean time, on Holy Thurſday, denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt Conrad, who having ſpent the winter at Verona, had now advanced to Pavia, and began hoſtilities againſt the Guelphs. From Pavia he marched to the coaſt of Genoa, Don Henry, and the Romans received him with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; however, during his reſidence at Rome, Henry, according to Malaſpini, formed a conſpiracy againſt him with ſome barons, and propoſed, that after king Charles ſhould be defeated, Conrad and his German friends ſhould be cut off, and the kingdom of Sicily conferred upon him. The army being reinforced with a conſiderable body of Romans, Conrad left Rome on the 10th of Auguſt, and advanced towards Naples in great confidence of ſucceſs, as his army was greatly ſuperior to that of king Charles. by the advice of Alard de S. Valtri, who had ſerved twenty years in the Holy Land, and was then returning to France, divided his ſmall army into three bodies, in conſequence of which he gained a complete victory; for Conrad's troops after defeating the two firſt bodies, imagining they had intirely diſperſed the enemy, laid aſide their helmets, and employed themſelves in collecting the booty, when they were unexpectedly attacked by king Charles, at the head of the third body, and wholly routed. Don Henry was taken priſoner at a monaſtery near Rieti, and delivered to the pope; and young Conrad, with Frederic duke of Auſtria, were diſcovered and ſeized at Aſtura in Campania by the Frangipani, who ſold them to king Charles [h] (E).

THE king having now his competitor in his power, ſatiated his cruel and revengeful diſpoſition with the barbarous execution of his priſoners and rebellious ſubjects. Thoſe cities which favoured Conrad were expoſed without mercy to the inſolence of the conquerors, who burned and deſtroyed Averſa, Potenza, Corneto, and almoſt all the villages of Puglia aud Baſilicata [i]. Many of the Sicilians were likewiſe put to death, and the whole inhabitants of the iſland were reduced in a manner to ſlavery, by new and oppreſſive taxes. The Saracens of Lucera were at laſt obliged to ſurrender, and the widow of the late king Manfred, with her young ſon, being taken priſoners in that city, were ſent to a caſtle near Naples, and put to death. Charles, however, not thinking himſelf yet ſecure in his throne, reſolved to diſpatch his competitor. As his ambition prompted him to think of making conqueſts in Africa and Greece, he was apprehenſive leſt, during his abſence, his ſubjects, particularly the Saracens of Lucera, ſhould make an inſurrection in favour of Conrad: he therefore reſolved upon his death; but as he was not his ſubject, but a priſoner of war, he cloaked his inhumanity by the formality of a trial; ſent for two ſyndics from each of the chief cities of Terra di Lavoro and Principato, and deſired them with the French lords and barons of the kingdom, to give their opinion concerning the German priſoners. The count of Flanders, the king's ſon-in-law, with ſeveral other lords, adviſed to detain them in priſon; but the majority, conſulting their own ſecurity, and the inclination of the king and the biſhops, counſelled their death. Accordingly on the 26th of October, the young prince, who was then but ſeventeen years of age, was conducted, with the duke of Auſtria, Girando da Piſa, and ſome others, to a ſcaffold, in the market-place of Naples, where they were publickly beheaded, to the eternal infamy of king Charles, and the general regret of the ſpectators [k]. Conrad, from the ſcaffold, juſtified his proceeding to the people, and before he ſubmitted to the fatal ſtroke, threw among them a glove, or, according to ſome, a ring, in token of inveſtiture, which pledge, according to Æneas Silvius, was taken up and carried to Peter, the ſon of the king of Arragon [l], though ſome allege, that Conrad intended Don Frederic of Caſtile for his heir (F).

He is publickly beheaded at Naples.

AFTER this barbarous execution, Charles endeavoured to gain the affection of the Puglian barons, by profuſe donations, and beſtowed ſeveral fiefs on ſome French lords, whom he had prevailed upon to remain in Puglia. As he had intirely quieted his new dominions, he made preparations for joining his brother St. Lewis in an expedition to Africa. He accordingly the following ſummer ſailed with a fleet to Tunis, which was then inveſted with an army of French cruſards. An epidemical diſtemper having ſeized the Chriſtian troops, and cut off the king of France, Charles, with the other generals, thought proper to conclude a peace with the king of Tunis, without making himſelf maſter of the city. By this treaty the Mooriſh prince agreed to pay an annual tribute to king Charles, equal to the quit-rent required by the holy ſee for the kingdom of Sicily, on condition that the Tuniſians ſhould enjoy the freedom of navigation in the Sicilian ſeas, and be allowed to trade to Sicily [m]. After the concluſion of the treaty the cruſards left Africa, ſome of them a proceeding under the command of the ſon of the king of England, to Paleſtine, while Charles with his nephew Philip, the new king of France, ſet ſail for Sicily. A few months after their arrival they went to Viterbo, to urge the cardinals to proceed to the election of a pope. Gregory X. was accordingly elected on the firſt of September, after a vacancy of thirty-three months; and arriving the following ſummer at Puglia from the Holy Land, he was received with great honour by Charles, who conducted him through Capitanata and Abruzzo, as far as Campania di Roma. Charles about the ſame time, having been widower three years, married the daughter, according to Coſtanzo, of Baldwin, the titular emperor of Conſtantinople, but according to Maſaſpini and Sigonius, of the duke of Burgundy, which duke, Malaſpini relates, raiſed a conſiderable body of horſe, and conducted them himſelf who ſuppreſſes the Gibellines of Rome and Tuſcany.

CHARLES the year after went to Rome, where he deſtroyed ſeveral caſtles belonging to the Gibellines. He afterwards proceeded with ſome troops, under the banner of the church to Tuſcany, and reducing almoſt all the Gibelline cities, he went and waited upon the pope at Florence, who being bent upon relieving the Chriſtians in Syria, endeavoured to reconcile the two factions in Italy, and had appointed a general council to be held the following year at Lyons. Charles hoped to prevail with the pope to favour his pretended expedition againſt Conſtantinople; but the pope's views being wholly upon a cruſade, and Palæologus offering to unite the Greek church to the Roman, Charles was diſappointed in his expectations, and returned diſſatisfied to Naples, which city, from his arrival in Puglia, he reſolved to make the capi-
c tal of his dominions. The foundation of its preſent magnificence and grandeur, as we have obſerved, was firſt laid by Frederic II. by the univerſity which he erected in it. He beſides frequently made it the place of his reſidence; and the two popes Innocent IV. and Alexander IV. continuing in it with their court a conſiderable time during their conteſt with Manfred, Charles upon his arrival found the city in a moſt flouriſhing ſtate. Being pleaſed with its ſituation, he immediately cauſed Caſtel Nuovo to be rebuilt after the French faſhion, and adorned the city with ſeveral new churches and monaſteries. He repaired and ſtrengthened the fortifications, cauſed the ſtreets of the city to be finely paved with ſquare ſtones, taken out of the Via Appia, and to encourage traffick, made a new market-place, much larger than the former. He particularly enlarged the univerſity, and beſtowed upon it d many new prerogatives and privileges, promiſing his royal protection to the youth of all nations who ſhould come thither to ſtudy. To render the city more illuſtrious, he honoured many of the citizens with the order of knighthood, invited the barons, lords, and great officers of the kingdom, to make it the chief place of their abode, reſolved to make it the ſeat of his parliaments, and repaired and beautified the Seggi or tribunal of the nobles, to whom he confirmed their antient prerogatives (G).

Complaints againſt the king in the council of Lyons. A. D. 1274.

WHILE Charles was thus engaged in embelliſhing Naples, the reſt of the kingdom groaned under oppreſſion; ſo that the archbiſhop of Capua, in hopes of intereſting the pope in favour of the Puglian and Sicilians, made a public recapitulation of their grievances in the general council of Lyons. Gregory, who before he had left Tuſcany had admoniſhed
e the king, ordered two prelates, after diſmiſſing of the council, again to repeat the admonition; and being offended with Charles, for requiring duties from ſome ſhips belonging to the templars and hoſpitallers, that had been loaded with corn in Sicily for the Holy Land, he threatened to proceed againſt him in a judicial mannner [o]. The council being diſſolved, Gregory returned in the following year to Italy, but ſurvived only a few months, and died in the beginning of January. Ten days after his death Innocent V. a native of Tarantaiſe in France, was elected, to the great ſatisfaction of king Charles, who expected to find him more favourable to his ambitious views than his predeceſſor. He accordingly exerciſed his ſenatorial authority in Rome in a more abſolute manner, and received many favours from the pope, who died, however, before he had enjoyed his new dignity ſix months. During his
f pontificate, according to Saba Malaſpini, Charles, by the ceſſion of Mary, daughter of the prince

They were nothing elſe but ſome particular places of the city, for the moſt part near the gates, where the noble families of the ward met for the ſake of converſation, to diſcourſe of the public affairs. In proceſs of time they aſſumed a kind of rank and juriſdiction, ſcrupling to admit the commons into their ſociety, and taxing themſelves ſeparately from them. In the time of Charles, there were twenty-nine Seggi in the city, but at preſent they are reduced to five, and on that account are become more illuſtrious and conſiderable. Theſe five enjoy many prerogatives: they create the ſyndic, who in general parliaments, and in other public functions, in the preſence of the viceroy, repreſents not only the city but the whole kingdom: they chuſe the deputies, who with the deputy of the people, govern the city; and exerciſe many juriſdictions, particularly that of naturalizing ſtrangers, and declaring plebeians to be noble Neapolitans. CHARLES, in the mean time, a few days after the death of Innocent, ſhut up the cardinals in the Lateran palace, according to a canon made in the council of Lyons, to oblige them to haſten the election. Being deſirous to procure a pope in his own intereſt, he ſent in bread and water for the members of the conclave, but privately ſupplied the French cardinals with plenty of victuals, that they might be able to weary out the oppoſite party. His deſign, however, proved ineffectual, for Adrian V. a Genoeſe, was elected, who died thirty-eight days after; yet, during his ſhort reign, is ſaid to have invited the emperor Rodolphus to come into Italy againſt Charles [q]. To avoid the inſolence of the king, he removed his court to Viterbo, where, upon his death, John XXI. or XXII. was elected, and was crowned b on the 20th of September. During his pontificate, which continued only about eight months, the princeſs Mary made a formal renunciation of her rights to the kingdom of Jeruſalem and the principality of Antioch, in favour of Charles, who was with great ſolemnity crowned by the pope [r]. Upon the death of John the Roman ſee was vacant ſix months, during which time king Charles uſed his utmoſt endeavours to procure the election of a French pope; but as there were only three French cardinals and four Italian, cardinal Cajetan, of the family of Orſini, a man of abilities and of an aſpiring temper, was elected pope, and took the name of Nicholas III.

Makes preparations for an expedition againſt Conſtantinople. A. D. 1277.

THE king, about the ſame time, ſent Roger Sanſeverino to take poſſeſſion of the territories ſubject to the princeſs of Antioch, and made great preparations both by ſea and land c againſt Jeruſalem, and likewiſe againſt Palæologus the Greek emperor, in favour of Philip, emperor of Conſtantinople, who was in poſſeſſion only of Negroponte, and ſome maritime places of Greece. Charles at this time, according to Villani, was the moſt powerful prince in Chriſtendom. Beſides his kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and his dominions of Provence and Anjou, he had the kingdom of Tunis and the city of Florence tributary, was deſpotic governor of Rome, had great influence in the Guelph cities of Italy, was acknowleged king of Jeruſalem, was in poſſeſſion of the iſland of Corfu, and was moſt formidable by his numerous forces by ſea and land. At the ſame time he had intirely loſt the affections of the Sicilians, by his moſt arbitrary and oppreſſive government (H), and had diſobliged the pope, by diſdainfully refuſing to give his daughter, or, according to ſome, his grand-daughter, d in marriage to one of the Orſini. Nicholas, piqued at his refuſal, or, according to ſome, irritated againſt him, becauſe he had put one of his relations to death for favouring Conradin, reſolved to humble his pride; and the following year obliged him to reſign the vicariate of the empire, and the dignity of ſenator of Rome [s]. Charles, who was wholly intent upon his expedition againſt Conſtantinople, was eaſily perſuaded to reſign theſe offices; and having received the promiſe of aſſiſtance from the pope, and from France, the following year had prepared an immenſe armament againſt Greece. His fleet conſiſted of upwards of 100 gallies, 30 large ſhips, 200 tranſports, beſides many other ſmaller veſſels, on board of which he intended to embark 10,000 horſe, and a numerous army of foot [t].

THE rumour of this vaſt preparation greatly alarmed Palæologus, who uſed his utmoſt endeavours to render the expedition ineffectual. What chiefly contributed to his ſecurity was his negociation with John di Procida, a noble Salernitan, lord of the iſle of Procida, in the bay of Naples, who had formed a ſcheme for a general revolt in Sicily. John, though a nobleman, was likewiſe a phyſician, and had been counſellor to Frederic II. and Manfred, and even to king Charles [u]. Being ſtript, however, of his eſtate by the king, on pretence of treaſon, and his wife being debauched by the French, he retired to Conſtantia in Arragon, where he was created a baron of the kingdom of Valentia by her huſband king Peter, and lord of Luxen, Benizzano, and Palma. As he was greatly exaſperated againſt the French, e

(H) Malaſpini relates, that he divided the oxen, cows, ſwine, ſheep, horſes, &c. that uſed to feed in his parks and foreſts, among the wealthy husbandmen of Sicily, to be kept by them for his uſe and profit, upon the moſt unjuſt conditions. A ſow was ſuppoſed to litter twice in a year, and to bring each time five pigs. The pigs of the firſt litter were ſuppoſed likewiſe to have young in ſix months; ſo that at the end of the year the poor farmer was obliged to give account to the king's officers of twenty pigs, and at the end of the ſecond, and every year following, for thirty. For every hundred ewes, the king expected ninety lambs, beſides a quantity of wool and cheeſe; and for every yoke of oxen a certain quantity of corn, &c. ſo that it is not to be wondered the Sicilians embraced the firſt opportunity of delivering themſelves from ſuch cruel and inhuman maſters (1).

a he employed many ſpies both in Puglia and Sicily, where he had many friends; and being informed of the diſaffection of the Sicilians to the French, he came to the iſland in diſguiſe, and concerted a plan with the moſt powerful of the malcontents for a revolution in favour of Conſtantia. From thence he went to Conſtantinople; and having ſome ſecret conference with Palæologus, perſuaded him, as the moſt probable means to defeat the expedition of Charles, to aſſiſt the king of Arragon and the Sicilian malcontents. Palæologus accordingly granted him a large ſum of money, and upon his departure ſent one of his ſecretaries along with him, who, landing in Sicily, had a conference with the chief conſpirator. John, having received letters from them to the king of Arragon, diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a Franciſcan, and went to Suriano, in the neighbourhood of Rome; and knowing the declared b enmity of the pope to Charles, he diſcloſed his deſign to his holineſs, who readily entered into his meaſures, wrote to Peter to haſten his armament, promiſing him the inveſtiture of the iſland, as ſoon as he ſhould take poſſeſſion of it; and by refuſing his promiſed ſuccours to Charles, obliged him to delay his expedition. In the beginning of the following year John returned to Arragon; and by ſhewing the letters from the pope and the Sicilian barons, prevailed on Peter to embark in his deſign, by aſſuring him of the aſſiſtance of Palæologus. The king of Arragon accordingly prepared a formidable fleet, under pretence of invading Africa, and, according to Coſtanzo, even received 20,000 ducats from king Charles, who perhaps wanted to have the merit of aſſiſting in a war againſt the infidels [w]. John immediately returned with the Greek ambaſſador to Italy to have further conferences with the c pope, when his enterprize was unexpectedly diſturbed by the death of Nicholas, which happened in the month of Auguſt.

A. D. 1280.

The ſucceeding pope, Martin IV. was a Frenchman, and intirely in the intereſt of king Charles, on whom, the following year, he conferred the ſenatorial dignity of Rome. Procida, however, ſtill reſolved to proſecute his ſcheme; and leaving Italy, had another conference with the conſpirators in Sicily, from whence he again went to Conſtantinople in diſguiſe, and obtained from Palæologus 30,000 ounces of gold, with which he directly returned to Arragon. The death of Nicholas had damped the ardour of Peter; but being urged with great earneſtneſs by John, he again renewed his preparations, which began to alarm the pope and the king of France, who ſent to him, deſiring to know againſt what Saracens he d intended his expedition. Peter refuſing to ſatisfy them, they earneſtly counſelled Charles to guard againſt an invaſion; but the king, in great ſecurity, neglected their advice, and was wholly intent upon forwarding his expedition againſt Conſtantinople, being encouraged by a revolt which had happened in Greece; and to facilitate his enterprize, he prevailed with Martin to denounce a ſentence of excommunication againſt the Greeks, under pretence that they had broken the articles of union concluded a few years before in the council of Lyons.

Martin IV. eſpouſes his intereſt. A. D. 1281.

PETER, in the mean time, continued his preparations with great diligence, intending to put to ſea the following ſummer. Procida had then returned to Palermo, to wait for a favourable opportunity of putting his deſign in execution, which was quickly afforded him by the French. On Eaſter Monday, which happened on the 30th of March, the chief con- e ſpirators had aſſembled at Palermo; and, after dinner, both the Palermitans and the French went in a grand proceſſion to the church of Monreale, about three miles without the city. While they were ſporting in the fields, a bride happened to paſs by with her train, who being obſerved by one Drochettus, a Frenchman, he ran to her, and began to uſe her in a rude manner, under pretence of ſearching for concealed arms. A young Sicilian, flamed with reſentment, ſtabbed him with his own ſword, and a tumult enſuing, 200 French were immediately murdered. The enraged populace then ran to the city, calling out, Let the French die, let the French die; and, without any diſtinction of age or ſex, maſſacred all thoſe of that nation, even in the churches. The conſpirators then left Palermo, and excited the inhabitants to murder the French all over the iſland, excepting in Meſſina, which city at firſt f refuſed to be concerned in the revolt. But being invited by the Palermitans to throw off the French yoke, a few weeks after the citizens, in a tumultuous manner, murdered ſome of the French; and pulling down the arms of king Charles, and erecting thoſe of the city, choſe one Balduin for their governor, who ſaved the remaining French from the fury of the populace, and allowed them to tranſport themſelves, with their wives and children, to Italy [x] (I). Eight thouſand perſons were ſaid to have been murdered.

(I) This is the account given us by Giachetto, Malaſpini, Nicholas Specialis, Bartholomeo de Neocaſtro, and the anonymous writer of the Chronicon of Reggio, all four authors cotemporary to the tranſaction they relate, and the two laſt of them only lately publiſhed in the collection of Muratori. They vary in ſome trifling particulars;

THE archbiſhop of Monreale, upon the firſt tumult in Palermo, immediately ſent an account of it to the pope, who was then in Tuſcany, attended by Charles. The king was greatly alarmed with the news, and in a rage threatened to make the rebels feel his ſevereſt reſentment. Having aſked the aſſiſtance of the pope and Florentines, and ſent for ſuccours from his nephew the king of France, he returned to Naples, and ſent four gallies to join ſeven of Meſſina, which were blocking up Palermo. They had hardly ſailed when he was ſhocked with the news that Meſſina had revolted, and that their gallies had taken thoſe he had ſent from Naples. The Palermitans, in the mean time, before they knew that the Meſſinians had joined in the revolt, on the 27th of April ſent an ambaſſador to Barcelona with an offer of their allegiance to Peter of Arragon, having deſpaired of pardon from king Charles, and the pope having rejected their offer of ſubjection to the apoſtolic ſee. The ambaſſador, after he had proceeded as far as Minorca, was driven by a north wind to the coaſt of Africa, where he found king Peter, who at firſt ſeemed to condemn the proceedings of the Sicilians; but ſcrupled not, however, to accept of the offered allegiance. His firſt difficulty was to prevail with his army of cruſards to engage in his deſign. Several of them, awed by the dread of the pope's reſentment, and the formidable power of Charles, abſolutely refuſed to invade Sicily, and returned to Spain; but the reſt were eaſily perſuaded to aſſert the rights of Conſtantia and her children.

MEAN while Charles, whoſe reſentment was now chiefly directed againſt the Meſſinians, having received 600 horſe from Florence, and ſuccours from France, and many cities in Lombardy, on the 10th of June arrived at Catena, on the coaſt of Calabria, with an army of 90,000 foot and 24,000 horſe, beſides his forces by ſea, conſiſting of upwards of 200 veſſels great and ſmall. On the 25th of July he tranſported the greateſt part of his army over the Straits, and inveſted Meſſina both by ſea and land, which, though badly fortified, made a moſt vigorous defence. As the pope had ſent a cardinal legate to Sicily to act as mediator, they ſolicited him to prevail with the king to pardon them; but Charles rejected their conditions, and inſiſted upon their ſurrendering at diſcretion, though he is ſaid by Malaſpini and Villani to have ſounded a retreat when ſome of his men had entered the city, and might have taken it by aſſault. Bartholomeo de Neocaſtro, on the contrary, gives a minute account of the fruitleſs attacks of the French, and of the unwearied ardour even of the ladies of the city in aſſiſting in its defence. According to him, Charles, after he had continued ſix weeks before the place, and loſt a great many of his men, about the middle of September ſent a carte blanche to the governor, on condition he would deliver up the city.

HE now began to find the rebellion more formidable than he expected; for, above a fortnight before, his competitor had landed with his forces at Trapani; and, being immediately joined by the Sicilian barons, was conducted to Palermo, where he was crowned king of Sicily with great ſolemnity. Charles, upon hearing this news, ſoon hearkened to humble counſels; and being apprehenſive leſt his retreat to Italy ſhould be cut off, as great part of his ſailors had died, he pillaged and deſtroyed the churches about Meſſina, and on the 27th of September raiſed the ſiege, and with great precipitation tranſported his army to Calabria. He had been ſtruck with a panic upon being informed that the Arragonian fleet was advancing to the Straits under the command of Roger di Loria, a refugee Calabrian, who actually arrived the day after he had tranſported his army, and took twenty-nine of his gallies; and then, proceeding to Catena and Reggio, burnt eighty of his tranſports in preſence of his

culars; but Fazellus, Spondanus, Giannone, and ſeveral others, relate, that on the ſame day, and at the ſame hour of the day, at the ringing of the bell for veſpers, or evening prayers, the French all over the iſland were maſſacred, without diſtinction of age, ſex, or rank, not only by laymen, but alſo by the Dominicans, Franciſcans, and other monks; and that the rage of the murderers was ſo furious, that they did not even ſpare their own relations, but ript up thoſe Sicilian women who were with child by Frenchmen, and daſhed their infants againſt the walls; the whole maſſacre being over in two hours. We have preferred the other relation, being perſuaded, that though the conſpiracy had been concerted for near three years with an amazing ſecrecy, yet its being put in execution on Eaſter Monday was accidental, as it is plain the conſpirators acted precipitately, and, inſtead of being diſperſed through the iſland, were aſſembled in Palermo; that the city of Meſſina, which was one of the chief quarters of the French, at firſt afforded them protection, and diſapproved of the proceedings of the Palermitans, which were indeed furious and execrable; that it was almoſt a month before the revolt became general, and even then the Sicilian cities choſe particular governors, and formed a kind of aſſociation, like a republic, without acknowleging any king; ſo that it would appear they were not all privy to the deſigns of the conſpirators in favour of Peter, as is generally imagined. Bartholomeo de Neocaſtro likewiſe informs us, that Peter did not ſail from Spain before the 16th of May; and that then he employed his forces in beſieging a city of Africa, deſigning perhaps to ſail in the end of ſummer to Sicily, when Charles ſhould be abſent with his fleet in Greece. Whereas, if the conſpiracy had been general, and the day of its execution fixed for Eaſter, in all probability his fleet would have been then off the coaſts of Sicily to have ſeconded the attempts of his friends.

Notwithſtanding the exaſperated rage of the murderers, they ſpared one William Porcellet, a noble Provençal, on account of his diſtinguiſhed worth and probity (1).

MESSINA being thus unexpectedly relieved, when it had only three days proviſions remaining, Peter, who at firſt heſitated whether he ſhould venture with his ſmall force to continue in the iſland, advanced towards the city, and entered it in triumph in the beginning of October. A few weeks after a Dominican friar came to him as ambaſſador from Charles, accuſing him of perfidy in invading his dominions in time of peace, and, according to Bartholomeo, challenged him to decide the diſpute by ſingle combat. Other authors ſay, that Peter, in his anſwer to this embaſſy, challenged Charles. However it be, both the kings agreed to meet the following year, on the 1ſt of June, at Bourdeaux, then ſubject to the king
b of England, attended each by 100 knights, and to decide their quarrel by an engagement. In conſequence of this agreement, the articles of which are publiſhed in Rymer's Fœdera [z], the king of Naples appointed his ſon prince Charles as lieutenant of Puglia during his abſence, and the following ſpring ſailed from Lucca to Marſeilles to fulfil his engagement. Peter, in the mean time, ſent for his queen Conſtantia to Sicily, with his two ſons, Don James and Don Frederic, and one of his daughters, Violante; and propoſing ſoon to go to France, he cauſed the Sicilians to ſwear allegiance to Don James, as his lawful ſucceſſor and heir. Thus Charles, having neglected to uſe vigour in cruſhing his rival, and imprudently agreeing to a duel, the two kingdoms were formally disjoined; Naples becoming the royal ſeat of the French, and Palermo of the Arragonians.

The two kings agree to decide their quarrel by a duel.

c PETER, not having the duel ſo much at heart as Charles, employed the following ſpring in making conqueſts in Calabria. At length, being urged by his brother, he left Italy; and having ſettled the affairs of Sicily, on the 11th of May he ſet ſail for Valentia, where he arrived on the 19th of the ſame month. As he had only a few days to perform the reſt of the journey, he immediately ordered his knights to aſſemble, and, in the mean time, endeavoured to inform himſelf of the proceedings of his competitor. The pope had prohibited the duel under pain of excommunication, and in the end of March this year depoſed Peter from all his dominions. Edward king of England had peremptorily refuſed to ſecure the place of combat, and the king of France had accompanied king Charles within a day's march of Bourdeaux with 3000, ſome ſay with 6000 horſe; but, according to Bartholomeo, d with 20,000 horſe and 50,000 foot. Peter reſolving to ſave his honour, and at the ſame time to elude the deſigns of his enemies, diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a ſquire, and accompanied three of his knights, likewiſe diſguiſed, to Bourdeaux, where, on the morning of the day appointed for the action, he preſented himſelf before the marſhal of the king of England, as a meſſenger from Peter, to excuſe his non-appearance, becauſe Charles had broken the articles by filling the place with his enemies. At the end of his harangue he diſcovered himſelf; and leaving his armour, ſword, and lance, with the marſhal, and a writing, with his ſeal affixed, to teſtify that he had appeared on the day appointed, he immediately mounted his horſe, and returned with all ſpeed to Arragon [a]. The French authors allege, that Peter never appeared; and others, that he preſented himſelf to the marſhal in the evening, e after Charles and his knights had rode all day in the field waiting for him. Peter thus eluded his enemy; and by making him loſe a campaign, eſtabliſhed his own authority in Sicily without oppoſition. Charles, and his nephew king Philip, returned vexed and diſappointed to Paris. The pope, likewiſe enraged that his favourite had been thus baffled, again denounced a ſentence of excommunication and depoſition againſt Peter, ordering a cruſade to be preached againſt him, and conferring his hereditary kingdom of Arragon upon Charles Valois, the ſecond ſon of the king of France, on condition of his becoming a vaſſal of the holy ſee, and paying the yearly quit-rent of 500 livres [b]. Peter treated this ſentence of Martin with great contempt, appealed to a future pope, and threatened to tranſport an army of Moors into France and Italy.

Peter invades Calabria. A. D. 1283.

f Don James, in the mean time, quelled an inſurrection of ſome barons in Sicily, and the famous Roger di Loria gained ſeveral advantages over the fleets of the enemy. The following year he ſurpriſed twenty Provençal gallies in the harbour of Malta, and, after a deſperate engagement, took ten of them; in conſequence of which victory the caſtle ſurrendered, and the whole iſland acknowleged Peter. From thence he immediately ſailed to the coaſt of Naples, being informed that prince Charles had given orders to equip a conſiderable fleet in different places of Puglia. Having intercepted a ſmall veſſel from king Charles, by which he found that he had put to ſea with a fleet from Provence, he immediately ſailed to the harbour of Naples, and by his bravadoes tempted the prince and the Neapolitans to come to fight him. As Loria had done a great deal of damage on the coaſt, and his fleet was not numerous,
g Charles contrary to his father's orders, put to ſea with a conſiderable number of gallies, attended by a great many of the French and Neapolitan nobility, who, confident of victory, ordered a grand entertainment to be provided for the evening. Loria, pretending to fly, drew them a good way from the ſhore, then attacked them with great reſolution, and ſoon gained a complete victory. Many of the gallies flying, and others coming over to him, he ſurrounded the prince's galley, and took him and his retinue priſoners [c]. Two days after this action, which happened on the 23d of June, king Charles arrived with fifty-five armed gallies, and many other veſſels, at Gaeta. Being informed of his ſon's captivity, and that, after the engagement, the mob in Naples had run through the ſtreets, calling out, Down with king Charles, and up with Roger di Loria, he immediately haſtened thither with the intention of burning the city; but at the interceſſion of the cardinal legate and the nobles, he landed; and cauſing about 150 of the chief rioters to be hanged, he pardoned the reſt [d]. The prince of Salerno, in the mean time, was condemned to be beheaded by a general aſſembly of the Sicilian deputies, by way of repriſal for the execution of Conradin; but Conſtantia, with great generoſity and magnanimity, ſaved his life; making the cruelty of Charles thereby appear more deteſtable.

KING Charles, as a condition of his pardon to the Neapolitans, obliged them to fit out a conſiderable number of gallies, and having reinforced his fleet, he ſailed in the month of July with 158 veſſels towards Meſſina, with the deſign of making another deſcent upon the iſland; but the Sicilians declaring, if he landed any men, they would immediately put the prince of Salerno to death, he ſteered his courſe to Calabria, and beſieged Reggio, which in the beginning of the former year had been taken by Peter. Though he inveſted the place by ſea and land with a powerful army, yet by the vigour of the beſieged his attempt proved fruitleſs, and he was obliged to retire with his forces to Catena, where a few weeks after his whole fleet was almoſt deſtroyed by a ſtorm [e]. Loria, in the mean time, took and plundered ſeveral places on the coaſt of Calabria; and after Charles had retired with his forces towards Naples, he paſſed over to Africa, and gained ſeveral advantages over the Moors, many thouſands of whom he carried ſlaves to Sicily.

His death.

DURING his expedition in Africa, Charles was making great preparations againſt the Sicilians; but falling ſick at Foggia, on his way to Brindiſi, after a ſhort illneſs he died in that city on the 7th of January. According to a certain author, he was ſo oppreſſed with melancholy and deſpair, that he ſtrangled himſelf with a halter [f]; but according to Villani, he died with great penitence, and received the viaticum. As his ſon and heir was then a priſoner, Charles, by his laſt will, left his couſin the count of Artois, who had come with a reinforcement of troops from France, as regent of the kingdom [g]. Pope Martin, however, made pretence, that the king, when paſſing to Bourdeaux, had left the adminiſtration of the kingdom to him, immediately appointed the cardinal legate as governor [h], who, of his own authority, called a parliament of the barons and prelates at Melphis, Mary the wife of the captive prince, and the regent, being obliged to wink at his uſurpations [i].

ROGER di Loria, in the mean time, harraſſed the Neapolitan coaſts with continual deſcents. He took Cotrone, Catanzaro, Callipolis, Tarento, and ſeveral other places; but the king of France having invaded Catalonia with an army of near 100,000 men, he left the coaſts of Italy, and, at the deſire of Peter, ſailed with his fleet for Spain, where he arrived on the 26th of September. The king of France, by this time, had taken Perpignan, and, after a long ſiege, had made himſelf maſter of Girona; but an epidemical diſtemper carrying off great part of his army, and likewiſe raging on board his fleet, ſo that he could now only man fifty-five gallies, though he had ſailed thither with 210 veſſels, he reſolved to march back with all haſte to France [k]. Roger, after having a conference with Peter in Barcelona, ſailed from thence with forty-eight gallies, and on the firſt of October at night attacked the French fleet in the harbour of Roſes, and took and burnt upwards of forty veſſels. Three days after, meeting with a rich galleon and twelve gallies, coming with money and proviſions to the French army, he ſhewed French colours; and going on board them with his men as friends, immediately made prize of them. Theſe loſſes ſo effected the king of France, that he ſecretly repaſſed the Pyrenees, and died a few days after at Perpignan. Peter ſurvived him only a few weeks; and dying on the 11th of November at Villa Franca, he left the kingdom of Arragon to his eldeſt ſon Alphonſus, and Sicily to Don James, who, in caſe Alphonſus ſhould die without male iſſue, was to enjoy both kingdoms.

Soon after he ſent two ambaſſadors to pope Honorius, who a few months before had ſucceeded Martin, to deſire his holineſs to pardon the Sicilians, and to accept of his obedience. Honorius, however, refuſed to grant the requeſt of the ambaſſadors, and excommunicated both king James and his brother Alphonſus. Mean while Charles prince of Salerno, who was now a priſoner in Arragon, being deſirous of regaining his liberty, prevailed with Edward king of England to treat with Alphonſus for that purpoſe. The two kings accordingly had a conference at Oleron in Bearn, where a treaty was drawn up for the prince's liberty; but the articles of it diſpleaſing the pope, in the beginning of March he wrote to Charles, ſeverely blaming him for treating without the conſent of the apoſtolic ſee. Hono-

In the mean time, while Roger di Loria was abſent with a few gallies ravaging the coaſts of Provence, the cardinal legate, at the perſuaſion of two friars, who, ſome time before, had been ſpies in Sicily, cauſed to embark 500 horſe and 150 foot, who landing on the iſland ſurpriſed the city of Agoſta. The Sicilians were greatly alarmed; and Loria arriving at Meſſina, they murmured loudly againſt him for neglecting the defence of the coaſts; but
c the admiral, by working night and day in the dock, and even perſuading the women and children to give their aſſiſtance, in ſix days repaired and refitted 40 gallies, and on the 13th of May ſurpriſed Agoſta, after a moſt obſtinate diſpute, in which he was twice driven to his ſhips. Having left king James beſieging the caſtle, he went in queſt of the enemy's fleet; and, arriving at Sorrento, went into the harbour in the diſguiſe of a fiſherman, where he found upwards of 80 gallies, and a formidable army encamped on the ſhore, with the intention of embarking for Sicily. Returning to his fleet, he ſent a challenge to the Neapolitan admiral to come out to fight him. The Neapolitans, truſting to their numbers, accordingly put to ſea, the cardinal legate encouraging them by indulgences, the gallies alſo being commanded by counts, and attended each by two ſmaller veſſels with a ſpare crew. Notwithſtanding the d manifeſt ſuperiority of his enemies, Loria, after he had drawn them about ſix miles from ſhore, made no difficulty of attacking them; and though at firſt they obtained ſome advantages, yet in the end he gained a complete victory, and took 42 of their gallies, on board of which were upwards of 5000 men. The cardinal legate, upon this defeat, being afraid of an inſurrection of the Neapolitans, at their requeſt agreed to a truce betwixt them and the Sicilians for two years.

As ſeveral cities in Calabria were held by the Sicilians, James, in the beginning of the following year, went over thither with 400 horſe and 10,000 foot, and reduced ſeveral other places. The city of Gaeta in the mean time offering to ſubmit to him, he embarked his forces about the end of June, and ſailed thither. Upon his arrival, however, finding the e gates ſhut, and that his friends durſt not diſcover themſelves, he attacked the city, which made a vigorous defence. According to Bartholomeo de Neocaſtro, an eye-witneſs, the ſiege muſt have continued more than 15 months; for the following year, while king James remained with his army before the city, Charles, prince of Salerno, arrived at Rieti, where he was crowned king of Sicily by pope Nicholas, the ſucceſſor of Honorius.

Charles crowned king of Sicily at Rieti.
A. D. 1289.

King Charles had recovered his liberty the October preceding, in conſequence of a treaty concluded with Alphonſus by the mediation of the king of England. Nicholas IV. ſhewing himſelf ſomewhat more condeſcending than Honorius, the kings Edward and Alphonſus had a conference in a village on the top of the Pyrenees; and Charles, being likewiſe conducted thither, was ſet at liberty, on giving his ſecond ſon, with his two brothers, and 60 Pro- f vençal knights, as hoſtages for the performance of the treaty made at Oleron, the principal articles of which were, that he ſhould prevail with Charles of Valois to renounce his right to Arragon, perſuade the king of France to agree to a peace with Alphonſus, ſolicit his holineſs to take off the interdiction from Arragon, and, if theſe articles were not performed, he ſhould return again within three years to his priſon. The article concerning the renunciation of Sicily in favour of king James was omitted [1].

CHARLES, upon recovering his liberty, went directly to France, to perſuade king Philip and his brother Charles to a peace with Alphonſus. His endeavours, however, being un-ſucceſsful, he proceeded to Italy, and uſed his interceſſion with the pope in behalf of Arragon. a

But Nicholas, ſeeing the king now at liberty, conceived new hopes of recovering Sicily; therefore, inſtead of hearkening to peace, he abſolved him from his agreement with the king of Arragon, and, after crowning him king of the Two Sicilies, he raiſed a large body of cruſards and Guelphs from Tuſcany and Lombardy, and ſent them with a cardinal legate to Gaeta, againſt king James. Bartholomeo informs us, that there were women, and even dogs, that were cruſards in this expedition, and that he ſaw the women cut to pieces by the Meſſinians, and dogs licking their blood [m]. As king Charles likewiſe arrived at the ſiege with a reinforcement from Naples, James, in his turn, began to be hemmed in, and even made propoſals for an accommodation. and threatening, that if he did not agree to a peace with James and his brothers, that his maſter would eſpouſe their cauſe, Nicholas ſent a legate with the Engliſh ambaſſador to the ſiege, who prevailed on both the kings to agree to a truce for two years, to the great diſcontent of the count d'Artois, and the other French lords, who, judging that Charles had thereby put it out of his power ever to recover Sicily, returned in diſguſt to France [n].

After the departure of the Sicilians, Charles, in conſideration of the vigorous defence made by the Gaetans, exempted them from all taxes for five years [o]; and upon his return to Naples, in the month of September, being informed of the death of Ladiſlaus, king of Hungary, without iſſue, cauſed his eldeſt ſon Charles Martel to be crowned king of that kingdom, in right of his mother queen Mary, ſiſter of Ladiſlaus. The king of Sicily in the mean c time was ſolicited earneſtly by the pope to engage in a cruſade for the relief of the Holy Land; but his old counſellors, after recapitulating the perfidiouſneſs of the holy ſee to his great grandfather Frederic II. and ſhewing him that Nicholas, during his abſence, would probably endeavour to cauſe a revolution in Sicily, James ſent John di Procida to Rome, to urge his holineſs to be reconciled to the Sicilians, aud to accept of his obedience. Nicholas, however, ſtill remained inflexible, and told Procida, that he could determine nothing as to Sicily, as he had already commiſſioned two legates to go to Aix in Provence, to treat of a to conſent to the reſtitution of Sicily to the family of Anjou. Though, to forward the peace with Alphonſus, king Charles left Naples, and proceeded to France, yet the negociations for ſome time proceeded very ſlowly. At length the pope's legates preſſing the king of France and his brother to ſuſpend their warlike preparations againſt Arragon, and Charles even declaring, that, if the war continued, he would return to his priſon, a peace was concluded on the 2d of February betwixt Alphonſus and the French, without including the Sicilians, to whom Alphonſus promiſed to give no further aſſiſtance.

After the concluſion of the treaty, Charles went to Genoa, where he hired ſixty gallies, to be ready the following year for the invaſion of Sicily, and afterwards went to Figheres in Spain, where he had a friendly interview with the king of Arragon. The Sicilians in the mean time were greatly alarmed to find themſelves abandoned by the Catalans; but an un- e expected event in ſome meaſure relieved them from their apprehenſions, and baffled the deſigns of their enemies. Alphonſus, after he had ſent ambaſſadors to England, to conduct his queen, the daughter of king Edward, to Arragon, died about the middle of June, after a ſhort illneſs. The news of his death ſoon arriving in Sicily, king James immediately appointed his brother Don Frederic as regent of the iſland, and embarked for Spain, where he landed about the middle of Auguſt, and, being ſolemnly crown at Barcelona, immediately entered into an alliance with the king of Caſtile, and married his daughter Elizabeth [*].

A few months after, the Sicilians being alarmed with the news of the armament of the Genoeſe, and a rumour prevailing, that the gallies of Genoa had begun hoſtilities againſt the Sicilian veſſels, Don Frederic ſent an ambaſſador, to repreſent to the republic the im- f prudence of contributing to the aggrandizing the French; in conſequence of which embaſſy the Genoeſe were perſuaded to lay aſide their armament, and confirmed an ancient law againſt making war upon the Sicilians. Roger di Loria, about the ſame time arriving from Catalonia, ſailed to the coaſt of Calabria, and landing with ſome of his ſailors, attacked and defeated a body of French that had marched thither againſt the cities ſubject to the Sicilians. From thence ſailing towards Greece, he took the iſlands of Corfu, Malvaſia, and Chios, probably becauſe the emperor had allowed ſome of the maritime places to be garriſoned by the French. KING James, in the mean time having refuſed to ſtand to the treaty concluded betwixt his brother and the king of France, Arragon was again threatened with an invaſion. The French, however, were prevented from acting by the death of Nicholas, and ſoon after by a difference betwixt king Philip and Edward of England, which quickly broke out into an open war. While the Roman ſee was kept vacant by the diſſenſions of the cardinals, and the attention of the French was engaged upon the diſpute with the king of England, king Charles received ſecret intelligence of the deſigns of Loria againſt Amalfi and the Neapolitan coaſts. As his diſpoſition was naturally pacific, and his kingdom had ſuffered greatly b by the continual bad ſucceſs of the war, he began ſeriouſly to think of peace, and accordingly ſent the maſter of the Teutonic order to Arragon, with preliminary articles of an accommodation, propoſing an immediate ceſſation of arms, which ſhould continue for a year after the election of the pope. The Sicilian deputies remonſtrated with great warmth againſt this propoſal; but James, having then ſome ſecret view, accepted of the offer, and in the month of November had a conference with king Charles at Juncaria, near the Pyrenees [q].

He agrees to a truce with king Charles.

THE following year, in the month of June, Celeſtine V. an old monk of great ſimplicity and auſterity, being elected pope, after the Roman ſee had continued vacant 27 months, Charles preſſed him to accept of the dignity, and received him with great honour at Naples, c hoping, that as he had been one of his ſubjects, he would obtain from him whatever he deſired. The humility of the pope, however, diſappointed his expectations; for Celeſtine, after he had enjoyed the pontificate five months, reſigned his dignity; but at the king's deſire, before his abdication, he conferred the cardinal's hat upon ſeven Frenchmen and five Italians, all devoted to the intereſt of Charles. By the influence of theſe twelve cardinals, king Charles procured the election of Boniface VIII. who is ſaid to have uſed ſome artifices to prompt Celeſtine to reſign, and, after his abdication, to have made an offer of his ſervice to the king, on condition of being elected pope [r].

BONIFACE, who was of a diſpoſition very different from his predeceſſor, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity and ſkill in the management of affairs, to ſhew his grati-
d tude to Charles, in the beginning of the following year ordered king James to reſign the kingdom of Sicily, under pain of being excommunicated, and depoſed from his kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia. The king of France and Charles of Valois at the ſame time making preparations for another expedition into Arragon, James, by the advice of his nobles, ſent four ambaſſadors to Rome, deſiring the mediation of the pope. A perpetual peace was accordingly concluded, in the beginning of June on theſe conditions: That the pope ſhould declare the marriage of James with the daughter of the king of Caſtile null and void; that king James ſhould marry the daughter of king Charles, reſtore Sicily, and all the places he poſſeſſed on the other ſide the Pharo, to him; that Charles of Valois ſhould renounce all pretenſions to Arragon, in lieu of which he ſhould receive the counties of Anjou and Forcalquier; that the e hoſtages for king Charles ſhould be ſet at liberty; that the pope ſhould take off the interdiction from Arragon; and that James, king of the Balleares, ſhould be reſtored to his dominions [s]. What were the motives which induced king James to deſert the Sicilians, and to aſſent to this ſurpriſing peace, is uncertain. It is probable he was influenced by the hopes given him by the pope, of being put in poſſeſſion of the iſlands of Corſica and Sardinia.

Boniface VIII. mediates a peace betwixt them. A. D. 1295.

AFTER the concluſion of the treaty, Don Frederic, with Roger di Loria, John di Procida, and ſeveral other Sicilian lords, arrived in the neighbourhood of Rome, where they were earneſtly ſolicited by the pope to agree to the delivering up of the iſland. The grand-daughter of the emperor Baldwin, and heireſs of the empire of Conſtantinople, was offered in mar-
f riage to Don Frederic; and the pope promiſed to uſe all his intereſt and power to put him in poſſeſſion of Greece, on condition he would aſſent to the peace. Frederic refuſed to give his conſent before he ſhould conſult the Sicilians, whom, upon his return to Sicily, he found in the greateſt commotion, on account of the news of the peace. By the advice of the queen dowager Conſtantia, deputies were immediately ſent to Arragon, who having in vain endeavoured to prevail with king James not to abandon the Sicilians, obtained a formal renunciation of his right in writing, and returned to Sicily. They had no ſooner publiſhed the anſwer of the king of Arragon, than the lords and people, with great unanimity and zeal, declared Don Frederic king, and appointed the 25th of March for his coronation. Boniface in the mean time, in hopes of perſuading them to ſubmit to king Charles, ſent a carte

blanche to them by a legate, ſealed with the pontifical ſeal, deſiring them to make their own terms; but one of the nobles, drawing his ſword, ordered the legate immediately to quit the kingdom, and declared that they would procure peace by their ſwords, and not by parchments. a

A. D. 1296. FREDERIC, after the ceremony of his coronation, declared his intention of proſecuting the war with vigour, and received the moſt affectionate aſſurances of the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects. Having ordered Roger di Loria to equip the fleet, he paſſed over from Meſſina to Reggio, and, aſſembling an army, advanced into Calabria, and took Squillace, after which he reduced the city and county of Catanzara. Several other places likewiſe ſurrendered to him; but being informed that his brother king James had arrived at Rome, had obtained from the pope the inveſtiture of Sardinia, and was appointed ſtandard-bearer of the church, with the deſign of aſſiſting king Charles againſt the Sicilians, he left his army in Calabria under the command of Blaſco de Alagona, and returned to Sicily. After his departure, Roger di Loria took Lecce and Otranto, the laſt of which he fortified, and afterwards made a bold though unſucceſsful attempt upon Brindiſi.

A. D. 1297. KING James, in the mean time, having in vain endeavoured to draw his brother to a conference in the iſland of Iſchia, ſent for his mother and her daughter Violante to Rome, where the following ſpring the young princeſs was married to Robert, duke of Calabria, the ſecond ſon of king Charles. John di Procida and Roger di Loria accompanied Conſtantia to Rome, in which city Procida ſpent the reſt of his days. But Roger, having the year before had ſeveral differences with Frederic, which were inflamed by his enemies, now deſerted his party, and, by the interceſſion of the pope and James of Arragon, was reconciled to king Charles, who, upon his return to Naples, not only reſtored him to all his ancient lands in Calabria, Baſilicata, and Principato, but gave him many others, and appointed him high admiral of both kingdoms. Frederic, upon being informed that Roger had entered into the ſervice of king Charles, immediately proclaimed him a traitor, and beſieged the caſtles belonging to him in Sicily, which were quickly reduced. Roger in the mean time, being highly exaſperated againſt Frederic, proceeded to Calabria with a large body of horſe, and beſieged Catanzara, which willingly ſurrendered to him. However, before he could reduce the caſtle, Blaſco de Alagona arrived with ſome forces to its relief. Roger immediately attacked him; but was received with ſuch firmneſs and courage, that his troops were entirely routed, and he himſelf being wounded, and his horſe killed, with great difficulty made his eſcape [t].

As the king of Arragon about the ſame time had arrived at Rome with a conſiderable fleet, Frederic appointed Conrad Doria, a Genoeſe, as his admiral, and, going on board himſelf, ſailed with ſeventy-four gallies to the coaſts of Naples, to intercept his brother. He thought proper, however, not to wait for him, but returned to Sicily, and was immediately followed by James and Loria, who made a deſcent upon the iſland, and reduced Patti, Melazzo, Nucera, Monteforte, and ſeveral other caſtles in that neighbourhood. As that coaſt was dangerous in winter, they left garriſons in the places they had taken, and ſailed through the Pharo to Syracuſe, which city they inveſted by ſea and land. The city making a vigorous defence, they employed their army in reducing Buacura, Palacioli, and ſeveral other towns and caſtles. Frederic in the mean time arrived with his army at Catania, where he was ſoon alarmed with the news that three caſtles belonging to one Bereſius, and one of them in the middle of the iſland, had revolted to king James. Roger di Loria likewiſe ventured to march by land with 300 horſe to recover Patti, which had expelled the Catalonian garriſon, while his relation John di Loria ſailed round from Syracuſe with twenty gallies. John, upon paſſing by Meſſina, was attacked by the gallies of that city, and, after a ſharp engagement was taken, with ſixteen of his ſhips; upon which news the king of Arragon, as he had already loſt 18,000 men before Syracuſe, thought proper to re-imbark his army, and return to Naples. After his departure, Frederic quickly reduced almoſt all the places he had taken; and, being informed that James was making preparations for a ſecond invaſion, he immediately equipped forty gallies, and put to ſea. The two fleets met off Cape Orlando on the 4th of July, when Frederic with great reſolution attacked the enemy, though greatly ſuperior to him in number. The ſucceſs, however, did not anſwer his eager hopes; for, after a moſt bloody engagement, he was entirely defeated, and loſt twenty-two gallies, the officers of which were cruelly put to death by Roger di Loria, in revenge for the death of his relation John, who had been executed as a rebel. The king of Arragon, after this ſignal victory, returned with the Catalan veſſels to his own dominions, alleging, that the affairs of the Sicilians were now ſo deſperate, that his aſſiſtance would be no longer needed, though he is ſuſpected by ſeveral authors of never having been really zealous for the ſucceſs of the war, and to have retired, to prevent his brother from being intirely ruined.

a FREDERIC, upon his return, being comforted by the Meſſinians, immediately publiſhed an account of the engagement, and ordered the whole iſland to prepare for the moſt vigorous defence. The duke of Calabria and Roger di Loria in the mean time landed their troops; but the firſt city which they ſummoned refuſed to ſurrender to them. The duke, by the advice of Loria, retired from thence, and marched to Adernio and Paternio, both which places, though inacceſſible, and ſtrongly fortified, ſurrendered to them without oppoſition; by which means his army, which began to be in great want, was furniſhed with plenty of proviſions. Several other places imitated the example of theſe cities. At length Catania revolted, and was followed by Raguſa, and many other cities; ſo that a report prevailing, that more than one half of the iſland had declared for king Charles, Boniface b ſent the cardinal Gerard of Parma thither as his legate, to perſuade the Sicilians to ſurrender without oppoſition. Roger di Loria aſſured the duke, that the Sicilians were not to be ſubdued by excommunications and the tinkling of a maſs-bell; he therefore ſent for freſh ſuccours from Naples. His brother, the prince of Tarento, accordingly embarked with 600 horſe and 1000 foot, and landed in that part of Sicily called the Valley of Mazara; but a few days after, on the 1ſt of December, he was attacked at Falconara by Frederic, and intirely routed, he himſelf being taken priſoner, with the greateſt part of his men.

His brother is defeated, and taken priſoner.

Upon the news of this defeat, Boniface wrote to king Charles, reproving him ſeverely for having committed the care of the war to the young princes who had no experience, and at the ſame time he ſent for Charles of Valois from France, allowing him the tythes of the eccle- c ſiaſtical revenues of that kingdom to ſupport his expedition, expreſly prohibiting king Charles to make any convention with the Sicilians, till the arrival of his couſin. Charles, to appeaſe the pope, the following year publiſhed an edict, ordering all the Saracens of Lucera to embrace Chriſtianity, or leave his dominions. Loria in the mean time returned to Naples, to haſten more ſuccours, charging the duke not to venture an engagement with the Sicilians during his abſence. Frederic, however, found means of drawing a large party of the French and Neapolitans into an ambuſcade, and intirely cut them off; which victory gave freſh ſpirits to the Sicilians, who again put a fleet to ſea, conſiſting of thirty-two gallies, under the command of Doria. The admiral, after ravaging the Neapolitan coaſts, imprudently ventured an engagement with Roger di Loria, who ſailed from Naples with forty- d eight gallies, and, after a ſhort diſpute, he was obliged to ſurrender to Roger, and loſt twenty of his gallies. Soon after, duke Robert, being informed that the Meſſinians were diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, ſailed with his army from Catania, and encamped before their city, while his general in Calabria inveſted Reggio, and his fleet lay before both cities. Meſſina was quickly reduced to great diſtreſs; but being relieved by Frederic, and the army of duke Robert beginning in its turn to want proviſions, the ſiege was raiſed, and, by the interceſſion of Violante, Robert's wife, and ſiſter to Frederic, the two princes had a conference at Syracuſe, and agreed to a truce for ſix months. Robert, leaving his wife with her infant ſon in Sicily, immediately ſailed with Roger di Loria to Naples, promiſing quickly to return with a ſtrong army. He was detained, however, longer on the continent than he e expected; and the truce expiring in the beginning of the following year, Frederic, without delay, renewed his hoſtilities.

CHARLES of Valois in the mean time, arriving in Italy, had a conference with the pope at Anagni. As he had lately married the only daughter of Philip, the titular emperor of Conſtantinople, Boniface gave him hopes of ſucceeding to that empire; in order to which ſucceſſion, he ſhewed him the neceſſity of firſt reducing Sicily, that his couſin king Charles might be at leiſure to aſſiſt him: great preparations were accordingly made for invading the iſland with a formidable armament in the ſpring. Boniface is even ſaid to have propoſed Charles of Valois as emperor of Germany, from his hatred to Albert of Auſtria; and, while the preparations were carrying on at Naples, he created him Paciare, or Pacificator of d Tuſcany, as though the empire had been vacant [u].

After. Charles had ſpent three or four months at Florence, where, by the exerciſe of his new authority, he increaſed the troubles and confuſions, he returned to Naples in the ſpring, and embarking with a formidable army, attended with the duke of Calabria and Roger di Loria, landed in Sicily, in the Valley of Mazara. Frederic, not being able to oppoſe him in the field, kept at a diſtance with his army, and by frequent ſkirmiſhes, and intercepting of convoys, ſoon reduced his enemy to great diſtreſs. Charles, finding it impoſſible to execute any enterprize of importance, as he had loſt almoſt all his horſes; and conſidering that, if he could put an end to the war, he would be aſſiſted in his expedition againſt Conſtantinople, both by Frederic and king Charles, he therefore perſuaded the duke of Calabria to propoſe an accommodation, and afterwards had a perſonal conference with

Frederic. A congreſs being agreed to, the peace was at length concluded on the 31ſt of Auguſt, on theſe conditions: That Frederic ſhould marry Eleonora, the daughter of king Charles, and ſhould keep poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Sicily, under the name of Trinacria; that he ſhould reſtore all the places he held in Calabria to king Charles, who ſhould immediately evacuate Sicily; that all priſoners ſhould be ſet at liberty, and thoſe who had changed ſides during the war ſhould be reciprocally deprived of their eſtates in each kingdom, excepting Roger di Loria, who ſhould be allowed to hold the caſtle of Jacia in Sicily, and Vinciguerra, who ſhould ſtill retain three caſtles on the coaſt of Calabria; that king Charles ſhould prevail with the pope to ratify the peace, and to grant Frederic the inveſtiture of Sardinia or Cyprus, who, upon obtaining poſſeſſion of either of theſe two iſlands, ſhould deliver up Sicily to king Charles, who on that account ſhould pay him 100,000 ounces of gold [w]. Violante, who is ſaid to have been inſtrumental in procuring this accommodation, died before the concluſion of the treaty, when her huſband had become heir apparent to the kingdom of Naples by the death of his eldeſt brother Charles Martel king of Hungary. Both parties ſoon after ſending ambaſſadors to the pope, deſiring his ratification of the treaty, Boniface the following year confirmed the articles, on condition that Frederic ſhould pay 15,000 florins yearly to the holy ſee for the iſland of Sicily, take the oath of allegiance to the pope both in temporals and ſpirituals, and leave to him the ſupreme power in all ſpiritual and eccleſiaſtical matters within his dominions.

which is ratified by the pope. A. D. 1303.

THUS ended the war in Sicily, which had been maintained with great ſpirit by the Sicilians for twenty years, againſt the moſt powerful enemies. The peace was allowed to be very advantageous and honourable for king Frederic; but Charles of Valois greatly hurt his reputation by agreeing to the treaty, and was ridiculed by the Italians, who remarked, that he had fomented new quarrels at Florence, where he went to make peace, and had concluded a diſhonourable peace in Sicily, where he went to make war [x]. Upon his return to Italy, he was prevented from proſecuting his expedition againſt Conſtantinople; but was recalled to France by his brother, who had a difference with the pope, whom this year, in the month of September, he ſurpriſed at Anagni, and kept priſoner ſome days. Boniface was ſo affected with the indignity, that he died a few weeks after. On the day of his death, king Charles arrived at Rome with 1500 horſe and 8000 foot to his aſſiſtance. He continued at Rome for ſome time, and protected the cardinals till the election of the following pope, Benedict XI. who enjoyed the pontificate only a few months, being poiſoned at Perugia in the beginning of July. His ſucceſſor Clement V. was a Frenchman, and transferred the papal court to Avignon, where it continued upwards of ſeventy years to the great detriment of Italy.

Charles of Valois recalled to France.

CHARLES, upon his return to Naples, employed the remaining years of his reign in cultivating the arts of peace. He enlarged and embelliſhed Naples, increaſed the privileges of the univerſity, and invited thither the moſt famous profeſſors of Italy, to whom he gave large ſalaries [y]. He did not only adorn his capital with uſeful ſtructures and magnificent edifices, but alſo built ſeveral ſtately churches and large monaſteries in different parts of his kingdom: he publiſhed ſeveral new and uſeful laws, and regulated the offices of his court with ſplendor and magnificence. While he was thus, by his wiſe adminiſtration, promoting the happineſs of his kingdom, he was ſeized with a fever, which carried him off on the 4th of May, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign. His body was interred with royal pomp in the Dominican church in Naples; and was ſoon after tranſported to Provence, and buried in a monaſtery of nuns built by himſelf in the city of Arles, his heart, however, being left behind with the Dominicans in Naples. His death was univerſally lamented, as he had gained the affections of his ſubjects by his clemency, courteſy, and liberality, on which account he was diſtinguiſhed with the name of the ſecond Alexander [z] (M).

UPON

a UPON the death of Charles II. a diſpute immediately aroſe about the ſucceſſion, between his grandſon Carobert, king of Hungary, and his ſon Robert, duke of Calabria. The affair was ſtrongly debated in the college of cardinals; and at length, on the 1ſt of Auguſt, the deciſion was given in favour of Robert, in a public conſiſtory. Robert had then arrived with a ſplendid retinue at Avignon; and, having taken the oath of fealty and homage to the pope, and received from him the inveſtiture both of Puglia and Sicily, according to the uſual form, on the 8th of September was crowned king in Avignon, with great pomp and ſolemnity [a]. This ſentence of the pope is allowed by many lawyers to be both legal and prudent. It was the deſire of his father that Robert ſhould be his ſucceſſor; and if the claim of Carobert had been looked upon as valid, Italy would thereby have probably been involb ved in great diſorder, as Naples in that caſe would have been governed by Hungarian viceroys, whoſe manners were very different from thoſe of the Italians [b].

ROBERT, after receiving many more marks of favour from the pope, particularly the remiſſion of an immenſe debt of 300,000 ounces of gold, contracted by his father and grandfather to the ſee of Rome, on account of their war againſt Sicily, left Avignon, and returned to Italy, where, to ſhew his gratitude to the pope, he made a progreſs through ſeveral cities, encouraging the Guelphs, and declaring that he would be an enemy to all thoſe that ſhould offer to diſturb the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. Upon his arrival at Naples, he was received with univerſal joy, not only every province, but all the cities and towns in the kingdom, ſending their ſyndics to compliment him. After he had made a progreſs through c his own dominions, he created his only ſon Charles duke of Calabria, and honoured many great barons with the title of count. For the firſt year of his reign, he employed himſelf in the arts of peace, at the ſame time favouring the Guelphs over all Italy, to the utmoſt of his power.

A. D. 1310.

THE following year, being informed that the emperor Henry VII. after receiving the crown of Italy in Milan, had arrived at Genoa; he ſent two ambaſſadors to him, to treat of an alliance by marriage betwixt their two families. Robert at the ſame time, jealous leſt the emperor ſhould eſtabliſh his authority in Italy, and thereby become a check upon his ambition, privately entered into an alliance with the Florentines and Guelphs to thwart and oppoſe him in his expedition to Rome. He had ſent his marſhal to Florence with 400 horſe, who d with great diligence fortified that city, and increaſed his forces with new levies. His brother John, prince of Morea, had likewiſe proceeded to Rome with a large body of troops, to raiſe a party in that city againſt him. The emperor complained of theſe proceedings to the Neapolitan ambaſſadors, who, finding their embaſſy ineffectual, left Genoa without taking leave. Henry about the ſame time ſent Lewis of Savoy to Rome, who, being ſupported by the Colonna family, and having been created ſenator that ſame year, counterbalanced the authority of the prince of Morea and the family of the Orſini. As the attention of Italy was chiefly engaged upon the motions of the emperor, Frederic, king of Trinacria, thought proper to cultivate his friendſhip, and, after the departure of the Neapolitan ambaſſadors, ſent a ſplendid embaſſy to Genoa, with a maſſy ſilver table, and ſeve-e ral other rich preſents for Henry. It was ſuppoſed by ſome, that Frederic deſired the title of king of Sicily; and others alleged, that he propoſed an alliance with the emperor againſt the kings of France and Puglia; but the conferences of the ambaſſadors were kept ſecret, and, after they had continued a few days, and taken leave of the emperor, they embarked for Sicily [c].

He oppoſes the emperor Henry in his march to Rome.

HENRY, after remaining ſeveral months at Genoa, proceeded the following ſpring to Piſa, where he received another embaſſy from Frederic. In conſequence of this embaſſy, the purport of which was not diſcovered, the emperor ſent two embaſſadors to Sicily. King Robert about the ſame time received an embaſſy from him, to treat of a marriage betwixt his ſon Charles, duke of Calabria, and his daughter. This negociation, however, ſeems to f have had no effect; for Robert refuſed to recall his brother from Rome, great part of which, by the aſſiſtance of the Guelphs, he had fortified againſt the emperor, and had even built a fortification which commanded Ponte Molle, or the Milvian bridge without the city. Henry, notwithſtanding this fortification, paſſed the bridge with inconſiderable loſs, and was received into Rome by Colonna and the Gibelline faction with great rejoicing. As the other faction was in poſſeſſion of St. Peter's church, and that part of the city on the north ſide of the Tiber, Henry again ſent ſeveral embaſſies to king Robert, deſiring that his forces might be ordered to evacuate Rome. Robert returned a friendly anſwer to the emperor, and in ſome meaſure promiſed to agree to his juſt demand; but at the ſame time he ordered his admiral to attack ſeven Piſan gallies which were tranſporting 500 bowmen to Rome for the emperor's ſervice. He likewiſe ſent a ſtrong reinforcement of horſe to the prince of Morea; but in their march through Campania they were attacked by the imperial party near Tipherno, and intirely routed, 300 of them being taken priſoners, and almoſt as many killed [d]. a

An alliance concluded betwixt the emperor and Frederic king of Sicily. A. D. 1313.

HENRY in the mean time, by the permiſſion of the pope, was crowned on the 1ſt of Auguſt, with great ſolemnity, in the Lateran church, and immediately after received another embaſſy from Frederic, king of Sicily, with a large ſum of money. The Sicilian ambaſſadors concluded a treaty of marriage betwixt Frederic's ſon and the emperor's daughter; and as Henry was reſolved to make war upon Robert and the Tuſcan Guelphs, Frederic entered into a ſtrict alliance with him, and promiſed to give him a yearly ſubſidy of 50,000 florins during the continuance of the war [e]. Henry, upon his return to Piſa, ſummoned king Robert, as a vaſſal of the empire, to make his appearance before him, at the ſame time citing alſo all the cities of the Guelph aſſociation, which had refuſed to acknowlege his authority [f]. Soon after, in the end of April, he publiſhed a manifeſto, in which, after recapitulating the various hoſtilities committed againſt him by king Robert, he depoſed him from all his dominions, and put him to the ban of the empire as a rebel. b

They declare war againſt Robert.

THOUGH the legality of this ſentence may in ſome meaſure be queſtioned, as the kingdom of Naples was never reckoned ſubject to the empire, yet it appears plainly, that Henry had received juſt provocation for declaring war againſt king Robert. He therefore appointed his ally Frederic, king of Sicily, admiral of the empire; and, while he was making great preparations to invade Calabria, he ſent to Germany and Lombardy for a reinforcement of troops, and prevailed on the Piſans, Genoeſe, and the Venetians, to fit out a formidable fleet. The pope had hitherto ſeemed to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality with regard to the differences betwixt the emperor and the king of Naples; but, upon receiving a copy of the ſentence againſt Robert, he publiſhed a bull, prohibiting every one from attacking the kingdom of Naples by ſea or land, under pain of excommunication. It would appear, however, from the words of a certain biſhop, then by the pope's order attending on the emperor, that Henry had private encouragements from Clement to proceed in his expedition [g]. He accordingly, in the beginning of Auguſt, began his march from Piſa to Puglia; but dying at Benevento, in the neighbourhood of Sienna, on the 24th of the ſame month, all his preparations were rendered ineffectual. About the time that he left Piſa, Frederic, king of Sicily, made a deſcent upon Calabria, and took Reggio, and ſeveral caſtles in its neighbourhood. From thence, by the emperor's deſire, he ſailed towards Gaeta, to join the united fleets of Piſa and Genoa; but, upon his arriving at the iſlands of Lipari, he received the melancholy news of the emperor's death. He immediately called a council, and determined to proceed to Piſa, where, upon his arrival, he was requeſted earneſtly to accept of the ſovereignty of the city; but finding the Germans and Gibellines in great confuſion, he rejected the offer of the Piſans, and returned immediately to Sicily, to guard againſt an invaſion from king Robert, whoſe reſentment was greatly inflamed againſt him on account of his alliance with the emperor. c

The emperor dies.

Sicily is invaded by the king of Naples. A. D. 1314.

ACCORDING to Ferretus, Frederic, being informed of Robert's great preparations, deſired the citizens of Trapani, one of the ſtrongeſt fortified cities in Sicily, to make a ſecret offer of ſurrendering the place to him; and having induced him, by this ſtratagem, to direct his armament thither, he put a ſtrong garriſon into the city, which he furniſhed with proviſions, and other neceſſaries, for a moſt vigorous defence. Robert, accordingly, having embarked 2000 horſe, and an immenſe number of foot, on board of 120 gallies and about as many tranſport ſhips, ſet ſail for Sicily in the month of Auguſt, and landed in the neighbourhood of Trapani. He immediately took Caſtello a Mare by ſtorm, and inveſted Trapani, which he expected to be ſurrendered to him. But the citizens, who had entered into a correſpondence with him, kept him in ſuſpence for ſeveral weeks, by pretending various delays, till at length an epidemical ſickneſs ſeized his troops, in conſequence of a wet ſeaſon, and his fleet was greatly ſhattered by a ſevere ſtorm. His enemy in the mean time having aſſembled a conſiderable fleet and army, and intercepting his convoys, and perceiving at laſt that it was impoſſible to take the city, which had no intention of ſurrendering, he agreed to a truce for three years, and on the firſt of January returned to Naples [h]. Robert, during the continuance of this truce, ſent aſſiſtance to the Florentines againſt the Piſans; and, being obliged to viſit Provence and Tuſcany, he committed the care of the kingdom of Naples to his only ſon Charles, who about this time married the daughter of the archduke of Auſtria. d e f g a THE truce being expired, hoſtilities were immediately renewed in Sicily. Frederic beſieged and made himſelf maſter of Caſtello a Mare; but the count of Squillace arriving with a formidable fleet and army, Frederic was obliged to retire to the middle of the iſland, while the enemy without oppoſition, ravaged the whole kingdom, which is ſaid to have ſuffered more in this campaign than during the long war with Charles I. and II. The whole iſland, it was believed, would ſoon have been reduced, but by the mediation of two legates from pope John XXII. who had been elected in the beginning of the year, a ſecond truce was concluded for five years, or, according to ſome authors for three years only. Upon the concluſion of this armiſtice, the Neapolitan troops evacuated Sicily; and Frederic delivered Reggio, and the other places he held in Calabria, into the hands of the legates, b who quickly reſtored them to king Robert, under pretence that he was appointed vicar or lieutenant of the holy ſee; though others ſay, that the pope was to hold them only till he had decided which of the two kings had the beſt right to them, and that he delivered them to Robert in conſequence of a ſentence in his favour [i].

Hoſtilities are again renewed. A. D. 1317.

They are ſuſpended by a ſecond truce.

ROBERT was prevailed upon to agree to this truce, that he might be at leiſure to attend to the affairs of Lombardy, where the Gibellines in ſeveral cities were again recovering ſtrength and authority. In Genoa, however, the Guelphs prevailed, and on the 10th of November expelled the Gibellines, particularly the families of Doria and Spinola, the two moſt powerful houſes in Italy of the imperial faction [k]. Theſe two families, who before were at variance, now united; and having entered into an alliance with Mapheo Viconti of c Milan, and all the other Gibellines of Lombardy, and by their influence and money aſſembled a powerful army, the following ſpring they returned, and beſieged Genoa. The beſieged, being quickly reduced to great diſtreſs, ſent an ambaſſador to beg the aſſiſtance of Robert, who had adviſed and promoted the revolution. Robert immediately fitted out 25 gallies, and upwards of fifty tranſports, on board of which he embarked with 1200 horſe, accompanied with two of his brothers, and many barons, and on the 21ſt of July entered Genoa. A few days after his arrival, the Genoeſe reſigned the ſovereignty of their ſtate on certain conditions, to the pope and him for 10 years; which he very readily accepted, in hopes of being thereby enabled to recover Sicily, for which purpoſe he had formed the deſign of expelling the imperial party from Genoa. By his vigilance and activity he reco- d vered ſome places in the neighbourhood of the city from the beſiegers, who, in the beginning of the following year withdrew their troops. Robert ſoon after, in the end of April, ſet ſail with 40 gallies for Avignon, where he had a conference with the pope.

Robert ſails to the relief of Genoa.

THE Gibelline exiles, who had entered into alliance with the emperor of Conſtantinople and Frederic, king of Sicily, hearing of the departure of Robert, returned a few months after to the ſiege, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral of the ſuburbs. The attacks continued betwixt the two parties till the following ſpring almoſt without any intermiſſion, during the nights. Soon after a Sicilian fleet of forty gallies, with eleven belonging to the Gibellines, arriving at Genoa, the city was reduced to great diſtreſs; but Robert, ſending fifty gallies to the relief of the beſieged, the Sicilian fleet ſailed to Piſa, and from thence e to the bay of Naples, and made a deſcent upon the iſland of Iſchia, which they plundered. They returned a ſecond time to Genoa, to avoid the Neapolitan fleet which followed them, and were ſoon after recalled by Frederic to Sicily, without having been able to effect any thing againſt the beſieged. Frederic, having exhauſted his treaſury by the expences of this armament, laid a tax upon the eccleſiaſtical revenues of Sicily; which the pope was no ſooner informed of, than he denounced a ſentence of excommunication and interdict againſt him and his dominions [l]. The king to ſhew his diſregard of this ſentence, the year after aſſembled the barons of the iſland at Palermo, and in their preſence cauſed his eldeſt ſon Peter to be ſolemnly crowned [m].

ROBERT in the mean time ſtill continued his aſſiſtance to the Genoeſe; and about three f years after, returning to their city from Avignon with 56 gallies and 300 horſe, he received a prolongation of the ſovereignty from them for ſix years [n]. After continuing a few days at Genoa, Robert proceeded to Naples, where he made great preparations for invading Sicily. Frederic according to Villani, having information of the great armament that was preparing againſt him, hired ſome Catalans and Tuſcans to aſſaſſinate Robert and the duke of Calabria, and to burn the fleet; but before they could put their deſign in execution, being diſcovered in Naples, they were put to the moſt cruel deaths. About the ſame time the prince of Morea paſſed over with twenty-five armed gallies, and other veſſels, to Romania, to recover ſome territories in Greece. A few months after, in the end of May, the duke of Calabria arrived at Palermo with 130 gallies, beſides a great number of tranſports, on g board of which were 3000 horſe, and a very numerous army of foot, being attended likelikewiſe by the greateſt part of the nobles and barons of Puglia. Immediately after he landed, he ravaged the whole country in the neighbourhood of the city, cutting down all the plantations and vines, and ſetting fire to the corn, which was then beginning to ripen. All his attempts, however, againſt the city were ineffectual, the garriſon, which was very numerous, making a moſt vigorous defence. That the army might not be deſtroyed by fruitleſs attacks, on the 18th of June, by his father's orders, he raiſed the ſiege, and, dividing his troops into ſeveral bodies, marched through the iſland without oppoſition, cutting down the trees, deſtroying the corn, and burning the villages. Having in this manner made a progreſs through the Valley of Mazara, and in the neighbourhood of Syracuſe and Catania, he arrived in the beginning of Auguſt at Meſſina; and, after deſtroying all their vineyards, embarked in the end of the ſame month with his army for Naples [o]. a

THE following year, Lewis of Bavaria, who, contrary to the pope's inclination, had been elected emperor, being invited by the Romans and Gibellines to come into Italy, John again created Robert vicar of the empire in Italy. The king accordingly ſent conſiderable reinforcements to Lombardy and Tuſcany, to the aſſiſtance of the Guelphs. Being reſolved, however, to purſue his plan of reducing the Sicilians by famine, in the month of May he ſent another fleet of upwards of ninety gallies againſt Sicily, under the command of the count of Novello, who made ſeveral deſcents upon the coaſts of the iſland, from Palermo round to Syracuſe; and, having ravaged and burnt many towns and villages, returned through the Pharo, and in the end of July ſailed to the aſſiſtance of the Genoeſe againſt Caſtruccio Caſtracani, tyrant or governor of Lucca. The duke of Calabria, about the ſame time arriving at Sienna, was complimented with the ſovereignty of that city for five years. The year after, Robert again ſent another fleet againſt Sicily, under the command of the count of Coriolani, who acted nothing of conſequence, and was ſoon recalled. The Genoeſe about the ſame time arrived with nineteen gallies, and made a deſcent in the neighbourhood of Agoſta, in hopes of ſurpriſing the city; but they were themſelves intercepted, and the admiral and a great many men being made priſoners, the reſt returned diſappointed to Genoa.

MEAN while the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, who had been excommunicated and depoſed by the pope, had arrived at Trent, where he held a diet with the chiefs of the Gibellines and the ambaſſadors of Frederic of Sicily. From thence he proceeded to Milan; and after receiving the crown of Italy in the church of St. Ambroſe, began his march to Rome. As his army, after his arrival in Italy, was conſiderably reinforced, Robert was apprehenſive of his deſigns againſt Naples. He therefore reſolved to oppoſe him to the utmoſt of his power, and, if poſſible, to prevent his entry into Rome, for which purpoſe he ſent his brother, the prince of Morea, with 1000 horſe, to take poſſeſſion of that city. The Romans, however, refuſed to admit him, and even repulſed him with loſs, when he endeavoured to force his paſſage. As the emperor's party appeared the moſt powerful in Rome, Robert recalled his ſon, the duke of Calabria, to defend the frontiers of his kingdom. Lewis in the mean time, being received with great honour by the Romans, was ſolemnly crowned by the deputies of the people on the 17th of January. Inſtead, however, of immediately marching to Naples, he trifled away his time at Rome in making an antipope, and gave Robert an opportunity to take the neceſſary precautions for the defence of the kingdom. While he continued at Rome, Frederic of Sicily, though he refuſed to acknowlege the antipope, fitted out a fleet of fifty gallies, which, being joined by thirty Genoeſe veſſels, ſailed under the command of king Peter towards the Tiber, to aſſiſt in the invaſion of Naples. While they rowed by the coaſt of Gaeta, they made a deſcent, and ravaged its territories. They likewiſe landed at Aſtura, and, in reſentment of the treachery of the Caſtellan to Conradin, they pillaged and burnt the caſtle. By delaying, however, to join the emperor, who was in great want of the money they were carrying to him, they obliged him to abandon his deſign againſt Naples. He therefore, about the end of July, returned with his army from Campania to Rome, and, leaving the city about three weeks after, marched to Piſa, and from thence in the following year proceeded to Germany. Peter, after having a conference with Lewis, ſet ſail for Sicily with his fleet, which ſuffered greatly in a ſevere ſtorm [p].

BY the departure of the emperor towards Tuſcany, Robert was freed from his apprehenſions of a war in Naples. He therefore reſolved to proſecute the war againſt the Sicilians with great vigour; but his deſign was unexpectedly interrupted by the death of his only ſon the duke of Calabria, which happened on the 2d of November, in the 31ſt year of his age. As the duke left no male iſſue, his death was a great affliction to the whole kingdom, as well as to his father, who foreſeeing the calamities that the nation would be involved in, a called out, "The crown is fallen from my head (N)." This accident was a fatal interruption to the prosperity of Robert, who, by his interest with the Guelphs in Lombardy and Tuscany, had become very powerful.

About five years after he renewed his hostilities against the Sicilians, but with little or no advantage. As he now began to feel the infirmities of old age, and had no male issue, he was anxious to settle the succession of his kingdom. Reflecting, perhaps, that the king of Hungary, the son of his elder brother, had a claim to the kingdom by hereditary right, or being influenced by some other motive, he resolved to restore the crown to that branch, by contracting a marriage betwixt one of the king of Hungary's sons, and Joan, or Jane, the eldest daughter of the late duke of Calabria. The king of Hungary joyfully accepted of b the proposal, and arriving at Naples with his second son Andrew, according to the Italians Andreasso, the ceremony of betrothing was performed on the 26th of September, Andrew being at that time only seven years of age and Jane five [q]. Robert being disgusted with temporal grandeur, proposed then to resign the crown, and to spend the remaining years of his life in the habit of a Franciscan: but at the intreaty of his nobles he was prevailed upon still to retain the administration of the kingdom [r]. In the end of the following year he lost his great patron pope John, who had held the pontifical chair eighteen years. His successor Benedict XII. having seemed to favour the king of Sicily while he was cardinal, Frederic immediately sent three ambassadors, one of whom was Nicholas Specialis, to congratulate him upon his promotion, and to desire his mediation for a peace. Benedict

c received the ambassadors with great kindness and familiarity; but declaring his intentions to proceed in the steps of his predecessors, they returned disappointed to Sicily. Frederic, however, still hoping to procure the pope's favour, sent two other embassies to Avignon; but the pope still persisted in the answer he had given to the first ambassadors [s].

While Frederic was thus endeavouring to gain the friendship of Benedict, a Neapolitan fleet of sixty gallies arrived at Sicily, under the command of the count of Coriolano and the count of Claramonte, which last, upon a disgust, had deserted from Frederic, and as he had many friends in the island, expected that they would join him and declare for king Robert. His hopes were however frustrated; and tho' the Neapolitans landed in several parts of the island, they were joined by none of the Sicilians; and not being able to make themselves mas-

d ters of any fortified place, they ravaged the open country, and in the end of August returned to Naples [t]. The war on both sides was now carrried on in a very languid manner, owing to the age and infirmities of both princes. Frederic, who had long been grievously afflicted with the gout, about two years after this invasion died in the neighbourhood of Catania, on the 24th of June, in the 65th year of his age, and the 42d of his reign. Upon his death, which was universally lamented by the Sicilians, great troubles immediately ensued. His successor Peter, on account of his imprudent conduct, was believed by many to be seized with madness, which encouraged the count of Ventimiglia to revolt. He was a relation of the count of Claramonte; and having received an injury from Frederic, immediately upon his death he declared for king Robert, and sent one of his sons to e Naples. Having acted, however, with too great precipitation, before he could receive assistance from the continent, all his castles were reduced, two of his sons were taken prisoners, and he himself with another son were killed [u].

ROBERT, in the mean time, had solicited his sister Eleonora to prevail with her son Peter to quit his pretensions to Sicily, promising to assist him in the conquest of Sardinia. He had likewise requested Benedict to send an apostolic legate to Sicily, for the same purpose. The pope accordingly sent two legates to Sicily; but the Messinians not allowing them to land, and shooting arrows into their gallies, they threw the pope's bull on shore, and renewing the sentence of excommunication and interdict against the island, immediately departed [w]. Eleonora also, in her answer to her brother, begged of him to look upon Peter as his own son, f and to appoint him his successor in Puglia [x]. Robert being thus disappointed renewed his armaments, and in the beginning of May fitted out a fleet of sixty gallies and transports, which he sent, with 1200 horse, to harrass Sicily. After these troops had landed, he sent a second and more numerous embarkation, under the command of Charles of Durazzo, his brother's son, who joined the former troops at the siege of Tremole, which city, with great

Though the count of Lentino, one of the firſt barons in the kingdom, revolted to them with all his caſtles, yet they were not able to make any other conqueſt; and after pillaging ſome of the open country, they returned in autumn to Naples. Robert at the ſame time was not a little diſturbed, with conſiderable inſurrections that happened in his own kingdom, where oppoſite factions were formed in ſeveral cities, and being headed by counts, openly commenced hoſtilities againſt each other. a

The Neapolitans take Lipari and Melazzo. A. D. 1340.

THE year following Robert ſent another fleet againſt the iſland of Lipari, under the command of the count of Squillaci, who defeated the Meſſinian fleet, and made himſelf maſter of the iſland; but upon his return he was driven by a ſtorm into Corſica, where he loſt four of his gallies [y]. Arriving, however, at Naples, in the beginning of the following year, with the news of his victory, Robert judged that the poſſeſſion of Lipari would enable him to reduce Melazzo, and thereby ſtraiten Meſſina. Having therefore prepared another fleet of forty-five gallies, he ſent it the year after, in the month of June, againſt Sicily, under the command of Roger of Sanſeverino. The troops having landed at Melazzo, immediately threw up an intrenchment acroſs the peninſula, to prevent any ſuccours from entering the city. Peter, however, made an attempt to relieve the place; but the beſiegers receiving continual reinforcements from Calabria, repulſed him with great loſs. The city at length ſurrendered upon a capitulation, on the 15th of September, to the great joy of Robert, who had ſpent upwards of 50,000 ounces of gold upon the ſiege [z]. Peter ſurvived the loſs of this place not quite twelve months, but died in the beginning of the following Auguſt, in the 6th year of his reign, leaving the kingdom to his ſon Lewis, then only five years of age, and appointing the duke of Randatium, his uncle, regent during his minority. b

Peter of Sicily dies. A. D. 1342.

Great part of the iſland declares for Robert,

UPON the death of Peter, the Sicilians, who, with ſurprizing courage and conſtancy, had maintained almoſt a continual war for fifty years againſt the family of Anjou, were upon the point of ſubmitting to their old maſters. Robert held a correſpondence with ſeveral barons, who were now as much diſcontented with the government of the Catalans, as their predeceſſors had been with that of the French. The chief of theſe were the family of the Palizzi, and the counts of Antioch, Lentino, and Ventimiglia, ſome of whoſe anceſtors had been concerned in the conſpiracy againſt king Charles I. The Palizzi by ſurprize made themſelves maſters of Meſſina, and immediately ſent for aſſiſtance from Robert, to whom they ſwore allegiance; but the king from dilatorineſs, or rather from avarice, delaying to ſend them ſuccours, loſt that opportunity of recovering the iſland; for the regent in his turn ſurpriſed the rebels in Meſſina, and expelled them from the city [a]. Others attribute the delay of ſuccours to the king's ſickneſs, who, before the arrival of the meſſengers from Meſſina, had taken extreme unction, and died on the 19th of January [b], in the 64th year of his age, and the 34th of his reign. Robert, according to Villani, was reckoned the wiſeſt and moſt learned prince that had reigned in Chriſtendom for 500 years. He was a great philoſopher, and deeply ſkilled in divinity, which a little before his time firſt began to be formed into a ſyſtem. He was courageous, juſt, liberal, eloquent, and modeſt. Towards the end of his life he was inclined to avarice. He, however, in his old age did not remit his ſtudies, but publiſhed a treatiſe on the moral virtues in Tuſcan rhimes, often regretting as Petrarch relates, that he had no ſooner applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry [c] (O). c d

ROBERT, before his death, had appointed his grand-daughter Jean as his ſucceſſor in the throne; and as ſhe and her huſband Andrew were both minors, he nominated ſome of the chief nobles as adminiſtrators of the government, with the approbation of the pope. Jean accordingly, after his death, was immediately crowned and proclaimed queen, Andrew ſtill retaining only the title of duke of Calabria. A few days, however, produced an amazing alteration in the ſtate of public affairs; for the Hungarians, particularly friar Robert, the preceptor of Andrew, directly aſſumed the whole of the adminiſtration, which preſumption and inſolence diſguſting the princes of the blood, they retired from the court. As Andrew diſcovered no princely and noble qualities, but waſted his time in indolence and ſloth, the Neapolitan gentlemen, inſtead of proſecuting the war againſt Sicily, went and joined Robert, prince of Tarento in an expedition to Greece, who by their aſſiſtance conquered as far as Theſſalonica. Robert in the mean while, to eſtabliſh his own authority, ſent to Lewis, king of Hungary, preſſing him to come to Naples to marry Mary, the other grand-daughter of king Robert, e f

(O) The ſame author likewiſe mentions, that Robert once hearing that the king of France was offended with his eldeſt ſon for applying himſelf to learning, exclaimed with a generous diſdain and deteſtation, "How different are the inclinations of mankind. For my part, "I ſwear that learning is much more dear to me than "my kingdom; and if I were to forfeit either of them, "I would be much more content to loſe my crown than "part with my ſtudies."

a and, according to Giannone, to take the poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, as heir to his great grandfather Charles II. To prevent this alliance, the duke of Durazzo, nephew of the late king, obtained a diſpenſation from the pope, and in the month of April married the princeſs Mary [d].

About the ſame time Elizabeth, the queen dowager of Hungary, arrived in Puglia, to viſit her ſon and her daughter-in-law. As ſhe was eminently pious and devout, after ſhe had continued ſome time with her ſon, ſhe went and viſited the ſacred places at Rome, where ſhe made ſeveral rich oblations. Upon her return to Naples, ſhe was greatly diſpleaſed with the immodeſt and inconſiderate behaviour of her daughter-in-law, who was noted for her indecent levity, intolerable arrogance, and abandoned lewdneſs. Having reproved her ſe-
b veral times for her licentious manners ſhe left Naples, and after viſiting St. Nicholas of Bari, the following year ſhe returned to Hungary [e]. Clement VI. in the mean time had appointed his legate in Italy, cardinal Americus, as guardian of the kingdom [f]; but, upon various pretences, he delayed ſatisfying the Neapolitan ambaſſadors, who preſſed him to grant a bull for the coronation of Andrew in his own right. Lewis, king of Hungary, according to Bonfinius, at laſt underſtanding the diſtemper of the prieſts, made the pope a preſent of 44,000 merks; in conſequence of which bribe, the bull, which the ambaſſadors had been ſolliciting for two years, was expedited in favour of Andrew, and the biſhop of Chartres ſent to Naples, to perform the ceremony of his coronation [g].

The pope grants the bull for the coronation of Andrew, A. D. 1345.

The princes of the blood had uſed their utmoſt endeavours to prevent the granting of the c bull; but their hopes being diſappointed, they now formed a conſpiracy to murder Andrew, with the conſent even of the queen, who was openly accuſed of adultery with her couſin Lewis, prince of Tarento; and ſeveral other perſons about her court [h]. She is ſaid, by many authors, to have conceived a diſguſt for her husband, on account of his barbarous Hungarian manners, his inſolence, and debility, which laſt was owing to his exceſſes after the conſummation of the marriage [i]. Other authors, however, particularly Boccacio and Petrarch, who were both alive, and remarkable for their freedom of cenſure, do not accuſe Jean as being concerned in the murder, but relate, that the princes and nobles conſpired againſt him, from an apprehenſion of being puniſhed for their crimes, if he ſhould ever aſſume the adminiſtration of the government [k]. Andrew having gone with his queen to Averſa, on the d 18th of September, about midnight, was called out of his bed-chamber by one of the conſpirators, under the pretence of ſome important news from Naples. He had no ſooner entered the hall adjoining, than they threw a rope about his neck, and ſtrangled him, by hanging him over a balcony into the garden, at the ſame time torturing him after the moſt cruel manner, as appears by informations taken concerning the murderers, by the order of Clement (P). The conſpirators being diſcovered by a Hungarian maid, left the corpſe in the garden and fled. Jean, according to Villani, appeared but ſlightly concerned at the murder, and next morning returned to Naples, from whence ſhe wrote to the pope and Lewis, king of Hungary, giving them an account of the fact, and aſſuring them of her innocence. As the city of Naples, and the whole nation, diſcovered the utmoſt abhorrence and deteſ-
e tation of the murder, the count of Novello was appointed, with the conſent of the whole nobles, to make a ſtrict enquiry after the murderers, with full power to puniſh the guilty as he thought proper. The count executed his commiſſion with great zeal, and condemned and put to death ſeveral murderers. The queen in the mean time, in the month of December, was delivered of a ſon, who was named Carobert, after his grandfather, and ſoon after created duke of Calabria [l].

The pope, upon hearing of the murder, expreſſed great reſentment and grief. He blamed himſelf in the public conſiſtory, for having delayed the bull for the king's coronation; and on the firſt of February, he excommunicated and deprived of all benefices, both ſpiritual and temporal, all thoſe who had aided and aſſiſted in the murder, or who had been in the f leaſt privy to it, confirming the commiſſion of the count of Novello to judge and puniſh the murderers [m]. The kingdom was now in the utmoſt confuſion, being divided into two parties, one of which ſtill adhered to the queen, who was in poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Naples, and the treaſure of the late king. The duke of Durazzo, the greateſt part of the barons, and the city of Naples, compoſed the other party; and both factions levied troops againſt each other, and equally dreaded the arrival of the king of Hungary, who was preparing an army to revenge his brother's death. Beſides, the roads were filled with banditti, who, in defiance of the government, robbed and plundered the inhabitants, and many of the murderers had retired to their caſtles, and openly ſtood upon their defence[n]. a

The king of Hungary makes preparations to invade Naples.

LEWIS of Hungary not only reſolved to puniſh the murderers of his brother, but likewiſe intended to take poſſeſſion of Naples, in right of his grandfather Charles Martel. He therefore entered into an alliance with the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, his ſon the marquis of Brandenburgh, the duke of Auſtria, and many other German nobles, and ſent ambaſſadors to the pope, deſiring the inveſtiture of Sicily from his holineſs. As he had concluded an alliance with the emperor, who had been depoſed ſeveral years before by the popes, Clement refuſed to grant an audience to his ambaſſadors. Lewis, nevertheleſs, did not abandon his enterprize, but ſent ambaſſadors to Sicily to treat with the regent of the iſland, who having then recovered Melazzo, immediately ſent thirty gallies into the Adriatic to his aſſiſtance, and propoſed an alliance betwixt his nephew the young king, and the king of Hungary's ſiſter, and to aſſiſt him with forty armed gallies upon his arrival in Puglia[o]. b

Several cities in Abruzzo declare for him. A. D. 1347.

LEWIS in the mean time, having ſent emiſſaries into Puglia with large ſums of money, prevailed on the city of Aquila to declare for him; and his friends in that part of the kingdom raiſing about 1000 horſe, made incurſions in the neighbourhood, and beſieged Sulmo, the cities of Tieti, Penna, Popoli, Lanciano, and Guardia, and ſeveral caſtles having likewiſe revolted from Jean. Upon the news of this revolt, the duke of Durazzo, in the beginning of Auguſt, marched to the relief of Sulmo, with 2500 horſe and a large body of foot; and having raiſed the ſiege inveſted the city of Aquila, whither the rebels had retired; but conſiderable reinforcements arriving from Hungary, the loyal barons, after they had completed their ſervice of three months, raiſed the ſiege and returned home. c

Queen Jean marries Lewis of Tarento.

QUEEN Jean, in the mean time, under pretence of ſecuring the kingdom againſt the Hungarian invaſion, on the 20th of Auguſt married Lewis, the ſecond ſon of the prince of Tarento, without waiting for the pope's diſpenſation. By this match, however, ſhe did not augment the number of her friends, but rather increaſed the diſcontent among her ſubjects; for as her husband was her full couſin, the marriage was looked upon with abhorrence as inceſtuous, and ſhe was beſides accuſed of having had a criminal intimacy with him, during the life of Andrew[p]. The Hungarians, on theſe accounts, met with but a faint and ſpiritleſs oppoſition; and in the month of November, having reduced all Abruzzo, paſſed over the mountains into Terra di Lavoro, and took Sarno, Venafri, Tiano, and St. Germano. The queen, in the mean time, wrote to the Florentines for aſſiſtance; and the prince of Tarento, now duke of Calabria, aſſembled a conſiderable army at Capua, which, if it had continued long united, would have been able to have fruſtrated the attempts of the Huugarians; but the zeal of the barons appeared very languid, and many of them had a private correſpondence with the king of Hnngary. d

The king of Hungary arrives in Italy. A. D. 1348.

LEWIS, encouraged by the ſucceſs of his troops in Abruzzo, left Hungary with a ſmall army, and in the end of November arrived in Italy, being received with great reſpect in the cities through which he paſſed, particularly in Bologna, which gratuitouſly furniſhed him and his army with proviſions. About Chriſtmas he was met on the confines of the kingdom by the pope's legate, who counſelled him, as from himſelf, not to take poſſeſſion of Puglia without the conſent of the pope, which advice the king treated with great contempt. Being joined by a great many barons of the kingdom, who took the oath of allegiance to him, he advanced on the 11th of February to Benevento, where he was joined by many other barons, and received an ambaſſy from the city of Naples. Queen Jean was greatly alarmed with this ſucceſsful march of the king of Hungary; and ſeeing the whole country voluntarily ſubmitting to him, ſhe privately embarked on the 15th of February, with a few attendants, on board three gallies, and ſailed to Provence. Her huſband Lewis hearing of her departure, immediately returned from Capua to Naples, and embarking with a few friends on board a private galley, followed the queen to Provence. e

Jean flies to Provence. f

THE king of Hungary, in the mean time, arrived at Averſa, where he was met by 1000 Neapolitan gentlemen. Several princes of the blood likewiſe viſited him in that city, and took with them his nephew Carobert, then about two years of age. Lewis received them in a courteous manner; but a few days after he ordered the duke of Durazzo to be put to death, and thrown over the balcony, from whence his brother had been hanged. The other princes were alſo immediately apprehended, and ſent afterwards priſoners to Hungary. Lewis having entered Naples with a black ſtandard, on which his brother was repreſented as ſtrangled, ſtruck a great terror into the inhabitants, who expected to be plundered by his army. Having taken up his reſidence in Caſtel Nuovo, he ordered the magiſtrates of the g a city to be changed, and the new officers who ſucceeded them to act by the direction of the biſhop of Waradin. He cauſed the ſame regulation to take place in other cities; and Naples being then afflicted with a moſt terrible plague, he left that city, and appointing Conrad Wolf, a German baron, his lieutenant, with the general command of his troops, he embarked on the 24th of May on board a light galley at Barletta, and landed at Sclavonia, from whence he proceeded to Hungary [q].

QUEEN Jean, in the mean while, was put under confinement by the barons of Provence, upon a report that ſhe intended to exchange that country for another in France, the French king's eldeſt ſon being ſuppoſed to have come to Avignon to tranſact the affair with the pope. As the Provençals deteſted the French government, they threatened to revolt with b the dauphin of Vienne; but the pope ſending back prince John to France, they again ſet the queen at liberty. Her husband, in the mean time, hearing of her confinement, was afraid to land at Nice, but proceeded to the Rhone, and landed at Avignon. A few weeks after Jean entered the city, where ſhe was received with the greateſt reſpect by the cardinals and the pope, who immediately granted her a diſpenſation for her marriage with her couſin, for which he was univerſally blamed. Soon after her cauſe was tried in a public conſiſtory, in the preſence of the Hungarian ambaſſadors, when ſhe defended herſelf with ſo much eloquence, that the pope, by an authentic act, declared not only that ſhe was innocent, but that ſhe could not even be ſuſpected of having any knowlege of the murder [r]. This ſentence was ſuppoſed by many to be precipitate, and to be owing to the earneſt deſire the pope had
c to purchaſe Avignon, which the queen then ſold to him, with all its territory, for 80,000 florins [s]. Several authors allege, that the ſale was only pretended, and the queen made a preſent of the city to the church, to procure the favour of the pope; but others aſſert, that ſhe employed the money in fitting out ten gallies, in order to return to Naples, whither ſhe was invited by many of her barons, who, after the departure of the king of Hungary, abandoned his intereſt [t]. The pope having honoured her husband with the title of king of Sicily, he and ſhe embarked at Marſeilles, and in the end of Auguſt returned to Naples, where they were received with the moſt extravagant joy [u].

THE regent of Sicily, in the mean while, being carried off by a plague, which was then ravaging the ſouthern parts of Europe, the whole iſland was divided into two parties, the d chiefs of each claimed the guardianſhip of the king and kingdom. At the head of one party were the Palizzi, with the counts of Claramonte and Ventimiglia, and they were ſupported by the cities of Meſſina, Syracuſe, Melazzo, Cefalu, Palermo, Drapani, Mazzara, Sciacca, Gergenti, Taormina, and many others. The cities of Catania, Giati, La Licata, Coſe, La Catona, and Capo Orlando, with many other towns and caſtles, declared for the oppoſite party, which was headed by Blaſco d'Alagona, and ſupported by the Catalans. The two parties immediately commenced hoſtilities againſt each other with the moſt bitter animoſity. They plundered and burnt each others territories without intermiſſion; and the peaſants, diſtruſting either party, neglected to cultivate their farms, and retired to the mountains; ſo that the country quickly became deſolate, and the following year great numbers of peo-
e ple, to avoid periſhing by famine, abandoned the iſland, and took refuge in Calabria and Sardinia [w].

A civil diſſenſion in Sicily.

DURING theſe diſſenſions in Sicily, the king of Naples had prevailed on Werner, a German duke, to declare for him. This Werner had aſſiſted the king of Hungary with 3000 horſe, but was diſcharged by him, on account of ſome irregularities. Inſtead however of returning to Germany, he entered with his troops into Campania, and ſupported himſelf by raiſing contributions. He willingly hearkened to the propoſals of the king of Naples, who condeſcended ſo far as to receive the honour of knighthood from him, which was at the ſame time likewiſe conferred on eighty other gentlemen. WHILE each party was endeavouring to harraſs and diſtreſs the other, many cities and provinces ſuffered all the calamities of war. The king's affairs, however, ſeeming to decline, Werner allowed himſelf to be ſurpriſed in Corneto, and again entered into the ſervice of the Hungarians. Soon after the loyaliſts ſuffered a conſiderable defeat, while Conrad Wolf approached with his troops to Naples, and raiſed a contribution from the Neapolitans of 20,000 florins. As the pope had appointed a general jubilee to be celebrated the following

The Germans then left the kingdom, and returned some of them to Lombardy and others to Germany, having enriched themselves with the plunder of the churches, and taken along with them several married and unmarried women. a

The king of Hungary returns to Naples.

LEWIS of Hungary, a few months after, passing the Adriatic with a considerable reinforcement, hostilities were again renewed; and about the end of September, almost all Terra di Lavoro was reduced by the Hungarians. However, they having suffered greatly at the siege of Aversa, which had continued four months, Lewis was prevailed upon to agree to a cessation of arms till April, on the following conditions, namely, that the cause of queen Jean should be again tried by the apostolic see with greater accuracy; that if she should be found guilty of the murder of her husband, she should lose all right to the kingdom of Naples, which should be conferred on the king of Hungary; but if she should be declared innocent, the king of Hungary should evacuate all the places he held in Naples, on condition of receiving 300,000 florins of gold [z]. Lewis, upon the conclusion of this treaty, went to the jubilee at Rome, and from thence returned to Hungary. Mean while his ambassadors, with b

those of queen Jean, had repaired to the pope's court at Avignon, to be present at the trial. The cardinals seemed unwilling to enter upon a re-examination, as it would be very difficult to prove the innocence of the queen; but as her character suffered greatly by the suspicion of the crime, they at last accepted of her excuse, namely, that she was under the power of witchcraft or fascination, which hindered her from loving her husband as she ought, from c whence others were encouraged to conspire against him. The truth of this allegation being proved by several witnesses, she was declared innocent of all actions subsequent to that fascination [a]. The king of Hungary, after some difficulty, declaring himself satisfied with this determination, generously refused to accept of the 300,000 florins for the expences of the war, according to the stipulation, and set at liberty the five princes of the blood, whom he had detained prisoners in the castle of Wissegrad. The young prince Carobert had died soon after his arrival in Hungary.

Upon the conclusion of this peace, which was signed in the beginning of the following year, the disbanded troops assembled, to the number of 400 horse and 500 foot, and ravaged all the province of Terra di Lavoro; but the king marching against them at the head of d 1000 cavaliers, attacked them in the month of April, and quickly dispersed them. A few weeks after, on the feast of Whitsuntide, Lewis and his queen, by the permission of the pope, were solemnly consecrated and crowned in the city of Naples [b]. Conrad Wolf, however, still refused to deliver up Nocera; but having assembled 700 horse, fortified the city, and raised the imperial standard, as though he had a correspondence with Charles IV. who was then expected in Italy. Lewis being afraid of new troubles, condescended to treat with him, and by paying him 30,000 florins, prevailed on him to deliver the city, and depart the kingdom. Soon after the king, by means of his vicar Malatesta, surprised Aversa, and obliged friar Moriale to deliver up the castle and all his treasure.

Sicily still ravaged by two opposite factions. A. D. 1353.

During these transactions, the two factions in Sicily still continued their hostilities against e each other; but Matthew Palizzi having got possession of the palace, kept the young king as his prisoner, and assumed the administration. He exercised his office with so much rapacity, that he even alienated many of his own friends, and drew upon himself the hatred of the Messinians, who the following year, in the month of August, assassinated him, with his wife and children, in the palace. The inhabitants of Sciacca likewise murdered the officers sent by Palizzi to raise the oppressive subsidies, on which account many of that party fled to Catania, and joined themselves to the Catalans; and the young king likewise, finding their party superior, went and put himself under their protection. The miserable inhabitants, in the mean time, were so distressed by famine, that this year upwards of 10,000 families abandoned the island [c]. The chief of the Italian party was now the count of Claramonte, f who had been instrumental in raising the tumult of the Messinians against Palizzi. To support his party, and protect himself from the resentment of the young king and the Catalans, he entered into a correspondence with the king of Naples, and offered to deliver to him all that part of the island under his obedience. The Sicilians, who were starving, assented to this proposal. Lewis accordingly, in the month of April, embarked 100 horse and 400 foot on board six gallies, and sent them, with about thirty-five other vessels loaded with provisions, to Sicily. The Neapolitan troops were immediately put in possession of Melazzo and Palermo, and all the other cities, towns, and castles, of the Italian faction, to the number of 112, declared for the king of Naples, who, however, was so destitute both of men and money, as not to be able to send a second embarkation to the island. But so weak was g a the oppoſite party of the Catalans, that for a conſiderable time no hoſtilities were committed on either ſide. The city of Meſſina refuſed to acknowlege the king of Naples; and a few months after the Meſſinian gallies took ſeventeen Neapolitan veſſels, that were ſailing with proviſions for Palermo.

THE kingdom of Naples, in the mean time, was diſturbed by the rebellion of the duke of Durazzo and the count Palatine, who believing themſelves ſlighted by the king had recourſe to arms; and in the beginning of the following year, an army of freebooters, conſiſting of 6000 men, which had been at firſt raiſed by the friar Moriale, but was now commanded by the count di Lando, entered the kingdom by Abruzzo, and took poſſeſſion of Peſcara, Villa Franca, and San Fabiano. They alleged, as the reaſon of this invaſion, that b the king had refuſed to pay them 40,000 florins which he had promiſed, and advancing towards Foggia, they encamped in that neighbourhood, and ravaged the country for many miles round, while the king, inſtead of oppoſing them, ſpent his time in dancing with the ladies of his court [d]. A. D. 1355.

WHILE the grand company of Lando was thus ravaging Naples, Lewis of Sicily aſſembled ſome troops at Catania, and reduced ſeveral towns of the Italian party. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, he armed ſix gallies, and made an attempt upon Palermo both by ſea and land: but finding it impoſſible to recover the city, he plundered the villages in its neighbourhood, and returned to Catania, where he died ſoon after, in the month of November, in the ſeventeenth year of his age. As his brother John died about the ſame time, his younger c brother Frederic, then only about thirteen years of age, was declared his ſucceſſor, his ſiſter Euphemia being appointed regent [e]. About two months before the death of the king of Sicily, Lewis entered into a treaty with the grand Company, and promiſed them 105,000 florins of gold, 35,000 to be paid immediately, and the other 70,000 at two payments, on condition they would leave the kingdom. Upon receiving the 35,000, they retired from Naples to Puglia; but the king not paying the remaining ſum ſo ſoon as they expected, in the month of February they took poſſeſſion of the city of Venoſa, and plundered the inhabitants. The citizens of Naples in the mean time thinking themſelves oppreſſed by the taxes which were laid upon them to pay the grand Company, univerſally had recourſe to arms. Lewis with great difficulty quelled the tumult, by taking off the tax upon ſalt, and a few months d after he prevailed with the grand Company to quit his dominions.

Lewis of Sicily is ſucceeded by his brother Frederic.

A. D. 1356.

ABOUT the ſame time Nicholas di Ceſaro, one of the exiles from Meſſina, being allowed to return to the city privately, introduced 200 horſe and 400 foot from Melazzo, by whoſe aſſiſtance he expelled thoſe families that favoured the Catalans, and uſurped the government of the city. Nicolas, however, invited the young Frederic to come to Meſſina, where the ceremony of his coronation might be performed; but his negotiation with him not taking effect, he entered into a treaty with the king of Naples, who immediately proceeded with his queen to Calabria, and continued in Reggio till the agreement ſhould be concluded. Nicolas having at length made himſelf maſter of the caſtles of San Salvadore, which commanded the harbour, and Mattagrifone, which overlooked the city, introduced the Neapoli- The king of Naples is received into Meſſina. A few weeks after, on the twenty-fourth of December, the king and queen arrived at Meſſina, where they were welcomed with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy, lodged in the royal palace, and next day received the homage and allegiance of the citizens [f].

WHILE Lewis continued in Meſſina Simon count of Claramonte came to wait upon him, and was received by him with great reſpect, on account of the important ſervices he had performed. Simon, as a reward of his ſervices, demanded Blanch the ſiſter of Frederic, who was then a priſoner, as a wife: but leſt ſuch a match might give him a pretence for claiming Sicily, Lewis declined ſatisfying him, and ſoon after propoſed to give him the daughter of the duke of Durazzo. Simon in the mean time died, about the middle of March, after f ſix days illneſs; and his death being ſuppoſed to be owing to poiſon, his relations left Meſſina in great diſcontent [g].

LEWIS endeavoured to procure the affections of the Sicilians by promiſing to continue with his court ſix years in the iſland, on condition they would aſſiſt him in reducing Catania. The barons accordingly aſſembled 1500 horſe, and a large body of foot; and in the month of May inveſted Catania, while four armed gallies and two other veſſels blocked up the harbour. Two Catalan gallies in the mean time arriving at Saragoſſa, fitted out two veſſels they found in that port, chiefly with drummers and trumpeters, and ſurpriſed thoſe before Catania, two of which they made themſelves maſters of, which ſtruck the beſiegers with ſuch a panic, that next morning they raiſed the ſiege, and abandoned their camp. g They were attacked on their march by the garriſon of the city, who killed many of them, Beſieges Catania without ſucceſs.

and took a great number of priſoners. The kingdom of Naples in the mean time being harraſſed, not only with large bodies of robbers and banditti, but alſo with the troops of the duke of Durazzo, the count Palatine, and the prince of Tarento, the king's elder brother, who openly contemned his authority, and ravaged the richeſt provinces of the kingdom, to maintain their followers, Lewis left 300 horſe in Meſſina, and in the month of September returned to Naples. Soon after his return, the prince of Tarento ſurpriſed the count Palatine, and ordered him to be hanged. Many of the count's followers upon his death diſperſed, which obliged the duke of Durazzo to deſire a reconciliation with the king. This was effected the following April, when all foreign ſoldiers were ordered to quit the kingdom. a

Is obliged to return to Naples.

A FEW months after the Catalans in Sicily attacked and recovered ſome places held by the Neapolitans. The Meſſinians were likewiſe tempted to revolt by one of the family of the Claramonte; but Lewis kept them in obedience, by promiſing to return quickly to Sicily. He was, however, prevented from going to their aſſiſtance, by the troubles and confuſions in the kingdoms of Naples, while they continued to be harraſſed by the Catalan faction, which received ſome reinforcements from Arragon. The counſellors of Frederic, in hopes of procuring him a powerful auxiliary, concluded an alliance betwixt him and a daughter of the king of Arragon; who accordingly arrived at Catania in the end of the following year with fourteen gallies: but after the celebration of the nuptials, inſtead of aſſiſting his ſon-in-law, he returned with his fleet to Spain. Frederic, however, recovered ſeveral places from the Neapolitans, who were obliged ſoon after to evacuate almoſt the whole iſland, as they could get no aſſiſtance from Lewis, who was wholly engaegd in purſuing his pleaſures. Lewis at laſt finding his conſtitution broke, turned very penitent, and made devout pilgrimages to the relics of the apoſtles at Melphis, Benevento, and Salerno, and upon his return to Naples died on the 26th of May, in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and the tenth year of his reign [h]. The pope upon being informed of the death of Lewis, immediately ſent William Grimoaldi as his legate to Naples, with a ſubſidy to the queen. The legate, however, was immediately recalled, having been elected pope upon the death of Innocent; when he took the name of Urban V. b c

THE new pope, ſoon after his election, propoſed the duke of Tours, the French king's ſon, as a third huſband for queen Jean: but, by the advice of her nobles, ſhe preferred James the infant of Majorca, who had then eſcaped from the caſtle of Barcelona, where he had for many years been kept in cloſe confinement. James, who had long ſuffered the miſeries of a priſon, willingly accepted the offer of a crown; and arriving at Naples, the marriage was celebrated with great magnificence, when the queen conferred upon him the title of duke of Calabria. This marriage, however, proved unfortunate to the kingdom of Naples; for James about three months after went to Spain to aſſiſt his brother againſt the king of Arragon, in which war he was taken priſoner, but was afterwards ranſomed by the queen for 60,000 florins. He died about eleven years after, not without ſuſpicion of having been poiſoned by the queen, who was accuſed of having haſtened the death of her former huſband Lewis [i]. About the ſame time Jean concluded a peace with Frederic of Sicily, on theſe conditions; namely, That he ſhould take the title of king of Trinacria, and, as his queen was dead, he ſhould marry Antonia del Balzo, the duke of Andria's daughter, by the ſiſter of king Lewis; that he ſhould hold his kingdom of the queen of Naples, and pay to her a yearly acknowledgment of 3000 ounces of gold, promiſing likewiſe to aſſiſt her, when attacked, with 100 ſpearmen, and ten armed gallies. On the other hand, the Neapolitans were to evacuate all the cities, towns, and caſtles, they held in Sicily [k]. Theſe conditions, however, were never entirely fulfilled, the kings of Sicily having never taken the title of kings of Trinacria, nor ever paid the 3000 ounces of gold according to the ſtipulation (Q). d

About the ſame time the tranquility of her kingdom was diſturbed by Ambroſio Viconti, a baſtard ſon of the lord of Milan, who invaded Abruzzo with 2000, or, according to others, 12,000 horſe [n], and a large body of infantry. He ſeized ſome caſtles in Abruzzo, and advancing into Puglia, ravaged the whole province for ſome time, without oppoſition: but being ſurpriſed by Malatacca, whom the queen ſent againſt him, his troops were defeated, and he himſelf taken priſoner [o].

The duke of Andria revolts. A. D. 1371.

Not long after, the kingdom was again embroiled by a diſpute betwixt the duke of Andria and the family of Sanſeverino, about the property of the city of Matera. The b difference was referred to the arbitration of the queen, who decided in favour of the count of Sanſeverino. The duke, however, thinking himſelf injured, had recourſe to arms, and being joined by one Mazziotto, who from a common ſoldier had made himſelf a captain of banditti, he quickly became very formidable, and over-run Puglia, Capitanata, Cantade de Moliſe, and the vale of Benevento. The queen the year following having ſummoned him to appear, upon his refuſal declared him a rebel; and the year after ſent an army of 12,000 horſe and foot againſt him, under the command of Malatacca, who on the 23d of September made himſelf maſter of Teano, after a long ſiege. The duke ſome time before had eſcaped from the city, and gone to Lombardy, where he raiſed 6000 horſe, and a great body of infantry, and in the beginning of the following year entered Terra di Lavoro, at the head c of 15,000 men [p]. However, after he had advanced as far as Puglia, he was prevailed upon by the perſuaſions of his uncle to deſiſt from his rebellion, and leaving his own camp in the night-time, went to the pope, who had returned to Avignon, with the intention of reſiding there till his peace ſhould be made with the queen. The foreign troops, which he had deſerted, immediately begun to plunder the country, but upon receiving 10,000 florins from the queen, they marched out of the kingdom.

He flies to Avignon. A. D. 1374.

During theſe tranſactions the peace with Frederic of Sicily had been again renewed, upon the ſame conditions as formerly [q]; when Gregory XI. ſent a legate into Sicily to take off the excommunication and interdict from the iſland, and to celebrate the marriage betwixt Frederic and Antonia del Balzo, who were afterwards ſolemnly crowned at Palermo [r].

Soon after the quieting of the rebellion of the duke of Andria, the queen was informed d of the death of her third huſband, James of Majorca, of the houſe of Arragon. Tho' ſhe was now forty-ſix years of age, ſhe reſolved to take a fourth huſband, whether ſhe expected heirs of her own body, or was jealous of the ambition of Charles Durazzo, who in right of his ducheſs Margaret, was heir apparent to the crown, and was then commanding the army of his kinſman, the king of Hungary, againſt the Venetians. Jean choſe for her fourth huſband Otho of the houſe of Brunſwic, who was then in Lombardy, and had ſerved in the papal army againſt the Viconti of Milan (R). Four gallies were accordingly fitted out, on board of which forty Neapolitan counts and gentlemen embarked, to conduct Otho to Naples. They returned the following year, on the 25th of March, when Otho was conducted under a canopy to Caſtello Nuovo, where the marriage was celebrated with great rejoicing [s]. Jean, that ſhe might not ſeem to deprive the duke of Durazzo of his right, would not confer the title of duke of Calabria on her huſband, but created him duke of Tarento, and made him a preſent of that large principality which had been lately forfeited by the duke of Andria. Charles, however, from this time conceived a great hatred againſt the queen, and her niece the ducheſs Margaret, who had returned from Hungary, and a few weeks before was delivered of a ſon named Ladiſlaus, openly expreſſed her diſpleaſure [t].

The cardinals are compelled by the Romans to elect Urban VI. A. D. 1378.

THE tranquility of Naples was of very ſhort continuance; but was ſoon diſturbed by an accident which likewiſe affected all other Chriſtian ſtates. Pope Gregory dying the following year in the end of March, the Romans, thoroughly ſenſible of the great loſs they had ſuſtained by the reſidence of the popes at Avignon, ſurrounded the conclave in a tumultuous manner, and threatened to put the cardinals to death, if they did not elect an Italian pope. The members of the conclave in great terror nominated one Perignano, a Neapolitan gentleman, then archbiſhop of Bari, who had ſome employment about the pope's court, and was noted for his humility and modeſty. The cardinals therefore, as was afterwards alleged, expected that he would acknowledge his election to be void, and voluntarily reſign; but they were greatly deceived, for he, ſuſpecting they deſigned his abdication, took the name of Urban VI. obliged them to conſecrate him, and behaved to them with great moroſeneſs and auſterity. The French cardinals reſolved to take the firſt opportunity of abandoning him, and accordingly, a few months after, retired to Anagni, where they publiſhed a ſentence againſt him, as an apoſtate and antichriſt. b who is favoured by the queen.

QUEEN Jean, upon being informed of his election, immediately ſent Nicolas Spinello, count of Gioja, a famous lawyer, and chancellor of the kingdom, to congratulate him, and to do him homage. Urban treated his countryman with great rudeneſs and ill manners. The queen nevertheleſs, upon the open revolt of the cardinals, not only ſent money and proviſions to him, but alſo ordered a body of her troops to attend him as a guard. Her huſband Otho likewiſe waited upon him at Rome, according to ſome authors, to procure the inveſtiture of the kingdom [w]: but though Urban had formerly received many favours from him, when Otho commanded in Lombardy, yet he now treated him with the greateſt inſolence; for when he preſented him at dinner with the cup, kneeling, he ſuffered him to continue ſo long in that humble poſture, that the cardinals were aſhamed, and ſaid to him, Holy father, 'tis time for you to drink [x]. Urban is accuſed by Summontius and others of having at the ſame time entered into a private negociation with the duke of Durazzo, for conferring upon him the kingdom of Naples, in hopes of procuring from him large ſettlements for his two nephews, whom he was very ambitious of promoting. He was prompted to this ſecret negotiation by the duke of Andria, who then reſided in Rome, in a very low condition [y]. c d

The queen and cardinals diſguſted by the moroſeneſs of the pope. An antipope elected, who reſides at Avignon. A. D. 1379.

JEAN being informed of his intrigues, immediately abandoned him, and countenanced the ſchiſmatic cardinals, who aſſembling at Fondi under her protection, on the 21ſt of September choſe Clement VII. who, though he was obliged the following ſummer to leave Italy, and retire to Avignon, was acknowleged as true pope, not only by her, but alſo by France, Spain, Scotland, Cyprus, and Savoy [z]. Urban was now prompted by revenge to dethrone the queen. He therefore ſent the duke of Andria to Charles of Durazzo, who was then in Friuli, inviting him to come and receive the inveſtiture of Naples at Rome; and to ſtrengthen his intereſt in the kingdom, he created ſeveral Neapolitan cardinals, upon whom he conferred the principal benefices in Naples. He likewiſe depoſed the archbiſhop of Naples, for adhering to the antipope, and conferred that ſee on one Bozuto, a gentleman of great authority in the city, whoſe adherents raiſed a furious tumult, which obliged Clement to ſail for France. Urban at the ſame time warmly oppoſed the pretenſions of the king of Arragon to Sicily, deſigning, according to the account of his ſecretary Theodoric Niem, to have concluded a marriage betwixt his nephew and Mary heireſs of the iſland, who about the ſame time was taken, during the night, out of the caſtle of Catania, and carried on board a galley to Catalonia [a]. e

Urban propoſes to dethrone queen Jean.

THE kingdom of Naples in the mean time ſuffered ſeverely by a deſtructive plague, while the provinces were ravaged by great troops of banditti. The queen likewiſe was greatly alarmed with the increaſing report of the duke's preparations, and endeavoured to ſeize the new archbiſhop Bozuto, one of his greateſt partizans; but failing in her attempt to apprehend him, ſhe ordered all his eſtates to be plundered, and deſtroyed his houſes in Naples. Soon after, however, ſhe imprudently allowed the ducheſs Margaret, with her daughter and infant ſon, to retire to Rome. Being greatly apprehenſive of the fidelity of the Neapolitans, ſhe retired into the caſtle del Ovo, likewiſe ordering all her ſubjects to abandon the villages, and betake themſelves to the fortified towns, while her huſband Otho with the greateſt diligence was aſſembling an army to defend the frontiers of the kingdom. f

URBAN in the mean time having prevailed on Lewis of Hungary to give assistance to Charles, in the beginning of the following year published a sentence of excommunication and deposition against queen Jean. The queen, to protect herself from the designs of the pope, and in resentment for the signal ingratitude of the duke of Durazzo, soon after adopted Lewis duke of Anjou, and brother of Charles V. of France, for her son and heir, and immediately conferred upon him the title of duke of Calabria. Clement VII. the antipope, a few weeks after confirmed the adoption of Lewis at Avignon [b]. The death of the king of France prevented Lewis from proceeding directly to Naples, as he was appointed regent during the minority of his nephew Charles VI.

He excommunicates and deposes her. A. D. 1380.

THE duke of Durazzo in the mean time had entered Italy, at the head of an Hungarian army, and in his march to Rome had ravaged and plundered many towns and villages, and levied heavy contributions upon Florence and other cities. In the beginning of the following year he arrived at Rome, having considerably increased his army by many Italians and Neapolitans, who had joined him. Urban received him with great honour and distinction; and as he was in great want of money, he stripped all the churches and monasteries of Rome of their plate, crosses, and images, which he either melted down or sold, to supply the expences of the expedition. He refused, however, to give him the investiture of the kingdom, unless he would confer upon his nephew Butillo Prignano the duchies of Capua and Amalfi, and many other valuable baronies in the kingdom [c]. Charles, much against his inclination, having granted the writ of investiture of these lands to Prignano, on the first of June was solemnly crowned king of Sicily and Jerusalem, under the same conditions as Charles I. of Anjou had stipulated with Clement IV. Urban then appointed the cardinal di Sangro to attend the king as his legate, and hired a large body of troops, commanded by Alberico Barbiano, whom he ordered to join Charles.

Charles of Durazzo arrives at Rome. A. D. 1381.

Receives the crown of Naples from Urban.

THE king immediately proceeded to Naples, and his army, being very numerous, entered the kingdom without opposition. As the queen, by the adoption of the duke of Anjou, had increased the disaffection of her subjects, who inclined rather to submit to their countryman the duke of Durazzo than to a foreigner, prince Otho was followed but by few barons, and therefore prudently declined engaging the enemy, but retired before them to Naples. Charles followed the prince, and on the sixteenth of July encamped on the opposite side of the city. Three days after, some of his cavalry, by wading into the sea, surprised one of the gates, took possession of the market-place, and admitted his army into the city, which was then in the utmost confusion; one party declaring for him, another for the queen, and a third for pope Urban. Charles immediately besieged the queen in Castello Nuovo, and in a few weeks reduced the garrison to such distress, that the queen promised to capitulate, if she was not relieved within four days. Her husband, accordingly, on the fourth day, attacked the intrenchments of Charles, with great bravery; but not being seconded by his troops, he was surrounded by the enemy and taken prisoner, which occasioned the total rout of his army. The queen next day surrendered to Charles, and four days after had the mortification to see ten Provençal gallies arrive at Naples, with succours to her relief. Upon the news of the queen's imprisonment, the whole kingdom submitted to Charles, excepting the counties of Fondi, Caserta, and Ariano, which never acknowledged his authority. In the end of the year queen Margaret returned with her two children to Naples, when she was crowned with great solemnity by the pope's legate.

CHARLES having thus taken possession of the kingdom, refused to put Prignano in possession of the duchy of Capua, which greatly irritated the pope. He likewise alienated the family of Sanseverini, by restoring the duke of Andria to the principality of Tarento, and allowing the duke's son the following year to marry his relation Agnes of Durazzo, who took the title of empress of Constantinople. About the same time the counts of Montuoro, Lecce, and Conversano, openly revolted; and news arrived that the count of Anjou, regent of France, was making great preparations to invade the kingdom. Charles, to secure his conquest, by the advice of the king of Hungary, caused queen Jean to be put to death. On the twenty-second of May she was accordingly strangled, according to Theodoric Niem; but according to others, she was smothered with a bolster in the castle of Nuovo, from whence her body was brought to Naples, where it lay unburied for seven days, exposed to the view of the people [d]. Jean died in the fifty-sixth year of her age, and the thirty-ninth of her reign. Notwithstanding what several authors, and some of them her cotemporaries, have said, concerning her lewdness and abandoned life, other writers, likewise her cotemporaries, have been very full and warm in her praise. She is greatly extolled, particularly by the two brothers Baldo and Angelo da Perugia, famous lawyers of those times, and by Boccacio, who enumerates her many excellencies, both of body and mind [e].

A FEW weeks after the queen's death, twenty-two Provençal gallies arrived before Naples, a and attacked the ſub urbs; but being repulſed by the inhabitants, they retired to the iſland of Iſchia, which they took poſſeſſion of. At the ſame time the duke of Anjou having been crowned king of Naples at Avignon, by pope Clement, received the homage of the Provençals as their ſovereign, and was preparing to enter Italy with an army of 30,000 horſe. Charles being ſenſible that he had irritated the pope, and alienated a great many barons, took all precautions for his ſecurity. He impriſoned ſome barons whom he ſuſpected, put others to death, and ſent a body of troops to Tuſcany, to oppoſe the march of the French.

Lewis of Anjou, however, having forced his way through Italy, entered Abruzzo about the end of July, at the head of 40,000 men. About the beginning of November he advanced as far as Ariano; but as the ſeaſon was ſevere, and his army was in great want of provi- b ſions, he ſeparated his troops into winter-quarters, and contented himſelf with ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes with the enemy, till the return of the ſpring. Charles in the mean time fortified thoſe cities he judged moſt expoſed; and having aſſembled an army of about 14,000 men, uſed his utmoſt diligence in cutting off the French convoys. As he avoided coming to

WHILE Charles was harraſſing the French in this principality, he was informed that pope Urban had left Rome, with the intention of coming to Naples, to urge the fulfilling of his promiſe, in favour of his nephew Butillo. ver, in the evening, he obliged him to come to the caſtle, and detained him a priſoner five days. Upon his arrival at Naples, he was likewiſe forced to take up his reſidence in the caſtle Nuovo; but ſoon after Charles, by the interceſſion of the cardinals, ſet him at liberty, having entered into new ſtipulations with him, and again promiſed the duchy of Capua to his nephew [f]. Urban then went to the archbiſhop's palace, and diſpoſed of two of his nieces in marriage to two Neapolitan counts. Butillo Prignano in the mean time thinking himſelf protected by the authority of his uncle, broke into a nunnery, and raviſhed one of the moſt beautiful and noble of the nuns. In conſequence of this outrage, d which occaſioned a great uproar in Naples, Prignano was capitally condemned. He was, however, pardoned at the interceſſion of the pope, who excuſed him upon account of his youth, though Theoderic Niem, then in Naples, remarks, that he was upwards of forty years

About three months after Charles marched to Barletta, with 16,000 horſe, and a large body of infantry; and having gained ſome advantages over the French, by following the advice of Otho of Brunſwic, he ſet that unfortunate prince at liberty [g]. Soon after he was prevented for ſome months from proſecuting the war, by an epidemical ſickneſs, which ſeized himſelf, and carried off a great part of his army. e

THE duke of Anjou in the mean time had fixed his court at Bari, and had appointed juſticiaries and officers in the provinces that he had ſubjected; but having over-fatigued himſelf, in preventing his men from plundering Biſeglio, which had ſurrendered to him, he was ſeized with an illneſs, of which he died on the tenth of October, leaving behind him two ſons, Lewis and Charles [h]. His troops immediately diſperſed, and many of them returned, begging, to France. Several of the barons of the kingdom, nevertheleſs, ſtill continued in arms, and refuſed to acknowlege king Charles; who thinking the war concluded by the death of his rival, returned in a triumphant manner to Naples. Immediately after his return the diſſentions were again revived betwixt him and the pope, who during his abſence in

The pope, after being beſieged ſeveral months, at laſt made his eſcape by the aſſiſtance of Romandello and Sanſeverino, two barons of the party of the late duke of Anjou. Though theſe two barons acknowleged Clement as true pope, yet, in hope of creating troubles to king Charles, they intereſted themſelves in the ſafety of Urban, and conducted him to the ſea-coaſt, where in the month of July he embarked for Genoa. The pope, out of gratitude, gave to Romandello the city of Benevento, and confirmed to him the county of Lecce, and the barony of Flumare [i].

Soon after, however, a ſtrong party of malecontents invited king Charles, who was well known in Hungary, on account of his long reſidence in that country. Charles willingly accepted of the offer of the malecontents, and, contrary to the perſuaſions of his queen, on the fourth of September embarked, with a ſmall retinue, on board four gallies at Barletta, and a few days after arrived at Hungary. King Mary was quickly obliged to abdicate the throne, and on the laſt of December Charles was crowned king of Hungary with great ſolemnity. He however enjoyed his uſurped dignity but a ſhort time; for on the 6th of February his ſkull

DURING the abſence of king Charles in Hungary, queen Margaret ſeized a Venetian ſhip, richly laden, that had put into the harbour of Naples in diſtreſs. The Venetians in return for this injury, immediately took poſſeſſion of Durazzo and the iſland of Corcyra, which places the Neapolitans never afterwards recovered [l]. The news of the king's death arrived at Naples in the midſt of the rejoicings for his coronation. The queen a few weeks after cauſed her ſon Ladiſlaus, or Lancelot, then about ten years of age to be crowned; and ſent a ſubmiſſive embaſſy to the pope, intreating him to take the young king under his protection. Thomas Sanſeverino in the mean time proclaimed Lewis II. duke of Anjou, who the year bec fore had received the inveſtiture of Naples from Clement at Avignon. A few months after, he advanced with a large body of troops to the neighbourhood of Naples, to ſupport the governor of one of the caſtles, who had declared for Lewis. Though the city ſtill continued in obedience to Ladiſlaus, they refuſed, however, to ſubmit to the adminiſtration of the queen; and the Seggi choſe new magiſtrates, who were called the eight lords of good government, and ſupreme authority. The city on this account was immediately filled with tumult and diſorder; ſo that the queen, finding her intereſt declining, fled with her ſon to Gaeta, and the two factions giving admittance at the ſame time to the oppoſite armies, Thomas Sanſeverino, who was now joined by Otho of Brunſwic, and was declared viceroy, repulſed the party of Ladiſlaus, and remained in poſſeſſion of the city. The faction of Ladiſlaus was thus overpowered, chiefly by the d ſlowneſs and inactivity of Urban, who with great difficulty could be prevailed upon to forgive the injuries he had received from the late king Charles.

QUEEN Margaret in the following year endeavoured to recover Naples; and in the month of July arrived before the harbour with ten veſſels; but by the diligence of the viceroy and Otho of Brunſwic, her attempt was fruſtrated, though the Neapolitans were then, and had been for ſome time before in great want of proviſions. They ſent a galley to Avignon, intreating the aſſiſtance of Lewis and of Clement. A few months after, five gallies and a galliot arrived, with a ſupply of proviſions and money, and on board of them came lord Monjoy, the nephew of Clement, in the character of viceroy, and many other nobles and barons. Thomas Sanſeverino, who expected to have been confirmed viceroy by the king, e upon the arrival of Monjoy retired in diſguſt to his eſtate; and the new viceroy having affronted Otho of Brunſwic, he likewiſe left Naples, and went to San Agatha de Goti. Monjoy endeavoured in vain to effect a reconciliation; for Otho, being in hopes of marrying the queen dowager Margaret, ſoon after abandoned the Anjou faction, and declared for Ladiſlaus.

Queen Margaret being informed of his great power and wealth, propoſed an alliance betwixt her ſon and his daughter Conſtantia, and ſent an embaſſy to Manfred, who readily accepted of her offer. The Neapolitans, by another embaſſy, in vain endeavoured to diſſuade him from the match; for on the fifth of September the bride arrived at Gaeta with four gallies while twelve other Sicilian gallies ſailed to the relief of Caſtello Nuovo, which was then beſieged by Monjoy [o].

POPE

A. D. 1389. POPE Urban dying the following year, in the beginning of October, Ladiſlaus acquired a zealous friend in his ſucceſſor Boniface IX. who was a Neapolitan, and ſoon after his promotion created ſeven Neapolitan cardinals. Boniface, in hopes of procuring ſettlements for his relations, whom he was fond of promoting, warmly eſpouſed the cauſe of Ladiſlaus, and ſoon after receiving an embaſſy from the queen, who deſired to be abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication and depoſition, denounced by Urban, he granted the abſolution, and ſent Acciajoli the cardinal of Florence to Gaeta, who on the 8th of May crowned

Lewis of Anjou lands at Naples.

ABOUT three months after, Lewis of Anjou, who the year before had been ſolemnly crowned king of Sicily by pope Clement at Avignon, and had married the daughter of the king of Arragon, arrived with twenty-one veſſels, and a conſiderable body of troops at Naples, where he was received with great rejoicing. As his party was in poſſeſſion of more than a half of the whole kingdom, upon the news of his arrival the barons crowded from all parts to do him homage; and among the reſt arrived Thomas Sanſeverino, with many others of his family, with a body of 800 horſe. The barons of his party then held a parliament at S. Chiara, when it was agreed to furniſh 1000 lances before March, and to maintain ten

Eramo*, Caſtel Nuovo, and Caſtel Ovo; and being of a mild and courteous diſpoſition, had acquired the eſteem and affection of the Neapolitans. Ladiſlaus, in the mean time, was greatly diſtreſſed for want of men and money, while ſeveral barons refuſed to declare for either party; and continuing upon their eſtates, ſent preſents to both princes [r].

Mary and her huſband Martin of Arragon take poſſeſſion of Sicily.

DURING this interruption of the war in Naples, a great revolution happened in Sicily. Manfred di Claramonte dying at Palermo, the princeſs Mary, who had married, in Arragon, Martin the ſon of the duke of Monblanco, arrived with her huſband and a ſtrong army at Sicily. She quickly reduced Palermo, and recovered all the cities that had been in the poſſeſſion of Manfred; and having got the whole family of Claramonte into her power, ſhe ordered Andrew, the governor of Palermo, to be put to death. Her father-in-law, Martin duke of Monblanco, who was brother to John king of Arragon, and afterwards ſucceeded him, had attended her in the expedition; and after the reduction of Palermo, had contracted an intimacy with the widow of the late Manfred.

Ladiſlaus divorces his queen Conſtantia.
A. D. 1392.

THEIR intrigue, being reported in Gaeta, ſerved queen Margaret as a pretext for an action of the blackeſt ingratitude. She alleged, that it was diſhonourable for her ſon to have for a wife the daughter of one who was miſtreſs to a Catalan. Ladiſlaus accordingly, by her perſuaſion, immediately ſent Conſtantia to a private houſe attended only by an old governante, and two Sicilian maids; and in the end of May he went with forty gallies to Rome to demand a divorce from the pope, which he obtained without any difficulty [s]. Queen Margaret hoped to procure a ſecond marriage, and a ſecond fortune for her ſon, though her affairs had been already ſaved from ruin by the immenſe portion of Conſtantia. Her conduct, however, ſo full of baſeneſs, ingratitude, and inhumanity, was cenſured by her beſt friends, and the ambition of the pope was univerſally condemned (S).

He beſieges Naples without effect.

LADISLAUS, in the beginning of the year, having gained ſome advantages by the conduct of his viceroy Cicco del Cozzo, about two months after his return from Rome he reſolved to command his troops in perſon; and having heard maſs in complete armour, he left Gaeta, and marched to Aquila, which was the only city in Abruzzo that held for Lewis. The Aquilans, after having in vain expected to be relieved, ſurrendered to Ladiſlaus, and paid 40,000 ducats to ſave their city from being plundered. Ladiſlaus, in his return, took poſſeſſion of the county of Manupello, and ſtopt at Capua, where, in conſequence of poiſon that he had received, his life was deſpaired of; and it was reported that he was dead. By the aſſiſtance of phyſicians, however, he was cured; but he continued a ſtammerer to his death [t]. The following year, while he reſided at Gaeta, an ambaſſador arrived from France to treat of an alliance betwixt the French king and his ſiſter Jean; but the negociation had

That no prince might have any objection to contract a ſecond alliance with Ladiſlaus, about two years after ſhe was given in marriage with a portion of 30,000 ducats, to Andrew the ſon of the count of Altavilla. When he led her home, ſhe declared before all the courtiers, that he ought to think himſelf the happieſt knight in the kingdom, who had got his ſovereign's lawful wife for his concubine (1).

a ficers, he left Gaeta, and on the 9th of April encamped before Naples, the harbour being blocked up by three gallies and a galliot. After he had continued thirty-six days before the city, he was obliged to retire, as his gallies were repulsed by four vessels from Provence, and the communication with the sea opened. A few months after the Sanseverini family, who had come to the relief of the city, perſuaded Lewis to contract an alliance with the duke of Sessa; who was chief admiral, and one of the moſt powerful adherents of Ladiſlaus. The duke readily agreed to the propoſal made by Lewis, immediately deſerted Ladiſlaus, and joined his new friends with a 1000 horſe. Lewis, in the mean time, ſent conſiderable preſents to the duke's daughter Mary, and gave her the title of queen: but Ladiſlaus vigo-rouſly attacking the duke's territories; after hoſtilities for ſeveral months, the duke, by the b mediation of Boniface, was again reconciled to him, and the marriage never took effect [u]. While his troops were ravaging the eſtates of the duke, Ladiſlaus went and viſited Boniface at Rome, from whom and the cardinals he received very large ſubſidies. Lewis, about the ſame time, received ſome aſſiſtance from pope Clement, who died ſoon after about the middle of September. His ſucceſſor Benedict XIII. immediately confirmed the crown of Naples to Lewis, and declared himſelf his protector.

LEWIS, however, continuing inactive at Naples, while his competitor was continually employed in ſome expedition, his affairs quickly began to decline, while many of the barons, particularly the Sanſeverini, reſolving to abandon his party, treacheroſly urged him to leave Naples, and to go to the ſupport of his friends in Tarento. He was accord-c ingly, ſome years after, perſuaded to go to Calabria, when Naples immediately admitted the troops of Ladiſlaus, and detained Charles his brother priſoner, who had arrived from Provence with a ſmall reinforcement ſoon after his departure. Upon the news of the loſs of Naples, Lewis wholly deſpaired of being able to recover his affairs; and though he was ſtill in poſſeſſion of more than one half of the kingdom, and had many barons faithful to his intereſt, he abſolutely determined to return to Provence. He accordingly embarked at Tarento, and, ſailing round to the iſland of Caprea, entered into a negotiation with Ladiſlaus, offering to deliver up the Caſtel Nuovo, on condition that the French garriſon ſhould be allowed to depart with their bag and baggage, and his brother ſhould be ſet at liberty. Ladiſlaus willingly agreed to this condition; and Lewis taking his brother and the garriſon on board his fleet, ſailed directly to Provence, to the great grief of all thoſe of his party [w]. About the ſame time, Martin king of Sicily had made himſelf maſter of Catania; and having reduced ſeveral factious barons, obliged the whole iſland to acknowlege his authority [x].

Lewis by his inactivity alienates his friends.

A. D. 1400.

He returns to Provence.

THOSE barons who had treacherouſly abandoned the duke of Anjou were quickly convinced of the imprudence of their conduct; for Ladiſlaus had no ſooner driven his rival out of the kingdom, than he reſolved intirely to cruſh and ruin them. In the end of the year he reduced the whole county of Fondi, except Ponteciello and Portella, on the confines of the kingdom; and the following April, after holding a parliament at Naples, he marched into Calabria, and conquered the whole province, except Reggio and Cotrone, e which laſt city was garriſoned by ſome French that had come thither after the departure of Lewis. He ſoon obliged the French to ſurrender, and in his return ſeized ſeveral of the family of the Sanſeverini, whom he impriſoned in the caſtles of Naples. He likewiſe took the duchy of Seſſa from the family of Marzano, and impriſoned the late admiral's ſon with his mother and two ſiſters. Having reduced the whole kingdom to his obedience, by the advice of his great protector Boniface he contracted an alliance with Mary the ſiſter of the king of Cyprus, who landing the following year, on the 12th of February, at Naples, attended with her uncle, and many Cypriot ladies, the marriage was celebrated with great magnificence [y].

Ladiſlaus marries the ſiſter of the king of Cyprus. A. D. 1402.

ABOUT the ſame time, he was informed, that the Hungarians had impriſoned their king f Sigiſmond, and ſet up his ſtandard all over the kingdom. Receiving repeated invitations from the Hungarian nobles, who offered him their crown, the following year he was prevailed upon to depart for that kingdom, under pretence of conducting his ſiſter Jean to Germany, ſhe having, ſome time before, been contracted to the duke of Auſtria. Reflecting on the fate of his father, he ſtopped at Zara, or Jadra, on the coaſt of Dalmatia, till he ſhould be informed of the true ſtate of affairs in Hungary. Many Hungarian barons and prelates waited upon him in this city, and according to Bonincontrius, and others, he was ſolemnly crowned king of Hungary by the biſhop of Gran, or Strigonia, but by the account of Thedoric Niem, Boniface ordered the cardinal of Florence to confer upon him the crown, and beſides remitted him a debt of 300,000 florins, and granted him the tythe of g the eccleſiaſtical revenues of Naples for three years. Ladiſlaus, in the mean time, being

Being choſen mediator by both parties, he allowed the people to chuſe their ſupreme magiſtrates; but left the Leonine part of the city, and the caſtle of St. Angelo, in the hands of the pope, who granted him Campania di Roma

A few weeks after his return, being informed of the death of Ramondello Urſino, prince of Tarento, who left two ſons and a daughter, he reſolved to ſeize that principality; and accordingly, in the month of March, he ſent nine gallies round by ſea, and marched thither with 7000 horſe, and a large body of infantry. Her brothers readily agreed to this propoſal; and the marriage being celebrated, he was put in poſſeſſion of the city; and about a month after conducted his new queen to Naples[b].

DURING theſe tranſactions, Martin king of Sicily had loſt his queen, who died a few years before from grief for the death of her only ſon Frederic, who was killed by accident while he was learning the exerciſe of the ſpear. Martin by the laſt will of his wife, and the ceſſion of his father, continued in poſſeſſion of the iſland, and this year married Blanch the daughter of the king of Navarre[c].

IN the mean time, by his intrigues with the Gibellines in Rome, Ladiſlaus had prevailed on them to expel the pope from the city, and to take poſſeſſion of his palace. John Colonna d their chief promiſing him the ſovereignty of the city, he immediately ſent the count of Troja thither with a body of troops, who were admitted by Colonna, and took poſſeſſion of

The king, ſtruck with this fulmination, by which he run a riſk of loſing his kingdom, immediately propoſed an accommodation, which was effected by the mediation of the pope's nephew, and Paul Urſini the chief of the Guelphs, on condition that he ſhould evacuate the caſtle of St. Angelo, and all other places belonging to the church[d]. Innocent ſurvived this treaty only a few months, and in the beginning of December was ſucceeded by Gregory XII. a Venetian. e

A. D. 1407. LADISLAUS, being ſtill earneſt to get poſſeſſion of Rome, in the month of June advanced with an army, and endeavoured to ſurprize the city; but his troops, after they had entered the place, were repulſed by Urſini the pope's general, while Gregory and ſeveral of the cardinals ſaved themſelves in the caſtle of St. Angelo[e]. The pope, a few months after, leaving Rome, with the intention, as he declared, of going to Savona, where a congreſs was appointed with the antipope, in order to terminate the ſchiſm, Paul Urſini remained in Rome with the chief command. Whether he received any indignity from the pope is uncertain; but he is accuſed by Bonincontrius of having had an intention of delivering the city to the antipope.

a him not to resign the pontificate, being apprehensive lest, if the grand schism should be terminated, his right to the kingdom of Naples would be called in question [g]. This probably was the reason why he was so earnest to be in possession of Rome, that, in case of the reunion of the cardinals, he might be able to make his own terms with the future pope, though no doubt he was greatly actuated by his vanity and ambition; for he had no sooner made himself master of Rome, than he assumed the pompous title of, Ladislaus by the grace of God, king of Hungary, Jerusalem, Sicily, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rome, Servia, Salicia, Lodomiria, Comania, and Bulgaria, and count of Provence, Forcalquier, and Piedmont [h]. The Romans were quickly tired of his government; and he had no sooner returned to Naples, than they openly revolted, imprisoned the senator, and expelled his troops from the city [i]. The following
b year he again made himself master of Rome; and Gregory delivering to him Romagna for a present of 20,000 crowns, in the beginning of April he marched to Tuscany, with an army of 18,000 horse, besides infantry, and took possession of Cortona, Certaldo, and many other cities and castles. He endeavoured to surprize Sienna, and intended to besiege Florence, as the Florentines had allowed the cardinals, who had deserted from Gregory and Benedict, to hold a council in Pisa. The Florentines, in their own defence, entered into an alliance with the Siennese, and with Balthasar Cossa, legate of Bologna [k].

The council of Pisa, in the mean time, had deposed both the contending popes, Gregory and Benedict; and, on the 26th of June, elected a third, who took the name of Alexander V. The power and ambition of Ladislaus, who still acknowleged Gregory, being greatly c dreaded in Italy, Alexander, immediately after his promotion, invited Lewis of Anjou to renew his pretensions to Naples; and a few weeks after, upon his arrival at Pisa, he published a sentence of excommunication and deposition against Ladislaus, and gave Lewis the investiture of the kingdom. Lewis immediately entered into the Florentine league, and, assembling an army, quickly recovered all the territories of the church in Tuscany; and in the end of the year drove the Neapolitans from Rome, and reduced the castle of St. Angelo [l]. Ladislaus, in the mean time, in hopes of strengthening himself against his competitor, sent for pope Gregory to Gaeta, and banished a great many nobles, whose fidelity he suspected, from the city of Naples. He left the greatest part of his army on the frontiers, as many barons in Campania, and the county of Fondi, had already openly revolted, and declared for

The council of Pisa chuse a 3d pope, who excommunicates Ladislaus.

During these transactions, Martin king of Sicily died at Cagliari in Sardinia, whither he had gone the year before to reduce the inhabitants, who had revolted from his father's government. As he died without issue, he left his father, Martin king of Arragon, heir of Sicily by his will, and his wife Blanch regent in the island [n]. Pope Alexander dying a few months after, he was succeeded by the legate of Bologna, who took the name of John XXIII. As he was a Neapolitan, and a declared enemy of Ladislaus, he immediately interested himself with great zeal in behalf of Lewis of Anjou, who, with the assistance of the Florentines, fitted out thirteen gallies, and nine other vessels, against Naples. The ships, being separated from the gallies, were taken by the fleet of Ladislaus, who, about the same time, made an e unsuccessful attempt to surprize Rome. John, after he had resided about eight months at Bologna, making preparations for the invasion of Naples, came in the following spring to Rome, where he declared Lewis of Anjou standard-bearer of the church.

Soon after this ceremony, Lewis advanced towards Naples with an army of 12,000 horse, besides infantry; and on the 9th [o], or, according to some, the 19th of May, in the evening, attacked the camp of Ladislaus, whose army consisted of about 13,000 horse and 4000 foot. After a most obstinate dispute, Ladislaus was intirely defeated, and with great difficulty escaped by flying to Rocca Secca, and from thence to St. Germano, where the remains of his army again assembled [p]. According to the opinion of Ladislaus, if his enemies had pursued their blow, he would have been intirely ruined [q]. Lewis of Anjou was very earnest to f advance immediately into the kingdom; but Paul Ursini and Sforza, two soldiers of fortune, had no desire to finish the war, and wilfully delayed the march of the army; so that the effect of the victory was wholly lost.

The pope's army mutinying for want of pay, Lewis was obliged to return to Rome; and being disgusted with the fickleness of the Sicilians, soon after went back to France, while John, who was obliged either to defend himself, or to lose the possession of the pontifical chair, published two bulls of excommunication against Ladislaus, and, in the beginning of the following year, ordered a crusade to be preached against him; granting likewise the most scandalous indulgences, in order to raise money for the war. and Sforza, however, acting with great lukewarmneſs, and being ſuſpected even of favouring Ladiſlaus, he was obliged to agree to a diſhonourable peace, which was concluded on the 25th of June [r]. a

The pope concludes a peace with Ladiſlaus;

LADISLAUS, by the articles of this peace, promiſed to abandon Gregory, on condition of receiving immediately 100,000 ducats from John, who engaged likewiſe to acknowlege him as king of Naples, to aſſiſt him in recovering Sicily, and to allow him a yearly penſion of 2000 ducats [s]. A few months after Ladiſlaus loſt his mother, who was buried with great pomp in Salerno. Notwithſtanding the advantageous peace he had made with the pope, yet having taken Sforza, with his band of 2400 horſe, and 400 foot, into his pay, he was

The following year he accordingly aſſembled a numerous army; and though he ſtill kept a good correſpondence with the pope, yet it was univerſally rumoured that he intended to attack Rome. John encouraged b this report, as it ſerved as an excuſe for his declining going to Conſtance to a general council; and, by Poggio [u], is even ſaid to have invited Ladiſlaus to invade the march of Ancona, with the intention of ruining Urſini, to whom he had committed the care of that province. Ladiſlaus ſent part of his troops to the march of Ancona, under the command of Sforza; but he himſelf, with the greateſt part of his army, on the 8th of June ſurrounded Rome, the pope and the cardinals with great difficulty eſcaping to Sutri, and from thence to Florence. The king treated the Romans with the greateſt barbarity. He ſeized and plundered the pope's chapel and palace; ſtript all the churches of the city of their treaſure; ſeized the jewels of the holy ſee, and many rich ſhrines; maſſacred ſeveral prelates; and ſeized the c poſſeſſions of all the Florentine merchants, after he had aſſured them of his protection [w]. From Rome he marced to Tuſcany, and quickly reduced the whole eccleſiaſtical ſtate as far as the territories of Sienna and Florence, raiſing immenſe contributions upon the inhabitants, whom his ſoldiers treated with great inhumanity.

LEAVING the command of his army to Sforza and Nicholas of Eſte, he returned in the end of the year to Naples; and ſoon after prevailing with Paul Urſini and his brother Orſo to deſert the pope, and to enter into his ſervice, the following June he again entered Tuſcany at the head of an army, with the intention of reducing the Florentines. He fixed his

According to ſeveral authors, the phyſician was bribed by the Florentines to poiſon him, d which he effected by adminiſtring the poiſon to his daughter in ſuch a manner that the king could not lie with her without being infected [x]. Poggio, Aretin, Niem, and other authors, make no mention of poiſon; but ſome of them attribute his lingering illneſs to the exceſs of his debauches. His illneſs obliged him to lay aſide his expedition againſt Florence, and to return to Rome, where finding his diſtemper increaſing, he embarked and proceeded by ſea to Naples, taking Urſini and his brother with him priſoners, under pretence that they

Upon his arrival at Naples, he was carried on ſhore in a litter on the 2d of Auguſt, and died four days after, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and the thirtieth of his reign. He was a moſt expert general, and very liberal to his ſoldiers; but in his tranſactions, either with his neighbours or his ſubjects, he had no regard to juſtice, and even gloried in his fraud and perfidy [y].

a marriage contracted a great intimacy, on which account the barons had conferred the title of king on the count de la Marche, that he might be able to counterbalance their influence and authority. The king resolved to crush them immediately, and the day after his marriage he put Sforza in chains, and a few weeks after imprisoned Pandolphello, when he ordered both of them to be tortured; and Pandolphello, in consequence of his confession, was afterwards put to death.

He usurps the whole administration, and imprisons the queen. A. D. 1416.

JAMES likewise took possession of all the fortresses in the kingdom, which he committed to the care of Frenchmen; and conceiving a disgust for his queen, on account of her abandoned life, he deprived her of all share in the government, removed from her all her antient servants, whose places he supplied with French people; and placing a guard over her, would b not allow her subjects to speak to her. Being soon after relieved from his apprehensions of a competitor by the news of the death of the duke of Anjou, and fearing nothing from the pope, who was too much engaged at the council of Constance, he set Paul Ursini and his brother Orso at liberty, hoping to put an end to the civil dissentions, and to govern the kingdom in a peaceable manner. However, his great partiality to Frenchmen, on whom he bestowed all offices, quickly alienated the affections of the barons from him; and the Neapolitans, being deprived of the sight of the queen, were filled with discontent, and began openly to murmur. Jean, about a year after she had been confined, obtained liberty to dine in a garden belonging to a Florentine merchant, which the Neapolitans were no sooner informed of, than they flocked thither in great numbers from a curiosity to see her. Two c of the nobles excited the people to take arms in her defence. Accordingly, after she had dined, her guard was compelled to leave her, and she was conducted by the people to the archbishop's palace, and from thence to Castello di Capuano. The king immediately retired to Castel Nuovo, where he was besieged by order of the queen; but the Neapolitans, rather than trust the whole administration to the queen, resolved again to support James, and mediated a reconciliation betwixt him and Jean. He was allowed the title of king, and a yearly pension of 40,000 ducats; but engaged for the future not to assume the supreme administration. Jean immediately promoted several of her favourites to the chief offices, set Sforza at liberty, and conferred upon him the office of high-constable; and was very liberal in her favours to the Neapolitans, in order to alienate them intirely from the king [b].

She is set at liberty by the Neapolitans.

Alphonsus of Arragon is declared king of Sicily.

DURING these transactions in Naples, Ferdinand king of Arragon and Sicily died in Catalonia. About three years before he had been chosen king of both these kingdoms, as his d uncle Martin had left no issue. Alphonsus, the eldest of his four sons, was now proclaimed king, and John, his second son, arrived in Sicily as governor of the island [c].

QUEEN Jean, in the mean time, resigned herself intirely to the direction of her high-steward Sergianni Carraccioli, who was accused of having a criminal intimacy with her. Sergianni, in order to secure her favour, dismissed his two greatest rivals, Sforza and Origlia, from court. Origlia was sent ambassador to the council of Constance, and Sforza, in the end of January, marched to the relief of the castle of St. Angelo, which was besieged by Bracchio da Montone, a soldier of fortune, who, during the absence of the pope in Germany, had made himself master of Rome. Sergianni soon after persuaded the queen to imprison her husband, e and to banish all the French from her dominions. Though he had acquired the hatred of the chief nobles by his arbitrary administration, yet he found means of securing a great party among the Neapolitans, by distributing the pensions which the French enjoyed among the rich citizens, and furnishing the common people with provisions at a low price. Sforza, in the mean time, having recovered Rome, returned with his forces towards Naples, highly enraged against Sergianni, who had neglected to send money to pay his soldiers, in order to oblige them to munity, and desert to Bracchio. Sergianni levied troops in order to oppose him; but Sforza investing Naples, the queen was obliged to banish her favourite to the island of Procida.

JEAN was, at the same time, urged by the duke of Burgundy and pope Martin, who f had been elected at the council of Constance, to set her husband at liberty. Martin soon after sent two legates to her, promising to agree to her coronation; and a few months after his nephew Antonio Colonna arrived at Naples with the form of a defensive alliance betwixt him and the queen, which was soon after published. Antonio, in a great measure, reconciled Sforza and Carraccioli; but the queen, not thinking it safe immediately to recal Carraccioli to Naples, sent him as her ambassador to the pope, who in the month of February had arrived at Florence. Carraccioli, by her order, restored Ostia, Castel St. Angelo, and Civita Vecchia, to Colonna; and then, proceeding to Florence, had several conferences with the pope, to whom he promised the assistance of the queen's troops against Bracchio, who had usurped the ecclesiastical territories. He quickly found a great many friends; and many of the nobility of the Seggi waited upon the legate, and upon the pope's brother and nephew, propoſing that he ſhould be crowned at the ſame time with the queen. This propoſal greatly alarmed Carraccioli, who had returned to Naples; but by making the queen promiſe large eſtates to the Colonnas, he prevailed on them and the legate to refuſe their aſſent. James ſeeing no proſpect of recovering any authority, and deſpairing of having any iſſue by the queen, who was now fifty years of age, reſolved to leave Italy; and accordingly, about two months after, ſecretly hired a Genoeſe galley at Naples, and embarking with a few friends, returned to France[d] (T). The queen, after the departure of her husband, was ſolemnly crowned by the legate on Sunday the 28th of October, and the feaſting and rejoicings on that occaſion were continued to the end of the year[e].

THOUGH the queen, by the abſence of her husband, was now her own miſtreſs, and was ſecured on the throne by the ſanction of a catholic pope, yet ſhe was quickly involved in greater troubles than ever. Her favourite Carraccioli, puffed up with his proſperity, greatly exaſperated the Neapolitan nobles by his inſolence and cruelty. As they were not in a condition to oppoſe him, they privately ſollicited Sforza to return to Naples. This general had been employed the whole ſummer in oppoſing the conqueſts of Bracchio in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; but being diſappointed of money and ſupplies by Carraccioli, who even privately ſent money to Bracchio, he had received a ſignal defeat, and loſt great part of his troops. The pope likewiſe, having in vain ſollicited ſuccours from Naples, by the mediation of the Florentines concluded a peace with Bracchio, who delivered up all his conqueſts; but was allowed to retain Perugia, Todi, Aſſiſi, Rocca-Contrada, Jeſio, and Monte Abbode[f]. The pope and Sforza being both irritated againſt the queen and Carraccioli, they concluded a treaty with Lewis the ſon of the late duke of Anjou, whoſe ambaſſadors were then in Florence, ſolliciting the intereſt of the pope in favour of their maſter, whom they wanted at leaſt to be declared heir to the crown, as the queen had no children. The duke's ambaſſadors declared Sforza high-conſtable and commander in chief; and it was agreed, that if the queen, by her bad counſellors, ſhould reject the reaſonable conditions they would offer her, Sforza ſhould invade the kingdom by land, and the duke of Anjou, in the month of June, ſhould appear with a fleet off Naples[g]. Lewis, being informed by his ambaſſadors of the treaty concluded with the pope, immediately requeſted the aſſiſtance of the king of Arragon, who, though he was at war with the Genoeſe, promiſed to allow the Genoeſe veſſels in his ſervice to paſs unmoleſted. Sforza, in the mean time, advanced with his army towards Naples; and appeared before the city on the 18th of June; when the queen, refuſing to agree to the propoſals offered by him, he ſent her the truncheon and other enſigns of his office, and immediately diſplayed the ſtandard of Lewis III. ſo he called the duke of Anjou. He inveſted the city with his army, in hopes of the appearance of the fleet, when the Anjou faction would probably have declared themſelves: but the duke not arriving with the fleet the 19th of Auguſt, his army, in the mean time, ſuffered greatly, and he loſt his eldeſt ſon, and ſeveral chief officers.

The ambaſſador receiving only fair words from the pope, immediately, by the queen's command, proceeded to Sardinia, and entered into a treaty with Alphonſus, whom the queen adopted for her ſon and heir. Alphonſus was then preparing to invade Corſica; but embracing the offer of queen Jean, he directly ſent a fleet, with three ambaſſadors, to Naples. In conſequence of this reinforcement, Sforza was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and on the 16th of September retired to Averſa, which had declared for king Lewis; while the queen publickly ratified the treaty made in Sardinia, put the Arragonian ambaſſadors in poſſeſſion of the duchy of Calabria, and the two caſtles Nuovo and del Ovo, and ordered the Seggi and the people of Naples to take the oath of allegiance to Alphonſus as heir of the kingdom[h]. a of Anjou daily growing more powerful, a few months after she made an offer of adopting Lewis; but while she was negotiating that affair with a baron of the Anjou faction, four Arragonian gallies arrived at Ischia, on which account she again attached herself to Alphonsus, who was then in Sicily, making preparations for his Neapolitan expedition, and hired Bracchio of Perugia with 3000 horse. Bracchio accordingly, having concluded a treaty with the queen, who promised him the principality of Capua, and conferred upon him the office of high constable, on the 7th of June entered Terra di Lavoro, and soon after arrived at Naples[i]. About a fortnight after, Alphonsus appeared with seven ships, sixteen gallies, and twenty-six smaller vessels, and was received by the queen with the greatest honours. A. D. 1421.

THE pope, finding the Durazzo faction not so easily suppressed as he expected, now b openly declared himself, and sent his general Tartalia, with 500 horse and some infantry to the assistance of Sforza. But he, being secretly in the interest of Bracchio, prevented Sforza, during the whole campaign, from effecting any important enterprize, and even formed a design for murdering him. The last action of the campaign was the siege of Acerra, which place the inhabitants, though terrified with the battering cannon of Alphonsus, defended with the utmost bravery. The besiegers at last, to save their honour, agreed to raise the siege, on condition that the place should be sequestrated into the hands of the pope's legate. Martin finding himself unable to support the war, and Alphonsus threatening to acknowlege Benedict, one of the antipopes, who still resided in Spain, he now endeavoured to reconcile the two parties; and though he countenanced Lewis, he offered him no c longer any assistance. The two legates that he sent into the kingdom proposed a truce for some months, during which all the towns that had been taken by Lewis were sequestrated into their hands. Alphonsus and the queen, in the mean time, proposed, if possible, before the opening of the campaign, to reconcile Sforza to their party. He having obtained leave from the pope and Lewis to make the best terms for himself that he could, in the beginning of summer he had a conference with Bracchio, and soon after went to Gaeta, where the king and queen then resided, on account of the plague which raged at Naples. Sforza met with a very gracious reception from the queen, as she and Carraccioli began to be very jealous of Alphonsus, who had lately reduced Sorrento, and detained it in his own name. He received the city of Manfredonia, with all its territories, from the queen, promised to endea- d vour to reconcile the barons of the Anjou faction, and to assist the queen and Alphonsus whenever he should be called, or either of them that should desire him first[k].

NOT long after the mutual jealousy of the king and queen broke out into an open rupture. In the end of the year, as the plague had ceased in Naples, they both returned to that city. The queen, however, being persuaded by Carraccioli that Alphonsus designed to seize her and send her a prisoner to Catalonia, took up her residence in Castel Capuano, and declined going to Castel Nuovo, where Alphonsus kept his court. Carraccioli likewise refused to go thither to the council without a safe-conduct from the king, which was granted him. Alphonsus, however, persuaded that the queen was alienated from him by the suggestions of Carraccioli, on the 22d of May apprehended him, when he came to the Castle Nuovo, and e put him in chains, and immediately went with the Catalans and Spaniards to the Castel Capuano, with the intention, as it was believed, of seizing the queen. Jean, suspecting his design, ordered the gate to be shut, and obliged him to retire; and immediately sent messengers to Sforza, who was then at Benevento, to come to her assistance. The king likewise desired the assistance of Sforza, and at the same time assembled his troops to besiege the queen. Sforza in a few days arrived at Naples, and declaring for the queen attacked the Spaniards, and after an obstinate dispute obliged them to retire into Castel Nuovo. Alphonsus, about ten days after, was relieved from his distress by the arrival of a considerable fleet from Arragon, which, it was alleged, he had sent for to carry off the queen.

A rupture betwixt Alphonsus and the queen;

As Sforza had then gone to take possession of Aversa, the Spaniards immediately landed; f and, notwithstanding the opposition of the Neapolitans, that same day made themselves masters of almost one-third of the city. A few days after they took possession of the whole city, part of which they burnt, and plundered the houses of those whom they suspected to favour the queen. She, in the mean time, with many Neapolitan ladies, retired in great terror to Aversa, where, by the advice of Sforza, Carraccioli, and her other counsellors, she declared the adoption of Alphonsus null and void, and adopted Lewis of Anjou, who was then at Rome, but quickly arrived at Aversa, where he was received with great honour, and declared duke of Calabria. Lewis and Sforza, a few weeks after, attacked the Catalans and Sicilians near Naples, and repulsed them into the city. Alphonsus was highly provoked against the pope and Lewis; and being sensible that it would now require great efforts to maintain himself in Naples, he left the command of the garrison to his brother the infant

UPON the rupture betwixt the queen and Alphonſus, Bracchio had declared for the king: however, he gave him very little aſſiſtance, but ſpent the whole ſummer in the ſiege of Aquila, which city had been granted to him according to the agreement betwixt him and the queen; but having declared for Lewis of Anjou, abſolutely refuſed to ſubmit to him. As Bracchio was now an enemy, and the intereſt of the queen and Lewis was united, Sforza was ordered to the relief of Aquila. He accordingly aſſembled all his forces, and marched to Abruzzo; but in paſſing the river Peſcara, on the 4th of January, he was unfortunately drowned [m]. The command of the army was immediately aſſumed by Francis his baſtard ſon, who thoght proper to return to Averſa, where he was received very graciouſly by the queen, and ordered to inveſt Naples. The pope, a little before, had prevailed with Viconti duke of Milan to ſend a fleet to the aſſiſtance of the queen. Guido Torello had accordingly arrived with a powerful fleet, and taken Gaeta and the iſle of Procida, and received the ſubmiſſion of a great many barons in the name of Lewis. By the aſſiſtance of this fleet, Sforza, on the 12th of April, obliged the city of Naples to ſurrender, and took the greateſt part of the garriſon priſoners, Don Peter with a few Catalans ſaving themſelves in Caſtel Nuovo [n]. The queen, having recovered Naples, ordered her generals to march to the relief of Aquila. They accordingly being joined by the pope's troops, marched to Abruzzo, and on the 2d of June came to a general engagement with Bracchio, who being killed in the action, his troops were entirely routed and diſperſed [o]. The queen, in the mean time, being informed that Don Peter had expected to be relieved by an Arragonian fleet, immediately aſſembled her barons for the defence of Naples. The city having thus received a powerful garriſon, the Catalans, who arrived on the 20th of June, were prevented from landing; and after continuing ſome weeks before the city, ſailed with Don Peter to Sicily, leaving the command of the caſtle to one Dalmeo. b

ALPHONSUS being at this time engaged in a war with the king of Caſtile, almoſt intirely dropt his pretenſions to Naples; and the army of Bracchio being diſperſed, the kingdom began again to enjoy tranquillity. Carraccioli, however, ſoon occaſioned great murmuring among the people of Naples, by neglecting to beſiege Caſtel Nuovo, and conſenting to ſeveral truces with the Spaniſh governor, who was even allowed to buy proviſions in the city. He likewiſe irritated many of the barons, by impriſoning ſome of them, and ſtripping others of their eſtates, which were conferred upon the pope's relations. To ſecure his own power and grandeur, he gave one of his daughters in marriage to the ſon of Caldora the general, and the other to the brother of the prince of Tarento, with the county of Acerra as her portion. He likewiſe, by his intereſt with the queen, prevailed upon her to confer upon him the principality of Capua, which had devolved to the crown by the rebellion and death of Bracchio. In the mean time, being jealous of the harmony betwixt him and Lewis of Anjou, who was likewiſe greatly beloved by the Neapolitans, he would not allow him to continue two nights in Naples, but ſent him with his own ſon to Calabria, where he was employed two years in reducing the barons of the party of Alphonſus [p]. c

POPE Martin dying the following year, on the 20th of February, he was ſucceeded by Eugenius IV. a Venetian. A rupture immediately happening betwixt the new pope and the Colonni, who were ſuppoſed to be in poſſeſſion of an immenſe treaſure belonging to the church, Eugenius aſked the aſſiſtance of the queen againſt them, as they had taken arms, and had endeavoured to ſeize the caſtle of St. Angelo. Carraccioli eagerly embraced this opportunity of ruining the Colonni, that he might raiſe himſelf ſtill higher by their downfal; and prevailing on the queen to diveſt them of the principality of Salerno, and all the counties and eſtates they held in the kingdom, he ſent his brother Marino with 1000 horſe to the aſſiſtance of the pope. In the mean time, though he was in poſſeſſion of the principality of Capua, the duchy of Venoſa, the county of Avellino, and many other lands, he aſked the principality of Salerno, and the duchy of Amalfi, under pretence that Capua would probable be taken from him and annexed to the crown by her ſucceſſion. As the queen was now old and decrepid, the ſtrict connection betwen her and Sergianni had long ceaſed. She therefore, by the perſuaſion of her favourites and counſellors, who hated Carraccioli, abſolutely refuſed his requeſt, which provoked him to ſuch a degree of inſolence, that he broke out into abuſive language, and, according to ſome authors, even gave her a blow. The ducheſs of Seſſa, who was the queen's couſin, and now her chief favourite, urged the neceſſity of curbing his inſolence; and having in ſome meaſure obtained the conſent of the d e f g a queen, she soon after found an opportunity of putting her design in execution. Carraccioli being suspicious of the power of Caldora, who lived in Abruzzo with 4000 men under his command, resolved to secure his friendship by a second alliance, and accordingly concluded a match betwixt his only son Trojano and the daughter of Caldora. The duchess of Sessa representing to the queen, that Carraccioli and Caldora, being strictly united by this match, intended to deprive her of the kingdom, she received orders to imprison the high-steward. The conspirators, however, sensible of the queen's fickleness, resolved to put him to death, which resolution they executed on the 18th of August, the day of the marriage, which was honoured with the presence of the greatest part of the barons, and celebrated with the utmost magnificence in Castello di Capuano. After Carraccioli had gone down to bed, one of b the conspirators knocked at the door of his chamber, and desired him to come immediately to the queen, who was seized with an apoplexy. The chamberlains opening the door without suspicion, the conspirators entered, and directly stabbed him. Next day, to prevent a tumult, all the relations of Carraccioli, under pretence of the queen's death, were called to the palace, and forthwith imprisoned. Tho' the queen was dissatisfied with his death, yet she ordered all his estates to be confiscated, and granted a full pardon to all the conspirators [q].

LEWIS of Anjou, who was then in Calabria, and had fixed his residence in Cosenza, hearing of the death of Carraccioli expected to be recalled to Naples, and made preparations for his return. But the ambitious duchess carved out new business for him in that province, c some of which was still possessed by the Colonni [r]; and in hopes of ingrossing the whole direction of affairs, she persuaded the queen not to invite him to Naples [s]. Alphonsus returning to Sicily from an African expedition, and hearing of the death of the high steward, and that the duchess of Sessa, with whom he had formerly had a great intimacy, was at the head of affairs, he immediately sailed to the island of Ischia, and entered into a private correspondence with the duchess, who endeavoured to persuade the queen again to declare him her son and heir. Alphonsus likewise prevailed on the duke of Sessa to espouse his interest, hoping that his authority would influence other barons; but he was greatly disappointed, for there was none who offered to revolt; and the dutchess, who had long been at variance with her husband, no sooner heard of his correspondence with Alphonsus, than she accused d him of rebellion. The king, finding that his plots had miscarried, made a truce with the queen for ten years, and returned the following summer to Sicily [t]. A few months after, Lewis duke of Anjou contracted an alliance with Margaret the daughter of the duke of Savoy. The queen proposed that the bride should land at Naples, but by the advice of her counsellors, who had no desire to see Lewis in the capital, the duchess Margaret was desired to land at Sorrento, whither she arrived the following year, and proceeded to Cosenza, where in the month of July the marriage was celebrated, with as much magnificence as the place would allow [u].

Soon after, the courtiers, who had the intire management of the queen, desirous to ruin the prince of Tarento, prevailed upon her to summon him, under pretence that he had not e restored some lands that in the former civil dissensions he had taken from the family of the Sanseverini. Without waiting for his appearance, they sent against him the general Caldora, whose troops being joined with those of the queen, and Lewis of Anjou, composed an army of 9500 horse and 3500 foot. As the prince of Tarento had always been loyal to the queen, Lewis of Anjou engaged in the war out of obedience to her, against his own inclination; and contracting an illness from the fatigues of the campaign, he returned to Cosenza, where he died on the fifteenth of November, after he had spent 100,000 ducats of his wife's portion in the expedition against the prince. His death was greatly lamented by the whole kingdom, but particularly by the queen, who regretted bitterly that she had not honoured and treated him as his great patience and submissive obedience to her had deserved [w]. The f queen survived Lewis only a few months, and died on the second of February, in the sixty-fifth year of her age, and the twenty-first of her reign, being the last of the first race of the family of Anjou. She left behind her a treasure of 500,000 ducats; and as the wife of the late Lewis was not with child, by her last will she appointed his brother Renatus as her heir, nominating sixteen barons of her council and court as regents of the kingdom till he should arrive [x].

till he ſhould be confirmed by the holy ſee, to which the kingdom had devolved by the death of the late queen without iſſue. The regents paid little regard to this command, but declared that they would have no king but Renatus of Anjou; whoſe ſtandard, with that of the pope, they erected in Naples. Mean while Alphonſus, who for ſome time paſt had been ſending ſuccours from Sicily to the prince of Tarento, hearing of the queen's death, immediately came with a fleet to Iſchia, and entered into a correſpondence with ſeveral nobles who were not of the regency. By their advice he landed with ſome troops, and many other barons declaring for him, in the beginning of May he found himſelf at the head of 15,000 men. Capua was likewiſe delivered up to him, and by the advice of ſome barons he inveſted Gaeta. The regency, in order to oppoſe him, gave the command of their troops to Caldora, and hired Antonio Pontadero and Micheletto da Cotignola, each of whom commanded 1000 horſe. The duke of Milan, who was at this time in poſſeſſion of Genoa, and had reduced almoſt all Lombardy, declared againſt Alphonſus, and ſent aſſiſtance to the Gaetans, being ſuſpected of having a deſign to ſeize the kingdom for himſelf. The ſiege ſtill continuing, the Genoeſe a few weeks after fitted out ſeventeen veſſels, with ſupplies for the place, which Alphonſus being informed of, according to common opinion, by the duke of Milan, who deſired the defeat of the Genoeſe in order to humble them, he embarked 10,000 men, and ſailed to the iſland of Poncia, to intercept the fleet. The Genoeſe, who were only 4000, at firſt declined any engagement; but being attacked by Alphonſus, they fought for ten hours with ſuch deſpair and fury, that at laſt they gained a complete victory, took all the enemies gallies except one, and made Alphonſus priſoner, with his two brothers, the king of Navarre and Don Henry, with many other Neapolitan, Sicilian, and Catalan knights and barons, to the number of near 1000. The Cajetans hearing of the victory, immediately ſallied out upon the beſiegers, whom he entirely routed. The Genoeſe fleet, after ſupplying Gaeta with proviſions, ſailed to Naples, with the deſign of attacking the two caſtles towards the ſea; but the admiral being bribed, it was believed by Alphonſus, abſtained from any further hoſtilities, and returned to Savona, where he landed his priſoners, who inſtead of proceeding to Genoa, were conducted to Milan. The duke treated Alphonſus with great honour and reſpect, and being ſoon convinced by him, that it was not his intereſt to allow the French to get footing in Italy, he entered into an alliance with him againſt Renatus, and towards the end of the year ſet all his priſoners at liberty.

THE Genoeſe thinking themſelves ſlighted by this alliance, immediately revolted from the duke, and concluded a treaty with Renatus, who was at this time a priſoner to the duke of Burgundy. A few months before, he had come to Anjou, on parole, where he received the deputies from the regency; but reſolving to fulfil his engagements to the duke of Burgundy, he refuſed to proceed to Naples, but ſent his wife Elizabeth, with his ſecond ſon Lewis marquis of Piedmont, returning himſelf to priſon, where he continued three years. Elizabeth embarking at Provence on the firſt of October, arrived at Gaeta; and a few weeks after proceeded to Naples, where ſhe was received with great honours as queen. She immediately ſent Micheletto as viceroy to Calabria, who being aſſiſted by a fleet under the command of her ſon, quickly reduced that province. Caldora and Antonio in the mean time, deſirous, for their own advantage, to protract the war, neglected to take poſſeſſion of Capua, and allowed the Arragonians to ſeize Gaeta [y].

ALPHONSUS hearing that his brother was in poſſeſſion of Gaeta, on the ſecond of February arrived in that city with all thoſe barons that had been priſoners in Milan. He continued there ſeveral months, and though ſeveral barons of the Anjou faction revolted to him, he ſpent the whole year without any enterprize of importance. Being irritated againſt the pope, who refuſed to favour his pretenſions to Naples, he declared for the council of Baſil, which was then at variance with Eugenius, and began hoſtilities againſt the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, under pretence of taking poſſeſſion of it in behalf of the fathers at Baſil [z]. Alphonſus by this conduct ſtirred up a more formidable enemy againſt him than he expected; for the queen the following year begging aſſiſtance of the pope, he ſent 4000 horſe and 1000 foot to her aid, under the command of Vitelleſchi, patriarch of Alexandria, who was then greatly diſtinguiſhed for his military talents. Vitelleſchi entered the kingdom in the month of April, and took Cepperano, Venafro, and many other places, in his way to Naples, where he was received with great honour by the queen, who gave him 26,000 ducats for the payment of his troops. As the cardinal paid his men not only with money but alſo with indulgences, they fought with great bravery; and in a few months recovered many places from the Arragonians. The queen, however, refuſing to grant him any ſettlement in the kingdom, and Caldora, inſtead of co-operating with him, profeſſing open enmity againſt him, and thwarting him to the utmoſt of his power, ſoon after Chriſtmas he embarked on board a ſmall veſſel, and ſailed to Venice, and from thence to Ferrara to the pope [a].

a RENATUS about the same time, upon paying an immense ransom to the duke of Burgundy, being at last set at liberty, in the month of April arrived at Pisa, where he received an offer of assistance from Francis Sforza, which he accepted. His council, however, assuring him, that if he hired Sforza, Caldora would immediately revolt to Alphonsus, he afterwards desired Francis not to enter the kingdom. Upon his arrival at Naples (U), Renatus was received with great rejoicings, and it was universally concluded that the war would quickly be at an end; but it was no sooner known that he came without money, than his reputation sunk, and the ardour of the people abated. Soon after his arrival, Caldora came to Naples, and offered him his service; and he immediately after marched into Abruzzo, to defend his own territories from Alphonsus, who had reduced great part of the b province. Renatus quickly followed him with as many men as he could collect; and at the end of August joined him at Sulmona, which they besieged. Finding the siege very difficult, and being joined by 7000 Aquilan infantry, Renatus decamped, and went in quest of Alphonsus, to whom he sent a bloody glove, challenging him to an engagement. Alphonsus having privately viewed his army, thought proper to decline an engagement, immediately left Abruzzo, and marching with all speed to Naples, on the twenty-seventh of September invested the city by sea and land. Though the city had almost no garrison, yet it made a vigorous opposition; and the infant Don Peter being killed by a cannon-ball, Alphonsus raised the siege, which had continued thirty-six days, and retired with his army to Capua.

RENATUS in the mean time had reduced almost all Abruzzo, and towards the end of the c year returned to Naples. Early in the spring he besieged Castel Nuovo by sea and land. Alphonsus used his utmost endeavours to relieve the place; and for that purpose marched with 11,000 men to Naples. His troops being exposed to the cannon from the castle of S. Erasmus, they mutinied, and declared they would not stand to be shot at like dogs; which obliged him to send a message to Renatus, desiring him to make war according to the usual manner, and not to fire at night. His message being treated with contempt, and the castle being in want of ammunition and provisions, it was at last agreed to deliver it to the French ambassadors, who had lately come to Naples to propose an accommodation betwixt the two kings. The Catalans, who had been in possession of the castle fifteen years, accordingly marched out the twenty-fourth of August, with what effects they could carry with d them. The French ambassadors soon after went to wait upon Alphonsus, who had given them hopes of agreeing to a truce; but both they and their retinue being intercepted on the road, and beat by the Catalans, they returned to Naples, and delivered the castle to Renatus.

ALPHONSUS in the mean time made himself master of Salerno, which he gave, with the title of prince, to Ursino count of Nola; and immediately after he besieged the castle of Aversa. Renatus was very solicitous to relieve the Aversans, and for that purpose intreated the assistance of Antonio Caldora, confirming to him the duchy of Bari, which had been possessed by his father, who had died a few weeks before. Antonio returning him an evasive answer, by which he appeared to lean to the party of Alphonsus, Renatus declared publickly, e that seeing his affairs in a desperate situation, he intended to go with his wife and two sons to Eugenius of Florence; that if the pope would give him assistance he would return to Naples, but if not he would proceed to France.

He in vain solicits the assistance of Caldora.

Being dissuaded from this resolution by the Neapolitans, a few weeks after, on the twenty-ninth of January, he ventured to leave Naples, with some faithful attendants; and though almost all Terra di Lavora was in possession of Alphonsus, he proceeded through the snow and over the mountains to Nocera. He gained great honour by his journey, and was immediately visited by the barons of Abruzzo, and some of the family of Caldora. Though he received many presents from the barons, he could not raise so much money as would satisfy the demand of the duke of Bari, who held him in suspence for f near four months before he would absolutely engage in his service. The duke having at length joined him with his troops, he sent a trumpeter to Alphonsus, desiring him not to desolate the kingdom by prolonging the war, but to engage with him in single combat, or with a select troop, or with his army, and that the conqueror should quietly enjoy the crown. Alphonsus answering, that it would be imprudent to hazard a battle, as the kingdom was already his own, Renatus, on the last of June, attacked his camp, which he made himself master of, and would have entirely ruined his army, if Caldora had not treacherously refused to join in the pursuit. The king being convinced of his

Of these sixty, only two understood the art of making gunpowder. Alphonsus caused them to make a great many muskets; but as none of his party knew the art of making gun-powder, the guns were for some time useless, till he happened to seize one of the musketeers of Renatus who knew the receipt for making the powder (1).

RENATUS being thus destitute of money and troops, sent his wife and two sons to Provence, and began to treat with his competitor, offering to leave him the quiet possession of the kingdom, on condition that he would adopt his eldest son John for his heir. The Neapolitans being informed of this negotiation, prevailed upon Renatus to break it off, by assuring him that the pope, Francis Sforza, the Florentines, and Genoese, had concluded a league to drive Alphonsus from Italy. Alphonsus in the mean time allowed the prince of Tarento to seize the duchy of Bari, and the county of Conversano, from Caldora, who
A. D. 1442. afterwards lost all his territories, and died a beggar in the march of Ancona. He likewise took possession of Cajazza, and the island of Caprea, where soon after he seized a French galley b with 80,000 crowns; and though the cardinal of Tarento, and the count of Tagliacozzo, by the command of the pope, entered the kingdom with 10,000 men, to the assistance of the Anjou faction, he found means of prevailing on them to agree to a truce, and to retire to the Campania di Roma.

THIS truce proved the entire ruin of the affairs of Renatus; for Alphonsus having now no enemy to oppose him in the field, marched, and invested the city of Naples; which, after a long siege, he at last, on the second of June, made himself master of by storm; his soldiers having been conducted into the place through an aqueduct. Renatus having used his utmost endeavours to repulse the enemy, retired to Castello Nuovo; and two Genoese ships arriving next day with provisions, he embarked in one of them, and proceeded to Florence c to the pope, who received him with great kindness, and granted him the investiture of the kingdom; but could not prevail on him to continue in Italy, in hopes of recovering the kingdom [b].

THE Arragonians, who at first broke into Naples, pillaged the city for four hours; but Alphonsus at length entering, immediately rode through the streets with a detachment of officers and horse, and prohibited any injury or violence to be done to the inhabitants under the pain of death. He treated all the citizens with great clemency, and having in a short time reduced almost the whole kingdom, he assembled a parliament at Benevento; and that he might not seem to annex his new conquest to his other hereditary dominions, he caused all the barons to swear homage to his bastard son Ferdinand, whom he legitimated, d and created duke of Calabria. Although Arragon, Valencia, Catalonia, Majorca, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, and Roussillon, were at this time under the dominion of Alphonsus, yet he resolved to fix his royal seat at Naples; and the following year, having ordered forty yards of the wall to be levelled, he entered the city through the breach in a triumphal chariot drawn by four white horses, and followed by all the nobles of the kingdom on foot. The day was concluded with tournaments and feasts, and having granted a pardon to all those of the Anjou faction, he was so liberal of honours to his friends, that the author of the Neapolitan diary observes, the number of those who enjoyed titles was then doubled [c].

HAVING thus restored tranquility to the kingdom, he bent all his thoughts upon a reconciliation with Eugenius; but in order to obtain from him the better terms, he at the e same time entered into a negotiation with the antipope Felix, who had been elected about four years before by a few schismatic members of the council of Basil. As the authority of the council was daily declining, he interrupted his negotiation with Felix by starting new difficulties, and about the middle of June concluded a treaty with Eugenius, by which it was stipulated, that the pope should confirm the adoption of Alphonsus by Jean II. and grant him the kingdom of Naples upon the same conditions as it had been granted to others by former popes, with the clause, notwithstanding he had conquered the kingdom with the sword; that Alphonsus and all his subjects should acknowlege Eugenius as true pope; that he should support the ecclesiastical liberties, and re-establish those that had been infringed; that he should restore all the places taken from the church; should furnish six f gallies against the Turks, and 4000 horse and 1000 foot to recover the march of Ancona from Francis Sforza, and grant the same privileges to the barons as they enjoyed during the reign of William II. The treaty contained some other less material articles, which were all confirmed by Eugenius, who on the fifteenth of July granted the bull of investiture. Tho' it was mentioned in the bull, that if Alphonsus left no lawful issue the kingdom should revert to the church, the pope nevertheless granted another bull of investiture to Ferdinand, which it was agreed should not be published during his life [d].

a report to prevail that he was dead. The king by this ſickneſs being convinced how little he could truſt to the fidelity of the barons, reſolved to ſecure the intereſt of the prince of Tarento, the moſt powerful of them, by contracting a marriage betwixt the duke of Calabria and his niece Iſabella, whom the prince had propoſed to marry to the brother and heir apparent of the emperor of Conſtantinople. Iſabella was accordingly conducted to Naples, where the marriage with the duke was celebrated without any magnificence, as news arrived of the death of the queens of Caſtile and Portugal, the king's two ſiſters. Alphonſus likewiſe ſecured the fidelity of the duke of Seſſa, by marrying his baſtard daughter Leonora to the duke's only ſon; and being informed that the troops he had ſent into the march of Ancona, in conſequence of his treaty with the pope, had been defeated by Sforza, b he ordered another body of men to march thither, under the command of the count of Ventimiglia, and ſent a powerful fleet into the Adriatic, to prevent the Venetians from ſending ſupplies to the enemy.

About three years after Alphonſus reſolved to march againſt Sforza; but when he had proceeded as far as Tivoli, he was informed of the death of Eugenius. Nicholas V. his ſucceſſor, being of a peaceable diſpoſition, and having no partiality to the Venetians, immediately propoſed a general peace, and prevailed on Alphonſus, with the Venetians and Florentines, and the duke of Milan, to ſend their plenipotentiaries to a congreſs at Ferrara. The conferences were quickly broke off, and all Italy was again thrown into confuſion by the death of the duke of Milan. As he left no lawful iſſue, the emperor, the duke of Orleans c Francis Sforza, and Alphonſus, all formed pretenſions to his dominions. Alphonſus reflecting on the hazard of exciting the emperor and all Italy againſt him, ſoon dropt his claim, but under pretence of ſecuring the peace of Italy, he declared war againſt the Florentines, and entered Tuſcany, in hopes of ſoon making a conqueſt of that province [f]. Having quickly taken ſome few caſtles, in the beginning of the following ſpring he beſieged Piombino; but the place being vigorouſly defended, and the plague cutting off a great many of his army, he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege ſeveral months after, and in September returned with the remains of his army to Naples [g].

He declares war againſt the Florentines. A. D. 1447.

A few months after his return there happened a rupture betwixt him and the Venetians, which almoſt entirely ruined the commerce of the ſubjects in Abruzzo, Puglia, and Terra di d Bari. The war, however, was but of ſhort continuance, for a peace was concluded the year after in the month of Auguſt [h]; when the Venetians entered into an alliance with the king againſt the Florentines, the Genoeſe, and Francis Sforza, who was now declared duke of Milan [i]. This war was carried on but in a languid manner by the king, as he now began to be in love with repoſe, and was at this time enamoured with Donna Lucretia de Alagno, a Neapolitan lady of great wit and beauty; who is likewiſe celebrated by ſeveral authors for her chaſtity, ſhe having declared that the king with her conſent ſhould never violate her honour, and that if he offered to uſe force, ſhe would not imitate the Roman Lucretia, but would prevent the diſhonour by death. According to Mariana, however, and ſome others, ſhe was the king's concubine:

e After the war had continued two years, with various ſucceſs, he ſent 6000 horſe and 2000 foot into Tuſcany, under the command of his ſon Ferdinand, who took Fojano and two other caſtles, while the Neapolitan fleet infeſted the coaſt [k]. The Florentines immediately ſent an ambaſſador to France, deſiring the aſſiſtance of Charles VII. and intreating him to ſend Renatus with a body of troops into Italy, promiſing to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power, in recovering the kingdom of Naples. Renatus accordingly arriving in Lombardy the following year, with a conſiderable body of troops, gave ſuch a turn to the war, in favour of the duke of Milan and the Florentines, that the Venetians began to make ſome offers for peace. Nicholas V. likewiſe being earneſt to unite the Chriſtian princes againſt Mahomet II. who a few months before had made himſelf maſter of Conſtantinople, f offered his mediation for a treaty, and ſent for ambaſſadors of all the parties to Rome. Alphonſus, however, was very deſirous to protract the war, and made large promiſes to the Venetians to make them alter their intentions; but the republic, inſtead of hearkening to his propoſals, ſent a ſecret meſſenger to the duke of Milan, to ſound his inclinations, and finding him not averſe to peace, they a few months after concluded a treaty with him and the Florentines. At the deſire of the Florentines, the three parties likewiſe entered into a defenſive alliance; and, that Alphonſus might not be offended, they immediately ſent their ambaſſadors to Naples, who, with the pope's legate Simonetus the hermit, with great difficulty prevailed upon him to enter into the league. As all Italy was alarmed with the loſs of Conſtantinople, and expected immediately to be invaded by the Turks, a defenſive alliance for twenty-five years was accordingly concluded among the Italian ſtates, excepting the Genoeſe, Sigiſmond Malateſta, and Aſtur of Faenza, who were excluded to gratify Alphonſus [l]. a

A FEW months after this general peace, Alphonſus reflecting that his competitor Renatus might be powerfully aſſiſted by the Italians, and that his eldeſt ſon John was ſtill left in Italy and was entertained by the Florentines, he reſolved to ſecure the friendſhip of Sforza duke of Milan, who was likewiſe deſirous of the king's alliance to defend himſelf againſt the pretenſions of the duke of Orleans. A double marriage was accordingly contracted; Hippolita Maria, the duke's daughter, being betrothed to Alphonſus, the duke of Calabria's eldeſt ſon, and Leonora, the ſiſter of this Alphonſus, to the duke of Milan's third ſon, named Sforza [m].

ALPHONSUS, however, about the ſame time drew upon himſelf the enmity of the ſucceſſor of Nicolas, Calixtus III. who had been born his ſubject, and promoted to the cardinalate by his intereſt. The new pope is accuſed by ſome authors of ingratitude, and 'tis ſaid, that being intoxicated with his elevation, he behaved with inſolence to the king. Others allege, that the king, even after his promotion, looked upon him as his ſubject, and was piqued that the pope had rejected ſome arrogant demands made to him in an authoritative manner [n]. However it be, the enmity continued during the reſt of Alphonſus's life; and the following year the king, from his reſentment againſt the pope, aſſiſted Picinius, who with a body of troops ravaged the territories of Sienna [o]. At the ſame time he continued the war againſt Malateſta and the Genoeſe; and the year after he ſent a powerful fleet to beſiege Genoa. The Genoeſe being likewiſe attacked by land, were reduced to great diſtreſs; but the next year they were happily delivered from their enemy by death. Alphonſus in the beginning of May was taken ill, and after languiſhing a few weeks, died on the twenty-ſeventh of June, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age. He is ſaid to have excelled all the princes of his time in the knowlege of the art of war, in his generoſity, magnificence, love of learning, and regard for learned men, particularly George of Trebiſond, and Laurentius Valla. He is, however, blamed for his immoderate ambition, incontinency, paſſion, and diſſimulation, and the ſevere exactions with which he oppreſſed his ſubjects [p]. As he had no lawful iſſue, he left by his laſt will the kingdom of Naples to his baſtard ſon Ferdinand, and all his other dominions, particularly the iſland of Sicily, to his brother John, king of Navarre, and his poſterity [q] (W). b c

His baſtard ſon Ferdinand ſucceeds to the kingdom of Naples.

THE ſame day that Alphonſus died, Ferdinand ſent to the pope, demanding the inveſtiture of the kingdom. Calixtus, however, refuſed his demand, unleſs he would divide the realm with his nephew Peter Lewis Borgia, a man of a moſt abandoned character, whom he had created duke of Spoleto. Otherwiſe he declared, that he would claim the kingdom as devolved to the church, or give the inveſtiture of it to John king of Arragon [r]. Ferdinand would not hearken to the condition propoſed by the pope; but nevertheleſs endeavoured to mitigate him by reſpectful and ſubmiſſive letters and meſſengers. His endeavours were entirely without effect; for the pope on the twelfth of July publiſhed a bull, prohibiting Ferdinand to take the title of king of Naples under pain of excommunication, and likewiſe, under the ſame penalty, forbidding any of the Neapolitans from ſwearing allegiance to him, abſolving all who had already ſworn to him, and affirming that the kingdom had devolved to the church, as Ferdinand was not the true ſon of Alphonſus, but ſuppoſitious. The king in his defence appealed to a future council, and, as he was informed the pope was endeavouring to excite a rebellion by private emiſſaries, he aſſembled an army and threatened to march to Rome [s]. At the ſame time he wrote to the cardinals, to endeavour to mitigate the pope, who was likewiſe importuned by the ambaſſadors of the duke of Milan. Calixtus, however, ſtill continued obſtinate and implacable; but all his ambitious deſigns were ſoon diſſipated by death, which happened to him on the ſixth of Auguſt. His ſucceſſor, the famous Æneas Sylvius, who took the name of Pius II. immediately declared himſelf favourable to Ferdinand, received the homage of his ambaſſador, and notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Renatus of Anjou, and his ſon John, who was then at Genoa, granted the bull of in- d e f

When Alphonſus died, Charles prince of Viana, the ſon of his brother John, happened to be then in Naples, and privately propagated his claim to the crown, as lawful heir to his uncle. He had ſeveral conferences with the malecontents; but fearing his intentions were diſcovered, and ſeeing no proſpect of ſucceſs, he embarked with many Catalans and Sicilians, and went over to Sicily. After his departure, the diſaffected barons invited his father, John king of Arragon; but he refuſing their invitation, they ſent for John the eldeſt ſon of Renatus of Anjou, then governor of Genoa, which republic had
b ſubmitted to the king of France, in order to be protected from the late king Alphonſus. During their ſecret intrigues, Ferdinand was ſolemnly crowned at Barletta, on the fourth of February, by cardinal Latino Urſino, when he granted many favours to his ſubjects, and honoured many of them with knighthood [u]. Is crowned at Barletta. A. D. 1459.

HE appeared now quietly and ſecurely fixed upon the throne, and reſolved to proſecute the war againſt the Genoeſe and Malateſta. He was, however, prevented by a cruel civil war, which broke out in the kingdom. According to the author of the Neapolitan diary, the prince of Tarento, who was very powerful by his great number of vaſſals, and beſides, as conſtable of the kingdom, received from the exchequer yearly 100,000 ducats of gold, for the ſupport of the men at arms, ſuſpecting that the king intended to diminiſh his
c grandeur, reſolved openly to take up arms, and ſoon after inveſted Venoſa, under pretence of a private quarrel. When the king ordered him to deſiſt, inſtead of obeying, he propoſed conditions to Ferdinand, and deſired him to reſtore ſome barons who had forfeited their eſtates during the late reign. According to this author, his requeſt was denied; but others ſay, that thoſe barons he intreated for were reſtored to their eſtates, and that nevertheleſs the prince and they entered into a correſpondence with John of Anjou, and even prevailed on the prince of Roſſano, who had married Ferdinand's ſiſter, to join their party.

JOHN of Anjou, who for ſome time had aſſumed the title of duke of Calabria, being encouraged by their preſſing intreaties, fitted out a fleet of twenty-three gallies at Genoa and Marſeilles, and hearing that Ferdinand had gone to Calabria, to prevent a revolt in that province, on the fifth of October he arrived before Naples, in hopes of being admitted into
d the city. Queen Iſabel with great diligence and prudence putting the city in a ſtate of defence, he thought proper to retire, and ſailing to the coaſt of Seſſa, landed his troops between the mouths of the rivers Garigliano and Volturno, and was joyfully received by the prince of Roſſano [w]. Many barons immediately joined him, and Lucera, Troja, Foggia, Sanſevera, Manfredonia, and other cities, declared for him, and ſet up his ſtandard. A few months after he was joined by the prince of Tarento from Puglia, with a large body of troops, and Picininus, who commanded the troops of the late Bratchio, and the Genoeſe fleet returning to the coaſt, he encamped at Sarno, and received the ſubmiſſion of ſeveral cities. Ferdinand in the mean time having concluded a peace with Malateſta, and received conſiderable reinforcements from the pope, and artillery from the duke of Milan, marched e againſt the enemy, and imprudently attacked their camp, though in a few days he could have forced them to ſurrender. At firſt he gained a conſiderable advantage, but in the end he was entirely defeated, and obliged to fly to Naples. John of Anjou is invited by the diſaffected barons to ſeize the the crown. He enters the kingdom. A. D. 1460. Defeats Ferdinand.

DUKE John gained ſo great a ſuperiority by this victory, that almoſt all the barons ſeemed to ſtrive who ſhould firſt ſubmit to him, and the cities in the moſt diſtant parts of the kingdom ſet up his ſtandard; ſo that excepting the count of Fondi, and a very few barons, and Naples, and ſome other chief cities, he ſeemed to be in poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom [x]. If he had marched directly to Naples, it was ſuppoſed he would quickly have put an end to the war; but the prince of Tarento diſſuaded him from this deſign, having, as was reported, been privately ſolicited by his niece, queen Iſabella, who left Naples in the f diſguiſe of a Franciſcan, attended by her confeſſor, and threw herſelf at his feet, intreating him, that as he had made her a queen, he would make her die a queen [y]. Duke John being accordingly perſuaded by the prince to employ his troops in reducing the towns in Campania, Ferdinand had leiſure to recruit his forces, and to receive new reinforcements from the pope and the duke of Milan. Having thus drawn together a conſiderable body of troops, he left Naples, and in the beginning of winter, almoſt in ſight of the enemy, beſieged two towns in Puglia, which, after a long ſiege, he obliged to ſurrender.

THIS ſucceſs encouraged a great many barons to return to their allegiance. The Anjou faction, however, ſtill continued very powerful, and in the following campaign beſieged the Ferdinand retrieves his affairs. A. D. 1461.

king in his camp before Barletta. While Ferdinand was in this situation, George Caſtriota of Albania, ſurnamed Scanderbeg, at the requeſt of the pope, and in return for the ſuccours he had formerly received from Alphonſus, croſſed the Adriatic to his aſſiſtance. The news of his arrival ſurprized all Italy, and increaſed the credit of Ferdinand's party. He immediately obliged the duke to retire from Barletta, and with his light horſe ravaged the territories of the prince of Tarento; but the Turks violating the truce they had concluded with him, he was quickly obliged to return to Albania [z]. Though Ferdinand likewiſe this year increaſed his party, by creating one of the moſt powerful of the Sanſeverini prince of Salerno, yet in the beginning of the next campaign he loſt all the towns which he had before taken from the Anjou faction. But about the middle of July, being joined by Alexander Sforza, lord of Piſaura, who was ſent to his aſſiſtance by the duke of Milan, a few weeks after he gained a complete victory over the duke in the neighbourhood of Troja, the particulars of which are related by Pontanus, who was preſent in the action. Two days after Troja ſurrendered, and afterwards Foggia, Sanſevero, and Aſcoli. Many of the barons alſo immediately abandoned the Anjou faction, the duke of Milan offering himſelf as guarantee for the performance of all the promiſes made to them by the king. The prince of Tarento likewiſe ſeeing the Anjou faction ruined, thought proper to make his peace with the king; but ſurvived not much more than a year, being ſtrangled by two of his own ſervants, who were ſaid to have been bribed by Ferdinand [a].

A. D. 1463. JOHN, with Picininus, after the defeat at Troja, retired with the remains of their army to Abruzzo, and offered to conclude a truce with Ferdinand; but their propoſal was rejected by the king, who the following ſpring aſſembled his army near Capua, and marched againſt the prince of Roſſano, while Sforza proceeded to Abruzzo. The duke leaving Arruzzo, and coming to Seſſa, to encourage the prince to continue ſtedfaſt, in hopes of ſuccours from Marſeilles and Genoa, Piciniuus during his abſence ſubmitted to Sforza, and entered into the king's ſervice, being promiſed a yearly penſion of 110,000 ducats. The prince hearing of his ſubmiſſion immediately concluded an accommodation with the king, while duke John, being abandoned by all the barons, retired with a few French into the iſland of Iſchia. Ferdinand returning in the end of autumn with his army into Puglia, marched againſt Manfredonia, which ſtill held out for the duke. After he had reduced this city, which was pillaged by his army, he was informed of the death of the prince of Tarento, and was invited to take poſſeſſion of his territories and treaſures, as he had left no male iſſue. The king, overjoyed at the news, immediately left the command of his army to Sforza, and proceeded with a few troops to Tarento, being honourably received by the cities, towns, and caſtles, through which he paſſed, as heir of the late prince. He was joined by all the troops of the deceaſed, to the number of 4000 men, and received in money, jewels, cattle, and furniture, to the value of a million of crowns [b]. John of Anjou hearing of the death of the prince, with whom he had concerted to renew the war in the ſpring, loſt all hopes of recovering the kingdom; and though he was reinforced with ten gallies from Provence, a few weeks after he left Iſchia, and returned to Marſeilles [c].

The barons return to their allegiance.

John returns to Marſeilles.

A. D. 1464.

Not many months after, Ferdinand loſt his great protector Pius II. who died at Ancona, and in the end of Auguſt was ſucceeded by Paul II. a Venetian. The king at this time had marched with his army into Abruzzo, and deprived all the family of Landola of their territories. In his way thither, he ſeized the prince of Roſſano, and ſent him a priſoner to Naples. This proceeding being a manifeſt violation of the treaty concluded with him, Piciniuus, who had been created prince of Sulmo, to avoid the ſame treatment, fled to Milan, where he was honourably received, and married the duke's baſtard daughter. Being, however, perſuaded the following ſummer to return to Naples, he was apprehended by the king, with his ſon, and ſome few others, after he had been treated at his firſt arrival with the greateſt honours. Ferdinand excuſed the proceeding to the duke of Milan, under pretence that Piciniuus was forming a ſecond conſpiracy. The duke, however, was ſo offended with his breach of faith, that he immediately ordered his two ſons not to proceed till further orders with their ſiſter Hippolita, who had advanced to Sienna, on her way to Naples, attended by Frederic, the king's ſecond ſon with 600 horſe [d]. He likewiſe ſent another of his ſons ambaſſador to the king, to intercede for his ſon-in-law; but before his arrival Piciniuus was dead, having accidentally killed himſelf according to the account publiſhed by the king, by falling from a window of the caſtle. Though the duke did not believe this account of his death, it was reported he had been ſtrangled by the king's order, yet he allowed his daughter to proceed to Naples, where ſhe arrived about the middle of September, when the marriage was celebrated with Alphonſus the duke of Calabria.

tranquility. As Alexander Sforza duke of Milan died a few months after the marriage of Hippolita, he renewed the league with his ſon Galeatius and the Florentines, and the year after ſent his ſon, the duke of Calabria, with a conſiderable body of troops, to Tuſcany, to the aſſiſtance of Peter Medici, againſt ſome malcontents, who had prevailed on the Venetians to ſupport their party [c]. As the Turks had defeated Scanderbeg, and poſſeſſed Albania and Epire, and were making continual conqueſts in Greece, pope Paul the following year prevailed on the league to conclude a peace with the Venetians, and quieted, in ſome meaſure, the civil diſſenſions in Florence. A few months after, Ferdinand had a diſpute with the pope, about the annual tribute due to the holy ſee, and the cities in the kingdom poſſeſſed by the pope; namely, Terracina, Benevento, Civita Ducale, Acumoli, and Lioneſſa. A difference betwixt Ferdinand and the pope. A. D. 1469.

b The king threatened to begin hoſtilities againſt the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; and in the beginning of January ordered ſome troops to march towards Abruzzo. He likewiſe ſent his ſon Alphonſus to the aſſiſtance of Robert Malateſta, whom the pope was then beſieging in Rimini. The papal troops were obliged to raiſe the ſiege for want of reinforcements, which they expected from the Venetians, who were then chiefly engaged in preparing for the defence of the iſland Negropont or Eubœa againſt the Turks. The following year, on the 12th of July, Mahomet II. made himſelf maſter of the city and iſland, when he wrote a letter to Ferdinand, deſiring him to rejoice on account of his victory. Ferdinand, in his anſwer, declared, that he could not rejoice at the taking of the city; and all the ſtates of Italy, being greatly alarmed with the loſs, thought proper to accommodate their differences, and on Chriſtmas-

The king gives his daughters in marriage to the duke of Ferrara and the king of Hungary. A. D. 1477.

About three days after, Ferdinand entered into an alliance with Hercules d'Eſte, duke of Ferrara, and gave him his daughter Eleonora in marriage. He likewiſe betrothed his other daughter to Matthias, king of Hungary, who three years after being crowned queen by cardinal Caraffa, embarked in the month of September, with the Hungarian ambaſſador at Manfredonia, on board four gallies, with many other ſhips, and ſailed to Hungary. Queen Iſabella dying a few months after, Ferdinand contracted an alliance with his couſin Jean, the daughter of John, king of Arragon, and ſent the duke of Calabria, attended with many nobles, on board ten gallies, and ſeveral other ſhips, to Catalonia, to conduct the bride to Naples. Upon her arrival, in the month of September, ſhe was crowned by cardinal Borgia with great pomp and ceremony [g]. Ferdinand in the mean time, during theſe years of peace, employed himſelf in enlarging and embelliſhing the city of Naples, in reſettling the provinces, publiſhing new laws and regulations, reforming the tribunals and the univerſity, encouraging learning and learned men, and introducing new arts, particularly the art of printing, and the ſilken and woollen manufactories [h].

He aſſiſts the pope againſt the Florentines. A. D. 1478.

A few months after his marriage, the king concluded an alliance with pope Sixtus IV. which in the end proved very fatal to his kingdom. Sixtus, the following ſpring, formed a plot to aſſaſſinate Laurence and Julian Medici, the grandſons of the famous Coſmo of Florence, in hopes of cruſhing that commonwealth, and enriching his profligate nephew Jeronimo Ravere, and perſuaded Ferdinand to ſend ſome troops to Tuſcany, under pretence of aſſiſting the pope againſt ſome rebels. Laurence Medici was ſo fortunate as to eſcape the hands of the aſſaſſins; and the Florentines, being inflamed with reſentment againſt the pope, and aſſiſted by the Venetians and the duke of Milan, defended their territories with great vigour againſt the duke of Calabria and the papal troops, with thoſe of Sienna. The war continued with various ſucceſs till the end of the following year, when a truce being concluded for three months, Laurence Medici came as ambaſſador from Florence to Naples, and was ſo ſucceſsful as to prevail with Ferdinand to conclude a defenſive and offenſive alliance with the Florentines, which was publiſhed a few months after, to the great diſpleaſure of the pope, who had not yet been conſulted [i].

The Florentines and Venetians excite the Turks to invade Naples.

The Florentines, during the war, to oblige Ferdinand to withdraw his troops, ſecretly preſſed the Turks to invade Naples [k]. The Venetians likewiſe, being jealous of the king's power, and having got intelligence by intercepted letters, that he was forming pretenſions to the kingdom of Cyprus, excited the infidels, with whom they had then concluded a peace, to invade his dominions [l]. The Turks, according to Giannone, ſince their conqueſt of Conſtantinople, formed pretenſions to all the provinces that had formerly belonged to the Roman empire [m]; and Mahomet, being irritated againſt Ferdinand for having ſent ſuccours to the relief of Rhodes [n], was eaſily perſuaded to invade the kingdom of Naples. He accordingly fitted out a formidable fleet at Valona, anciently called Apollonia, on the coaſt of Epire, where the paſſage to Italy is only about 50 miles, and, embarking with a formidable army, gave the chief command to baſha Achmet, who landed in Calabria about the end of July, and immediately beſieged Otranto. The city had but a ſmall garriſon, and was unprepared for a ſiege. The citizens and ſoldiers nevertheleſs defended themſelves for near three weeks with great bravery, in hopes of being relieved by the king; but no ſuccours arriving, the Turks at length took the place by aſſault, when they maſſacred all the aged of both ſexes, and all the clergy, raviſhed the matrons and nuns upon the altars, ripped up the women with child, and made captives of all the youth [o].

Baſha Achmet takes Otranto. A. D. 1480.

THE news of this invaſion aſtoniſhed and alarmed all Italy. The king declaring to the pope, that, if he would not aſſiſt him, he would conclude a peace with the Turks, Sixtus immediately ordered 24 gallies, which he had deſtined for the relief of Rhodes, to ſail to Naples. He likewiſe agreed to an accommodation with the Florentines; and on the 16th of September concluded an alliance againſt the Turks with Ferdinand, the king of Hungary, the dukes of Milan and Ferrara, and the republics of Genoa and Florence. The Venetians excuſed themſelves from being concerned in the alliance, alleging, that they had carried on a war againſt the infidels for 15 years, without the aſſiſtance of the other Chriſtian powers; and having lately concluded a peace with them, they had yet no reaſon to renew their hoſtilities [p]. The Turks in the mean time took ſome other places in the neighbourhood of Otranto, and made incurſions along the northern coaſt of Italy, as far as Loretto [q].

FERDINAND, having recalled his troops from Tuſcany, ſent the duke of Alphonſus into Calabria to oppoſe the infidels, and wrote to almoſt all the princes of Europe for aſſiſtance. The Neapolitan fleet, the following year, being joined by 22 gallies of the pope, and ſome veſſels from the kings of Portugal, ſailed round to Otranto, and blocked up the harbour, while Alphonſus inveſted the city by land with a powerful army, being joined by 900 men from Florence [r], 3000 Caſtilians [s], and, according to Bonfinius, with 2000 Hungarian horſe, who wanted to attack the enemy the ſame hour that they arrived at the camp. The Turks made a vigorous defence; but in the beginning of June, being informed by Alphonſus of the death of the emperor Mahomet, they conſented to evacuate the place, after they had received a confirmation of the news from Valona. The city accordingly, on the 10th of Auguſt, ſurrendered to Alphonſus, who is accuſed by a certain author of having plundered the garriſon, and taken many of the Turks priſoners, contrary to the capitulation [t]. As he did not ſhare this booty with the pope's legate, he withdrew his gallies from the reſt of the fleet, which prevented him from attacking Valona as he intended [u]. Ferdinand was very deſirous of proſecuting the war, and of invading Greece during the diſſenſions betwixt the ſons of Mahomet, and, by his ambaſſadors at Rome, complained againſt the proceedings of the legate. The cardinal excuſed himſelf, alleging his fleet was very ſickly, and it would require 40,000 crowns to repair the gallies; but one of the Genoeſe captains, in a long diſcourſe recorded by Volaterranus, publicly accuſed Alphonſus of having diſobliged all the ſailors by his deſpotiſm and avarice. The Neapolitan ambaſſador, nevertheleſs, ſtill urging the great advantage to the general cauſe, to prevent the united fleet, conſiſting of upwards of 130 ſail, from being ſeparated, and to attack the infidels during their civil diſſenſions, the pope adviſed the legate and the Genoeſe to return to Naples; but at the ſame time declaring, that he had fulfilled his engagements with the king, and accuſing the king of not having done the ſame towards him in the Florentine war, the Genoeſe captain and the cardinal abſolutely refuſed to rejoin the fleet.

FERDINAND, being thus prevented from carrying his arms into Greece, a few months after was obliged to employ them againſt the pope and the Venetians, in defence of his ſon-in-law the duke of Ferrara. The power of the Venetians was at this time looked upon with jealouſy by all the Italian ſtates, who obſerved that they took every opportunity to extend their dominion on the continent. The republic having entered into a private treaty with Sixtus, by which it was agreed to make a partition of the duchy of Ferrara betwixt them and the pope's nephew Jeronimo, they took an occaſion to quarrel with the duke, and on the 2d of May declared war againſt him, and immediately ſeized the greateſt part of his duchy. The pope at the ſame time made great warlike preparations at Rome to act in concert with them, and aſſembled an army under the command of his nephew, to prevent the Neapolitans from marching to Ferrara. The Colonni and Savelli, however, joining the duke of Calabria, and admitting his troops into their towns, the duke quickly advanced with his army, in which were about 2000 janiſaries, and on the 5th of June encamped within view of the city. The pope and the Romans were in the utmoſt conſternation, eſpecially as it was reported that the emperor was aſſembling a general council at Baſil, and that Ferdinand had made himſelf maſter of Benevento and Terracina. a Rome were ravaged by both parties for ſeveral weeks, the Romans openly murmured againſt the pope; but a conſiderable reinforcement of Venetian troops joining the papal army, Alphonſus on the 21ſt of Auguſt was attacked, and intirely defeated.

NOTWITHSTANDING this loſs, Ferdinand found means of detaching the pope from the Venetians, by promiſing his nephew Jeronimo 40,000 crowns for three years. Sixtus likewiſe joining in the general alliance, Alphonſus entered Rome, and, after ſome conferences with his holineſs, on the laſt of December proceeded to Ferrara. He employed the whole following campaign in raiſing contributions in the Venetian territories on the continent, while his brother Frederic ſailed into the gulph, and ſeized a great many ſhips belonging to the republic. The Venetians, in reſentment, threatened to introduce the Turks into Puglia, b and ſent for Renatus, duke of Lorrain, promiſing to ſupport him in his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples. The duke continued but a ſhort time at Venice, and returned to France. The republic, being diſappointed in their aſſiſtance from him, reſolved to remove the war, if poſſible, from their own territories, and the following year ordered their admiral to invade Puglia. The Venetian fleet accordingly arriving on the coaſt, landed their troops, took Gallipoli by ſtorm, and afterwards reduced ſeveral caſtles in that neighbourhood. Policaſtro and Cero, upon the ſame coaſt, being likewiſe ſurpriſed and plundered by the enemy, Ferdinand immediately fitted out 38 gallies, and ſent them round to the gulph, under the command of his ſon Frederic and Bernard Villamarino. But as all parties began now to be tired of the war, a general congreſs was agreed to at a village in the neighbourhood of Breſ-
c cia, when the governor of the duke of Milan concluding a ſeparate peace with the Venetians: the allies were obliged to accede to the treaty, though the terms were not ſo favourable to them as they might have expected. By the treaty, which was concluded on the 7th of Auguſt, all conqueſts were to be reciprocally reſtored, excepting ſome places, that the Venetians and Lewis Sforza were allowed to retain, and Ferdinand promiſed to grant the Venetian merchants in his dominions the ſame privileges as they had always enjoyed [w].

A FEW days after the concluſion of this treaty, Sixtus IV. died at Rome, and on the 27th of the ſame month was ſucceeded by Innocent VIII. a Genoeſe. Though this pope had been long in the ſervice of Ferdinand and of his father Alphonſus, yet ſoon after his promotion to the pontificate he became the king's bitter enemy, and encouraged another formidable d rebellion in the kingdom. A few weeks after the general peace, the Florentines having declared war againſt the Genoeſe, Ferdinand granted them ſome aſſiſtance, and ſent a conſiderable fleet againſt Genoa. The pope interceded for his native country, and prevailed with the king to promiſe to embrace a neutrality; notwithſtanding which promiſe, Ferdinand ſtill continuing to ſend ſuccours to the Florentines, Innocent reſolved to ſeize the firſt opportunity of ſhewing his reſentment, and the following year openly eſpouſed the cauſe of ſome diſcontented barons [x]. Ferdinand for ſeveral years had reſigned almoſt the whole adminiſtration of the government to Alphonſus, who, being of an arbitrary and cruel diſpoſition, was diſ-
e ſatisfied with the independence which the barons enjoyed, and had formed a deſign of ſtripping them of their privileges; which purpoſe he was imprudent enough to diſcloſe to his confidents and favourites, and in a manner publiſhed to the whole kingdom, by wearing, as a device, a beſom upon his helmet [y]. The barons, by the alteration of his behaviour ſince the recovery of Otranto, and his retaining a body of Turks in his pay, had for ſome time been ſuſpicious of his deſigns, and perceiving the bad correſpondence betwixt the king and the pope, they judged the opportunity favourable for a revolt, as they would be ſure of the protection of his holineſs. Mean while Innocent was engaged in diſputes with Ferdinand about the uſual tribute for the kingdom, and at the ſame time held a ſecret correſpondence with the malcontents.

The pope immediately declared himſelf arbitrator, and cited the king to appear at Rome, while the other conſpirators appeared in arms in different parts of the kingdom, and the city of Aquila raiſed the ſtandard of the church. Ferdinand endeavoured at firſt to quiet the commotions by a treaty, and ſent his ſon Frederic to Salerno to conclude a peace, which for a few weeks had been negotiated with the rebels. The prince of Salerno, however, and the other malcontents, inſtead of ſubmitting, offered the crown to Frederic, and, upon his refuſing to accept of it, made him a priſoner. All hopes of an accommodation vaniſhing, hoſtilities were again renewed. The pope eſpouſed the cauſe of the barons with great zeal; and reſolving, if poſſible, to dethrone the king, made late John of Anjou, kept up a claim to the kingdom. Renatus neglecting the preſent offer, a Innocent earneſtly ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, who, though they were promiſed a large ſhare of the kingdom, refuſed to declare openly againſt Ferdinand.

THE king in the mean time concluded a treaty with the Urſini family, who had then revolted from the pope, and conferred upon them the counties of Nola, Tripalda, and Valentino, and the city of Aſcoli. He likewiſe aſſembled three armies, one of which, under the command of the duke of Calabria, invaded the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and made incurſions as far as Rome, whilſt the other two armies attacked thoſe of the barons, and gained ſeveral advantages over them. The pope, finding the efforts of the malcontents not ſo conſiderable as he expected, ſoon began to think of peace, and propoſed to the barons to come to an agreement with the king, promiſing to obtain good conditions for them. As they diſ- b

It was likewiſe ſtipulated, that the city of Aquila ſhould be at liberty either to ſubmit to the pope or the king; that the pope ſhould have the power of conferring all the benefices in the kingdom; and, what is ſomewhat remarkable, ſhould be at liberty to furniſh proviſions and a free paſſage to the French, if they ſhould attempt to invade Naples [z]. Some of the barons, particularly the prince of Salerno, refuſed to truſt to the king's pardon, and went to France and Rome. Thoſe who remained were c

FERDINAND, on account of this and many other acts of tyranny, began now to be regarded not as a lawful prince, but as a deſpotic tyrant, hated and deteſted by all his ſubjects. Though by the many forfeitures of the late rebellious barons he had amaſſed a great treaſure, and increaſed the number of fortified places in the kingdom, yet he was diſtruſtful of his own ſafety, as he was informed that both Ferdinand, now king of Spain, and d
Charles VIII. of France, formed pretenſions to his dominions. Charles VIII. alleged, that he was heir to the late John of Anjou; and the king of Spain, as guarantee of the late treaty
r which had been ſo baſely violated, threatened to declare war againſt Ferdinand, but was prevented by a rebellion in Sardinia, and an irruption of the Moors of Granada.

A new rupture betwixt the king and the pope. A. D. 1489. ABOUT two years after, the pope, not being able to obtain from him either the arrears of tribute, or ſatisfaction for the violation of the treaty concluded with the barons, denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt him, if he did not repent in two months. This fulmination not producing the deſired effect, on the 11th of September he ſolemnly excommunicated him, and depoſed him from the kingdom of Naples, at the ſame time publiſhing a cruſade againſt him, and appointing the king of France general of the cruſards. Ferdi- e nand, being ſenſible that the pope and the French king were not then able to offend him with temporal arms, paid no regard to the ſpiritual; but a few months after, being informed that Charles VIII. was making great preparations for an expedition to Italy, he began to think ſeriouſly of a reconciliation with the pope. For that purpoſe, he began a

Towards the end of May, the king ſent his grandſon the prince of Capua to Rome, who aſked pardon of Innocent, and promiſed, in the name of his grandfather and father, to pay the uſual tribute to the holy ſee, not to uſurp the collation of benefices, and to make ample ſatisfaction to the ſons or heirs of the barons who had been put to death in violation of the general pardon. Innocent received the young Ferdinand f with great honour, and on the 4th of June granted a bull, ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the kingdom to Alphonſus, or to the prince of Capua, in caſe Alphonſus ſhould die before his father [b]. For a further ſecurity of the pope's favour, a marriage was contracted betwixt one of the king's relations, and Baptiſtina, the pope's niece [c].

Alexander VI. ſucceeds to the pontificate. A. D. 1492. THESE precautions, however, were of very little conſequence; for the following year Innocent died, and on the 10th of Auguſt was ſucceeded by Alexander VI. who, by his wicked ambition, and deſire of aggrandizing his baſtard ſon Cæſar Borgia, not only diſturbed the tranquility of Naples, but of all Italy. Ferdinand is ſaid by Guicciardini to have lamented the promotion of Alexander with tears, as he was informed that Charles VIII. was ſtill intent upon invading Naples, and was apprehenſive that the new pope would eſpouſe the cauſe of g a the French. Soon after his elevation to the pontificate, he ſent an ambaſſador to congratulate him at Rome, and a good correſpondence ſeemed eſtabliſhed betwixt them; but in the beginning of the following year, Alphonſus rejecting the offer of an alliance betwixt one of his ſons and the pope's baſtard daughter, Alexander immediately entered into a treaty with the Venetians, and with Lewis Sforza, uncle of the duke of Milan, who had uſurped his nephew's dominions, and preſſed the king of France to invade Naples, as Alphonſus had threatened to aſſiſt the young duke, who was his ſon-in-law, to obtain poſſeſſion of his duchy. Ferdinand, alarmed with the deſigns of the pope and Sforza, immediately endeavoured to be reconciled to them: he offered to confirm the government of Milan to Lewis Sforza, and was ſo fortunate as to recover Alexander's favour by creating his youngeſt ſon b Geoffry count of Squillace, with a yearly revenue of 10,000 ducats, and giving him in marriage a baſtard daughter of Alphonſus [d]. The king of France, however, at the inſtigation of the prince of Salerno and other exiles, ſtill continuing his preparations, and ordering the Neapolitan ambaſſador to leave his court, Ferdinand exerted himſelf to put his kingdom in a poſture of defence; but by his extraordinary fatigues he contracted an illneſs, of which he died on the 25th of January, more oppreſſed with cares than age, though he was then in his 71ſt year. According to Guicciardini, Ferdinand would have been accounted a good prince, if he had continued to govern by the ſame maxims which he uſed in the beginning of his reign. Although by his arrogance, oppreſſion, and breach of faith, he had acquired the hatred of his ſubjects, yet by his prudence and abilities he raiſed the kingdom to a greater

c pitch of grandeur than any of his predeceſſors. He was a great patron of learning, which, by the loſs of Conſtantinople, began to revive and flouriſh during his reign in Italy. He reſtored the univerſity of Naples, and publiſhed many wiſe laws, which are in force to this day, and greatly eſteemed [e].

Ferdinand dies at Naples. A. D. 1494.

Some time before the death of Ferdinand, Alexander threatened again to join the king of France; but Alphonſus, immediately after his ſucceſſion, ſending ambaſſadors to Rome, by large conditions ſtill retained him in his intereſt. He granted him the inveſtiture, with a diminution of the yearly tribute during his life, and ſent his nephew John Borgia to Naples, to perform the ceremony of his coronation. Alphonſus likewiſe concluded a defenſive alliance with the pope, who refuſed the inveſtiture to the French ambaſſadors, and deſired
d the French king to lay aſide all warlike preparations, and refer his claim to the deciſion of the holy ſee. Ferdinand of Spain, the Venetians, and Bajazet, emperor of the Turks, were alſo ſolicited to join in the alliance, but only Ferdinand promiſed to ſend a fleet to the aſſiſtance of the pope [f]. Charles VIII. in the mean time being continually ſolicited by his favourites, the Neapolitan exiles and Lewis Sforza, reſolved to proceed in the expedition, contrary to the advice of his wiſeſt counſellors, and ſent the duke of Orleans with a conſiderable body of men to Genoa (X). He himſelf, leaving Vienne on the 23d of Auguſt, paſſed the Alps with his army, and on the 9th of September arrived at Aſti. This invaſion, according to Guicciardini, was the ſource of innumerable calamities to Italy, occaſioning the revolutions of ſtates, the ravaging of provinces, the deſtruction of cities, cruel ſlaughters, e new manners and factions, bloody methods of carrying on war, and unheard-of diſtempers [g].

ALPHONSUS endeavoured, if poſſible, to prevent the enemy from entering the kingdom, and for that purpoſe ſent his ſon Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, with an army to Romagna, and gave the command of a powerful fleet to his brother Don Frederic, to protect the coaſt, and prevent the enemy from receiving any ſuccours by ſea. Notwithſtanding the endeavours of Ferdinand, the French army, on the laſt of December, entered Rome, which the pope immediately quitted, flying for ſecurity to the caſtle of St. Angelo. Eighteen of the cardinals declared for Charles, and preſſed him in the moſt earneſt manner to reform the church, and depoſe the pope. The king, however, perſuaded by his favourites, who were bribed by Alexander, entered into a treaty with his holineſs, who, among other mat-

This nephew was left heir by the laſt will of Renatus, and, having no iſſue, transferred his rights to Lewis, who was likewiſe the nephew of Renatus by a ſiſter. The duke of Lorrain, who was grandſon to Renatus by a daughter, alleged, that he had the moſt juſt claim to ſucceed his grandfather in all his poſſeſſions. He, however, received only the duchy of Bar, and it was decided that women could not ſucceed to Provence and Sitily while there were males of the deſcent (1).

Mean while Alphonſus, hearing that his ſon Ferdinand had abandoned Rome, and retired before the French, that Aquila and almoſt all Abruzzo had ſet up the ſtandard of king Charles, and that in many other parts of the kingdom the people openly eſpouſed the French intereſt, he was ſtruck with ſuch a panic, that on the 22d of January he made a ſolemn renunciation of his crown in favour of his ſon Ferdinand, who was generally eſteemed, and, almoſt diſtracted with apprehenſions, fled with the queen dowager, his mother-in law, to Mazara, a town in Sicily, formerly given to the queen by her brother the king of Spain (Y). King Charles a few days after left Rome, and entered the kingdom. Ferdinand, upon the news of his approach, abandoned San Germano with his army, and flying to Naples, where perceiving the univerſal defection of the people, he embarked with a few followers on board ſome gallies, and ſailed over to the iſland of Iſchia. The French king, meeting with no oppoſition, advanced with his army, and on Sunday the 22d of February entered Naples in a triumphant manner, and ſoon after received the ſubmiſſion of the whole kingdom, except a few places in Calabria.

THIS unexpected revolution not only alarmed all the ſtates of Italy, but alſo the emperor Maximilian and the king of Spain, who were jealous of ſuch an acquiſition to the French power. Accordingly, before Charles had been ſix weeks in Naples, theſe two princes, with the pope, the Venetians, and Lewis Sforza, who had now uſurped the title of duke of Milan, entered into an alliance againſt him, the emperor and the king of Spain promoſing to invade France, and Sforza engaging to prevent any French reinforcements from entering Italy. Charles in the mean time minded nothing but his pleaſures in Naples, while his officers and ſoldiers inſulted and plundered the Neapolitans. He treated the nobility of the kingdom with diſdain and contempt, and conferred all offices and dignities on a few Frenchmen. Having, according to Spondanus, been declared emperor of Conſtantinople by the pope, in conſequence of a ceſſion made to him by the deſpote Palæologus, Charles vainly meditated the conqueſt of the Greek empire from the Turks, and ſent over the archbiſhop of Durazzo to tempt the Greeks to revolt; but, hearing of the formidable league concluded againſt him, he reſolved with the utmoſt diſpatch to return to France[h]. Having cauſed himſelf, on the 12th of May, to be ſolemnly crowned, and appointed Gilbert Montpenſier viceroy, eight days after he left Naples, and marched in great haſte to Lombardy, where his camp was attacked by the Venetians; but, having cut his way through the enemy, he ſoon after arrived at Grenoble.

He returns with precipitation to France.

BEFORE he left Naples, Gonſalvo Hernandes, known by the name of the Great Captain, had landed with ſome Spaniſh troops in Calabria, where he obtained ſome ſignal advantages over the French, and ſoon after his departure the Neapolitans received Ferdinand into their city with univerſal acclamations. At the ſame time a Venetian fleet arriving on the coaſt of Puglia, great part of the kingdom immediately revolted from the French, whoſe numbers were very inconſiderable, being, according to Commines, only 500 cuiraſſiers, 2500 Swiſs, with a ſmall body of infantry. Ferdinand, being aſſiſted by the Great Captain, the following ſummer recovered the whole kingdom, except Tarento and Gaeta; and, in order to enter into a ſtricter friendſhip with the king of Spain, he married his niece, who was at the ſame time his own aunt, being the daughter of his grandfather by his ſecond marriage. He now promiſed himſelf a return of his former proſperity; but while he was diverting himſelf with his new ſpouſe at Somma, near the foot of mount Veſuvius, he fell dangerouſly ill, and, his life being deſpaired of, he was carried to Naples, where he died on the 7th of October, in the 28th year of his age, and the 2d year of his reign, being greatly regretted not only by the Neapolitans, but by all Italy[i].

FERDINAND, leaving no iſſue, was ſucceeded by his uncle Frederic, a moſt prudent prince, of a mild diſpoſition, and a great encourager of learning, who, being aſſiſted by Gonſalvo, quickly made himſelf maſter of Tarento and Gaeta, and obliged the French wholly to evacuate the kingdom. A few months after his acceſſion, he received an affectionate letter from the pope, with the bull of inveſtiture, and on the 10th of Auguſt he was ſolemnly crowned by cardinal Borgia, in the cathedral church of Capua. As the king of France had for ſome time threatened a ſecond and more powerful invaſion, Frederic was very aſſiduous

a in putting the kingdom in a ſtate of defence; beginning likewiſe to ſuſpect the deſigns of his two allies the Venetians and Spaniards, who, under different pretences, kept poſſeſſion of the places that they had recovered from the French. Ferdinand of Spain, inſtead of proſecuting the war againſt king Charles in France, agreed to a truce with him, and even entered into a negotiation for making a partition of the kingdom of Naples. This negotiation, however, was prevented from being concluded by the death of Charles, who died of an apoplexy in the month of April. He was ſucceeded by his couſin Lewis, duke of Orleans, then in the 37th year of his age, who immediately aſſumed the title of king of France, Jeruſalem, and the Two Sicilies, and duke of Milan, which duchy he claimed in right of his grandmother.

b ALEXANDER VI. who knew that his ambition and covetouſneſs could not be ſatiated while Italy was in peace, had entered into a private negotiation with the late king Charles, inviting him again to croſs the Alps; but hearing of his ſudden death, he made an offer of his friendſhip to Frederic, on condition that he would give his daughter Charlotte, then in France, in marriage to Cæſar Borgia, who intended to renounce the eccleſiaſtic life, and grant him the inveſtiture of the principality of Tarento as her portion. Frederic, perſuaded that the next ſtep the pope would take would be to deprive him of the kingdom, and to give the inveſtiture of it to his ſon, abſolutely refuſed to hearken to his propoſal, though he was earneſtly preſſed by the duke of Milan, who was greatly afraid of the king of France. The pope, highly provoked with this repulſe, immediately had recourſe to Lewis, who,
c being wholly intent upon an expedition to Italy, and deſiring a divorce from his wife, readily concluded the alliance, and granted large conditions to Alexander, creating his ſon Borgia, upon his arrival in France, duke of Valentinois, with a revenue of 20,000 franks, beſides other 20,000 as captain of 100 ſpearmen [k].

Enters into an alliance with the pope, and conquers Milan. A. D. 1499.

LEWIS, the following year, in the month of Auguſt, ſent a powerful army into Italy, under the command of the duke of Luxemburg, Edward Stewart, duke of Aubigny, and one Triulzi, an Italian, who in leſs than three weeks made themſelves maſters of the whole Milaneſe. He himſelf arrived at Milan on the 6th of October, and, after giving a body of troops to Borgia to conquer Romagna, and receiving embaſſies of congratulation from the Italian ſtates, he returned in the month of December to France. By this imprudent conduct, Lewis
d Sforza was encouraged a few weeks after to return from Germany, whither he had fled, with a conſiderable body of Germans and Burgundians. Upon his arrival, the whole duchy revolted from king Lewis, and he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy into Milan. But ſoon after he was betrayed by the Swiſs in his own pay, and delivered to the French, who by that means again became maſters of the whole duchy. Notwithſtanding this conſiderable acquiſition, Lewis delayed invading the kingdom of Naples, till he had concluded a treaty of partition with Ferdinand of Spain. The Spaniſh monarch had long formed a claim to Naples, in conſequence of the conqueſt of his uncle Alphonſus I. whoſe right he alleged he was heir to; but obſerving the kingdom in the poſſeſſion of the baſtard Ferdinand and his ſons, he had hitherto craftily concealed his pretenſions: he even, at the e deſire of Frederic, ſent freſh ſuccours to Naples, under the command of the Great Captain. Frederic, however, was very ſuſpicious of his deſigns, and, rather than rely intirely upon his aſſiſtance, earneſtly ſolicited ſuccours from Bajazet; but being diſappointed at Conſtantinople, he made an offer to the king of France of becoming his tributary, and of paying him annually a large ſum of money; which was rejected by Lewis, who, rather than be the ſupreme power in Italy, and have a king tributary to him, imprudently, as Guicciardini obſerves, introduced his cunning, ambitious, and powerful rival.

THE two kings, being both covetous of the poſſeſſion of Naples, and mutually awed by each other's power, agreed to divide the kingdom in the following manner: That the king
f of Spain ſhould have the poſſeſſion of Apulia and Calabria, and that all the reſt of the kingdom, with the title of king of Naples and Jeruſalem, ſhould belong to the king of France. Alexander VI. in hopes of obtaining a part of the prey, to the aſtoniſhment of all Italy, confirmed the treaty, and on the 25th of June gave each of the princes the inveſtiture of their ſhare, all the three potentates cloaking their ambition with the pretence of religion, profeſſing that they intended the conqueſt of Naples only with the view of being the more able by that means of diſtreſſing the Turks. Frederic had already put Gonſalvo in poſſeſſion of ſeveral places in Calabria, and had prepared an army to oppoſe the invaſion of the French; but hearing of the league betwixt Ferdinand and Lewis, he did not think proper to wait the arrival of the French army, but put a ſtrong garriſon into Capua, and retired with the reſt of his army towards Naples. The French advanced without any oppſition, and on the 25th of g July took Capua by ſtorm, which they plundered with the greateſt barbarity. About a fortnight after they took poſſeſſion of Naples, when Frederic retired to Caſtel Nuovo, but, de-

Frederic retires to France, and reſigns the kingdom to Lewis.

Soon after, reflecting on the perfidy of the Spaniards, he reſolved to reſign his whole kingdom to Lewis; and, having obtained a ſafe-conduct from him, he went to France, where he was created duke of Anjou, with a yearly penſion of 30,000 ducats. His eldeſt ſon was then beſieged by the Spaniards in Tarento, and ſoon after being obliged to ſurrender, was detained priſoner, contrary to the articles of capitulation, and ſent by Gonſalvo to Spain, where he was treated at firſt with royal honours[l]. Thus the Neapolitans, by their internal factions, became a prey to foreign invaders, having tamely ſubmitted to allow their kingdom, formerly one of the moſt powerful in Europe, to be ſplit into two inconſiderable provinces, which diſgrace they might eaſily have prevented, if they had adhered with fidelity to their prince. From this period their national dignity and reputation daily declined, and the kingdom ſoon began to be conſidered only as a branch of the monarchy of Spain, to which it continued ſubject during the two following centuries. b

The French and Spaniards having without any difficulty each conquered their own ſhare of the kingdom, Gonſalvo was appointed governor and commander in Puglia and Calabria, and Lewis d'Arminac, duke of Nemours, as viceroy, took up his reſidence in Naples. As the terms of the partition-treaty, ſpecifying the limits of the two diviſions, were not explicit, diſputes immediately aroſe betwixt the two governors about the extent of their reſpective territories. Though Puglia had always been divided into three parts, namely, Terra d'Otranto, Terra di Bari, and Capitanata, yet the French inſiſted that Capitanata belonged to Abruzzo, groundleſly alleging, according to Guicciardini, that they were not obliged to ſtand to the modern diviſion made by Alphonſus of Arragon, eſpecially as Capitanata was disjoined from the reſt of Puglia by the river Ophanto[m]. Theſe diſputes ſoon branching out into others, the viceroy went to Melphis, and the governor to Attela, and entered into a negociation for terminating all differences; but not being able to come to any agreement, it was reſolved to wait the deciſion of Lewis and Ferdinand, and in the mean time to make no innovation. The viceroy, however, conſcious of his own ſuperiority of force, a few days after publiſhed an imperious declaration, threatening Gonſalvo with hoſtilities if he did not quickly renounce all pretenſions to Capitanata. c d

Immediately after the publication of this declaration, on the 9th of June the French troops began to ſeize the towns belonging to the Spaniards. Lewis, inſtead of reproving the viceroy, took the princes of Salerno and Biſignano, and ſome other of the chief barons, into his pay, and ſent a reinforcement of 2000 Switzers to Naples, ſo that in a ſhort time the French reduced almoſt the whole kingdom, Gonſalvo retiring with his army into Barletta, without money, and with little proviſions. The French, being elated with their ſucceſſes, towards the end of the year began to be leſs attentive to the war; and Gonſalvo receiving freſh ſuccours from Sicily and Spain, the following ſpring he was again able to appear in the field, and gained ſeveral conſiderable advantages over the French[n]. Mean while Philip, archduke of Auſtria, and ſon-in-law of Ferdinand, paſſing through France in his return from Spain to Germany, had an interview with Lewis at Lyons, and, contrary to the inclination of his father-in-law, negociated a peace with regard to Naples, by which treaty it was ſtipulated, that the former diviſion of the kingdom ſhould again take place, but the provinces in diſpute ſhould be conſigned in truſt to Philip; that Philip's ſon Charles ſhould marry Claudia, the daughter of Lewis; that for the future Naples ſhould be governed in the name of the two children, who ſhould aſſume the titles of king and queen of Naples, and duke and ducheſs of Apulia and Calabria.

After this victory, all the cities of the kingdom ſurrendered to the Spaniards, and on the 14th of May Gonſalvo entered Naples in triumph. Ferdinand, upon hearing of the ſucceſs of his arms in Naples, abſolutely refuſed to ratify the treaty concluded by his ſon-in-law, and accuſed him of having exceeded his commiſſion and inſtructions. A. D. 1504. They quit the kingdom of Naples.

LEWIS XII. having loſt his friend Alexander, thought proper to agree to a truce, when it was concluded that each party ſhould keep what they poſſeſſed, without however having any mutual intercourſe or commerce in Naples. Gonſalvo, under pretence of this article, blocked up the towns belonging to the French, who, for want of proviſions, were obliged intirely to quit the kingdom (Z). The following year, Ferdinand, who had been a widower for ſome months, renewed his negociations with Lewis, and contracted an alliance b with his niece Germana, when it was ſtipulated, that the kingom of Naples ſhould be accounted her dowry; but if ſhe had no iſſue it ſhould return to Ferdinand, and his heirs, and that Ferdinand in ten years ſhould pay to Lewis 70,000, or, according to Mariana, 50,000 crowns for the expences of the war °. The barons likewiſe, who had eſpouſed the French party, being reſtored by this treaty to their liberty, their native country, eſtates, dignities, and goods, and all confiſcations made by the king of Spain or Frederic were annulled. Lewis renounces his claim to Naples. A. D. 1505.

THOUGH Ferdinand claimed the kingdom as heir to Alphonſus I. who was his father's brother, yet reckoning the four preceding princes lawful kings, on account of the pope's inveſtiture, he aſſumed the name of Ferdinand III. and after Lewis had renounced his pretenſions, he publiſhed an edict, wherein, reputing them lawful kings, and his predeceſſors, he c confirmed all their deeds, conceſſions, and privileges. A few months before he thus acquired the kingdom of Naples, Ferdinand loſt the kingdom of Caſtile by the death of his queen Iſabella, the heireſs of that kingdom. She indeed, by her laſt will, left her huſband regent of the kingdom during his life; but the archduke Philip, who had married their daughter Jean, arriving in Spain the following year, and inſiſting upon the adminiſtration, Ferdinand was obliged to quit Caſtile, and retire to Arragon. Acknowleges Ferdinand as king. A. D. 1506.

AFTER his return to Arragon, being jealous of the authority and influence of Gonſalvo, who, though ſeveral times recalled to Spain, had ſtill formed excuſes for continuing in Naples, he reſolved to proceed thither, under pretence of ſeeing the kingdom, and ſettling the form of government, but in reality with a deſign of ſeizing Gonſalvo, who he ſuſpected had d a deſign either of uſurping the kingdom to himſelf, or delivering it to Philip, who alleged that it ought to be annexed to Caſtile, by the forces of which it had lately been conquered. On the 4th of September, Ferdinand, with his queen Germana, accordingly ſailed from Barcelona with 50 ſhips, and, coaſting along Provence, upon their arrival at Genoa they were met by Gonſalvo, whom the king treated with great diſtinction. On the 1ſt of November he entered Naples, when he created Gonſalvo duke of Seſſa, having before confirmed to him the office of high conſtable, the duchy of S. Angelo, Terranova, and other eſtates, amounting to above 20,000 ducats of yearly revenue, and given him a promiſe under his hand of the maſterſhip of the order of St. James, upon his arrival in Spain. Ferdinand, being jealous of Gonſalvo, comes to Naples.

THE Neapolitans expected great things from the preſence of Ferdinand; but as he was e obliged, by his treaty with the king of France, to reſtore the Anjouvian barons to their eſtates, his royal revenues were exhauſted in procuring equivalents for thoſe of his own party; ſo that, contrary to the cuſtom of new kings, he was forced to deny granting favours and exemptions, and exacted new ſubſidies from the people, who had vainly expected to be eaſed, and to have all their grievances redreſſed. By this conduct he diſobliged both parties; and by refuſing to pay the annual tribute to the holy ſee, he alſo offended the pope, who denied to grant him the bull of inveſtiture. Philip, king of Caſtile, in the mean time dying at Burgos, Ferdinand reſolved as ſoon as poſſible to return to Spain, to reſume the government of that kingdom, to which he was invited by the grandees, and by his daughter Jean, who was ſo affected with grief for the loſs of her huſband, as to be incapable of f the adminiſtration. Having granted ſome new privileges to the city of Naples, and to the Seggio del Popolo, and appointed Don John of Arragon, count of Ribagorſa, viceroy of the kingdom, on the 4th of June he left Naples, taking along with him the Great Captain Gonſalvo, and about three weeks after landed at Savona, where he had ſeveral conferences for three days with the king of France, who, as a teſtimony of his reſpect for Gonſalvo, took g gold chain which he himſelf wore, and put it about his neck, and prevailed with Ferdi- A. nand to allow him to ſup at the ſame table with themſelves and the queen. This was the a laſt of the Great Captain's glorious days; for immediately upon his landing in Spain, Ferdinand ordered him to quit the court, to retire to his own eſtate, and not to depart from thence without leave [p].

THE kingdom of Naples, from its firſt eſtabliſhment under the Normans, and during the reign of the family of Anjou, had continued hitherto framed according to the model of the kingdom of France, from which it derived many maxims and cuſtoms; but from this period a new polity, and new magiſtrates and laws, agreeable to the Spaniſh cuſtoms and principles, were introduced. The new viceroy Ribagorſa, being aſſiſted by two eminent lawyers who were called collateral regents, governed the kingdom for two years and four months with great wiſdom and diſcretion. As Ferdinand, the year after his return to b Spain, in the month of December, entered into the general league of Cambray againſt the Venetians, who retained ſeveral towns in Naples, on the coaſt of the Adriatic, as pledges for the money which they had formerly ſpent in aſſiſting the Arragonian kings againſt the French, the viceroy the following ſpring ſent Fabrizio Colonna, duke of Tagliacozzo, to recover thoſe cities. Fabrizio marched with his army againſt Trani, which without making any oppoſition, immediately ſurrendered. With the ſame eaſe he made himſelf maſter of Monopoli, Mola, Polignano, Brindiſi, and Otranto, and reunited them to the crown of Naples, as the Venetians, who were at the ſame time attacked by the king of France, the pope, and the emperor, deſpairing of defending the cities they poſſeſſed on the continent, had given orders to the governors to withdraw the garriſons [q]. The count of Ribagorſa ſoon c after being recalled to court by the king, Don Ramonda de Cardona, on the 24th of October arrived at Naples as his ſucceſſor, and continued viceroy during the life of Ferdinand, who died on the 21ſt of January, about ſeven years after [r].

UPON the death of Ferdinand, Charles, archduke of Auſtria, then in the 16th year of his age, ſucceeded to the whole Spaniſh monarchy, taking the title of king without the conſent of the ſtates, his mother Jean being ſtill alive, and in vain preſſed by ſeveral of the grandees to aſſume the adminiſtration in her own right. Charles was then in Bruſſels; and, having written an affectionate letter to the Neapolitans, promiſing them his friendſhip, and enjoining them to obey Don Raimonda de Cardona, whom he confirmed viceroy, he ſet out for Spain, where he arrived about the end of the year following. Before he left Flanders, d he concluded an alliance with Francis I. who had lately ſucceeded to the crown of France, and for ſome years had ſeemed inclined to undertake an expedition againſt Naples. Charles, having ſome difficulty in the ſucceſſion to the kingdom of Arragon, as being the ſon of the female line, which, according to the ancient cuſtom of that nation, had no claim while any of the male branch exiſted, Francis expected that he would reſign the kingdom of Naples to him, to avoid a ſecond conteſted ſucceſſion. The ſucceſſion, however, to Arragon, was ſecured to Charles by a law made by Ferdinand and Iſabella, upon an ancient precedent; and Francis being alarmed with the report that the emperor intended to invade the duchy of Milan, he thought proper to propoſe a treaty with Charles, who, to avoid a war in the beginning of his reign, and prevent the Arragonian malecontents from making any oppoſition e in expectation of foreign aſſiſtance, readily agreed to the propoſal. The treaty was accordingly concluded on the 13th of Auguſt at Noyon, when, with regard to the kingdom of Naples, Francis agreed to give his daughter Louiſa, then only a year old, in marriage to Charles, giving for her dowry all that part of Naples which had been aſſigned to the late king of France by the partition betwixt him and Ferdinand. Charles promiſed to pay yearly 100,000 crowns to the king of France for the maintenance of his bride, till ſhe ſhould be fit for marriage. It was farther ſtipulated, that if the intended ſpouſe ſhould die before marriage, Charles ſhould marry any future daughter under the ſame conditions, and, in caſe of want of iſſue, the part of the kingdom of Naples, now in diſpute, ſhould return to France [s]. f

A. D. 1519. ABOUT fourteen months after Charles arrived in Spain, the German empire became vacant by the death of his grandfather Maximilian, who died on the 12th of January. Charles all the preceding year had endeavoured to prevail with the electors to chuſe him king of the Romans, and had ſent 200,000 ducats to Germany to purchaſe their votes, the king of France in the mean time uſing his utmoſt endeavours to prevent the imperial dignity from being united to the power of Spain. Upon the death of Maximilian, both Charles and Francis openly aſpired to the imperial dignity; but the intereſt of Charles prevailing, on the 28th of June he was elected emperor. His promotion was not very agreeable to Leo X. who, for the ſecurity of the apoſtolic ſee, wanted a prince of ſmall authority to be elected emperor; however, he diſſembled his diſſatisfaction, and even before the election granted him

a a bull, diſpenſing with the inveſtiture of Naples, and allowing him to accept of the imperial dignity. Charles the year following, in the month of October, was crowned at Aix la-Chapelle. The Spaniards, in the mean time, who was diſguſted with his promotion to the empire, and oppreſſed by the governors whom he had left in Spain, openly took arms againſt them, and formed the government upon a new model, which they adminiſtered under the name of the Holy Junto.

WHILE the Spaniſh governors were employed in quelling theſe revolters, Francis I. who was envious of the emperor's greatneſs, ſent a powerful army into Navarre, which, after conquering that kingdom, penetrated into Spain. The Spaniards did not concern themſelves with the invaſion of Navarre; but when the French entered Caſtile, both factions united,
b and intirely defeated the invaders. According to Guicciardini, the king of France undertook this expedition at the inſtigation of pope Leo, who was likewiſe jealous of the power of the emperor Charles, and entered into a private negotiation with Francis for driving the Spaniards out of Naples. They agreed to invade the kingdom with joint forces, on condition that Gaeta, and all the territory betwixt the Garigliano and the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, ſhould be given to the church, and the reſt of the kingdom to the king of France's ſecond ſon; and that both he and the kingdom ſhould be governed by the pope's legate reſiding in Naples, till he ſhould be of age. Francis, afterwards reflecting that the pope hitherto had ſhewed himſelf no friend to him, that he had oppoſed him in recovering Milan, and probably would not wiſh to ſee him in poſſeſſion of Naples, and that if he ſhould join the Spaniards after c his troops had entered Naples, he would not only loſe that kingdom, but would likewiſe be obliged to abandon Milan, put off ratifying the treaty for theſe reaſons, which inſtigated the pope to have recourſe to the emperor againſt him. As the emperor and Francis began now to be jealous of each other's power, Leo earneſtly deſired to occaſion a rupture betwixt them, and ſoon after entered into a defenſive alliance with Charles, who was greatly irritated againſt the French on account of the late invaſion of Navarre. In conſequence of this league, Charles invaded the duchy of Milan, which in a few months he made himſelf maſter of [t].

ABOUT three years after, Francis marched in perſon with a powerful army into Italy, d and, quickly recovering the greateſt part of the Milaneſe, ſent a conſiderable body of men to invade Naples, under the command of Stewart, duke of Aubigny. Don Carlos de Lanoja, a Fleming, who about two years before had ſucceeded Ribagorſa as viceroy, put the kingdom in a ſtate of defence; and, leaving a deputy in Naples, proceeded to Lombardy, where he took the command of the imperial army, and on the 24th of February intirely defeated the French in the neighbourhood of Pavia, and took the king of France priſoner, whom he afterwards conducted to Spain. Francis continued a priſoner more than 12 months, but at laſt recovered his liberty upon very hard conditions, by which, among other matters, he intirely renounced all pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, in favour of the emperor. Tho' he gave his two eldeſt ſons as hoſtages for the performance of the conditions, yet, upon e his return to France, he abſolutely refuſed to fulfil his engagements, and renewed his preparations for invading Italy. A few weeks after, on the 17th of May, he concluded an alliance againſt Charles with the pope, the Venetians, and Sforza, who claimed the duchy of Milan. By this treaty the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily were to be conſigned to pope Clement, who, with the Venetians, and ſeveral other princes of Europe, began to be alarmed at the proſperity of Charles [u].

The viceroy, upon his arrival, cauſed the fortifications of f many cities to be repaired, and particularly fortified the cities on the coaſt of the Adriatic, to prevent any invaſion from the Venetians. The Spaniards in the mean time, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Venetians and papal forces, made themſelves maſters of the caſtle of Milan; and the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Rome, Don Hugo Monçada, perſuaded the Colonni to ſurprize and ſeize the pope in the Venetian palace. Clement ſaved himſelf in the caſtle of St. Angelo; but the Colonni ſeizing and plundering the Vatican, he agreed to a truce with the emperor, promiſing to recal his troops from Milan, and to pardon the Colonni. During theſe tranſactions at Rome, continual reinforcements from France and Germany were pouring into Lombardy, in order to ſtrengthen the armies for the following campaign. THE viceroy Lanoja, being informed of the invitation given to Vaudemont, reſolved to begin hoſtilities againſt the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and in the end of December advanced with an army to Ceſano and Cepperano. The pope, to oblige him to withdraw his troops, in the beginning of the year, ſent Renza di Ceri into Abruzzo with 6000 foot, who took poſſeſſion of Aquila, and ſeveral other places in that neighbourhood. About the ſame time Vaudemont arriving with twenty-four gallies, and being joined by thoſe of the pope and the Venetians, began to infeſt the Neapolitan coaſts. He aſſumed the title of king of Naples, and was appointed the pope's lieutenant. In the beginning of March he pillaged Mola di Gaeta, and afterwards took Caſtello a Mare, Torre del Greco, Sorrento, and Salerno. The imperialiſts, b however, were ſuperior in Lombardy; and as the other army undertook no enterprize, but only followed their motions, the duke of Bourbon, the imperial general, began his march for Rome.

CLEMENT, confounded with this news, immediately ſent for Lanoja, with whom he agreed to a truce for eight months, promiſing to deliver up all the places his troops had conquered in Naples, and to give 60,000 ducats to the imperial army, on condition it would not enter into the territories of the church, or of Florence. In conſequence of this truce, he recalled his ſea and land forces from Naples, and diſbanded his troops. Lanoja accordingly proceeded to Bourbon, who abſolutely refuſed to agree to a truce; and, advancing with his army, on the 6th of May attacked the city. The Neapolitans oppreſſed by the prince of Orange.

THOUGH the kingdom was now delivered from a foreign enemy, yet tranquility was far from being reſtored; for the prince of Orange, prompted by his avarice, rigorouſly oppreſſed thoſe barons that had declared for the French. The late viceroy Monçada, upon finding himſelf unable to oppoſe Lautrech, had given permiſſion to many of the barons, in caſes of neceſſity, to ſet up the French ſtandard, and open their gates to the enemy, in conſideration of large ſums of money he received from them. The prince of Orange, however, alleging that Monçada had no authority to remit the allegiance due from ſubjects to b their ſovereign, would not admit the excuſe of the barons, and began to puniſh them as rebels, ſome with death, and others with forfeitures. The duke of Bojano and the count of Morone were executed, and the prince of Melphis, the duke of Somma, the marquis of Monteſarchio, and the counts of Nola, Caſtro, and Converſano, with many others, loſt their eſtates. The new viceroy alſo, with the connivance of the emperor, who was always wanting money for the wars he maintained, obliged very many, who were barely ſuſpected of favouring the French, to purchaſe their ſecurity by the payment of large ſums [b]. emperor, a few months after his treaty with the pope, having concluded a peace with the king of France at Cambray, Francis thereby engaged to evacuate Barletta, the only place he held in Naples, to renounce all claim to that kingdom, and to aſſiſt Charles in obliging the c Venetians to deliver up all the places they had ſeized in the kingdom. The prince of Orange, in the mean time, by the emperor's orders, had proceeded with the greateſt part of his army to Tuſcany, in order to oblige the Florentines to accept of Alexander Medici, grand-nephew of the pope, as their ſovereign [c]. While the prince was beſieging Florence, the emperor arrived at Genoa with a powerful fleet, on board of which were 1000 horſe and 9000 foot, and about the ſame time the duke of Wirtemberg entered Lombardy with 8000 German infantry. Charles, by theſe numerous forces, rendered himſelf very formidable to the Italian ſtates, ſo that the Venetians thought proper to agree to an accommodation with him, by which they engaged to reſtore to him all that they poſſeſſed in Naples, and to aſſiſt him with fifteen light gallies, in caſe any Chriſtian prince ſhould attack that kingdom. Cardinal Colonna ſucceeds the prince of Orange as viceroy.

THE kingdom of Naples in the mean time was oppreſſed by cardinal Pompeo Colonna, who, upon the departure of the prince of Orange, had been appointed viceroy. The cardinal had ſerved the emperor in his diſputes with the pope, who had been provoked to deprive him of his hat for the inſult he had lately received from his family in Rome. Colonna was afterwards reſtored to his dignity, but not to the pope's favour; and as it was common, ſince the times of Alexander VI. for cardinals to intermeddle in ſecular affairs, he neglected all care of religious matters, and gave himſelf intirely to arms and love intrigues. Upon e his arrival at Naples, he found the kingdom drained of money, and full of diſorders and irregularities, which at firſt he did not give himſelf any trouble to reſtrain, but was wholly occupied in raiſing taxes and donations to ſupply the emperor's neceſſities. The prince of Orange, by his own example, had introduced an intolerable licentiouſneſs and debauchery among the young nobility, who, in contempt of the law, openly reſcued malefactors from the hands of juſtice, defrauded tradeſmen, oppreſſed the common people, and gave protection to the moſt enormous villains in their palaces, where they kept bravoes to execute their wicked purpoſes.

THE cardinal, without regarding theſe enormities, employed himſelf in extorting a donative for Charles, on account of the birth of a young prince, and ſoon after ſent 300,000
f ducats to Bologna, to help to defray the charges of the emperor's coronation. As Solyman, emperor of the Turks, the following year, threatened to invade Auſtria, Charles ordered the cardinal to aſſemble a parliament, and to require a donative of 600,000 ducats. The repreſentatives at firſt remonſtrated againſt this demand, as the kingdom had lately been afflicted with war, famine, and peſtilence; but the viceroy being inflexible, it was at laſt reſolved to raiſe the 600,000 ducats by a tax on houſes, and to pay the ſum within four years. Upon the payment of the firſt quota, the prince of Salerno, who carried the money, obtained a confirmation of the old privileges, and likewiſe ſeveral new grants. The cardinal about this time, rouſed by the univerſal diſſoluteneſs that prevailed through the kingdom, began to act with vigour againſt criminals of all ranks, and, by ſeveral ſevere

By an edict, he prohibited every one, of what quality ſoever, from keeping any arms in the ſtreets, except ſwords, and ordered that none ſhould go abroad even with a ſword from b about two hours after ſun-ſet till next morning. Night robberies in the city he puniſhed with death, and ordered the bulk-heads and benches of artificers, and ſeveral dark porches, which ſerved as a receptacle for rogues, to be removed. He appointed new captains of the watch, deprived the nobility of the privilege of granting a ſanctuary in their palaces to malefactors, and publiſhed ſeveral edicts againſt duelling, and thoſe who ſhould be found at night uſing ladders of ropes, wood, or any other matter [d].

A. D. 1534. WHILE he was thus employed in reforming abuſes, the emperor had returned to Italy; and, after having a conference with the pope at Bologna, had proceeded to Spain. The coaſts of Naples likewiſe were infeſted by the pirate Barbaroſſa, who had entered into the ſervice of the emperor Solyman. In the ſecond year of Don Pedro's government, being or- c dered to reſtore Ariendino Baroſſo, by ſome called Molireſetto, who had been expelled from the kingdom of Tunis by his brother Muleaſſen, he paſſed the Pharo of Meſſina about the end of July with a fleet of eighty gallies. He made a deſcent in Calabria, burnt ſome ſhips,

He afterwards burnt Cetrano, together with ſix gallies then on the ſtocks, and, paſſing in the ſight of Naples, landed ſome of his troops on the iſland of Procida, which he pillaged. Fondi was alſo pillaged, and many of the inhabitants of Sperlonga were made captives. The Neapolitans, in order to protect their coaſts from the inſults of the Turks, met in parliament on the 20th of Auguſt, and gave the emperor a donative of 150,000 ducats [e].

CHARLES in the mean time formed a reſolution of reducing the naval power of the d infidels, as Barbaroſſa, who had uſurped the government of Algiers, and reſtored Muleaſſen to the kingdom of Tunis, continued to infeſt all the coaſts of Spain, Italy, and Sicily. He employed the whole winter in making preparations for an expedition to Africa; and, reſolving to go thither in perſon, his ardour was imitated by the grandees of Spain and the Neapolitan nobility, who intended to accompany him. The viceroy and the princes of Salerno and Biſignano, the dukes of Caſtrouillaro and Nocera, the marquiſes of Caſtelvetere and Della Valle, each built a galley at his own expence, and, when the fleet ſailed from Naples

UPON the emperor's arrival in Sicily, the marquis del Vaſto, the prince of Salerno, and many others of the nobility, earneſtly ſolicited him to remove Toledo from the government, alleging, that his adminiſtration was rigid and ſevere, and not agreeable to the genius and ſtate of the kingdom. In hopes of perſuading Charles to hearken to their ſoli- f citations, when the parliament aſſembled in the beginning of the following year at Naples, they imprudently offered a donative of a million and a half of ducats, without conſidering their ability, ſo that the emperor was obliged afterwards to remit one third of the ſum. They then propoſed to aſk the removal of the whole miniſtry; but the motion being

His prudent government. UPON the departure of the emperor, Toledo applied himſelf with great vigour to enlarge g and beautify the city of Naples, and to render it more opulent and healthy. He ordered a the ſtreets to be made plain and ſtrait, and to be new paved, and he ſurrounded the city with a new and ſtrong wall. He cauſed many new and magnificent churches and hoſpitals to be built, adorned the city with many fountains of marble, and enlarged the arſenal, making conveniencies in it for building ſixteen gallies at once. To prevent the air from being corrupted, he cauſed the ſtanding waters near Averſa, Acerra, and Eragola, to be drained off by a large and deep canal; and, that the city might be always well ſtored with grain, he prohibited the exportation of corn, and ordered that no magazines or granaries of wheat or barley ſhould be kept within thirty miles of Naples [f].

DON Pedro was likewiſe very careful to ſecure the coaſts againſt the deſcents of the Turks; and the following year, hearing of the deſigns of Solyman againſt the kingdom, he wrote to b the emperor for a reinforcement of Spaniſh infantry, armed the militia of Naples, and, aſſembling a parliament of the barons, laid before them the general danger. Being informed that about the middle of July Barbaroſſa had arrived at Valona with 200 ſail of ſhips, and that the ſoltan had marched thither with 20,000 men, he left Naples, and made a general review of the whole army at Melphis. The Turkiſh fleet having received ſome loſs in an encounter with that of the Genoeſe and the pope, and Solyman having intelligence that the viceroy was in the field with 30,000 men, he thought proper to withdraw his troops, after they had made a ſlight deſcent on the coaſt of Puglia, and another on the coaſt of Otranto. After the enemy had retired, the viceroy allowed all thoſe engaged in the expedition to return to their own homes; and to prevent any future inſult from the infidels, he reſolved c to fortify all the places upon the coaſt, which he viſited himſelf, attended with ſkilful architects and engineers. He fortified the cities of Cotrone and Veſti, and cauſed caſtles to be built at Reggio, Otranto, Lecce, Gallipoli, Trani, Barletta, Brindiſi, Monopoli, and Manfredonia. The kingdom being thus put in a ſtate of defence, continued for ſome time free from any alarms from the Turks. About ſeven years after Barbaroſſa arrived on the coaſt, ſacked the iſlands of Iſchia and Procida, and endeavoured to make a deſcent near Pozzuolo, which city he cannonaded from his ſhips; but the viceroy marching immediately thither from Naples with a large body of horſe, and a great multitude of people from the adjacent cities, forced the Turks to abandon their enterprize, and to retire towards the Levant with their fleet.

d TOLEDO, about the ſame time, publiſhed a proclamation, ordering all the Jews to leave the kingdom. They had been very numerous in different parts of the kingdom for near 300 centuries, and had particularly increaſed ſince their baniſhment from Spain, about fifty years before, by Ferdinand the Catholic. They had acquired great riches by lending money upon extravagant intereſt; but their uſury about this time increaſing, and the city being full of complaints againſt them, they were baniſhed by the emperor's deſire; and the viceroy, for the conveniency of raiſing money upon pledges, eſtabliſhed a bank, called Monte delle Pieta, which continues to the preſent time, and lends money upon pledges at moderate intereſt, and as far as ten crowns without any intereſt at all [g].

TOLEDO's government had hitherto given general ſatisfaction; but he having, about e this time, begun to act with rigour againſt ſome who were ſuſpected to lean to the doctrines of Luther, and ſoon after attempted, by ſecret means, to eſtabliſh the inquiſition, he raiſed ſuch a ſtorm as had near proved fatal to him. The inquiſition had been firſt eſtabliſhed about three centuries before, in conſequence of the proceedings of St. Dominic againſt the Albigenſes. The kings of the houſe of Anjou were the firſt who admitted inquiſitors from Rome into Naples, who went through the provinces by leave from thoſe kings, without keeping any fixed court. The kings of the houſe of Arragon rarely allowed them to enter the kingdom, oblige them to give an account of their whole proceedings, and would not ſuffer them to execute any ſentence without a ſpecial licence. The inquiſitors, in the beginning of the reign of Ferdinand, endeavoured to eſtabliſh their authority in a fuller f manner; but the Neapolitans, then alarmed with the ſhocking inhumanities and barbarities exerciſed a few years before againſt the Jews and Moors in Spain, obliged the Great Captain Gonſalvo to ſtipulate, that no inquiſitor ſhould be allowed to enter the kingdom. The inquiſitors, however, ſoon found means of inſinuating themſelves; and as at that time there was no ſuſpicion of any new doctrines, that they might not be idle, they began to take cognizance of crimes formerly tried by the ordinary tribunals. They made themſelves judges of blaſphemy, fortune-telling, conjuring, and many other fooliſh arts. Whoever curſed the bells for their noiſe, was ſure to incur their cenſure; nor did thoſe eſcape unpuniſhed who preſumed to diſclaim againſt the immoralities of prieſts and monks, or mocked or ridiculed them. The inquiſitors, ſent from Spain to Naples, were at laſt expelled the kingdom with ignominy; and Ferdinand, being apprehenſive of an inſurrection, ſurrection, promiſed the Neapolitans that no inquiſition ſhould be introduced among them [h].

THE doctrines broached by Luther in Germany occaſioned new attempts to introduce the formidable tribunal. His opinions ſoon penetrated into Italy, and began to meet with many favourers in Naples; ſo that the emperor Charles, during his reſidence in the kingdom, prohibited his ſubjects by an edict, under pain of death, from holding any correſpondence with thoſe infected with the hereſy of Luther. The doctrines of the reformation, however, at the ſame time were publickly, though artfully, taught by the famous capuchin Bernard Ochus, or Ochino, who, on account of his eloquence and learning, had been invited to preach at Naples during Lent, and was approved by the emperor, who declared, that he preached with ſuch ſpirit and ſo much devotion, that he made the very ſtones weep [i]. Bernard, during his abode at Naples, made many diſciples, who after his departure privately inſtructed others, among whom were ſome famous preachers, and perſons of rank and fortune, who began to form congregations and conventicles. The jealouſy of the viceroy being awakened, he publiſhed a ſevere edict againſt heretical books, and ordered ſome books of Melanchon and Eraſmus, that had been diſperſed at Naples, to be publickly burnt. He likewiſe prohibited all books of divinity that had been printed within twenty-five years from being re-printed, and ordered that no treatiſe of divinity ſhould be printed, unleſs the authors were approved of, and affixed their names to their works. This jealouſy of the viceroy made all ſort of learning ſuſpected, and prevented the Neapolitans from making ſuch a progreſs in literature as formerly. Several academies, which were about this time formed by the nobility of the Seggi for the advancement of learning, were ordered to be ſuppreſſed; and in the end of the year, Toledo, having received orders from the emperor, if poſſible, to introduce the inquiſition, deſired Paul III. to ſend a deputy from that tribunal in Rome to Naples. The deputy accordingly arrived at Naples with the pope's brief, to which the viceroy, after deliberating a few days, granted the royal exequator, ordering it to be affixed upon the door of the cathedral, and not to be proclaimed through the city by ſound of trumpet, for fear of an inſurrection. The edict no ſooner appeared upon the cathedral door, than the whole city was filled with uproar and tumult; and the deputies of the nobility and commons ſent ſome of their number to Pozzuolo, to complain to the viceroy, who perceiving their fury and obſtinacy, promiſed that there ſhould be no more mention of an inquiſition, but that heretics ſhould be proſecuted according to the canons. The Neapolitans, upon receiving this anſwer, teſtified their joy for three days by bonfires and illuminations; but about two months after their fury was again excited by a ſecond edict, which appeared on the 11th of May, more alarming than the former, as it mentioned the inquiſition openly. The people immediately, in a tumultuous manner, tore down the edict, ran to arms, and made a new election of officers, who they were certain would not be in the intereſt of the viceroy.

A. D. 1547. Great tumults on account of the inquiſition.

Skirmiſhes betwixt the Spaniards and Neapolitans.

TOLEDO hearing of the inſurrection, came in great rage to Naples, and reinforced the garriſon of Caſtel Nuovo with 3000 Spaniards from the neighbouring towns. For ten or twelve days there were continual ſkirmiſhes betwixt theſe Spaniards and the citizens. A ceſſation of hoſtilities was then agreed to, and both parties ſent deputies to the emperor; but in the mean time the citizens, being informed that the viceroy had accepted the offer of 5000 Florentine foot, immediately levied 10,000 men, and muſtered the inhabitants fit to bear arms, to the number of 14,000. With this force they renewed hoſtilities againſt the Spaniards; but in their daily ſkirmiſhes they were generally worſted. The deputies at length returning from the emperor, the citizens were peremptorily ordered to obey the viceroy, and deliver up their arms to him; which command was complied with without heſitation, that the inſurrection might not appear to have been a rebellion againſt their lawful ſovereign. On the 12th of Auguſt a general pardon was granted to all concerned in the late tumult, excepting only thirty-ſix perſons, one of whom was afterwards executed. The city was fined in 100,000 crowns; but the emperor never exacted the money [k]. By this vigorous oppoſition, the emperor and the viceroy being both deterred from their deſign of introducing the holy tribunal, Toledo aſſiſted the vicar of Naples in proceeding againſt heretics according to the canons; and a few years after the Neapolitans obtained a bull from the pope, ordaining, that the goods of heretics ſhould not be confiſcated [l] (A).

Peace reſtored by the emperor's edict.

(A) Several other attempts were afterwards made during the reigns of Philip II. III. IV. and Charles II. to eſtabliſh the inquiſition in Naples; but by the jealouſy and vigilance of the people they all proved ineffectual. At laſt the emperor Charles VI. in the beginning of the preſent century, publiſhed an edict, expreſsly prohibiting all cauſes relating to the holy faith to be tried by any perſons, except the archbiſhops and biſhops as ordinaries (1).

a ABOUT four years after this commotion, the Neapolitans were alarmed with the news of the great preparations making at Conſtantinople for invading their kingdom. The prince of Salerno, from his enmity to Toledo, who he ſuſpected had hired aſſaſſins againſt him, had left Naples and gone to France, where he excited Henry II. then at war with the emperor, to attempt the conqueſt of his native country, which he aſſured him would be an eaſy enterprize. Henry, who inherited his father's rivalſhip and hatred of the emperor, ordered ſome gallies to be fitted out at Marſeilles, and by his ambaſſador at Conſtantinople ſollicited Solyman to ſend a fleet againſt Naples. Toledo in the mean time aſſembled the barons of the kingdom, and raiſed a fund of 300,000 ducats for ſupporting the war. He likewiſe ſent for Doria with forty gallies from Genoa; but before his arrival, the Turkiſh fleet of 150 large gallies apb peared on the coaſt, and having burnt ſome maritime towns, on the 15th of July anchored before Naples. Soon after the baſha obſerving the Genoeſe admiral, purſued his fleet, and before he could reach the ſhore, ſunk two and took ſeven of his ſhips. About three weeks after, however, the prince of Salerno not appearing with the French gallies, he retired with his formidable fleet, and ſailed to the Levant, the prince, who quickly followed him, in vain ſolliciting him to return. The baſha, as it was then reported, had entered into a ſecret treaty with Mormile, one of thoſe whoſe eſtates had been forfeited on account of the late commotion, who prevailed with him to retire upon receiving 200,000 ducats. Mormile for this ſervice was allowed to return to Naples, and received an equivalent for his eſtate [m].

c TOLEDO having removed this formidable enemy, began to proceed with rigour againſt ſeveral perſons, who he ſuſpected were privy to the deſigns of the prince of Salerno, and by his arbitrary and ſevere proceedings quickly rendered his government both terrible and odious. About this time the Sienneſe having been oppreſſed by the Spaniards, obliged the governor and garriſon to evacuate their city, and ſoon after introduced the French; on which account the emperor ordered Toledo to march from Naples to reduce the republic. The viceroy, during the winter, was very diligent in making preparations for his expedition to Tuſcany; and in the beginning of the following year ſent his ſon Don Garcia, with 10,0000 men, into the Sienneſe territories, where he quickly reduced ſeveral caſtles. He himſelf, in the mean time, leaving his third ſon Don Lewis lieutenant of the kingdom, d embarked with a conſiderable number of Spaniſh ſoldiers on board Doria's fleet, and proceeded to Leghorn, though he had been for ſome time afflicted with a rheum and fever. His diſtemper increaſing, he went for the benefit of the air to Florence, where he died on the 12th of February, leaving behind him by his firſt wife three ſons, Don Frederic, Don Garcia, and Don Lewis; and four daughters, three of whom were married to Neapolitan lords; but Eleonora the ſecond to Coſmo di Medici, duke of Tuſcany [n].

The Nea-

He refuſed to imitate the rigorous methods of his predeceſſor, with regard to ſudden impriſonments, tortures, and criminal puniſhments, inflicted upon delinquents on bare information, and preſerved the peace of the kingdom by his prudent and provident orders. As the emperor this year reſigned the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, and the Milaneſe, to his ſon Philip, on account of his marriage with queen Mary of England, the cardinal, on the 25th of November, gave the marquis of Peſcara, Philip's envoy, poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, in his name, with

During the commotion at Naples on account of the inquiſition, he had uſed his utmoſt endeavours to occaſion a general inſurrection, and to perſuade the pope to ſeize the kingdom for the church. ples. His promotion alarmed Philip, who ordered cardinal Pacecco, then in Rome, on account of the election, to continue in the city to watch his proceedings; and soon after hearing of his negotiations with the king of France, sent Don Ferdinando Alvares de Toledo, duke of Alva, then governor of Milan, to Naples, as viceroy, to put the kingdom in a posture of defence against the pope's designs. Alva arrived at Naples about the end of the year, and took the command from Bernard de Mendoza, who upon the departure of the cardinal, had been appointed lieutenant of the kingdom. The pope in the mean time, notwithstanding his great age and his reputation for sanctity, he having been the founder of the order of the Theatins, and a great promoter of the inquisition, began to cherish the most ambitious schemes, and indulge the most unchristian resentment against the Spaniards. He immediately promoted his three worthless nephews to dignities, protected the Neapolitan malcontents at Rome, depressed all those who were in the interest of Spain, and entered into a treaty with the king of France, by which he promised to give the kingdom of Naples to his second son. Under pretence likewise that the Spaniards had formed a conspiracy against his person, he imprisoned Philip's ambassador at Rome for England; and alleging that the arrears of tribute had not been paid in due time, he drew up a bull, declaring that Philip had forfeited the kingdom. a b

THESE outrages of the pope, and his ardour in fortifying Rome, and other places in the ecclesiastical state, and his great warlike preparations, excited the diligence of the duke of Alva, who having in vain made several offers for an accommodation to Paul, at length, in the beginning of September, advanced towards the ecclesiastical state with an army of 12,000 foot, 300 men at arms, and 1800 light horse, and before the end of the year reduced all the papal territories in the neighbourhood of Rome, making incursions to the very gates of the city. The great success of Alva highly exasperated the pope, who being disappointed of his succours from France, oppressed the inhabitants of Rome with the most arbitrary and grievous exactions. Though he would not hearken to an accommodation, yet he obtained a truce for forty days from Alva, who immediately returned to Naples, to make proper preparations for opposing the duke of Guise, who had entered Piedmont with a large army to the pope's assistance. Having assembled the barons of the kingdom, he obtained from them a donative of a million of crowns for the king's use, and 25,000 for himself; and to distress the pope, who had imposed a tax of two-tenths upon all ecclesiastical revenues in the kingdom, he used his utmost diligence to prevent any money from going to Rome. He sequestered the revenues of many archbishoprics, and other benefices, which were collected in the name of the royal chamber or exchequer, and registered the wealth and plate of all the churches and monasteries, great part of which treasure was carried to Naples. He also ordered all the bells of the churches and monasteries in Benevento, and all the brass cannon of that city, to be coined into money, and to be valued, in order to be paid at the conclusion of the war; and hearing that the French had arrived on the frontiers of the kingdom, on the 11th of April he set out for Abruzzo. The truce having been for some time expired, hostilities were again renewed, and before the viceroy could assemble his army, the French had entered the kingdom and besieged some places on the frontiers. Alva quickly repulsed the French, who found themselves but ill supported by the pope; and the papal troops being soon after defeated, about the end of August he advanced with his army to the neighbourhood of Rome. The Romans threatening to revolt, the pope began to hearken to proposals for an accommodation, especially as he saw his design against the kingdom frustrated by the defeat of the French at St. Quintin, which obliged Henry II. to recal his troops from Italy. Accordingly, by the mediation of the Venetians and the duke of Tuscany, the peace was concluded on the 13th of September, when it was agreed, that the duke of Alva should go to Rome and ask pardon of the pope, who engaged to renounce his alliance with the French; that all places taken from the pope should be restored, and their fortifications demolished; that both parties should grant a pardon to all offenders, excepting only the Colonni, who the pope alleged had been the authors of the war; and that Palliano should be kept by a Neapolitan nobleman, till it should be disposed of by the joint consent of the pope and Philip °. c d e f

THE news of the peace was very agreeable to Philip, and he bountifully rewarded all those who had distinguished themselves in the war. The duke of Alva, upon his return to Naples, was received with acclamations and rejoicing; but, to the great grief of the Neapolitans, he was quickly recalled to Spain, and Don Juan Manriques de Lara, the Spanish ambassador at Rome, was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom. a the death of Paul IV. During the government of theſe two lieutenants, the kingdom ſuffered greatly by the invaſions of the Turks. Soon after the departure of the duke of Alva, the Turkiſh fleet, conſiſting of 120 gallies, under the command of Muſtapha baſha, appeared in the Neapolitan ſeas. The infidels, after depopulating the city of Reggio, entered the gulph of Naples, and landing in the night-time, pillaged and deſtroyed the cities of Maſſa and Sorrento, of which laſt place they carried off almoſt the whole inhabitants into ſlavery. PHILIP in the mean time loſing both his father, the emperor, and his wife queen Mary b of England, in the beginning of the following year proceeded from Flanders to Spain, where he reſolved for the future to fix his reſidence. Soon after his arrival, he ſent Don Parafan de Rivera, duke of Alcala, as viceroy to Naples, where he arrived on the 12th of June, the ſame day that cardinal Cueva ſet out for Rome. The duke before had given proofs of his abilities as viceroy of Catalonia, and, according to Thuanus, was a man of prudence, probity, courage, and piety. During the firſt years of his government, he had many difficulties to ſtruggle with, which by his prudence and wiſdom he ſoon removed. At his arrival the kingdom was greatly afflicted by a general dearth. The people were alarmed with frequent earthquakes, which were felt through all the provinces, particularly in Principato and Baſilicata, where many cities were deſtroyed, and the country deſolated, while the c plague and other grievous diſeaſes daily carried off great numbers of the inhabitants. The Turks likewiſe infeſted the coaſts with frequent deſcents, and even preſumed to pillage part of the ſuburbs of Naples, from whence they carried off a great many captives.

He ſupported his ſmall army for ſome time by plundering the neighbouring provinces, and made an unſucceſsful attempt to ſeize the city of Cotrone. The viceroy ordered Fabizio Pignatelli, the preſident of that province, to march againſt him with 600 horſe, who was ſo ſucd ceſsful as to ruin and diſperſe the banditti by frequent ſtratagems, though their numbers at firſt were ſo formidable, that he durſt not hazard a general engagement with them [r].

A. D. 1563.

WHAT chiefly engaged the attention of Alcala, during his whole adminiſtration, was the extravagant pretenſions of the eccleſiaſtics and miniſters of the church of Rome, who by various methods attempted to make dangerous encroachments upon the king's temporal authority. As the council of Trent was about this time diſſolved, and its decrees publiſhed, the pope uſed his utmoſt endeavours to have them received and acknowleged, in the dominions of all thoſe princes who ſtill adhered to the church of Rome. As many of the decrees, however, tended to eſtabliſh the uſurpations of the popes, the catholic princes paid little or no regard to them, and ſome of them even at firſt prohibited them from being e publiſhed. The king of Spain, as an obedient ſon of the church, pretended to receive the decrees of the council in all his dominions; but at the ſame time gave ſecret orders to Alcala, to admit of no innovations with regard to the royal prerogatives. The viceroy accordingly allowed printed copies of the decrees of the council to be diſperſed over all the kingdom, but would never conſent to grant the exequatur regium, or royal permiſſion, in their behalf. He even gave orders to the preſidents of the provinces, and other officers of the kingdom, not to ſuffer any innovation to be made, and vigorouſly oppoſed the prelates who appeared fond of putting in execution thoſe decrees of the council derogatory to the king's authority.

He vigorouſly oppoſes the uſurpations of the church of Rome;

ALCALA likewiſe exerted himſelf in rejecting the bull of Pius V. in Cæna Domini, which, A. D. 1567.
f beſides an infinite number of extravagancies, intirely overthrows the power of princes, by ſubjecting their government to the cenſure and correction of the court of Rome, and prohibiting them, under the pain of excommunication, from laying taxes upon their ſubjects, without the permiſſion of the apoſtolic ſee. As the prelates, notwithſtanding the prohibition of the viceroy, diſperſed the bull through the kingdom, great diſorders immediately enſued, on account of raiſing the taxes, which occaſioned Alcala to write for new inſtructions to Spain. Having received ſtrict orders from Philip to puniſh thoſe who had diſperſed the bull, he confiſcated the eſtates of ſome prelates who had tranſgreſſed his mandate, prohibiting the publication, and impriſoned thoſe printers and bookſellers who had printed and diſperſed the copies. Pius exclaimed againſt thoſe proceedings of the viceroy; but inſtead g of uſing his uſual arms of excommunications and interdictions, according to Giannone, he had recourſe to a cunning, malicious, and ſcandalous ſhift, namely, to order the confeſſors, both regular and ſecular, to deny abſolution to their penitents, if they refuſed to acknowlege the bull. The clergy hoped by this means to triumph, and the confuſions in the kingdom increaſed: but the ardour of the pope ſoon after abating, the prelates likewiſe turned more remiſs, and contented themſelves with publiſhing the bull from the pulpits every Holy Thurſday; in which ſtate the diſpute continued during the reſt of the government of Alcala, though it was afterwards frequently proſecuted with ſpirit by his ſucceſſors. a

A. D. 1569. THE duke had alſo ſome very warm diſputes with the papal miniſters, about the neceſſity of the exequatur regium to the pope's bulls, reſcripts, and other proviſions, proceeding from the Roman court. He alſo oppoſed the encroachments attempted by the apoſtolic viſitors, and prohibited laymen from anſwering any citation from the court of Rome: he would not allow the eccleſiaſtics to take the cognizance of mixed cauſes, that is, of ſuch cauſes as properly belonged to the juriſdiction of ſecular magiſtrates, but which they alleged might all be tried in eccleſiaſtical courts: he vigorouſly inſiſted upon the king's right to one-half of the tythes raiſed upon the eccleſiaſtics in the kingdom: he likewiſe deprived the knights of St. Lazarus of the privilege of being accounted eccleſiaſtics, by which means, though they were mere laymen, they had ſheltered themſelves from the laws under the protection of the popes, and by fradulent methods acquired great eſtates: he alſo made ſtrong remonſtrances at the court of Rome againſt the abuſes concerning laſt wills, which the biſhops pretended to make for thoſe who died inteſtate: and he puniſhed thoſe prelates who, contrary to his mandates, perſiſted in the exerciſe of what they judged their antient right [s]. b and provides for the defence of the kingdom againſt the Turks. ALCALA, during theſe troubleſome diſputes with the eccleſiaſtics in defence of the king's prerogatives, was obliged to be conſtantly upon his guard againſt the invaſions of the Turks. In the ſixth year of his government the infidels alarmed all Italy, by a moſt formidable invaſion of the iſland of Malta, which expedition is particularly and elegantly deſcribed by Thuanus [t]. The viceroy, being apprehenſive leſt they ſhould make an attempt upon Sicily on the continent, was at great pains in fortifying the maritime cities, and providing them with ſtrong garriſons. His fears ſoon appeared not to be groundleſs; for the Turks failing in their enterprize againſt Malta, the following year ſailed with a numerous fleet into the Adriatic, and endeavoured to ſurprize Peſcara. Being, however, repulſed by the garriſon, they ravaged all the neighbouring coaſt; and having pillaged all the towns, they returned c

About four years after, by another formidable naval armament, they gave a freſh alarm to Naples, which obliged the viceroy to ſend for 3000 Germans for the defence of the kingdom: but the ſtorm falling on the iſland of Cyprus, he ſent twenty-three gallies with 3000 ſoldiers, and a great d

He greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his prudent and mild government, and was extremely benevolent and charitable to the poor and afflicted, by founding ſome hoſpitals for their relief, and diſtributing money to thoſe who were aſhamed to publiſh their neceſſities. For the e conveniency of commerce he enlarged the highways, and built many new and ſtately bridges, and with great watchfulneſs ſecured the kingdom againſt the inſults of the infidels, which occaſioned his death to be univerſally lamented [u].

The cardinal of Granville appointed viceroy. UPON the death of Alcala, the ſupreme government devolved to the collateral regents, which they held only for a few days; for Don Anthony Perenotte, cardinal of Granville, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Rome, on the 19th of April arrived at Naples as viceroy, in conſequence of an order which he had received ſome time before from Philip. He was the ſon of the famous Granville, counſellor to the emperor Charles V. who conferred upon him the biſhopric of Arras, and employed him in ſeveral embaſſies to England and France. After he was created cardinal, he had the charge of the moſt weighty affairs in Flanders, under the f ducheſs of Parma; but by his rigour rendering himſelf odious to the people, he was recalled to Spain.

He aſſiſts Don John of Auſtria againſt the Turks; THE cardinal, during his government in Naples, was chiefly engaged in oppoſing the formidable power of the Turks, in raiſing ſubſidies to ſupply the great neceſſities of the king, and in fruſtrating the inſolent attempts of the eccleſiaſtics to encroach upon the royal juriſdiction and prerogatives. He was very diligent in reinforcing the fleet of Don John of Auſtria, who arriving at Naples on the 9th of Auguſt, and being joined by the Neapolitan and Sicilian gallies, and many of the chief barons and noblemen of both kingdoms, on the 7th of October gained a moſt memorable victory over the Turks, in the gulph of Lepanto. The following year he likewiſe ſent on board the prince's fleet the Spaniſh garriſon of Naples, and g 5000 Italian forces; but the enemy declining an engagement, the ſummer paſſed off with-a out any enterprize of importance. The year after, the Venetians concluding a separate peace with the infidels, and withdrawing their forces from the allies, Don John sailed from Naples and reduced Tunis, after which expedition he returned, in the end of the year, to Italy; but while the cardinal and he were celebrating his safe return with bull feasts and tournaments, the Turks, who they expected after the late defeat would not dare to view their coasts, landed in Otranto, and pillaged the small city of Castro: and soon after having expelled the Spanish garrison from Tunis, recovered the possession of that kingdom, which for many years, with small interruption, had been tributary to the Spaniards. A. D. 1573.

As Spain about this time began to lose its strength, and become poor and desolate, on account of the large armies and numerous garrisons which it maintained both at home and b abroad, and of the many colonies that were sent to America, and of the total neglect of agriculture and manufactures, Philip began to mortgage his revenues to the Genoese, at most extravagant interest, and alienated cities and lands in the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. He particularly extracted large sums from Naples: and the cardinal, during his government of little more than four years, obtained two donatives, amounting to the sum of 2,300,000 ducats, besides other sums raised by the sale of titles, and great quantities of stores and provisions sent out of the kingdom, under pretence of supplying the fort of Goletta, which commanded the harbour of Tunis. raises large subsidies upon the Neapolitans;

The cardinal likewise imitated his predecessor in opposing the usurpations of the clergy, and even exerted himself with more vigour with regard to mixed causes, by ordering the c archbishop's prison to be broke open, and by taking from thence a thief, who had been guilty of sacrilege, whom he tried in the civil court and executed. Though the vicar of the archbishop excommunicated all those who were concerned in executing the orders of the viceroy, the cardinal, nevertheless, banished the vicar from the kingdom, sequestrated all the archbishop's revenues, and imprisoned the counsellors of his court, and the beadles who had pasted up the copies of the sentence, which he ordered to be defaced. The court of Rome was greatly irritated with the cardinal's proceedings, but condescended, however, to drop the affair, and to absolve all those privately in the treasury-chamber who had incurred the sentence of excommunication [w]. The cardinal is said to have disgusted Don John of Austria, by preventing him from extorting a private donative from the Neapolitans; on which d account the prince, by his interest at the court of Spain, procured his removal from Naples, in hopes that his favourite, the duke of Sessa, would be appointed his successor. The cardinal the following year, in the beginning of July, returned to Spain, where he was created counsellor of state, and president of the supreme council of Italy; but Philip, jealous of Don John's authority, instead of the duke of Sessa appointed the marquis of Mondejar, the prince's enemy, as viceroy. and opposes the encroachments of the clergy. A. D. 1574. He is recalled to Spain. A. D. 1575.

Don Inigo Lopez Hurtado de Mendoza, marquis of Mondejar, arrived at Naples about ten days after the departure of the cardinal. He quickly disobliged both Granville and Don John of Austria. Having, with great imprudence, confided in some flatterers, who insinuated themselves into his favour upon his first arrival, he revoked many wise regulations made by the e cardinal, who naturally taking offence at such a reformation, kept a watchful and jealous eye over all his proceedings. The marquis likewise could not dissemble his sentiments of Don John, whom he looked upon with great disgust, as he still continued to divert himself in Naples with feasts and tournaments, and made such a shining figure as quite eclipsed the dignity of the viceroy. The heart-burnings betwixt them soon broke out into an open quarrel; so that one day, after some angry words, Don John drew his dagger, and with great difficulty was prevented from stabbing him. He soon after, by his imprudent conduct, incurred the hatred of the Neapolitan nobility and commons. The nobility were offended by his endeavouring to impose upon the Seggi of Naples, a Fleming, who was provincial regent at Madrid, and his spy, as a person of noble birth; and the common people f were greatly irritated, by a report that, by the advice of a friar, he intended to adulterate the meal of corn with that of the herb Calf's-foot, or Wake-Robin, by the botanists called Aron, with which Julius Cæsar is said to have supported his troops in Albania, when besieging the army of Pompey. His enmity with the cardinal and Don John, and the universal discontent he had raised, prevented him from receiving any honour from his prudent regulations; so that, though by his provident care and severe edicts he had prevented the plague from entering Naples, which for two years had dispeopled many cities in Italy, the general security was attributed to the foresight of the city of Naples, but chiefly to their patron Januarius and other saints [x]. The viceroy likewise sent some troops to Puglia and Calabria, who repulsed the Turks, who had landed on those coasts: but the advantages gained g over the infidels on this occasion were attributed to the vigilance and valour of Nicolo Bernardino, prince of Bisagnano [y]. The marquis at length intirely alienated the Neapolitans, by The marquis of Mondejar appointed viceroy. His government disagreeable to the Neapolitans.

attempting to take a rich young heireſs by force from a nunnery, with the intention of marrying her to his eldeſt ſon. This outrage being repreſented by the nobility to the king, and aggravated by Granville, the marquis was immediately recalled, and obliged to leave Naples in the beginning of winter, after he had governed as viceroy four years and four months. During his adminiſtration Philip obtained three donatives from Naples, amounting to 3,400,000 ducats. He made many wholſome regulations for the good government of the city and kingdom, and left twenty-four ſtatutes or pragmatics, in which there are many prudent and commendable proviſions [z]. a

He returns to Spain, A. D 1579.

WHEN Mondejar was recalled, Don Juan de Zuniga, a ſecond ſon of the family of Miranda, and prince of Pietraperſia, who had been Philip's ambaſſador for ſeveral years at Rome, was appointed viceroy. He arrived at Naples on the 11th of November, three days after the departure of his predeceſſor, and at his landing refuſed the vain pomp of a bridge, deſiring 1500 crowns, appropriated for that purpoſe, to be given to the hoſpital for incurables [a]. A few months after his arrival, having received an order to furniſh all the ſuccours poſſible for an expedition againſt Portugal, to make good Philip's pretenſions to that kingdom, he fitted out ſeventeen veſſels, on board of which he embarked 6000 ſoldiers and 4000 pioneers, under the command of the prior of Hungary and Don Carlo Spinelli. To ſupport the charges of this armament, he aſſembled a parliament on the 29th of September, and obtained a donative of 1,200,000 ducats. About two years after he ordered the Gregorian reformation of the calendar to be obſerved in Naples; and as Philip now limited the time for the government of his viceroys to three years, he ſoon after returned to Spain, leaving the reputation of an excellent governor, his departure being univerſally regretted, on account of his piety, meekneſs, and courteous behaviour [b]. b

DON Pedro Giron, duke of Oſſuna, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the wars of Granada, and the conqueſt of Portugal, in the month of November arrived at Naples, as ſucceſſor to Zuniga. He ſoon rendered himſelf odious to the nobility by his ſtiff reſervedneſs, and haughty and diſdainful demeanour, which rendered his government uneaſy and diſagreeable to him. To procure the popularity, which at firſt he had ſlighted, he entered himſelf into the body of the nobility of the Seggio of Nido, but could not by that means remove the bad opinion that had formerly been conceived of him. He was much diſquieted with the continual demands of ſubſidies for Spain; but by promiſing new favours and privileges, which were actually granted, he obtained two donatives, amounting to 2,400,000 ducats. Towards the end of his government, which, notwithſtanding the late reſolution, continued four years, he began to acquire the good-will of the Neapolitans, by his diligence in the diſpatch of buſineſs, and his zeal for the impartial diſtribution of juſtice. During his adminiſtration he executed many public works, which were greatly beneficial to the nation; ſo that at his departure, he received many encomiums and bleſſings [c]. d

THE duke of Oſſuna was ſucceeded in the viceroyalty by Don Juan de Zuniga, count of Miranda, and nephew of the late prince of Pietraperſia, who arrived at Naples in the month of November. During almoſt the whole time of his government, which continued nine years, he was chiefly employed in extirpating the banditti, who had become very formidable in Naples and the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. Theſe robbers for ſeveral years had infeſted the kingdom in ſmall bodies; but having been overlooked by the viceroys, their numbers greatly increaſed, eſpecially as the famous Sixtus V. who the year before had aſcended the pontifical chair, by his vigorous proſecution of thoſe in the territories of the church, forced them to fly into the kingdom. Having by theſe reinforcements become very numerous, they openly took the field, and pillaged ſeveral walled towns, carrying deſolation and ruin every where; ſo that commerce and traffic were intirely interrupted. The ſoldiers who were ſent againſt them were frequently baffled and ſeverely handled; but in the ſecond year of his government, the viceroy was ſo fortunate as to ſeize their noted leader Benedetto Mongone, who, as a terrible example to others, was put to death by tortures. The banditti, however, ſtill kept in a body, and one Marco Sciarra aſſuming the command, and taking the title of king of Campagna, quickly became more formidable than his predeceſſor. e f

This permiſſion was afterwards renewed; Sciarra, however, defended himſelf for three years againſt all the attempts of the viceroy, who having received orders from Spain to watch the motions of the pope, ſent 4000 horſe and foot into the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, under pretence of purſuing the banditti. Sixtus, during his whole pontificate, had ſhewn himſelf but a very cold friend to the Spaniards, whoſe overgrown power he had formed a deſign to reduce, and is even ſaid byg Leti to have given Elizabeth of England intelligence of the deſtination of the grand Armada.

Though Sciarra went to Venice with ſixty of his who are extirpated by the viceroy.

Upon his death the count of Converſano intirely rooted out the whole gang of robbers, and returned with great honour to Naples.

THE viceroy, in the mean time, had cauſed four galleaſſes to be built at Naples, which
c were employed in the fatal expedition againſt England; and the French having, about this time, invaded Savoy, he ſent 4500 foot to the aſſiſtance of the duke, to prevent them from penetrating into the Milaneſe. To ſupport the charges of theſe expeditions, he raiſed during his government no leſs than five donatives, amounting to 6,000,000 of ducats: and as the Turks were reported to be fitting out a formidable fleet at Conſtantinople, he ſent a body of troops into Calabria, and garriſons to the caſtles of Brindiſi, Otranto, Tarento, and Gallipoli. The infidels ſoon after anchored with 100 ſail in St. John's bay, and pillaged Reggio, and fourteen villages in the neighbourhood. They afterwards ſailed to Otranto and Gallipoli; but finding thoſe coaſts well guarded, they retired to Valona. The count, about two years Miranda is recalled to Spain.

the city and kingdom by ſeveral public works. He likewiſe publiſhed fifty pragmatics, and divers proviſions concerning the price of corn, and other neceſſaries of life [e].

of Olivares, arrived at Naples, as his ſucceſſor. He had reſided at Rome twelve years as ambaſſador from Spain, where, on account of the extravagant and odd humour of Sixtus V. he had many troubleſome and difficult matters to tranſact. As he was eminent for his great ſkill and facility in diſpatching the moſt weighty affairs, and had acquired a great reputation for prudence, the Spaniards gave him the ſurname of Gran Papeliſta, that is, a perſon always buſy among papers or writings. After his departure from Rome, he went to govern Sicily, e and from thence he came to Naples. It was quickly obſerved, that he was of a ſerious and ſevere diſpoſition, and an enemy to diverſions. He baniſhed dancing, comedies, and feaſts, uſually given by his predeceſſors in the palace, and diſcouraged the formality and ceremony of a levee. rigorouſly adminiſtered. What diſtinguiſhed him above his predeceſſors, was his careful attention to the œconomy of government, whereby he reformed many abuſes, particularly the immoderate luxury in the women's dreſs, and the vanity of titles, which many, without foundation, arrogated to themſelves both in writing and ſpeaking. He was careful to keep plenty in the city and kingdom; and in order to beautify and adorn the city of Naples, he employed the famous architect Dominico Fontana, under whoſe direction he erected ſeveral
f magnificent works, and cauſed ſeveral ſtreets to be levelled, and built ſtraight and uniform. Philip II. of Spain dying, in the third year of his government, occaſioned his adminiſtration to be but of ſhort continuance; for Philip III. with whom he was no favourite, receiving ſeveral complaints againſt him from his enemies, ſent the count of Lemos as his ſucceſſor, He is recalled by Philip III.
who arrived at Naples before his departure, which obliged him to leave the city in an abrupt manner, and retire to the palace of the duke of Nocera. According to Giannone, there never was a more juſt, a more prudent man, or one of more indefatigable application, than the count of Olivares. During his government, which did not continue quite four years, he publiſhed thirty-two pragmatics, all of them uſeful and well digeſted [f].

PHILIP III. this year obtained the inveſtiture of Naples from Clement VIII. and the

quickly engaged, by the discovery of a formidable conspiracy, which had been hatched for a more than a year in Calabria, under the direction of Tommasa Campanella, a furious enthusiast. Campanella, on account of his wicked life, and on suspicion of heresy, had felt the censures of the inquisition, and had suffered a long imprisonment in Rome; but upon a profession of penitence he was set at liberty, and ordered to confine himself to a convent in Stilo, his native city. In resentment for the usage he had received at Rome, upon his return to Calabria he formed a design of expelling the Spaniards from Naples, and rendering the kingdom independent on the holy see. As he had acquired a great reputation for his skill in astrology, he first persuaded the monks of the convent where he lodged, and afterwards many others, that great revolutions of kingdoms, particularly of Naples, would happen in the first year of the ensuing century; that the people ought therefore to be forewarned, in b order to be ready to shake off the yoke of the tyrannical kings of Spain, as he intended then to form the kingdom into an excellent republic. In his sermons he openly declared, that he was appointed by God for delivering the nation, while the monks his associates, to the number of 300, in their discourses verified his assertions, and declaimed against the tyranny of the kings of Spain, and in private encouraged the people to rise up in arms. Besides the monks, the bishops of Nicastro, Girace, Melito, and Oppido, entered into the conspiracy, and a great many provincial barons, and some of the city of Naples. They proposed to introduce a general liberty, to kill all the Jesuits, and those priests and monks that should refuse to join them, to burn all books, and to make new statutes. Having likewise concluded a treaty with a Turkish admiral, who promised to appear in the month of September with a c fleet to their assistance, they assembled 1800 fugitives, whose number was daily increasing, when the plot was discovered by two of the conspirators. The viceroy immediately sent Don Carlo Spinelli with a body of troops into Calabria, under pretence of fortifying those coasts against the infidels. The designs of the conspirators by this means being anticipated, many of them were seized and put to death. Campanella was likewise apprehended and put to the torture; but by his many stupid and contradictory answers, he had the good fortune to be deemed a madman, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment; but finding means to escape, he fled to France, where he died about thirty-nine years after this transaction.

He quells a formidable conspiracy.

The conspiracy being quelled, the viceroy went to the jubilee at Rome, from whence he soon after returned to Naples, the kingdom being alarmed by the Turks, who in the month d of August landed at Scalea, on the coast of Calabria, but were repulsed with considerable loss to their gallies. Philip soon after acquainting him that he intended to visit Naples, he resolved to build a magnificent palace for his reception, which was accordingly begun under the direction of Fontana: but the count in the mean time falling sick, after lingering several months, died on the 13th of October, in the third year of his government. During his illness, he obtained a royal writ, granting the lieutenantcy of the kingdom to his son Don Francesco de Castro, a youth of twenty-three years of age, who held the government near eighteen months, and was engaged in defending the kingdom against the Turks, who landed in Calabria and pillaged Reggio g.

His death. A. D. 1601.

The following year, in the month of April, Don Jean Alfonso Pimentel d' Errera, count e of Benavente, arrived as viceroy at Naples. He immediately applied himself, with great assiduity, to reform the abuses of the tribunals, especially with respect to criminal causes, ordering all the processes of this kind that were lingering in the provincial courts to be brought to Naples, where sentence was denounced against the guilty according to their crimes, without delay. As he ordered criminals to be dragged even from the sanctuaries, he quickly had disputes with Rome about the ecclesiastical immunity. He was likewise obliged to add to the oppression of the Neapolitans, by imposing new taxes upon them, as the demands from the court of Spain were very pressing, and continually repeated. He accordingly laid a new duty upon fruit, which filled the people with discontent, so that they threatened an invasion. Their murmurs were increased by a new duty upon salt, and the f stagnation of commerce, occasioned by the insatiable greediness of the money-clippers and false coiners, who had debased the coin. The viceroy, to put a stop to the practice of the money clippers, ordered the Zannette, a coin of about the value of a sixpence, to pass current, whether of full weight or not, and the other money to be received by weight.

He is succeeded by the count of Benavente. A. D. 1603.

As the Turks likewise continued to infest the kingdom, and to carry off a great many captives, the count formed a resolution of destroying Durazzo, which served the infidels for a place of retreat. He accordingly fitted out a considerable squadron of ships, and sent them, under the command of the marquis of S. Croce, to Albania, who landing his men and artillery on the coast near Durazzo, took the castle by storm, and pillaged and destroyed the city. At the same time Don Lelio Ursini was sent with a body of troops into Calabria, g against the banditti of that province, of whom he destroyed a great number; without how-

THE viceroy, in the mean time, was engaged in warm diſputes about the immunity of churches and ſanctuaries with the eccleſiaſtics, who in conſequence of a bull, publiſhed about twelve years before by Gregory XIV. inſiſted, that it belonged to them to determine what criminals had a right to a ſanctuary; and beſides, at their own pleaſure, extended the immunity of places not only to church-yards, monaſteries, chapels, oratories, hoſpitals, and biſhops palaces, but alſo to porches, houſes, cloiſters, gardens, and bake-houſes in the neighbourhood of churches. The count having received orders from Spain to admit of no innovations, oppoſed the encroachments of the eccleſiaſtics with great vigour. The diſpute, b however, has never been abſolutely decided; for the eccleſiaſtics, even to the preſent times, have frequently renewed their claim to the pretended immunity, and have often been puniſhed by the viceroys by baniſhment, impriſonment, and ſequeſtration of their revenues. While the count of Benavente was thus employed in oppoſing the eccleſiaſtics, Philip III. who was very inattentive to the affairs of government, and allowed himſelf to be governed by his favourites, by their perſuaſion recalled him to Spain, and ſent the ſon of the late count of Lemos as his ſucceſſor. The young count of Lemos accordingly, in the month of June, arrived at the iſland of Procida, where he continued two or three weeks, that Benavente might have leiſure to prepare for his departure. Benavente at laſt, after he had governed the kingdom about ſeven years, on the 11th of July embarked with his counteſs for Spain, c leaving behind him ſhining monuments of his juſtice and magnificence[h].

DON Pedro Fernandez de Caſtro, count of Lemos, was ſon to the predeceſſor of Benavente, and brother of Don Franceſco, the late lieutenant of the kingdom. Upon his arrival at Naples, finding the royal patrimony exhauſted, no money in the military cheſt, and the corporation for ſupplying the city with corn many millions of ducats in debt, he immediately applied himſelf to remedy theſe miſchiefs, and by his prudent and frugal management of the public money, he ſoon increaſed the proviſions and royal treaſure; ſo that during his government the kingdom enjoyed great plenty. He ſtudied to have juſtice duly adminiſtered, and law-ſuits quickly diſpatched, awing the judges into a faithful diſcharge of their offices, and a ſtrict puniſhment of malefactors, to whom he was ſevere and terrible.

d ABOVE all, he was a great encourager of learning, in which he himſelf had made great proficiency. As the profeſſors of the univerſity of Naples taught their ſcholars in ſome vaults under ground, near a church of the Dominicans, where they were much diſturbed with the noiſe of the bells, the count, out of his love to learning, cauſed a large and magnificent ſtructure to be built for the muſes, under the direction of Fontana, which, according to Giannone, for ſtatelineſs and beauty cannot be paralleled by any univerſity in Europe. When the building was near completed, on which he had expended 150,000 ducats, to ſhew his eſteem for the univerſity, in the ſixth year of his government he attended all the members thither, in a grand proceſſion from their old lodgings, and heard the oration pronounced upon that ſolemn occaſion. He likewiſe compoſed a body of academical laws for the e maſters and ſtudents of the univerſity; and by the encouragements he gave to men of learning, raiſed a ſpirit of emulation among the Neapolitan nobility, who began to revive the inſtitution of academies, at ſome of which, particularly that of the Otioſi, the count himſelf recited a comedy of his own compoſing. The count adorned the city of Naples with other buildings beſides the univerſity, and cauſed ſeveral public works to be erected in different parts of the kingdom; but hearing that the duke of Oſſuna was appointed his ſucceſſor, he left the adminiſtration to his brother Franceſco till the duke's arrival, and on the 8th of July embarked for Spain, in order to take upon him the charge of preſident of the ſupreme council of Italy.

Encourages learning.

DON Pedro Giron, duke of Oſſuna, ſoon after the departure of the count of Lemos, arrived f at Naples from Sicily, where he had been for ſome time governor. To gain the affections of the people, he was very magnificent and liberal. He eaſed them of two taxes, and, nevertheleſs, obtained from them a donative of 1,200,000 ducats, which were ſent to Spain to ſupply the neceſſities of that crown. Mean time a war breaking out betwixt the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy, who had invaded Montferrat, and was aſſiſted by the Venetians, the viceroy, who had no affection for the republic, ſent a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the governor of Milan againſt the duke, and fitted out a fleet to act againſt the Venetians, in the Adriatic gulph. He did not openly declare war againſt the Venetians, but ſent the fleet into the gulph, under pretence of aſſiſting Ferdinand archduke of Auſtria, who was then at war with the republic, having eſpouſed the quarrel of the Uſcocks, a barbarous people of g Croatia, his ſubjects, who had made incurſions into the Venetian territories. complained againſt the hoſtilities of the duke at the court of Spain, who ſent an order to a the viceroy not to infeſt the republic. The duke, however, in open contempt of this command, continued to ſend ſmall ſquadrons into the Adriatic, which ſeized ſeveral veſſels belonging to the republic, and threatened to attack their territories. The Venetians, ſuſpect-ing that the viceroy's proceedings were connived at by the court of Spain, fitted out a fleet in their own defence; at the ſame time negociating a peace with the archduke Ferdinand, and endeavouring to reconcile the Spaniards and the duke of Savoy. A treaty for the peace of Italy was accordingly concluded the following February, which greatly offended Oſſuna, To- ledo, the governor of Milan, and the marquis of Bedmar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Venice.
Oſſuna ſtill continued to infeſt the territories of the republic, and diſturb their trade, being countenanced and aſſiſted by Toledo and Bedmar, who a few months after were diſcovered b to have hatched a moſt formidable conſpiracy againſt the republic. The duke, notwithſtanding the repeated complaints againſt him, both by the republic and the Neapolitans, who ſuffered in their trade by the reprizals of the Venetians, yet, by his relations and friends at the court of Madrid, ſtill found means of juſtifying his conduct. He denied his having had any correſpondence with the conſpirators in Venice, and even continued in his own name to infeſt the trade of the republic, furniſhing his veſſels with artillery by diſgarniſhing the principal forts of the kingdom.

THE Neapolitans ſtill renewing their complaints, and accuſing the duke of oppreſſing the kingdom, of living in a debauched and ſcandalous manner, and of privately encouraging the people in licentiouſneſs, the court of Spain at length reſolved to recal him. Notwith- c longer, as many of the Neapolitan nobility had arrived at Madrid, to ſollicit his removal, and a report prevailed, which was afterwards confirmed, that the duke had formed a deſign of disjoining Naples from Spain, and ſeizing the kingdom for himſelf [1]. He had for ſome time protected the people, without diſtinction, againſt the barons, and promiſed to redreſs their grievances, and aboliſh the taxes. He had foreign troops in his pay, and ſhips of force at his command; and according to Nani, by ſecret methods, he ſounded the duke of Sa- voy and the Venetians, in hopes that they would ſupport him in his enterprize. The Spaniſh court having intelligence of theſe ſecret deſigns, immediately ordered cardinal Borgia, then at Rome, to proceed to Naples, to turn out the duke, and aſſume the government of the d kingdom. Oſſuna uſed his utmoſt endeavours to delay the journey of the cardinal; but not ſucceeding, he attempted to raiſe a commotion in the city, by means of one of his creatures, Genuino, an elect of the people, who harangued the mob, and exaggerating the benefits they had received from the viceroy, aſſured them, that after his departure they would be treated more harſhly by the Spaniards. The cardinal, who had arrived at the iſland of Procida, to baffle theſe deſigns privately landed at Pozzulo, and in the night-time entered Caſtel Nuovo, proclaiming his arrival next morning by a general diſcharge of the cannon of the caſtle.

crown, and was coming to juſtify himſelf before his majeſty in the face of the court. On the 14th of June he embarked for Spain; but to give time for the king's paſſion to abate, he proceeded very ſlowly on his voyage, and after two months arrived at Marſeilles, where he trifled away his time in balls and feaſts. Arriving at length at Madrid, by means of his friends and relations he made his peace with the king, and ſo artfully cleared himſelf and aggravated the behaviour of the cardinal, that he had the aſſurance to deſire to be reſtored to the government of Naples. The council of ſtate, then awed by the capricious favourites, debated the matter, and would have even granted his deſire, if the Neapolitan ambaſſador had not made a vigorous oppoſition (B). The duke's intereſt, however, ſo far prevailed, that the cardinal, in the month of November, was removed, and cardinal Antonio f Zapatta, then in Rome, was ordered to proceed to Naples as lieutenant of the king-

a that had been taken off by the duke, and made other regulations that are published in three pragmatics.

DON Antonio Zapatta assumed the goverment of Naples on the 12th of December, and soon acquired the applause of the people by his care in reforming the tribunals, and obliging the judges to a constant attendance. Being of an easy access, he readily gave audience to all persons, and was very careful to cause the city to be supplied with abundance of all provisions. The city, however, notwithstanding his endeavours, was soon afflicted with a dearth, as corn was very scarce through the whole kingdom, on account of two or three successive bad crops, and could not be transported by land to Naples, the roads being rendered impassable by four months continued rains. The tempestuous weather at sea, and b the Turkish cruizers, prevented any supplies arriving by shipping; so that the city in a few months was reduced to the utmost distress, which provoked the populace to mutiny, and to threaten a general insurrection. One of the councellors, in order to pacify the mob, persuaded the cardinal to go through the city to comfort the people; but he no sooner appeared than he was insulted by the populace, who, notwithstanding his German guards, threw a shower of stones at his coach, and obliged him to take shelter in the archbish p's palace, till many of the nobility ran to his assistance, and conducted him back in safety to his palace.

His unhappy government.

THESE disorders were increased by stopping the currency of the coin called Zannette, which, by the covetousness of the money-clippers, was now reduced to one fourth of the c just value. As this money was refused in all payments, the viceroy caused it to be cried down; but at the same time, not being able, on account of the scarcity of silver, to coin a new species of money as he proposed, the nation was filled with commotions, and the Neapolitans again insulted him; and one of the mob threw a loaf of bread into his coach, desiring them to see what kind of bread he made them eat. The cardinal neglecting to punish the rioters, the mob soon after again surrounded his coach, calling out Victuals, victuals, my lord; and not receiving a satisfactory answer, assaulted him with stones; so that he was obliged to gallop back to the palace. The viceroy, finding the bad effects of his lenity, resolved at length to punish the seditious, and ordered ten of the most guilty to be broke upon the wheel, and sixteen others to be sent to the gallies, which severity effectually d quelled the tumults. The court of Spain being informed of the tumults in Naples, which were thought in some measure owing to the cardinal's easy and indulgent temper, he was recalled in the second year of his government, and on the 14th of December the duke of Alva arrived at Naples as his successor.

He is recalled. A. D. 1622.

D. ANTONIO Alvarez de Toledo, duke of Alva, in the beginning of his government, applied himself to redress the grievances occasioned by the stoppage of the currency of the Zannette, whereby some banks in the city, and many private citizens, had been ruined. He formed a board of ministers for restoring plenty and commerce in the kingdom, and by their advice laid a new tax upon all wine sold in the city in hogsheads or butts, which was farmed out at 90,000 ducats yearly. This revenue was assigned to the creditors of e the banks as a third part of their credit, and another third was paid them in new coined money. The interest of money likewise being lowered, there was a little respite from troubles, and commerce began to revive. However, the exhausted condition of Spain, and the ambition, profuseness, and bad œconomy of the ministers of that kingdom, rendered the following years of the duke's government full of troubles. On account of a dispute about the Valteline betwixt Spain and France, and of a war betwixt the Genoese and the duke of Savoy, the duke was obliged to send out of the kingdom supplies both of men and money: so that to raise men he was forced to grant a pardon to all outlaws and banditti who would inlist in the service; and to furnish subsidies, he imposed a tax of two carlini upon each family, and of five shillings in the pound upon the estates of foreigners, besides f appropriating the revenue assigned for the payment of the king's creditors. The duke likewise, being obliged not only to support the wars in Italy, but also to send men and money to Flanders, obtained a donative from the city of Naples of 150,000 ducats. The kingdom, at the same time, was again afflicted with a dearth, and threatened with the plague, which raged in Sicily. The coasts were also infested by the Turks, who seized several ships, and attacked the town of Sperlonga near Gaeta, and the castle of Abate, and the tower of Licasa. To complete the nation's misfortunes, in the fourth year of the duke's government a terrible earthquake was felt in Naples, and many other parts of the kingdom. A few weeks after, in the month of April, another yet more terrible was felt in Calabria, which did great damage to Catanzaro, Girifalco, and other cities. These, however, were only fore- g runners of one still more violent, which the following year afflicted Puglia, where it overthrew many cities, and made so great a slaughter of the inhabitants, that, there not being room to bury them, to prevent the air from being infected their bodies were burnt.

The duke of Alva arrives as viceroy.

The nation oppressed to support the Spanish wars.

IN

In the midſt of all theſe troubles, the magnanimity and generoſity of the duke appeared upon all the occaſions that offered during his government. He encountered all difficulties with conſtancy and courage, and applied himſelf with unwearied application to the affairs of government. He beautified Naples with ſeveral new public edifices, and, for the conveniency of travelling, cauſed ſeveral bridges to be built in different parts of the kingdom. The nation is chiefly indebted to him for cauſing the regent Carlo Tappia to draw up a ſtate of the whole revenue, wherein he regulated the ſum each corporation was to ſpend yearly in the public ſervice, which in a great meaſure prevented the managers from embezzling the public money. While the duke was thus governing the kingdom with general applauſe, he received the diſagreeable news that the duke of Alcala was appointed his ſucceſſor. That he might put off the time of his arrival as long as poſſible, he neglected to ſend the gallies to Barcelona; ſo that Alcala, after being obliged to pledge his plate for his ſubſiſtence, was forced to embark on board a Malteſe galley, and on the 26th of July landed unexpectedly at Poſilipo, where he continued for ſome weeks. Alva, in the mean time, remitted all the old debts that were owing to the exchequer, and obtained a donative of 1,200,000 ducats from the parliament, which he then diſſolved. Having likewiſe obtained a free gift for himſelf of 75,000 ducats, on the 16th of Auguſt he embarked for Spain, leaving behind him the character of a juſt, good, and prudent viceroy.

Alva is recalled.

A. D. 1629.

He is ſucceeded by the duke of Alcala;

NOTWITHSTANDING the wiſe government of Alva, the duke of Alcala upon his arrival found the kingdom in a moſt wretched ſtate. Philip IV. being wholly guided by his favourite the count of Olivares, whom he had created a duke, exhauſted Naples for ſupporting his wars in Lombardy, which, according to Giannone, occaſioned more miſchief to the kingdom than if a war had been carried on in the very heart of it. The forces of the nation being employed abroad, the banditti began again to plunder the provinces, and even to attack the walled towns, while the Turks, with little or no oppoſition, infeſted the coaſts, and carried off captives and booty. Notwithſtanding the poverty and diſtreſſes of the kingdom, the Spaniſh miniſter ſtill made new demands upon the viceroy both of men and money. The duke accordingly ſent ſeveral thouſand men to Lombardy; and, to raiſe the money wanted, ſuſpended the payment of the ſums to the king's creditors, and aſked a general voluntary contribution, which was regulated in ſuch a manner, that no perſon was to give above one thouſand ducats, and none leſs than ten; ſo that the nobility, barons, and even the advocates and clerks were obliged to empty their purſes into the viceroy's hands. Theſe reſources not being ſufficient, it was reſolved to ſell the cities and lands belonging to the crown, and to incroach upon the regalia, which increaſed the diſorders of the kingdom. The cities diſpoſed of, accuſtomed to be the kings inmmediate vaſſals, refuſed to ſubmit to the new purchaſers, whoſe dominion they dreaded. The inhabitants of Amantea and Taverna ſhut their gates againſt their new lords; and having entered an action at law, by refunding the price were continued in the king's domains. The kingdom was ſo impoveriſhed, that the following year the viceroy with the greateſt difficulty could maintain the infanta Mary with her retinue for four months, who paſſed through the kingdom on her way to her huſband, Ferdinand of Auſtria. The viceroy, in the mean time, was obliged to fit out eight gallies to guard the coaſts from the Turkiſh incurſions, and to ſend ſome troops againſt the banditti, who infeſted ſeveral parts of the kingdom.

Great diſtreſs and conſternation in Naples.

As the nation was ſtruck with a panic on account of another earthquake, and a report that prevailed, that ſeveral profligate wretches were travelling up and down Italy, and ſpreading an artificial peſtilence by poiſoning the water in the churches and ſtreets, the duke prohibited all perſons from entering the kingdom without bills of health, and kept a ſtrict guard upon the confines. The plague at this time actually raged in Lombardy, and even broke out in the borders of the kingdom, and in Milan. Some villains being condemned for poiſoning the waters, the people were ſo diſtracted that every thing went to wreck. The advocates refuſed to undergo the examination appointed by the king, and deſerted the courts, while the judges decided cauſes without any pleading, in favour of that party who gave them the largeſt bribe. The royal juriſdiction was likewiſe trampled upon by the eccleſiaſtics, whoſe incroachments were but weakly oppoſed by the viceroy. The duke of Alva in the mean time, having made many complaints againſt Alcala at the court of Spain, Olivares ordered him to come to Spain to anſwer to the charges againſt him, giving him hopes, however, of returning to Naples. He accordingly, on the 13th of May, ſet out for Spain, leaving the government to the count of Monterey, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Rome, who had arrived at Naples a few weeks before.

Alcala is recalled.

A. D. 1631.

The count of Monterey appointed viceroy.

D. EMANUEL de Guzman, count of Monterey, had procured the viceroyalty of Naples by his intereſt with Olivares, who was doubly related to him, and recalled Alcala, not on account of any real mal-adminiſtration, but to make room for his kinſman. The beginning of the count's government was very calamitous, occaſioned by a moſt terrible eruption of a of Mount Veſuvius, which began on the night of the 15th of December. The mountain vomited flames, aſhes, and ſtones, with ſo great violence, that many houſes in Naples were thrown down, and the whole city was threatened to be buried under the fragments of the eruption. The ſtones were carried to the diſtance of 100 miles, and from one ſide of the mountain an immenſe quantity of burning bitumen iſſued out, which ſeparated into ſeven currents, and run to the ſea, where it continued burning twelve days. From the other ſide of the mountain a torrent of hot water burſt forth, which overflowed many places in the neighbourhood. The ſea likewiſe was driven back, and for ſome time left the ſhips ſtranded upon the ſhore. About two months after the Neapolitans were again terrified by a ſecond eruption, which continued for ſeveral days [k].

b To theſe natural calamities were added others ſtill more diſtreſſing for the nation. As the Spaniards, notwithſtanding a continued run of bad fortune which attended their arms, nevertheleſs protracted their wars in Italy and Flanders with a haughty perſeverance, the Neapolitans were ſtill oppreſſed to furniſh ſubſidies and recruits, which were alſo demanded on account of the diſturbances in Catalonia and Germany. The viceroy likewiſe, in the third and fourth years of his government, was obliged to fit out ten large ſhips, and to ſend great numbers of troops to the Milaneſe, which was threatened with an invaſion from the French. The following year, a rumour prevailing, that the French held a private correſpondence with one of the chiefs of the banditti, and intended to invade the kingdom in different places, the viceroy was put to great expence in fortifying Barletta, Tarento, Gaeta, c and other cities; in furniſhing all the maritime places with garriſons; and fitting out thirty ſhips and ten tartans. But finding that the French intended only by falſe alarms to prevent him from ſending ſuccours to Milan, he immediately haſtened the reinforcements thither, ſending 1000 horſe by land, and ſeven regiments by ſea. During his government, it was found, that no leſs than 8000 horſe and 54,000 foot had been raiſed for foreign wars, and that 3,500,000 crowns had been ſent out of the kingdom in ſubſidies; other great ſums beſides being required for the expences of the kingdom; ſo that the viceroy was obliged to impoſe new taxes upon meal, fleſh, and oil, and frequently to ſeize the revenues of foreigners. The revenues of the city of Naples being alſo burthened with a debt of fifteen millions, the Neapolitans at length ſent the biſhop of Volturara to the court of Spain to beg d a redreſs of their grievances; but the preſſing neceſſities of the ſtate rendered his repreſentations ineffectual. Soon after, the count, after he had governed with great prudence ſix years, was recalled to Spain, for which kingdom he embarked on the 12th of November.

The Neapolitans greatly oppreſſed.

Monterey returns to Spain. A. D. 1637.

MONTEREY was ſucceeded in the government by D. Ramiro Guzman, duke of Medina de las Torres, who had been raiſed from a gentleman to that dignity by Olivares, whoſe daughter he had formerly married. Though the daughter of Olivares had died without iſſue, yet the miniſter being ſtill fond of promoting the duke, he procured him a ſecond match with a very rich Neapolitan heireſs, by promiſing him the office of viceroy. The marriage was accordingly celebrated at Naples; but the court of Spain, judging it neceſſary that Monterey ſhould continue ſomewhat longer in the government, the duke was obliged to e live in the kingom ſeveral months in a private character, to the great diſcontent of the young ducheſs and her relations, who openly complaining againſt Olivares, at length obtained the gratification of their deſires. As the court of Spain, on account of their ill-managed wars, were ſtill making new demands of ſubſidies from Naples, the duke was obliged to impoſe new taxes upon ſilks, ſalt, oil, corn, fleſh, and ſalted proviſions; as alſo upon lime, playing cards, gold and ſilver thread, upon contracts for money, and upon ſtamped paper. It was likewiſe propoſed to lay a ſmall duty upon every inhabitant of the city of Naples. This propoſal, however, was dropt; but the merchants were obliged to pay 200,000 ducats, and all the villages about Naples, Nola, and other cities belonging to the king's domains, that could not buy themſelves off, were ſold to the barons. A donative of a million of ducats f was likewiſe extorted from the baronage of the kingdom in parliament.

He is ſucceeded by the duke of Medina;

who is obliged to impoſe new taxes.

The nation, at the ſame time, was again afflicted with a moſt terrible earthquake, which, on the 27th of March, deſtroyed a great many cities in Calabria. Coſenza, Caſtiglione, Nicaſtro, and many other cities, and a great number of villages, were almoſt intirely reduced to ruins, and above 10,000 people were killed. The general conſternation and diſtreſs were greatly augmented by an impoſtor, named Pietro Paolo Saſſanio, who publiſhed everywhere that greater earthquakes were ſoon to happen, not only in Calabria, but throughout the whole world, as the day of judgment was near at hand; that the ſea was to break its banks, and overflow the fields and cities; that the heavens were to rain down hailſtones of five pounds weight each; and that the mountains were to vomit out flames. than other places, deſerted their native country, which the viceroy being informed of, he immediately apprehended Saſſanio, and condemned him to the gallies. a

The French threaten to invade Naples. A. D. 1640.

THE Turks, in the mean time, renewed their uſual depredations with a fleet of ſixteen gallies; and after doing a great deal of damage to the coaſts, ſailed up the Adriatic with the intention of attacking Loretto, but were prevented by the Venetians [1]. The French likewiſe, who now began to counterbalance the power of the Spaniards in Italy, had entered into a correſpondence with ſome malcontents, and formed a deſign of ſurprizing the city of Naples. The conſpiracy, however, being diſcovered, one of the nobles who had concerted the ſcheme with the French, was ſeized at Rome; and, being brought to Naples, was beheaded in the market place. Though the conſpiracy had failed, yet the French, in hopes of being joined by the diſaffected, the following year arrived with a fleet of thirty-four men of war off Gaeta. Being repulſed by the cannon of the caſtle, they proceeded to the gulph of Naples, and made ſeveral attempts to land; but by the precautions of the viceroy, and the vigilance of the inhabitants, their endeavours were fruſtrated; eſpecially as their motions were watched by eighteen gallies under the command of D. Melchior de Borgia. b

THE French were more ſucceſsful in Catalonia, where, by their emiſſaries, they provoked the people, who were moſt grievouſly oppreſſed by Olivares, to revolt from the Spaniſh government, to kill the viceroy, and to ſeize the places of ſtrength throughout the province. While the Spaniſh court were alarmed with this formidable inſurrection, and making preparations to reduce Catalonia, news arrived at Madrid that the Portugueſe had likewiſe revolted, and declared the duke of Braganza king, by the name of John IV. The revolution in Portugal was ſo general, and ſo quickly eſtabliſhed on a regular plan, that Olivares diſpaired of reuniting that kingdom to Spain, but bent his chief efforts againſt the Catalans, who, having put themſelves under the protection of the French, maintained a long war againſt the Caſtilians. On account of this war freſh troops were raiſed in Naples, new ſhips were fitted out, and a donative extorted by the viceroy, who was therefore obliged to oppreſs the ſubjects and corporations with new taxes and impoſitions. c

TROOPS likewiſe were ſtill demanded for the Milaneſe; and a war having broke out betwixt Urban VIII. and the duke of Parma, about the duchy of Caſtro, the pope made a demand from the viceroy of 900 horſe ſtipulated in the bull of inveſtiture. The duke alleging that the war did not concern the church, but the pope's own family, refuſed the requeſt of Urban; but was obliged, nevertheleſs, at the expence of the kingdom, to garriſon ſome places which were held by the Spaniards in Tuſcany. At the ſame time, the commerce of the kingdom being greatly interrupted by the banditti, and the regular troops not being ſufficient for ſuppreſſing them, the duke ſent the prince of Torello into Campania, with the title of lieutenant-general, to curb their inſolence. During theſe tranſactions, Olivares being diſgraced at the court of Spain, and the adminiſtration of the government committed to his enemy and nephew D. Lewis de Haro, the new miniſter, to gratify the admiral of Caſtile, who was then viceroy of Sicily, and might have pretenſions to become his rival at home, appointed him ſucceſſor to Medina. The admiral accordingly arriving at Naples on the 6th of May, Medina retired to his country-houſe at Portici, till the gallies were fitted out for carrying him to Spain. He held the government about ſix years and a half, during which time he adorned the city and kingdom with ſeveral public works, left about fifty moſt excellent laws, and erected two new tribunals in the provinces of the further Abruzzo and Baſilicata. d

D. JUAN Alphonſo Enriquez, admiral of Caſtile, like his predeceſſors, was immediately perplexed by the demands of the court of Spain for ſupplies of men and money. He was not only obliged to ſend troops to Catalonia, but likewiſe to Malta, which iſland was threatened with an invaſion from the Turks, who this year appeared in ſight of Otranto with a fleet of forty-ſix gallies, pillaged Rocca Imperiale, and carried off 200 captives. The admiral was alſo forced to demand a donative of a million, and, as the only means of raiſing the money, laid a tax upon all the rented houſes of the city of Naples. The collection of this tax occaſioning great diſturbances, which threatened a general inſurrection, the viceroy wiſely ordered the collectors to deſiſt, on which account he was ſeverely reprimanded by the court of Spain, who, blaming his timidity, commanded him without delay to raiſe the tax. The admiral, however, knowing the diſpoſition of the kingdom, with great prudence continued firm in his reſolution of ſuſpending the collection; declaring, that he intended to ſerve, and not to betray, his king; and wrote to Madrid, begging to be removed from the government, that he might not be obliged to carry matters to extremities. As he renewed his requeſt with great earneſtneſs, the Spaniſh miniſtry appointed the duke of Arcos, a bold and reſolute man, as his ſucceſſor; and ordered him to proceed to Rome to do homage, in the king's name, to the new pope Innocent X. The admiral accordingly, about the middle of April, f and ſucceeded by the duke of Arcos.

Don Rodrigo Ponce de Leon, duke of Arcos, made his entry into Naples, and aſſumed the government of the kingdom, a few weeks before the departure of the admiral. According to a modern author, he was of a rapacious diſpoſition; and, though poſſeſſed of an immenſe eſtate in Spain, had accepted of the government of Naples chiefly with the view of enlarging his fortune. Being filled with a preſumptuous opinion of the grandeur of the Spaniſh monarchy, he diſcovered a ſovereign contempt for the Neapolitans; and fomented the diviſion between the nobles and the people, in hopes of governing both with greater eaſe [m]. At his b firſt arrival, he declined oppoſing any new taxes; but, being obliged to raiſe money, he appointed two boards to extract the arrears of the donatives that had been granted to the king. As the French, under pretence of aſſiſting the nephews of the late pope againſt Innocent, threatened to invade Tuſcany with a powerful fleet, and ſoon after actually appeared on the coaſt with ten gallies, thirty-five men of war, and ſeventy tranſports, on board of which were 6000 foot and 600 horſe, the viceroy was obliged to ſend ſeveral reinforcements to the Spaniſh garriſons in that part of Italy; ſome of which, nevertheleſs, were forced to ſurrender to the French, who, though they were defeated by the Spaniards at ſea, yet in the end of the year made themſelves maſters of the important harbour of Portolongone.

The kingdom diſtreſſed to oppoſe the French in Italy.

These new acquiſitions of the French alarmed the viceroy, who immediately gave out c commiſſions for raiſing 12,000 men, 5000 of whom to be Germans, ordered the moſt wealthy citizens of Gaeta to fortify their city at their own expences, and ſummoned the militia of the kingdom to come to Naples, who refuſed to comply with his command. The French, in the mean time, having fitted out five men of war and two ſmall fireſhips at Portolongone and Piombino, on the 1ſt of April, appeared in the gulph of Naples, and took ſeveral ſhips in ſight of the city. But the Neapolitans, embarking on board thirteen men of war and twelve gallies then in the harbour, quickly drove them from the coaſts. A few weeks after, however, the city was greatly alarmed by the accidental or malicious burning of the Spaniſh admiral's ſhip in the night-time, by which 300,000 ducats, which were going to Spain, were loſt, and 400 ſoldiers periſhed. The viceroy, ſuſpecting that the loſs of the ſhip was owing d to the duke of Matalone, who was known to have an averſion for the Spaniards, ordered him to be impriſoned in Caſtel Nuovo. The duke was one of the moſt powerful nobles in the kingdom, being in poſſeſſion of ten duchies, ſix principalities, and a great number of large fiefs. He was beloved by the people on account of his known averſion to the Spaniards, and was of a haughty diſpoſition and enterprizing ſpirit; therefore the viceroy thought by impriſoning him he would prevent any tumults which the diſpoſition of the people ſeemed to threaten.

The Neapolitans threaten to mutiny on account of a new duty on fruit.

The duke, in the beginning of his government, had obtained from the parliament a donative of a million; but, in order to make it ready money, he impoſed a duty upon fruit, which he aſſigned to ſome merchants who advanced the ſum. This duty the common peo- e ple looked upon as the hardeſt oppreſſion, the chief part of their ſubſiſtence, during the hot ſummer months, being fruit, which in the kingdom of Naples is very plentiful and delicious. The edict for collecting the new duty was no ſooner publiſhed in the beginning of January, than the people began to murmur in a tumultuous manner; and when the viceroy came abroad, ſurrounded his coach, bawling to have their grievances redreſſed. They were encouraged in their ſedition by the news that the citizens of Palermo, on account of new duties, had openly revolted. The viceroy therefore, apprehenſive of greater diſorders in Naples, deſired the Seggi to deliberate about taking off the duty, and impoſing another leſs grievous; but ſuch difficulties occurred, that they could come to no determination; and thoſe who had farmed the duty bribing ſome of the viceroy's favourites, he was fatally per- f ſuaded by them to defer the abolition of the tax. The indignation of the people, who ſuſpected ſuch an intention, greatly increaſed; eſpecially as they were privately excited by ſeveral malcontents, among the chief of whom was Guilio Genuino the elect, now in prieſt's orders, and in the 80~~th~~ year of his age, who, in reſentment for his long ſufferings for his behaviour under the adminiſtration of Oſſuna, had been wiſhing for an opportunity of vengeance againſt the Spaniards. The farmers of the revenue, and all thoſe concerned in raiſing the taxes, had incurred the hatred and deteſtation of the people, particularly of Tommaſo Aniello, commonly called Maſſaniello, of Amalfi, a fiſherman, whoſe wife, having been diſcovered in ſmuggling a ſmall quantity of meal, was impriſoned, and condemned to pay a fine of 100 ducats.

g MASSANIELLO, a few years before, had come to Naples from Amalfi, where his father had been a fiſherman. At this time he was about twenty-four years of age, and the father for his boldneſs, activity, and integrity; and had a great influence with his companions, by whom he was beloved and eſteemed. As he was obliged even to ſell his furniture to pay the heavy fine, he had conceived an implacable hatred againſt the farmers of the taxes, and was alſo moved with compaſſion for the miſerable ſtate of the city and kingdom. He therefore formed a deſign, with ſome of his companions, to raiſe a tumult in the market-place on the feſtival day of the Carmelites, uſually celebrated about the middle of July, when between five and 600 youths entertain the people by a mock-fight; one half of them, in the character of Turks, defending a wooden caſtle, which is attacked and ſtormed by the other half in the character of Chriſtians. Maſſaniello being appointed captain of one of theſe parties, and one Pione, who was privy to his deſign, commanding the other, b for ſeveral weeks before the feſtival they were very diligent in reviewing and training their followers, who were armed with ſticks and reeds: but a ſmall and unforeſeen accident tempted them to begin their enterprize without waiting for the feſtival.

On the 7th of July a diſturbance happening in the market-place betwixt the tax-gatherers and ſome gardeners of Pozzuolo, who had brought ſome figs into the city, whether the buyer or ſeller ſhould pay the duty, after the tumult had continued ſeveral hours, Maſſaniello, who was preſent with his company, excited the mob to pillage the office built in the market for receiving the duty, and to drive away the officers with ſtones. The elect of the people, who, by deciding againſt the gardeners, had increaſed the tumult, run to the palace, and informed the viceroy, who moſt imprudently neglected all means of putting a ſtop c to the commotion. Maſſaniello, in the mean time, being joined by great numbers of people, ordered his young troop to ſet fire to all the offices for the taxes through the city; which command being executed with diſpatch, he then conducted them directly to the palace, where the viceroy, inſtead of ordering his Spaniſh and German guards to diſperſe them, encouraged their inſolence by timidly granting their demands. As they ruſhed into the palace in a furious manner, he eſcaped by a private door, and endeavoured to ſave himſelf in Caſtel del Ovo; but being overtaken by the rioters in the ſtreets, he was trampled upon by them, and pulled by the hair and whiskers. However, by throwing ſome handfuls of gold among them, he again eſcaped, and took ſanctuary in a convent of Minims, where, being joined by the archbiſhop of Naples, cardinal Filomarini, and ſeveral nobles, by their d advice he ſigned a billet, by which he aboliſhed all taxes upon proviſions. As a means to quell the tumult, he likewiſe deſired the cardinal to offer Maſſaniello a penſion of 2400 crowns, who generouſly rejected the bribe; and declared, that, if the viceroy would keep his word, he would find them obedient ſubjects.

Maſſaniello becomes abſolute maſter of the whole city,
It was now expected that the tumult would ceaſe; but Maſſaniello, upon his return to the market-place, being joined by ſeveral malcontents, among whom were Genuino, and one Peronne, who had formerly been a captain of the Sbirri, he was adviſed by them to order the houſes of all thoſe concerned in raiſing the tax to be burned, which were accordingly in a few days reduced to aſhes, with all their rich furniture[n]. Maſſaniello being now abſolute maſter of the whole city, and being joined by great numbers of people of deſperate fortunes, e he required the viceroy, who had retired to the Caſtel Nuovo, to aboliſh all the taxes, and ſtrikes a terror into the nobility; to deliver up the writ of exemption granted by Charles V. This new demand greatly embarraſſed the viceroy; but, to appeaſe the people, he drew up a falſe deed in letters of gold, and ſent it to them by their favourite the duke of Matalone, whom he now ſet at liberty. The fraud, however, being diſcovered, the duke was pulled from his horſe and maltreated by the mob, and at length committed as a priſoner to Peronne. This accident, to the great joy of the viceroy, enraged the people againſt the nobility, ſeveral of whom they killed, burnt the houſes of others, and threatened to extirpate them all. Maſſaniello, in the mean time, tattered and half naked, commanded his followers, who were now well armed, and were reckoned about 100,000 men, with a moſt abſolute ſway. He eat and ſlept little, f gave his orders with great preciſion and judgment, appeared full of moderation, without ambition, and intereſted views. But the duke of Matalone having procured his liberty by bribing Peronne, the viceroy imitated his example, and ſecretly corrupted Genuino to betray his chief. A conſpiracy was accordingly formed againſt Maſſaniello by Matalone and Peronne, the duke, who was equally exaſperated againſt the viceroy, propoſing, that after his death his brother D. Joſeph ſhould head the rebels.

MASSANIELLO, in the mean time, by means of the cardinal archbiſhop, was negotiating a general peace and accommodation; but while both parties were aſſembling in the convent of the Carmelites, the banditti hired by Matalone made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Maſſaniello's life. His followers immediately killed 150 of them. Peronne and D. Joſeph, g being diſcovered to be concerned in the conſpiracy, were likewiſe put to death, and the a duke with great difficulty escaped. Massaniello by this conspiracy was rendered more suspicious and severe. He began to abuse his power by putting several persons to death upon slight pretences; and to force the viceroy to an accommodation, he cut off all communication with the castles, which were unprovided with provision and ammunition. The viceroy likewise, being afraid lest the French should take advantage of the commotion, earnestly desired to agree to a treaty, which was accordingly concluded, on the fifth day of the insurrection, by the mediation of the archbishop. By the treaty, it was stipulated, that all duties, imposed since the time of Charles V. should be abolished; and that the writ of exemption granted by that emperor should be delivered to the people; that, for the future, no new taxes should be imposed; that the vote of the elect of the people should be equal to the b votes of the nobility; that an act of oblivion should be granted for all that was past; and that the people should continue in arms under Massaniello, till the ratification of the treaty by the king °.

By this treaty no less than 10,000 persons, who fattened upon the blood of the public, were ruined. The people, when it was solemnly published, manifested an extreme joy, believing they had now recovered all their antient rights and privileges. Massaniello, at the desire of the viceroy, went to the palace to visit him, accompanied by the archbishop, who was obliged to threaten him with excommunication, before he would consent to lay aside his rags, and assume a magnificent dress. He was received by the duke with the greatest demonstrations of respect and friendship, while the duchess entertained his wife, and presented c her with a robe of cloth of silver, and some jewels. The viceroy, to preserve some shadow of authority, appointed him captain-general, and at his departure made him a present of a golden chain of great value, which with great difficulty he was prevailed upon to accept; but yielded at length to the intreaties of the cardinal. Next day, in consequence of the commission granted him by the viceroy, he began to exercise all the functions of sovereign authority; and having caused a scaffold to be erected in one of the streets, and several gibbets, he judged all crimes, whether civil or military, in the last resort, and ordered the guilty to be immediately put to death, which was the punishment he assigned to all offences. Though he neglected all forms of law, and even frequently judged by physiognomy, yet he is said not to have overlooked any criminal, or punished any innocent person.

Massaniello still retains his absolute authority.

d His grandeur and prosperity was of very short continuance: for his mind becoming distracted and delirious for two or three days, he committed a great many mad and extravagant actions, and on the 18th of July was assassinated with the consent of the viceroy. Some attribute his madness to the sudden change of his fortune, and his excessive joy for restoring the liberty of his country; others to the want of rest, and too much wine; and some allege, that it was the effect of poison, secretly administered to him by the Spaniards. As the populace carried his head upon a pole, and treated his body with the greatest indignity, the viceroy expected that peace and tranquillity would be immediately restored; but the people being still in arms under several chiefs, who commanded in different quarters, and were jealous of each other, he had no authority in the city, where anarchy immediately e prevailed. The weight of bread being imprudently lessened, the people a few days after began to regret the death of Massaniello; and having taken his body from the common sewer, and joined the head to it, they carried the corpse in procession through all the quarters of the city, and buried it with solemn and royal funeral ceremonies P. The populace then continued for three or four weeks in quiet suspence, waiting for the orders from Spain; but one of those who had his house burned claiming to be indemnified for his losses, and the viceroy refusing to deliver up Genuino, who had encouraged him, and had fled to the castle, the people again ran to arms with greater fury than before, and immediately seized several posts, commanding the harbour and straitening the castles. They continued their hostilities for two days with great vigour, and on the 23d of August chose for their chief the prince f of Massa, one of the most wealthy nobles of the kingdom, who had acquired a great reputation in the war of Catalonia. He accepted of the command with great regret, and immediately entered into a secret correspondence with the viceroy, whom, at the same time, he was besieging in Castel Nuovo.

He is assassinated.

The commotion still continues.

During these transactions in Naples, the Spaniards had been expelled from Salerno, Cava, Sanseverino, and several other cities, by the people, who, upon the news of the insurrection of Messaniello, had taken arms in all the provinces of the kingdom, and revenged themselves upon the Spaniards and the nobility, who had long governed them with a rod of iron. This general insurrection being the subject of discourse at Rome, the duke of Guise, who happened at this time to be at the pope's court, was encouraged by Innocent to offer his service to g the Neapolitans against the Spaniards. The duke was prompted by his ambition to engage in the enterprize, eſpicially as he had ſome diſtant pretenſions to the crown. He accordingly ſent two Italians to Naples, deſiring the Neapolitans to form themſelves into a republic, and offering himſelf as their chief. The viceroy, who dreaded his arrival, eſpecially as he ſaw the whole kingdom in arms, and was informed that the French were fitting out a formidable fleet at Toulon, by the mediation of the archbiſhop, on the 7th of September, concluded another accommodation, more diſgraceful than the former. The people, now weary of commotion, reſumed their former occuparions with great eagerneſs, treated the Spaniards with kindneſs, and even deſtroyed all their works and retrenchm nts they had formed againſt the caſtles, being credulous enough to believe that the king would ratify a treaty that entirely deprived him of the ſovereignty of the kingdom. a

The viceroy condeſcends to a more diſgraceful treaty.

ABOUT three weeks after, the Spaniſh fleet at length arrived in the bay of Naples, conſiſting of forty ſhips of war, twenty-two gallies, and ſome other veſſels, under the command of the king's natural ſon Don John of Auſtria, a youth of eighteen years of age, extremely handſome, of a courteous behaviour, and ripe judgment. The fleet was but ill provided with ammunition, and had but 4000, or, according to ſome, 5000 troops on board; yet it was looked upon by the Spaniards as the bulwark of their monarchy, being deſigned as a bridle upon the two wavering kingdoms, and to recover Portolongone and Piombino from the French. The prince accordingly had character of vicar-general in Italy [q]. The prince was inclined to uſe clemency; but the viceroy, thinking his revenge would be thereby fruſtrated, fatally perſuaded him to inſiſt that the people ſhould lay down their arms before his entry into Naples, hoping by this means to give ſome foundation for renewing hoſtilities, when he would be able to reduce the revolters by force. The duke likewiſe employed his emiſſaries in Naples to perſuade the people that D. John wanted to ſurprize them, and had a deſign to deſtroy their city. The people accordingly inſiſting to capitulate upon even terms, by the advice of the viceroy it was agreed that 3000 troops ſhould be landed from the fleet, which with thoſe in the town and caſtles, would make a body of 11,000 men; and that a general aſſault ſhould be given to the city in different quarters, which at the ſame time ſhould be cannonaded from the caſtles and fleet. Next day, being the 5th of October, this perfidious reſolution was executed in a cruel manner, the Spaniards attacking the poſts of the revolters with great fury, and putting to death the men, women, and children, without diſtinction, while the artillery thundered from the ſhips and caſtles, and ſet fire to the city in ſeveral places. The people recovering from their firſt conſternation, were animated with rage, and in their turn attacked the Spaniards, whom they repulſed with great loſs. b c d

D. JOHN and the viceroy were confounded with the bad ſucceſs of their enterprize; but deſpairing now of any accommodation, next day they renewed the attack. Hoſtilities were continued ſeveral days with little interruption; but nothing ſucceeded with the viceroy; and the people becoming more exaſperated, openly revolted from the Spaniards; ordering, that none, under pain of death, ſhould propoſe an accommodation with them. They rejected with diſdain the offer of a truce made them by the prince and the viceroy; and publiſhed a manifeſto, recapitulating all their grievances, and requeſting the aſſiſtance of all Chriſtian princes. A few weeks after they cruelly put the prince of Maſſa, their general, to death, pretending to diſcover his private intelligence with the viceroy. The prince had from the beginning been ſecretly in the intereſt of the Spaniards, and hoped, by retarding and fruſtrating the military operations, to prevail with the people to return to their obedience; but his deſigns having been for ſome time ſuſpected by the chiefs of the revolters, they ordered his head to be ſtruck off, without, however, having any proofs of his intentions [r]. e

The people renounce their allegiance to Spain.

UPON the death of Maſſa, the chief command was conferred on Januarius Anneſe, a gunſmith, who was very inſtrumental in procuring the death of his predeceſſor. He was a man full of artifice and deceit, brutal and covetous; and, having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity in the beginning of the revolt, and his hatred to the Spaniards, had obtained the command of one of the chief poſts, which, rouſing his ambition, made him ſtill more vigilant in the common cauſe. He was at firſt very induſtrious in eſtabliſhing himſelf in his new dignity; but being wholly illiterate, and exerciſing his ſovereign power with great confuſion, vanity, and avarice, his government was quickly deteſted. The people, who began to feel the want of proviſions, openly murmured; and, having formed themſelves into a republic, ſent a deputation to the duke of Guiſe at Rome, offering him the ſame authority and rank among them that the prince of Orange enjoyed in Holland. The duke accordingly, after having ſurmounted many difficulties, arrived at Naples on the 15th of November, in a ſmall felucca, which held only about ſix perſons, and having been obliged to ſeparate from thirteen other feluccas, to avoid the Spaniards, who purſued him. Upon his arrival, the Neapolitans expreſſed a moſt extravagant joy; and two days after the ſupreme f g a command was conferred upon him, with great ſolemnity, in the cathedral church, where he took the oath of fidelity to the people, and received a bleſſed ſword from the archbiſhop.

THE duke was not a week in Naples before he found himſelf greatly embarraſſed. He obſerved, that the greateſt part of the citizens of any credit continued neutral, or rather privately favoured the Spaniards; and that there were not above 5000 troops regimented, though many thouſands occaſionally took arms; he himſelf had no money; his collegue Anneſe was in ſome meaſure his rival, and privately thwarted his deſigns, and he found it impracticable to reconcile the people and the nobility, which laſt he was very earneſt to render his friends, being ſenſible that it was otherwiſe impoſſible for him to ſucceed in his ambi-
b tious views[s]. The duke, however, having prevailed on Anneſe to grant him 100,000 crowns, raiſed about 1000 more troops, and commenced hoſtilities againſt the Spaniards, but with ſmall ſucceſs. As the city was greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, he was obliged, about the middle of December, to march out with 4000 foot and 600 hundred horſe, to open the communication with the country. He took the route of Averſa, where there was a body of 6000 nobles, who had aſſembled in their own defence, but had refuſed to co-operate with the Spaniards. He was in hopes of perſuading the nobles to declare for him; but having a conference with the duke of Andria, he ſoon found that his expectations were without foundation.

MEAN while the French fleet, conſiſting of 29 ill-provided men of war and five fire-ſhips, c arriving in the bay of Naples, the duke was flattered with the proſpect of powerful ſuccours. He however, ſuffered a moſt mortifying diſappointment; for Mazarine, jealous of the ſucceſs of his enterprize, addreſſed his diſpatches to Anneſe, as chief of the republic; and the fleet, inſtead of immediately attacking that of the Spaniards, while the half of their crew were on ſhore, lay inactive within cannon-ſhot of the enemy, and, after landing a ſmall quantity of powder and two pieces of artillery, continued about three weeks on the coaſt, and then returned to Toulon, having only taken a few merchant ſhips, and had ſome ſmall skirmiſhes with the enemy. The principal advantage the duke gained by their arrival was a confirmation of the chief command of the republic for ſeven years, Anneſe having been forced to reſign his ſhare in the ſupreme authority, in conſideration of a yearly reved nue of 50,000 crowns, and a land eſtate, with the title of duchy or principality, upon the concluſion of the war. The week following the baron of Modena, who commanded the army againſt the nobles, by a ſtratagem prevailed upon them to evacuate Averſa, which city he immediately took poſſeſſion of, to the great joy of the Neapolitans, who received from thence a conſiderable ſupply of corn. Their hopes were likewiſe flattered with the news that the army of the nobles was diſperſed, and that in almoſt all the provinces the party of the new republic was ſuperior. Beſides, ſeveral of the nobles began to acknowlege the authority of the duke, who recovered ſome important poſts from the Spaniards, and had even procured ſome ſpies in the collateral council of the regency. Two of the Spaniſh gallies likewiſe declaring for the republic, and news daily arriving of the loſs of the e Spaniards in the provinces, the duke at length eſtabliſhed a magnificent houſhold, ordered the courts of juſtice to be opened, and appointed ſeveral boards for the different branches of the adminiſtration.

THE Spaniards in the mean time ſuffering greatly for want of proviſions, and many of their ſoldiers deſerting, Don John, by one of his confidents, offered the duke the ſovereignty of the marquiſate of Final and principality of Salerno, if he would quit Naples, engaging likewiſe to procure for him from the emperor the inveſtiture of the duchies of Modena and Reggio, and the principalities of Carpi and Correggio. The duke, however, who fondly expected a crown, rejecting theſe offers, the Spaniards endeavoured to renew a treaty for an accommodation, by the mediation of the pope's nuncio; but the Neapolitans abſolutely
f refuſing to have any more concerns with the duke of Arcos, Don John prevailed on the duke to reſign his government. He accordingly left Naples on the 26th of January, when Don John aſſumed the government, and immediately publiſhed an edict, exhorting the people to return to their duty, promiſing them a general indemnity, and many favours. This edict produced little or no effect, which was likewiſe the fate of a manifeſto publiſhed about the ſame time by the nobility, who declared that they were willing to forget all the injuries they had received from the people.

Don John prevails on the duke of Arcos to reſign.

THE duke, in the mean time, being convinced of the enmity of Anneſe, who laid ſeveral ſnares for his life, and thwarted all his meaſures, formed a deſign of aſſaſſinating him, which however proved ineffectual. His revenge againſt Anneſe being fruſtrated, he called g in about 6000 men from the country, and on the 11th of February made a general attack upon the poſts of the Spaniards, but this enterprize likewiſe proved unſucceſsful. Not-withſtanding the difficulties he had to ſtruggle with, and the weakneſs and diſunion of his party, all Italy imagined he was upon the point of being elevated to a throne. The Venetians, Genoeſe, and the Roman princes, ſeemed inclined to court his friendſhip; and the pope, who had an affection for him, and wanted the kingdom of Naples to be independent both of France and Spain, preſſed him to aſſume the title of king of both Sicilies, offering him the inveſtiture of the kingdom, and a loan of 300,000 crowns, and aſſuring him, that he would form a league with the other Italian ſtates in his defence. The duke readily accepted the offer of the money; but alleged to his holineſs, that the time was not yet proper for aſſuming the title of king [t]. Anneſe in the mean time, and ſome other chiefs of the people, continued their deſigns againſt the duke; but failing in one or two attempts, and believing their own lives in danger, as he began to act with great haughtineſs and deſpotiſm, they ſeriouſly entered into a negociation, with Don John for a peace. During theſe tranſactions, the count of Oniate, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Rome, arrived at Naples, as ſucceſſor to the duke of Arcos, the court of Spain having been offended that the collateral council ſhould have arrogated to themſelves the power of removing one viceroy and appointing another, and being jealous leſt Don John ſhould ſeize the opportunity of the preſent diſorders to uſurp the ſovereignty of Naples.

DON Inigo Valez y Taſſis, count of Oniate, entered Caſtel Nuovo on the 1ſt of March, having brought with from Rome a great quantity of proviſions, and 200,000 crowns. His character was very different from that of his predeceſſor, being reputed a man of great prudence and ſtrict honour. He no ſooner entered upon the government, than he viſited all the poſts; and to influence the people to return to their obedience, ordered the monks in Holy Week to inſtil into the minds of their penitents the horrid guilt of rebellion againſt their lawful prince. He likewiſe carried on the correſpondence with Anneſe and the other chiefs, enemies of the duke, who having concluded a ſolemn treaty with him, promiſed to admit the Spaniards into the city. In conſequence of this agreement, he diſpoſed every thing for a general attack, which was accordingly made on Eaſter Monday, the 6th of April, about midnight, when the duke was abſent at Poſilipo, endeavouring to reduce the ſmall iſland of Niſita. The Spaniards, to the number of 3000, being admitted into the city by the gate of Alba, and publiſhing that the duke of Guiſe had joined them, quickly made themſelves maſters of all the poſts, with ſcarce any oppoſition. Very little blood was ſpilt, and in a few hours there was not the leaſt appearance of ſedition, the whole city being reduced. The people, recovering from their firſt conſternation, expreſſed the greateſt tranſports of joy, and embraced the Spaniards with the ardour of long abſent friends. Anneſe having joined the viceroy and Don John, they went in proceſſion to the cathedral church, where they rendered their thanks to God by a ſolemn Te Deum. The duke of Guiſe confounded with the loſs of Naples, which blaſted all his ambitious ſchemes, could not abſtain from tears. Having made ſeveral vain attempts to re-enter the city, he fled with a few followers towards Abruzzo, where the party of the republic was very powerful; but, being purſued by the Spaniſh troops, he was made priſoner, and carried to Gaeta. From thence he was conducted to Spain, where he continued a priſoner four years, but was at laſt ſet at liberty at the intreaty of the prince of Condé, who had joined the Spaniſh faction.

UPON the news of the reduction of Naples, and the impriſonment of the duke of Guiſe, all the provinces of the kingdom immediately ſubmitted, excepting Abruzzo, where the rebels were aſſiſted by ſome French, who had come from Rome; but the barons aſſiſting the viceroy, they were ſoon diſſipated. Notwithſtanding the impriſonment of the duke of Guiſe, Mazarine, ſenſible of his error, in not having given him aſſiſtance, ordered a fleet, which had been for ſome time equipping at Toulon, to ſail to Naples, in hopes of exciting the people to a ſecond inſurrection in favour of prince Thomas of Savoy, whom he intended as a huſband for one of his nieces. The French fleet under the command of prince Thomas, accordingly appeared on the Neapolitan coaſt; but the prince being quickly convinced that his enterprize was impracticable, returned ſoon after to Provence. The viceroy having diſcovered, that Anneſe had received and concealed a letter, relating to this invaſion of prince Thomas, condemned him to death, and cauſed him to be hanged in the middle of the market-place, by which proceeding he believed his authority firmly eſtabliſhed [u]. Tranquility being again reſtored, Don John on the twenty-ſecond of September left Naples, and with the fleet ſailed for Meſſina, to confirm the Sicilians in their former obedience to the king. Upon his departure, the viceroy publiſhed a general pardon, and applied himſelf to re-eſtabliſh the government, ſuch as it was before the revolution; and as all wiſe people agreed that a general exemption from taxes was impoſſible, the Seggi aſſembled and conſented to a tax of forty-two carlini upon each houſe, and to reſtore the half of the duties a that had been taken off, excepting thoſe upon fruit, herbs, and roots, which were never to be again impoſed.

THE count, to fruſtrate as much as poſſible the deſigns of the French in raiſing a ſecond revolt, eſtabliſhed a junto, or board of counſellors, to keep a ſtrict eye over all ſuſpected perſons, and began to puniſh with the utmoſt rigour all thoſe who had any principal ſhare in the late commotions. He charged the chief ringleaders frequently with pretended crimes, and on that account put them to death; which alarming many others, for their own ſecurity they fled the kingdom. As the banditti in the late revolution had all declared themſelves zealous republicans, and had been principally concerned in the diſturbances in the provinces, which they fomented more with the deſign of ſeizing the eſtates of the b barons, than from obedience to the duke of Guiſe, the viceroy formed a reſolution of ridding the kingdom of ſuch an irregular militia. They principally infeſted the two provinces of Abruzzo; but, by the meaſures taken by the viceroy, in a ſhort time they were almoſt entirely extirpated.

ALTHO' the nation was greatly exhauſted, the count likewiſe reſolved to attempt the recovery of the garriſons of Tuſcany; and accordingly ſailed thither in perſon, with a formidable fleet, and in the end of May, after a deſperate attack, made himſelf maſter of Piombino. A few months after, having alſo obliged the French garriſon of Portolongone to ſurrender, he returned to Naples, where continuing his rigour againſt the diſaffected, he began to render himſelf odious to the Neapolitans. On this account 'tis alleged, that the court of Spain c ſent him a ſucceſſor before he had finiſhed the ſixth year of his government. During his adminiſtration, he was very aſſiduous in re-ſettling the government, and in repairing all the public buildings at Naples that had ſuffered any damage in the late commotions.

He is recalled. A. D. 1653.

DON Garcia d'Avellino y Haro, count of Caſtrillo, arrived at Naples, as ſucceſſor to Oniate, on the tenth of November. He was of a mild and indulging temper, and to conciliate the affections of the people, immediately upon his aſſuming the government, ordered two ounces to be added to the weight of the bread. As the war ſtill raged more than ever betwixt the two crowns of Spain and France, the French were now fully perſuaded of the importance of making a diverſion in Naples; and the Neapolitan refugees, who had fled from the rigour of Oniate, urging the great eaſe of renewing the diſturbances, orders were given by Ma- d zarine for fitting out a formidable fleet. He was greatly influenced by the ſollicitations of the duke of Guiſe, who magnified the affection of the Neapolitans for his perſon, and obtained the chief command of the intended expedition. The viceroy being informed of the deſigns of the French, uſed his utmoſt diligence to put the kingdom in a ſtate of defence, by levying new troops, reinforcing the garriſons of Tuſcany, and by ſtrengthening all the places on the coaſt, moſt expoſed to the inſults of the enemy. By theſe precautions, the raſh ambition of the duke of Guiſe was again fruſtrated. The duke appeared on the coaſt on the twelfth of November, with a numerous fleet, on board of which were 7000 ſoldiers and 150 horſe, beſides 200 gentlemen, whom he intended as officers for thoſe he expected would join him. After a ſhort reſiſtance, he made himſelf maſter of Caſtello a Mare: but e before he could extend his conqueſt, he was entirely ſurrounded by the Spaniſh and Neapolitan troops, which obliged him to reimbark his forces, and abandon the place, which he held only a few days. The French, before they went on board, pillaged the houſes of the inhabitants, and robbed the churches of all their furniture and ſacred veſſels, and loading their ſhips with the booty, ſet ſail for Toulon on the tenth of December, when a ſquadron of twenty-three Engliſh men of war, which had been ſent by Cromwell to the aſſiſtance of the Spaniards, appeared in the gulf of Naples. Though the French were thus baffled in their enterprize againſt Naples, yet having prevailed on the duke of Modena to declare for them, they continued the war in Lombardy, and the following year beſieged Pavia, which forced the viceroy to fit out a ſquadron of men of war and gallies, and to ſend 7500 foot and f 1500 horſe to the aſſiſtance of the government of Milan, who by that reinforcement obliged the duke of Modena to raiſe the ſiege.

The duke of Guiſe makes a vain attempt to raiſe a ſecond inſurrection.

AS Sardinia at this time was afflicted with a peſtilence, the count of Caſtrillo prohibited, under the ſevereſt penalties, all commerce with that iſland. However, the following year a tranſport, with ſoldiers on board, from the iſland, being admitted into the harbour of Naples, and the troops being permitted to come on ſhore, the plague by this inadvertency was introduced into the city, where it raged with the greateſt violence, carrying off in leſs than ſix months 400,000 of the inhabitants. The diſtemper was at firſt called by the phyſicians a malignant fever; but one of them affirming it to be peſtilential, the viceroy, who was apprehenſive leſt ſuch a report would occaſion all g communication with Naples to be broke off, was offended with this declaration, and ordered him to be impriſoned. As a favour, however, he allowed him to return and die in his own houſe. By this proceeding of the viceroy, the diſtemper being neglected, made a moſt rapid and furious progreſs, and filled the whole city with conſternation. The ſtreets were crowded with confuſed proceſſions, which ſerved to ſpread the infection through all the quarters. The terror of the people increaſed their ſuperſtition, and it being reported that a certain nun had propheſied that the peſtilence would ceaſe upon building a hermitage for her ſiſter nuns upon the hill of St. Martin's, the edifice was immediately begun with the moſt ardent zeal. Perſons of the higheſt quality ſtrove who ſhould perform the meaneſt offices. Some loading themſelves with beams, and others carrying baſkets full of lime and nails, while perſons of all ranks ſtripped themſelves of their moſt valuable effects, which they threw into empty hogſheads, placed in the ſtreets to receive the charitable contributions. Their buſtling, however, and the increaſing heats, diffuſed the malady through the whole city, and the ſtreets and the ſtairs of the churches were filled with the dead, the number of whom, for ſome time of the month of July, amounted daily to 15,000. a b

THE viceroy in the mean time uſed all poſſible precautions to abate the fury of the diſtemper, and to prevent its ſpreading to the provinces. The infection, however, deſolated the whole kingdom, excepting the provinces of Otranto and the further Calabria, and the cities of Gaeta, Sorrento, Paolo, Belvedere, with ſome few other places. The general calamity was increaſed in Naples by ſeveral malecontents, who inſinuated that the diſtemper had been deſignedly introduced by the Spaniards, and that there were many people in diſguiſe that went through the city ſowing poiſoned duſt. This idle rumour enraged the populace, who began to inſult the Spaniſh ſoldiers, and threaten a ſedition; ſo that the viceroy, to pacify the mob, cauſed a criminal to be broke upon the wheel, under pretence that he was a diſperſer of the duſt. A violent and plentiful rain falling about the middle of Auguſt, the diſtemper began to abate, and on the eighth of December the phyſicians made a ſolemn declaration that the city was entirely free from infection. The diſeaſe, however, ſtill continued in the provinces for ſeveral months, on which account the viceroy prohibited any one from entering Naples without his leave, which prohibition was continued till the month of November in the following year [w]. Upon the ceaſing of this dreadful calamity, the viceroy was involved in new troubles by the banditti, who began to multiply in the Principato, where they were protected by ſome barons. While he was employed in puniſhing the protectors, and diſlodging the protected, he was informed that the count of Peniaranda was appointed his ſucceſſor; a few weeks after whoſe arrival in Naples he reſigned the government. c

THE count of Peniaranda arrived at Naples in the end of December, and entered upon the adminiſtration on the eleventh of January. His government was very peaceable, the treaty of peace being concluded betwixt the Spaniards and French in the November following at the Pyrenees. As the kingdom of Portugal was excluded from this treaty, the Spaniards bent their thoughts upon reuniting it to the crown, and aſſembled a powerful army for reducing the Portugueſe. As their uſual bad fortune ſtill attended them, the viceroy was obliged the four following years to ſend conſiderable ſuccours from Naples to Spain. In the mean time he was engaged in quelling the inſolence of the banditti. He publiſhed rigorous edicts againſt thoſe who protected them, and ſending troops into the Abruzzi and Principato, he apprehended a great many of them, and forced others to lay down their arms. Some he ordered to be hanged, others he condemned to the gallies, and ſent a great many of them to recruit the armies in Portugal. While he was thus employed in reſtoring tranquility in the kingdom, the cardinal of Arragon, who reſided at Rome for ſome time, as ambaſſador from Spain, arrived at Naples, as his ſucceſſor. The count, a few weeks after his arrival, on the ninth of September embarked for Spain, leaving behind him an illuſtrious character for affability, piety, and great diſintereſtedneſs, having, during his whole adminiſtration, manifeſted a great averſion to rapacity and avarice, which vices had diſhonoured many of his predeceſſors. He left fourteen wiſe and prudent ſtatutes, ſome of which ſeverely condemned duels and murders, which by the lenity of his government had become very frequent. e f

DON Paſchal of Arragon immediately upon aſſuming the government, publiſhed a rigorous edict againſt all thoſe who carried concealed arms, ordered all vagabonds to depart the city within three days, and cauſed many criminals to be executed, and condemned a great number to the gallies. His ſeverities, however, were not ſufficient to bridle the depraved city and nation; for the malecontents encouraged by the great number of ſanctuaries, and by the pretended privileges of the eccleſiaſtical court, ſtill continued to diſturb the public, in contempt of the laws. The banditti were no leſs inſolent, and being protected by the powerful barons, infeſted the roads in great troops, and carried off great numbers of pri-

a ſoners, ſome of whom they murdered, and obliged others to pay large ſums for their ranſom. The viceroy uſed his utmoſt endeavours to put a ſtop to theſe miſchiefs, and ſent a lawyer to Rome, to obtain ſome redreſs in the abuſes of the pretended immunity. At the ſame time he was engaged in puniſhing a new kind of robbers, namely, the merchants who by fraudulent bankruptcies cheated their creditors with impunity. In order to put a ſtop to this wickedneſs, he publiſhed an edict, declaring, that whoever ſhould be found guilty of a fraudulent bankruptcy ſhould ſuffer death. Thoſe were deemed guilty who within four days did not ſurrender themſelves; and the concealers of their effects, and their pretended creditors were likewiſe to be puniſhed with death. While the cardinal was thus employed in putting a ſtop to the diſorders, and reſtraining the looſeneſs of manners that prevailed in b the kingdom, he was informed of the death of the king of Spain, who left his dominions to his ſon Charles. As the new king was only four years of age, his mother was appointed regent, and a junta was nominated, to aſſiſt her in the adminiſtration of the government. The archbiſhop of Toledo, who by his office was one of the junta, dying on the ſame day with the king, the queen-regent appointed the viceroy as his ſucceſſor, who accordingly the following year, on the eleventh of April, embarked for Spain, having governed the kingdom of Naples only about nine months.

Don Pedro Antonio of Arragon, who for ſome time had reſided as Spaniſh ambaſſador at Rome, ſucceeded his brother, the cardinal, as viceroy. In the beginning of his government, Alexander VII. granted the bull of inveſtiture to the infant king; but at the ſame
c time, as ſovereign lord of the kingdom, claimed the adminiſtration of the government during the minority, and ordered his nuncios at Madrid and Naples to preſent memorials of his pretended rights. Theſe memorials being immediately refuted by ſeveral Spaniſh and Neapolitan lawyers, the court of Rome thought proper not to inſiſt upon their pretenſions.

Is ſucceeded in Naples by his brother Don Pedro.

The Spaniſh court at this time found a more formidable enemy in Lewis XIV. who upon the death of Philip publiſhed his pretenſions to the dutchy of Brabant, the lordſhip of Malines, the marquiſate of Antwerp, Upper Guelderland, the country of Namur, Limbourg, Dalem, Hainault, Artois, Cambray, the county of Burgundy, Luxembourg, and many places on the Meuſe, in right of his queen Maria Thereſa; who, being a daughter of the firſt marriage, he alleged was lawful heireſs of all theſe territories, in prejudice to the males of a d ſecond marriage. The Neapolitan and Spaniſh lawyers, according to Giannone, clearly refuted the pretenſions of the French king, who paying no regard to their arguments, ſuddenly invaded Flanders with a formidable army, and quickly conquered great part of it. As he likewiſe threatened to attack the Spaniſh territories in Italy by ſea and land, the viceroy was obliged to reinforce the garriſons of Tuſcany with 1800 Spaniſh and Italian foot, and to hire a regiment of Germans. He was alſo forced to detain the ſquadron of gallies which he had intended to ſend to the relief of the Venetians in Candy, who were greatly preſſed by the Turks. His fears, however, of an invaſion from the French were ſoon diſperſed, news arriving about Midſummer, that Lewis XIV. apprehenſive of exciting ſeveral other powers of Europe againſt him, had conſented to a peace, by which the Spaniards were ſtripped of a e conſiderable part of their territories in Flanders.

The Spaniards were continually receiving new diſgraces and loſſes. The peace was no ſooner concluded with France, than news arrived at Madrid, that the viceroy of Sardinia had been murdered by ſome of the nobles of that iſland, who had aſſembled a body of men for their defence. To quiet the diſturbances of that kingdom, the viceroy was obliged to ſend ſome troops and gallies thither from Naples, who being joined with others from Italy, Spain, and Sicily, ſoon reſtored tranquility to the iſland. The kingdom of Naples in the mean time was moſt miſerably harraſſed by the banditti, who infeſted the roads in ſuch numbers, that a ſtop was entirely put to all inland traffic and commerce. They fortified themſelves in ſeveral towns and ſtrong holds in the Abruzzi, and even became ſo inſolent f as to order many diſtricts to pay the taxes to them, and not to the king's collectors. They robbed the meſſengers and public poſts of their diſpatches and letters, and made frequent incurſions into the neighbourhood of Naples, threatening to prevent all proviſions from entering the city by land. The viceroy uſed ſeveral means for extirpating them, which in a great meaſure proved ineffectual. At laſt he erected a junta, or board of miniſters, for puniſhing them and their abettors. The junta cauſed ſome barons, their protectors, to be arreſted; but after a ſhort impriſonment they were ſet at libery, upon paying to the viceroy large ſums of money.

Naples harraſſed by the banditti. A. D. 1670.

Don Pedro was ſeverely cenſured for his mercenary diſpoſition, and acquired the charac-
g ter of a ſordid miniſter, for allowing all criminals, even the moſt enormous, to eſcape the puniſhment of their crimes, on condition of paying a compoſition in money; by which means, it was computed, that he amaſſed the immenſe ſum of 320,000 ducats, during his ſhort government of ſix years. He was not only careful of amaſſing money for himſelf, but likewiſe augmented all the taxes and cuſtoms to ſuch a degree, that the increaſe was computed little leſs leſs than nine millions of ducats. He adorned the city of Naples with many public works, a and left about thirty prudent laws, whereby the tribunals were put in better order, and many abuſes in the cuſtom-houſes were reformed. The marquis of Aſtorga, who was ambaſſador for the court of Spain at Rome, arriving on the eleventh of February at Naples, Don Pe- dro a few days after reſigned the gvernment to him, and on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month embarked for Spain.

Is ſucceeded by the marquis of Aſtorga; DON Antonio Alvares, marquis of Aſtorga, upon his arrival at Naples found the city afflicted with a great ſcarcity of corn, but much more harraſſed by the multiplicity of crimes, eſpe-cially robbery, which was committed in all corners. Tho' he ſoon reſtored abundance, by cauſing proviſions to be brought from remote countries, and from the provinces, yet he found the utmoſt ſeverity ineffectual to prevent robberies, and to put a ſtop to the continual b depredations of the banditti in the country. The kingdom at this time was likewiſe har-raſſed by the incurſions of the Turks, and by many ſecret enemies, who almoſt entirely put a ſtop to commerce by adulterating and diminiſhing the coin. Clipping irons and inſtruments for coining were even found in the houſes of the nobility; and women of quality, from ſordid avarice, were alſo ſaid to be concerned in the villainy. As the coin was reduced to a fourth part of its firſt value, the viceroy was very aſſiduous in putting a ſtop to the miſchief, and cauſed many clippers and falſe coiners to be executed, while many others protected themſelves from the laws, by having recourſe to the ſanctuaries and the privilege of the clergy.

A. D. 1673. LEWIS XIV. in the mean time, in conjunction with Charles II. of England, the elector of c Cologn, and the biſhop of Munſter, having declared war againſt the Dutch, and ſuddenly over-run great part of their country, the Spaniards joined the oppoſite alliance, and the following year declared war againſt the French. The viceroy on this account the year after was obliged to ſend conſiderable ſuccours to the defence of Catalonia, which the Spaniards who aſſiſts the Spaniards in quelling a revolt in Meſ- were apprehenſive the French intended to invade. But about the ſame time the city of Meſ- ſina having revolted from the Spaniards, and applied to the French for protection, the attention of the marquis was chiefly engaged in ſending ſupplies to Sicily. For this purpoſe, he appointed the city of Reggio as a place of arms, ſent ſeveral gallies to join the Spaniſh fleet, A. D. 1675. and hired a conſiderable body of Germans. The French, however, on the third of January, entered the harbour of Meſſina with ſeveral ſhips, and on the tenth of the following month, d after a long and deſperate engagement, obliged the Spaniſh fleet to retire in a ſhattered condition to Naples.

THE expences of refitting the fleet, paying the ſeamen's wages, and furniſhing other ne-ceſſaries for the war, which amounted to near a million of ducats, were all ſupplied by the kingdom of Naples. The viceroy, to raiſe the money, ſold the revenues of the cuſtoms and taxes at a low rate; diſpoſed of the office of auditor of the exchequer for three lives for 46,000 ducats; demanded from the barons an equivalent in money for their uſual ſupply of horſemen; and ſeized the third part of the yearly revenue of all foreigners. The Spa- niards in the mean were entirely driven from Meſſina; and it having been reported at Ma- drid, that the marquis of Aſtorga, and his favourite miniſters, had embezzled great part c of the money raiſed for the war, which had retarded the progreſs of the expeditions, on
He is recalled to Spain, and ſucceeded by the marquis de los Velez. the ninth of September, when the fleet had got under ſail, the marquis de los Velez entered government to him, and a few weeks after ſet out for Spain, where he was appointed one of the counſellors of ſtate, and general of the artillery.

DON Fernando Faxardo, marquis de los Velez, being informed that the French were like-wiſe endeavouring to raiſe an inſurrection in the kingdom of Naples, by correſponding with the banditti of Calabria, and diſperſing manifeſtoes, encouraging the people to imitate the Meſſinians, nominated a junta to ſearch out and puniſh the diſaffected. Accordingly, many being diſcovered, who had abetted the deſigns of the French, ſome of them were impriſoned, f and others hanged. At the ſame time, being urged by the queen-regent, he diſpatched powerful ſuccours to Sicily, having prevailed on the nobility and commonalty of Naples to grant a donative of 200,000 ducats; which ſum was expended partly in paying the army in Sicily. The Spaniſh fleet at length, in the end of November, being reinforced by eighteen Dutch men of war, and ſix fire-ſhips, under the command of admiral Ruyter, the Meſ- ſinians were ſoon reduced to great difficulties; but receiving now and then ſome ſmall ſupmitted to the Spaniards, who granted them a general pardon, but afterwards ſtripped them g of their privileges, and bridled their city by a ſtrong and impregnable citadel.

a On account of this cruel and obſtinate war, it was computed that little leſs than ſeven millions of ducats had been carried out of the kingdon of Naples, which reduced the nation to great diſtreſs. The difficulties were alſo increaſed by the bad currency of the coin, which was every day more and more diminiſhed. The contagion had reached the cloiſters, and the monks were become great proficients in the art of coining. Even thoſe criminals who had eſcaped hanging, and been condemned to the oar for adulterating the coin, continued to coin in the very gallies. The viceroy, to put a ſtop to the diſorders, cried down the old money, and paid to thoſe who brought it to the mint new money equal in value. Not being able, however, to furniſh the new coin in ſufficient quantities, this remedy was not anſwerable to the greatneſs of the miſchief, though it in ſome meaſure leſſened the con-
b fuſion. The kingdom at the ſame time ſtill continued expoſed to the ravages of the banditti, all the endeavours of the viceroy to extirpate them being ineffectual. The marquis was likewiſe careful to ſuppreſs the diſorders of the city, where the moſt heinous crimes were committed both by the nobility and commonalty, whoſe manners had been corrupted by the ſailors belonging to the fleet, and the ſoldiers that came to ſerve in the war of Sicily. He ordered many criminals to be hanged without diſtinction of rank, cauſed many to be privately ſtrangled in priſon, and condemned great numbers to the gallies.

The French in the mean time, notwithſtanding the peace of Nimeguen, having treacherouſly ſurpriſed Straſburg, put a garriſon into the citadel of Caſal in Montferrat, and ſeized large territories in Germany, under pretence that they were included in the ſovereignty of c the cities yielded to them by the treaty, all Europe began to be alarmed at their immoderate and unjuſt ambition [x]. The Spaniards were very jealous of their deſigns upon the Milaneſe and Catalonia, ſo that the viceroy was obliged to ſend 2000 men from Naples to Barcelona, and two ſhips loaded with ammunition. Conſiderable ſubſidies in money were likewiſe required from the Neapolitans; but while the viceroy was employed in contriving the funds for raiſing the ſubſidy, the marquis del Carpio arrived at Naples on the 6th of January as his ſucceſſor. Los Velez three days after reſigned the government to him, and quickly embarked for Spain, where he was kindly received by the young king, who honoured him with a ſeat in the council of ſtate, and afterwards appointed him preſident of the council of the Indies.

The marquis de los Velez returns to Spain.

d Don Gaſper de Haro, marquis del Carpio, had not enjoyed the government many months, when a new war broke out betwixt France and Spain, in conſequence of which, in the month of December, he publiſhed a proclamation, ordering all the French to quit the kingdom of Naples. In the mean time, obſerving that the corrupt diſcipline and looſeneſs of manners was not owing to the want of provident and wholeſome laws, but to the too great indulgence of the magiſtrates, he therefore determined to adhere ſtrictly to a courſe of uncorrupted and inflexible juſtice. In the beginning of his government, finding that the frequency of crimes was chiefly owing to the carrying of fire-arms, and other ſorts of offenſive weapons, with which every perſon was girt, he publiſhed a ſevere ſtatute, by which he took away the power from the magiſtrates of granting licence for carrying ſuch arms.
e He likewiſe revived the old laws againſt all idle perſons and vagabonds, and commanded the magiſtrates to ſee them ſtrictly put in execution, ſo that in a ſhort time the principal occaſion of ſo many crimes and diſorders were removed. About the ſame time he publiſhed divers regulations to prevent the frauds and tricks that were become too common among the manufacturers, eſpecially thoſe concerned in working in gold and ſilver; and, obſerving the pernicious effects of luxury, he prohibited by a ſevere law the exceſſive number of ſervants, the wearing of embroidered cloaths, or cloth of gold and ſilver, forbidding alſo the conſumption of theſe metals upon ſedans, coaches, calaſhes, and ſaddles. He applied himſelf no leſs to the reformation of the tribunals, and with the utmoſt care endeavoured to root out the abuſes and corruptions that had crept into them.

f But two things chiefly rendered his government illuſtrious, namely, the coining of new money, and the extirpating of the banditti. For reſtoring the currency of the coin, he began with reviving the old ſtatutes againſt thoſe who imported falſe money, or melted down any coin; and, to raiſe a fund for paying the deficiency occaſioned by the clipping, he impoſed a duty of 15 grana upon each buſhel of ſalt, to be paid by all perſons without diſtinction of rank; and exacted alſo a year's rent of all the incomes of Neapolitans and foreigners, and of natives living abroad with their families, to be raiſed within three years. For extirpating the banditti, in the firſt year of his government he granted a full indemnity to all criminals and outlaws, provided they would aſſiſt in the purſuit of their chiefs and gangs; he put a great reward upon the heads of thoſe who could not be taken alive, and caused all the towers and houses where they were wont to haunt to be demolished, for which purpose he sent troops against them with battering cannon. To deprive them of all protection, he published a severe law against all those who should keep any correspondence with them, or give them any assistance, favour, or victuals, ordaining that those who should furnish them with arms and powder, or should receive any share of their robberies or ransoms, should be looked upon as principals, and be punished with death. The strictness and impartiality of the viceroy alarming the barons, they quickly abandoned the outlaws, who, finding themselves deprived of shelter, were so terrified, that they thought of nothing but saving themselves by flight or submission. Those who were taken suffered the just punishment of their crimes; so that in a short time they were extirpated in so complete a manner, that they have never appeared since in the kingdom. a

His death. A. D. 1687.

While the marquis was thus a terror to audacious criminals, he was the patron and protector of the virtuous and indigent. He relieved the poor and unfortunate with great charity, and acquired the affection of the Neapolitans by supplying the city with plenty of provisions, and furnishing public shews after a magnificent manner. At the same time he was frugal and moderate, and manifested a great detestation of avarice and corruption. After he had thus rendered himself universally respected and beloved, he was unfortunately snatched away by death on the 15th of November, before he had completed the fifth year of his government[y]. b

He is succeeded by the count of Santistevan;

Upon the news of the death of the marquis del Carpio, Don Lorenzo Colonna, high constable of the kingdom, immediately went from Rome, and assumed the administration, which he held till the beginning of the following year, when Don Francesco Benavides, count of Santistevan, who had been viceroy of Sicily, entered upon the government as successor to the late marquis. The count endeavoured to tread in the footsteps of his predecessor, and immediately renewed the statutes about manufactures, provisions, and carrying of arms. He was chiefly solicitous about completing the new coinage, which his predecessor had not lived to finish. He added some new species to the coin, and raised the value of that which had been struck by the late marquis 10 per cent. being a little above the intrinsic value of the silver, to prevent it being melted down, or carried out of the kingdom. He published many regulations concerning the exchange of the old money for the new, and prescribed the method to be practised in the banks for circulating bills and letters of credit. Not content, however, with the alteration he at first made in the money, in the third year of his government he raised the value of the new coin other 10 per cent. whereby, besides lessening his own reputation, he greatly hurt the trade of the kingdom. As the nation was about this time alarmed with the report that a contagious distemper had raged in the province of Bari, and at Civita Vecchia in the ecclesiastical state, the count prohibited all commerce with that province and the territories of the church, and appointed persons in each ward of Naples to prevent any from entering the city without the necessary bills of health, till all suspicion of contagion quite vanished. In the following years of his government, he endeavoured to reform the tribunals, by limiting a time for the decision of all causes. He also published several regulations about the provisions of the city and kingdom, concerning the frauds committed in credit betwixt man and man, about the importation of foreign linen and woollen-cloth, and about many other affairs. Mean while the duke of Medina Cœli, the Spanish ambassador at Rome, arriving as viceroy at Naples, the count of Santistevan a few weeks after resigned the government to him, and set out for Spain. c d e

The duke of Medina Cœli appointed viceroy.

Don Ludovico de la Cerda, duke of Medina Cœli, resolved to imitate the glorious example of the marquis del Carpio. He began his government with endeavouring to suppress the contraband trade, and the frauds committed in the custom-houses, and in the importation of merchandize. His edicts against these frauds were so rigorous, especially in convicting the accused upon slight proofs, that the Seggi, apprehensive lest they should turn into an abuse, thought proper to oppose him. The duke was ambitious of imitating the late marquis in the magnificence of public shews. He enlarged the theatre, and not only furnished it with costly and noble scenes, but with the best musicians in Europe. He encouraged learning and learned men in a distinguished manner, assembling them in his palace, where, with great attention and complaisance, he heard their different compositions. f

Mean while the nation began to be terribly alarmed with the declining state of Spain, and the increasing power and grandeur of France, which this year had sent into the field five strong armies, and maintained them the whole campaign in the enemy's country. What chiefly struck the kingdom of Naples, and other dominions of the vast Spanish monarchy, with consternation, was the news of the continual infirmities of king Charles, who now despaired of having any issue. The disorders and revolutions likely to follow upon his death filled the Neapolitans with great apprehensions, which quickly appeared to be too well g

founded; for ſoon after the concluſion of the peace of Ryſwick, contrary to the laws of juſtice, a treaty of partition of the Spaniſh monarchy was made by the kings of England and France, the republic of Holand, and the duke of Savoy, by which the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, with their dependencies, the city and marquiſate of Final, with the province of Guipuſcoa, were aſſigned to the French. The Spaniards, who for two centuries had piqued themſelves upon the vaſt extent of their dominions, were highly incenſed at this treaty, and the Neapolitans and Sicilians for ſeveral ages had conceived a great averſion to the French; nevertheleſs Charles, who had alſo been greatly exaſperated againſt king William and Lewis XIV. was prevailed upon to leave by his laſt will Philip, the ſecond ſon of the dauphin, heir of all his dominions, to the prejudice of the Auſtrian family, who had the preferable right, on account of the ſolemn renunciation of Maria Thereſa, upon her marriage to the French king. Charles II. ſurvived this deed only a few weeks, and died on the 1ſt of November. The news of his death, and of the ſucceſſion of Philip of Anjou, quickly arrived at Naples, which filled the people at the ſame time with grief and aſtoniſhment; but the viceroy immediately publiſhing two clauſes extracted from the will of the deceaſed king, Philip was acknowleged as his ſucceſſor, without the leaſt commotion or diſturbance (W).

THE emperor, and the parties concerned in the deſigned partition, jealous of ſuch an acquiſition of power to the houſe of Bourbon, immediately reſolved to oppoſe the ſettlement of Philip on the throne of Spain; but that they might not diſguſt the Spaniards by a new diviſion of their monarchy, they agreed to place the archduke Charles, the ſecond ſon of the emperor, upon their throne. They accordingly declared war againſt Lewis XIV. and Philip, after they had imprudently allowed Philip to be quietly ſettled at Madrid, and the French troops to take poſſeſſion of Naples and the duchy of Milan. Clement XI. though he privately favoured the intereſt of Philip, yet, apprehenſive leſt the party of the archduke Charles ſhould prevail, refuſed to declare himſelf in favour of either of the pretenders, each of whom ſolicited him for the inveſtiture of the kingdom of Naples. Being afraid to interfere in the diſputes of ſuch powerful competitors, he reſolved not to grant the inveſtiture of Naples till the concluſion of the war; but to ſatisfy both parties, he publiſhed an authentic act, by which he declared, that the delay ſhould in no-ways prejudice the ancient rights of the king of Spain [z].

PRINCE Eugene, in the mean time having entered Lombardy with an imperial army, and made conſiderable progreſs in the Milaneſe and the Mantua, Philip reſolved to viſit Italy, thinking that his preſence would have a great influence in fixing the allegiance of his Italian ſubjects. He embarked on board a French fleet at Barcelona; and in the month of April arrived at Naples, where he was received with great outward ſplendor, though he made but ſmall progreſs in ſecuring the affections of the Neapolitans. The pope indeed condeſcended to appoint a cardinal legate to wait upon him, which partiality greatly offended the emperor, who immediately ordered his ambaſſador to leave Rome [a]. After continuing a ſhort time in Naples, Philip ſailed from thence to Final, and afterwards joined the French army commanded by Vendoſme, which on the 15th of Auguſt was defeated by prince Eugene at Luzara [b].

As the French, the four following campaigns, were put to great difficulties in oppoſing prince Eugene, and had no enemy in Naples, they drew the greateſt part of their troops from thence, to reinforce their armies in Lombardy, which, however, they were forced at length wholly to abandon. The Imperialiſts eagerly ſeized this opportunity of making an attempt upon Naples; and the following ſpring, contrary to the inclination of the allies, who wanted to invade Provence, the emperor ordered count Daun to march from Lombardy thro' the eccleſiaſtical ſtate with 8,500 men. Cardinal Grimani at Rome had already concerted the plan of a revolution in favour of the houſe of Auſtria, with the duke of Monteleone and his brother the archbiſhop of Naples; ſo that, upon the approach of the count, the whole kingdom declared for the emperor, which confounding the duke of Eſcalona, the Spaniſh viceroy,

A few months after it was reported that he died in priſon a natural death; but it was generally believed his fate was haſtened by wicked means. His diſgrace and confinement were ſuppoſed to be owing to his being concerned in ſome ſecret cabals with the Spaniſh grandees, who, upon the news that the allies, at the conferences at Gertrudenberg, had inſiſted that Lewis XIV. ſhould intirely abandon his grandſon Philip, were ſuſpected of taking ſecret meaſures for their own ſecurity (1)

he retired with his forces to Gaeta, whither they had conveyed their treasure and richest effects. The Neapolitans, whose ancient detestation of the French had been increased by their late government, expressed the greatest joy upon the arrival of the Imperialists, and the magistrates of Naples went as far as Aversa to present count Daun with the keys of their city. The whole kingdom then acknowleged king Charles, excepting Gaeta, Pescara, and some places in Calabria, which, however, were all soon reduced. Pescara surrendered for want of provisions, and on the last of September Gaeta was taken by storm and pillaged. The duke of Escalona, and the garrison, who had retired into the castle, were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. Their estates were confiscated, as belonging to rebels; and the duke, upon being conducted to Naples, was ungenerously exposed to the railleries of the people, who had smarted from the severity of his government. a

The Neapolitans, however, quickly found that their condition was not greatly bettered by their submission to the house of Austria; for count Daun, who was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom till the arrival of a viceroy, acted in such a manner as though he had resolved to ruin the nation by his exorbitant exactions. By laying a duty upon fruit and herbs, he raised a formidable tumult in Naples, which seemed to threaten an universal revolt, if the new tax had not been quickly laid aside. Representations having been made to the courts of Vienna and Barcelona, which last city was now in possession of king Charles, the excesses of the count were corrected, and cardinal Grimani soon after arriving at Naples as viceroy, the discontents of the Neapolitans abated, and a design was formed for seizing Sicily, as the disposition of the Sicilians was known to be averse to the French. This enterprize, however, was laid aside, and a small force was sent to reduce the garrisons on the coast of Tuscany, some of which surrendered after very little opposition [c]. b c

The archduke Charles elected emperor. A. D. 1711.

About four years after, king Charles succeeding his brother Joseph upon the Imperial throne, and the Tory faction in England being admitted into the administration, queen Anne, by their advice, entered into a friendly correspondence with Lewis XIV. as a means to put an end to the war, it being now judged more impolitic to insist upon the succession of the Spanish monarchy for the new emperor than for Philip of Anjou. In consequence of these views of the English ministry, seven preliminary articles were agreed to betwixt the courts of London and Versailles, and published for the foundation of a general peace. These preliminaries were rejected with disdain by the court of Vienna, and were very disgusting to the Dutch, who, after having in vain endeavoured to persuade the queen to alter her resolution, at length agreed to send their plenipotentiaries to Utrecht, the place appointed for the congress, and to grant passports for those of the French. The conferences were accordingly opened the following year, in the end of January, and continued about eighteen months, during which time France had concluded particular treaties with Britain, Holland, Savoy, Portugal, and others of the confederates. The emperor Charles, however, still persisted in continuing the war, but soon finding himself unable to oppose the French arms, he agreed at length to negociate a peace with France, which was concluded a few months after at Rastadt, betwixt prince Eugene and marshal Villars. By this treaty, among other things, it was stipulated, that Charles should be left in quiet possession of the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the island of Sardinia, and the forts on the coast of Tuscany. d A peace concluded betwixt the confederates and the kings of France and Spain. A. D. 1713. e

The emperor refuses to acknowlege Philip as king of Spain.

Though the emperor had thus agreed to a peace with Lewis XIV. yet he still refused to acknowlege his grandson Philip as king of Spain, and kept up his pretensions to the whole succession of that monarchy. On this account he expressed his resentment against the duke of Savoy, ordering his ambassador to quit the territories of the empire within fifteen days, because the duke had taken possession of the island of Sicily, which had been ceded to him by the king of Spain at the treaty of Utrecht. The emperor was prevented two or three years from prosecuting his designs against Spain by a war in Hungary against the Turks. Philip of Spain, in the mean time, reflecting upon the weak and exhausted state of his kingdom, attempted nothing against the emperor; but about three years after the peace of Rastadt, at the persuasion of cardinal Alberoni, he fitted out a formidable fleet, and took possession of Sardinia. The Spanish troops from thence sailed to Sicily, with the intention of blocking up Messina, the duke of Savoy being suspected of a design to enter into an alliance with the emperor, and of secretly negotiating with him an exchange of Sicily for Sardinia. As the king of Spain, by these hostilities, had violated the neutrality of Italy, contrary to his engagements with the allies at Utrecht, George I. of England sent a powerful fleet into the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Byng, and at the same time formed an alliance with the regent of France and the Dutch, to oblige the emperor, Philip, and the king of Sicily, to agree to an accommodation. f a In consequence of this treaty, which, from the accession of the emperor, was termed the quadruple alliance, the ambitious designs of Alberoni were defeated; and the following year Philip was obliged to agree to the terms of the treaty proposed by the mediators, by the fourth article of which it was stipulated, that he should renounce all rights and claims to the dominions possessed by the emperor in Italy, and also the right of the reversion of Sicily to the crown of Spain, as had been settled at the treaty of Utrecht. By the same treaty the king of Sicily was obliged to restore that kingdom to the emperor, who, in return, put him in possession of the island of Sardinia, the reversion of which kingdom, in default of heirs male, was reserved to the crown of Spain. Thus the two kingdoms of Naples and Sicily were solemnly disjoined from the monarchy of Spain, to which they had been united for b more than two centuries. As the investiture of the kingdom of Sicily had been dropped ever since the invasion of Peter of Arragon, whose pretensions were opposed by the popes, so it was now believed that the emperor by disusage would abolish the custom of investiture for Naples, which kingdom he had already been in possession of twelve years. Charles, however, for what reason is uncertain, continued to offer his homage to the holy see for Naples, which was at last accepted three years after by Innocent XIII.

As the Neapolitans, since the late revolution, had manifested great affection for the house of Austria, and had zealously exerted themselves against the Spaniards, upon their appearance before Messina, the emperor, as a reward for their fidelity and zeal, granted them many new concessions and privileges. He bestowed new and more honourable titles upon the c city and its magistrates, and excluded all foreigners from employments, benefices, and offices, within the kingdom. As the pope, during the war in Italy, had discovered a great partiality to his competitor, he, in resentment, opposed the usurpations of the Roman see. He abolished the tribunal of the nuncio, and all vestiges of the inquisition, and, by many royal writs, established the important right of the exequatur regium to all bulls, briefs, and other provisions coming from Rome. He prohibited any pensions being imposed upon ecclesiastical benefices in favour of foreigners. He extended the feodal succession in favour of the barons to the fifth degree, and confirmed the privileges granted to them by his predecessors. The kingdom was likewise comprehended in the truces made betwixt the emperor and the Turk; and, by establishing free ports, it was proposed to open a commerce betwixt d the kingdom and Germany. The Neapolitans, from a grateful sense of the favours and privileges conferred upon them, caused them to be collected and printed, that their value might be publicly known.

The HISTORY of GENOA.

The modern extent of the Genoeſe territories.

THE city of Genoa, by Latin writers frequently, though corruptly, called Janua, is the capital of a ſmall territory in the northern part of Italy, extending along the ſouthern ſhore from the river Macra to the Var, and ſeperated from Lombardy, on the north by the Apennine mountains, on the ſouth waſhed by the Mediterranean ſea. This country is part of the ancient Liguria, which, about the beginning of the Roman ſtate, comprehended part of France, as well as of Italy, extending from the river Arno to the Rhone: and including towards the north the cities of Turin, Tortona, Pavia, with many others [a]. In the diviſion of Italy made by the emperor Auguſtus, the rivers of Macra and Var were reckoned the eaſtern and weſtern boundaries of Liguria, which was terminated on the north by the Apennines. About three hundred years after, Conſtantine fixed its northern boundary at he river Adda, Milan, then perhaps the greateſt city in the Roman empire next to Rome, eing appointed the capital of the province, where the conſul and the archbiſhop both kept heir reſidence. a b

THE origin of the ancient Ligurians is very uncertain. The moſt probable opinion is, that they were a branch of the Celtæ, who had proceeded from the Loire to the Rhone, and from thence to Italy, as their language is ſaid to have been originally the ſame with that of the Gauls [b]. They were reckoned a very warlike nation; and from Livy it appears, that for more than eighty years they were at war with the Romans before they were ſubdued. In the ſecond Punic war they declared for the Carthaginians; but the city of Genoa, which even then was a celebrated emporium [c], eſpouſing the party of the Romans, Mago the Carthaginian ſailed thither with a large fleet, on board of which were twelve thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, who plundered and burnt the place. It was afterwards rebuilt by the Romans; and continued under their dominion, with the reſt of Italy, till the concluſion of the fifth century, when Theodoric, king of the Goths, having defeated the uſurper Odoacer, was proclaimed by his army king of Italy, even with the conſent of the emperor Zeno. c

Genoa conquered by the Goths, A. D. 498.

SOME think that the ſouthern part of Liguria, betwixt the Apennines and the Mediterranean, was never conquered by the Goths, but according to Folieta, the contrary of this is evident from the mandates of Theodoric, and other Gothic kings, to the Genoeſe [d]. However it be, the Goths, about ſixty years after, were intirely ſubdued by Beliſarius; and all Italy was again united to the eaſtern empire. The Lombards, who, about fifteen years after invaded Italy, and quickly reduced great part of it under their dominion, did not at firſt carry their arms over the Apennines; ſo that Genoa, being unmoleſted by them, ſtill continued ſubject to the emperors. This new revolution in Italy was of great advantage to the Genoeſe, their wealth and the number of their inhabitants being greatly encreaſed, by the many refugees who fled from the neighbourhood of the Po from the fury of the invaders. Many of the nobility of Milan reſorted thither; and the archbiſhop Honoratus, with his ſucceſſors, kept their reſidence in Genoa ſeventy years [e]. At the end of this period, Rotharis, king of the Lombards, invaded the Alpes Cottiæ, and reduced the whole coaſt of Liguria, from the city of Luna in Tuſcany to the Var, plundering and burning the cities, and among the reſt Genoa [f]. Rotharis erected his new conqueſt into a provincial dukedom, both the governors of diſtricts and particular cities among the Lombards having the title of duke [g]. d e

LIGURIA, being thus united to the kingdom of the Lombards, continued ſubject to them to the end of the following century, when Italy was conquered by Charlemagne, who reduced Liguria to its ancient bounds ſettled by Auguſtus, erected it into a marche, and appointed his relation Audemarus as the firſt comes, or margrave. Genoa, at this time, being diſtinguiſhed for its wealth and populouſneſs, began to give its name to the whole coaſt, and continued under theſe counts for about one hundred years, till the race of the Pepins became extinct in Italy, and the empire was tranſlated to the German princes [h]. Audemarus, the firſt Genoeſe count, was commiſſioned by Charlemagne to protect the coaſts of Italy, and the iſlands of Corſica and Sardinia, from the incurſions of the Moors [i]. For this purpoſe having fitted out a formidable fleet at Genoa, he ſailed over to Corſica, of which, accord- f a ing to Folieta, he made an entire conqueſt; but, according to others, it appears, that the infidels only abandoned the iſland for a few months; for the following year they again arrived with a fleet from Spain; but were defeated by one count Burchard, who deſtroyed thirteen of their ſhips. Whether this Burchard was the ſucceſſor of Audemarus, who had been killed the former year in his expedition againſt the Moors, is uncertain, as very little notice is taken by any hiſtorians hitherto publiſhed of this country for more than three centuries after Charlemagne; its remote ſituation prevented it from being concerned in the diſputes betwixt the kings of Germany and France, and the dukes of Spoleto and Frioul, for the ſovereignty of Italy, and the protection of Sardinia and Corſica, being afterwards committed to the counts or marquiſſes of Tuſcany, then very rich and powerful [k].

b In the year 935 or 936, while the Genoeſe forces were abſent upon ſome expedition, the Saracens ſurpriſed the city, which they plundered and burnt, putting to death a great many of the inhabitants, and carrying others into captivity. Having embarked their captives, and immenſe booty, they ſet ſail for Africa; but the Genoeſe, about the ſame time, returning, and finding their city in aſhes, immediately purſued the invaders, and overtaking them on the coaſt of Sardinia, entirely defeated them, recovered all the captives, and took a great many of the enemy's ſhips [l].

The Genoeſe form themſelves into a republic. A. D. 950.

The Franks having now loſt all authority in Italy, the Genoeſe began to form themſelves into a republic, and to be governed by their own magiſtrates, who were freely elected, and took the name of conſuls. In order to ſupport their independence, they applied them-

c ſelves with great aſſiduity to commerce and navigation, by which means they not only ſupplied themſelves with thoſe neceſſaries which the barrenneſs of their territory could not afford, but quickly became rich and powerful. Being apprehenſive leſt ſome of the German emperors, who frequently entered Italy as invaders, ſhould renew their pretenſions to their ſtate, they conſented to acknowledge Berengarius the third, duke of Friuli, who had been elected emperor by a party of the Italian nobles. Berengarius, who with great difficulty maintained himſelf in his new dignity, endeavoured by his conceſſions to enlarge the number of his friends and adherents; and accordingly made no difficulty to confirm the new republic in all their rights, privileges, and poſſeſſions [m].

The Genoeſe and Piſans conquer Sardinia. A. D. 1017.

Mean while the Genoeſe began to extend their commerce from Spain to Syria, and from

d Egypt to Conſtantinople, their veſſels, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, being fitted for fighting as well as for carrying merchandize. Having acquired a great reputation by their extenſive commerce, in the beginning of the following century they were invited by the Piſans, who had likewiſe formed themſelves into a republic, to join with them in an expedition againſt the Moors, who had entirely made themſelves maſters of Sardinia. The Genoeſe and Piſan annals give a very different account of this expedition: the Piſans alledge, that a few years before, having obtained the inveſtiture of the iſland from the pope, on condition of recovering it from the Moors, they accordingly expelled the infidels; but being then at war with the inhabitants of Lucca, they were ſo engaged on the continent, that the Moors again ſurpriſed the iſland: that, on this account, e they had recourſe to the Genoeſe, by whoſe aſſiſtance they entirely conquered the iſland; when, according to agreement, they gave all the booty of the Moors to their allies. The Genoeſe, however, make no mention of any gift of the pope, but ſay, that they made a partition of the iſland with the Piſans; that they took the Mooriſh king Muſactus, and ſent him a priſoner to the emperor; and that their allies refuſed to fulfil their condition with them [n]. However it be, from this time is dated that jealouſy and enmity betwixt the two republics, which engaged them in a long courſe of wars; that in the end proved the ruin of the Piſans. Scarce any account of theſe tranſactions is given us by the writers of thoſe times, who almoſt never relate the cauſe or iſſue of a war; but by a ſingle expreſſion ſlightly touch upon the moſt important enterprize.

War betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans. A. D. 1070.

f About thirty years after the joint expedition againſt Sardinia, we are informed by the Piſan annals, that the republics of Genoa and Piſa were engaged in a deſtructive war [o]. This war ſeems to have continued near eighteen years, when the two parties, probably by the mediation of the pope, concluded a treaty of peace and alliance, and ſent their fleets in conjunction againſt the Moors in Africa, where, according to Leo Oſtienſis they killed an hundred thouſand of the enemy, and carried off an immenſe booty; and, if we believe Bertholdus, obliged the Mooriſh king to become tributary to the pope, who had granted all thoſe concerned in the expedition an ample pardon for their ſins, and ſent with them a bleſſed ſtandard of St. Peter [p]. Folieta mentions two other expeditions to Africa a few years after; but we have no account of their ſucceſs.

A. D. 1097. THE ſtrange and unaccountable zeal which at this time ſeized the weſtern kingdoms of Europe for recovering the Holy Land from the Saracens, contributed to raiſe the Genoeſe republic to its higheſt degree of opulence and grandeur. Though very few of the Genoeſe took the croſs, yet they embarked with ardor in all the enterprizes of the cruſards; and on many occaſions performed very important ſervices to thoſe religious warriors. Their fleets were continually employed for many years either in tranſporting them to the Levant, or attending their armies along the coaſts of Syria, where they blocked up by ſea the maritime places which were beſieged by land. Sometimes they diſembarked their troops, to act in conjunction with the cruſards: at other times they tranſported their baggage; but they were conſtantly employed in furniſhing them with proviſions and warlike ſtores, which gave them new opportunities of extending their commerce; eſpecially as they made conſiderable acquiſitions of territory, and eſtabliſhed colonies in ſeveral places of Aſia, which they had conquered from the infidels. When the firſt body of cruſards marched into Syria, the Genoeſe ſent a fleet thither of forty gallies; which, at their firſt arrival, ſeized a great extent of the coaſt of Aſia Minor, and gave great aſſiſtance to the chriſtian army before
A. D. 1098. Antioch, which city, after a long ſiege, ſurrendered the following year on the third of June. Soon after, the infidels having marched with an immenſe army to endeavour to recover the city, two of the chriſtian officers, being ſtruck with a panic, fled to the Genoeſe fleet, and reported that the place was again in poſſeſſion of the Turks. This news terrifying the Genoeſe, they immediately ſet ſail for Italy; and in their paſſage landing at Myrrea in Lycia, brought from thence to Genoa the ſuppoſed body of John the Baptiſt, which was received by their countrymen with inexpreſſible joy [q].

THE following year, however, the Genoeſe ſent another powerful fleet into the Levant, under the command of William Embriacus, who, being informed that the cruſards had advanced from Antioch to Jeruſalem, immediately ſailed to Joppa, and made himſelf maſter of the city; but hearing that the Saracens had prepared a great number of ſhips at Aſcalon, with the intention of attacking him, he thought proper not to riſk an engagement with their ſuperior force, but landing all his troops and ſtores, ſunk the hulks of his gallies, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy; and marching over land, joined the beſiegers. As the Genoeſe were looked upon as very expert engineers, and brought with them many warlike ſtores, and ſeveral machines for throwing darts and arrows, their arri-

After they had joined the army, the attacks were carried on with great vigour, and the taking of the city was chiefly owing to their ingenuity: for, by the advice of Embriacus, they built a large wooden tower in ſuch a manner, that one of its ſides could be let down in the form of a draw-bridge, ſo as to ſerve as a paſſage for the troops to the top of the ramparts. This machine being advanced cloſe to the walls, a general aſſault was given to the city, which was firſt entered by Godfrey of Boulogne from the tower, who, being followed by many others, one of the gates was broke open, and the army admitted [r].

THE news of the taking of Jeruſalem no ſooner arrived in Italy, than the Genoeſe began to fit out another fleet of twenty-ſeven, or, according to ſome, thirty-ſeven gallies, and ſix other veſſels, which the year after, on the firſt of Auguſt, ſailed from Genoa with eight thouſand men, among whom was the hiſtorian Caffarus, whoſe annals have been lately publiſhed by Muratori. The fleet ſailed directly for Laodicea, then ſubject to the Greek emperor, where they took up their winter ſtation, and had a conference with the general Baldwin, who was perſuaded by them and the pope's legate as his brother Godfrey was dead, to accept of the crown of Jeruſalem. During the winter the Genoeſe made ſeveral ſhort ex-

Upon the approach of the ſpring they ſailed with their whole fleet to Joppa; and landing their troops they marched to Jeruſalem, where they celebrated their Eaſter, and afterwards made an agreement with the king to aſſiſt him in his enterprizes againſt the infidels, on condition of receiving one-third of the booty taken from the enemy; and that the Genoeſe republic ſhould have ſettlements in the places to be conquered, with full juriſdiction over their own citizens. In conſequence of this treaty, they, in conjunction with the cruſards, immediately attacked Azotus, which they made themſelves maſters of in three days. From thence, in the month of May, they ſailed to Cæſarea, which, after a ſhort ſiege, they took by ſtorm, Embriacus being the firſt that mounted the wall, where he continued for ſome time alone, by the breaking of the ladder of the galley on which he mounted. We are informed by Folieta and Jacob de Varagine, that when the booty was divided into three parts, and the Genoeſe, who had been principally concerned in the action, were deſired to chuſe their ſhare, they pitched upon a large emerald made in the form of a diſh, which alone they preferred

a to the other two ſhares, becauſe it was ſaid to have been uſed by our Saviour in celebrating the laſt paſſover [s]. Sacred relics ſeem at this time to have been as frequent in Paleſtine as giants bones were afterwards ſaid to be in America.

After the conqueſt of Ceſarea the Genoeſe ſet ſail for Italy, and after a voyage of three months arrived ſafe at Genoa. The following February, when the magiſtrates were to be elected, the republic reſolved to chuſe four conſuls for four years; and as a reward for the ſervices of Embriacus, nominated him the firſt conſul. The new conſuls immediately ſent a fleet of forty gallies to Paleſtine, and, conſidering the flouriſhing ſtate of the republic, they put a ſtop to the currency of the money of Pavia, and for the firſt time ordered new money to be coined in Genoa [t]. The fleet that had ſailed to Syria took Acaron and Gibelleto; The Genoeſe begin to coin their own money.

b and the year after, having reduced Dertuſia, and received conſiderable reinforcements from Genoa, ſo that the number of their veſſels amounted to ſeventy ſail, they entered into a new treaty with Baldwin, promiſing to defend all the coaſts of Syria ſouthwards from the city of Sidon, the king at the ſame time ſtipulating to grant them a third part of the cuſtoms of Azotus, Ceſarea, and Ptolemais, and to allow them a ſtreet in Jeruſalem, and another in Joppa. Theſe great privileges were owing to the ſignal ſervices performed by their numerous fleet at the ſiege of Ptolemais or Aco, which, though looked upon as impregnable, was obliged to ſurrender to the Chriſtians in the laſt year of the conſulſhip of Embriacus. William of Tyre A. D. 1105. adds, that Baldwin was ſo ſenſible of the advantage of the alliance of the republic, that upon the taking of the city, he gave ſeveral private eſtates to many particular perſons among the c Genoeſe [u]. As the republic had likewiſe received many favours from Boemond prince of Antioch, particularly a full immunity over all his principality, and a ſtreet and church in his capital, with a right of juriſdiction over their own citizens, the following year they welcomed the prince into their city with the greateſt honours upon his return from France with his bride Conſtantia, the daughter of king Philip. At the ſame time they were employed in fitting out another fleet of ſixty, or according to ſome, ſeventy gallies, which the year after ſailed to Syria, where it continued almoſt three years, during which time they forced Gibello to ſurrender; and, in conjunction with the cruſards, reduced Tripoli, after a long ſiege. According to Caffarus, the year following after the election of the four quadriennial conſuls, they ſent another fleet of twenty-two gallies to Paleſtine, which, in conjunction

d with the Chriſtian army, took Baruto, after a ſiege of two months. About the ſame time they alſo reduced Malmiſtra, which concluded their military expeditions in Syria during the firſt holy war.

The Genoeſe, having now no foreign enemy to contend with, began to renew their diſputes with their neighbours the Piſans; and, as a check upon theſe rivals, they fortified Porto Venere, ſituated on the weſtern confines of their territory, near the mouth of the river Macra. When they firſt formed themſelves into a republic, many cities and towns of their territory at the ſame time aſſumed an independence, and, being claimed by no ſovereign, were governed by their own ſeparate councils and determinations; ſo that the dominions of the republic in Italy were, for a conſiderable time, almoſt bounded by the walls of their city.

e The great ſucceſs that attended their arms in Aſia, now began to awaken their ambition; they, therefore, reſolved to reduce all the old marquiſate under their dominion; and at the ſame time that they rebuilt Porto Venere, they conquered Lavagna and its ſmall territory. Soon after, many towns and diſtricts voluntarily ſubmitted to the republic, which, now abounding in wealth, exacted no taxes or tribute from its new ſubjects, but afforded them protection from the petty inſults of their neighbours [w].

During the following quadriennial conſulſhip nothing memorable appears to have been tranſacted by the Genoeſe. At the next election they made a ſmall alteration in the form of government, and choſe eight ſupreme magiſtrates for four years, four of whom were to govern the firſt two years, and the other four during the remaining time. In the firſt

f year of this conſulſhip, according to the Genoeſe writers, pope Gelaſius the ſecond, had recourſe to the protection of the republic againſt the emperor Henry the fifth, and was conducted by their gallies from Gaeta to Provence, after having ſtopped at Genoa, where, in the A. D. 1118. month of October, he conſecrated the church of St. Laurence [x]. Other cotemporary writers, however, make no mention of the pope's arrival at Genoa; but, on the contrary, tell us, that he ſtopped ſome time at Piſa, and was honourably entertained by that republic [y].

A few months after a new war broke out betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans, on account of A new war betwixt them and the Piſans. the iſland of Corſica, which had been lately invaded by a Piſan fleet. According to Caffarus, hoſtilities were commenced by the Genoeſe, who with a fleet of ſixteen gallies, in the A. D. 1119.

month of May ſurpriſing the Piſans in a port of Sardinia, obtained a complete victory, and a very rich booty. The Piſans tell us, that the year following their archbiſhop embarked on board their fleet, and defeated the Genoeſe in Porto Venere, which ſeems ſcarce to agree with the account of Caffarus, who relates, that his countrymen fitted out a moſt formidable fleet, conſiſting of no leſs than eighty galleys, with ſixty-eight other veſſels, on board of which were embarked twenty-two thouſand horſe and foot, five thouſand of whom were clad in complete armour of poliſhed ſteel, as bright as ſnow. The Piſans, he ſays, upon ſight of this armament, which appeared before their city, were ſo terrified, that they immediately ſubmitted to the terms of peace preſcribed by the Genoeſe, reſtored Corſica, and reſigned all pretenſions to the inauguration of the biſhops of that iſland. a

A. D. 1121. THIS peace, however, was of very ſhort continuance; for two years after the Piſans, not able to bear the hard conditions impoſed upon them, imprudently renewed the war. The Genoeſe, who ſome months before had been employed in an expedition in the Apennines, where they made ſeveral conqueſts, immediately marched with their army into the territories of the Piſans, which they ravaged, and carried off one thouſand captives, whom they impriſoned at Genoa. At ſea likewiſe they made prizes of two rich veſſels belonging to the Piſans, who in their annals make no mention of theſe loſſes; but give an account of ſix Genoeſe gallies taken by them in the river Arno [z]. The hiſtorians of each republic appear to have been ſolicitous only to narrate the advantages and victories of their countrymen, and to have ſacredly abſtained from ſtaining their glory by mentioning their loſſes and defeats. The diſputes between the two republics troubling the repoſe of Italy, pope Calixtus, who b

A. D. 1123. had aſſembled a general council at the Lateran church the following year, ſummoned the two parties to Rome, to decide the controverſy about the conſecration of the Corſican biſhops. The affair being left to the arbitration of twelve archbiſhops and twelve biſhops, it was at laſt decided, that the right of the conſecration of the Corſican biſhops ſhould for the future be reſerved to the popes. c

BY this ſelfiſh determination the pope rather inflamed than quieted the diſcords; for tho' the Genoeſe declared themſelves ſatisfied with the ſentence, yet the Piſans were highly enraged. The archbiſhop immediately pulled off his ring and mitre, and threw them at the feet of the pope, who kicked them from him in great diſdain. Their deputies alſo left Rome without taking leave; and the year after the war was renewed with greater animoſity d than before. The Genoeſe gained ſeveral advantages over the Piſans; recovered from them the caſtle of St. Angelo in Corſica; and took twenty-two of their veſſels richly laden from Sardinia, which had been deſerted by their convoy of nine gallies, though the Genoeſe attacked them only with ſeven. The Piſan hiſtorians, however, tell us, that the following year their republic fitted out a fleet of eighty gallies, and recovered St. Angelo; which, as to the taking of the caſtle, may be probable, as the Genoeſe make mention of recovering it again from the Piſans; but the ſtrength of their fleet ſeems not to agree with the account of Caffarus, who was this year conſul, and relates, that the Genoeſe kept the Piſan coaſts blocked up for a great part of the ſummer with ten gallies; and that in the month of September hearing that eight Piſan gallies had ſailed from the Arno, they went in purſuit of them with ſeven; e but not meeting with them, they ſailed to Piombino, which they took and plundered, and carried off a great number of the inhabitants priſoners to Genoa [a].

The Genoeſe invade the territories of Piſa. A. D. 1126. THE war ſtill continuing, the Genoeſe the next year ſailed with a numerous fleet up the Arno, landed their forces in the territory of the Piſans, and after ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes ſailed to Piombino, which they again made themſelves maſters of; and from thence proceeded to Corſica, where they took three hundred Piſans priſoners, and recovered the caſtle of St. Angelo. This far Caffarus; but, according to Volateranus, the Genoeſe beſieged the city of Piſa a whole year, and reduced the Piſans to the greateſt diſtreſs; which account the Piſan hiſtorians alledge is a mere fable, without any foundation [b]. Two years after the Genoeſe made themſelves maſters of Montalto; and the following ſummer they attacked the Piſans with ſixteen gallies in the harbour of Meſſina, and as the Meſſinians gave aſſiſtance to their enemies, they even took poſſeſſion of their city, which, however, they quitted at the intreaty of king Roger [c]. Pope Honorius, dying a few months after, the ſucceſſion to the papal chair was diſputed by Innocent and Anaclet, who were both elected on the ſame day. The king of Sicily and the Romans having declared for Anaclet, Innocent was obliged to quit Rome, and to go to France, to implore the aſſiſtance of the French king and the emperor: but before he left Italy, he prevailed upon the Genoeſe and Piſans to agree to a truce till his return from a been conſecrated by the pope. About two years after, the pope having prevailed on the emperor Lotharius II. to march into Italy to his aſſiſtance againſt Anaclet, returned himſelf to Piſa, where he continued ſeveral months, and at length mediated a peace betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans. To prevent any future diſputes about conſecrating the Corſican biſhops, he erected the ſee of Genoa into an archbiſhopric, and ſubjected to its juriſdiction three of the biſhops of Corſica, leaving the three other biſhops of that iſland under the juriſdiction of the archbiſhop of Piſa. The Genoeſe the ſame year ſent eight gallies to Rome to the aſſiſtance of the emperor and the pope againſt the party of Anaclet; and as the city of Lavagna had revolted, the conſuls marched with an army, and obliged it again to ſubmit to the republic.

A peace concluded betwixt the two republics. A. D. 1130.

b The following year the Genoeſe, to the ſeven old corporations or companies added a new one, and for every company choſe two conſuls. Having now no enemy to contend with in Italy, they turned their arms againſt the Moors in Africa and Spain, who by their piracies diſturbed the trade of the Mediterranean: they were very ſucceſsful during the four following years in their expeditions againſt the infidels, from whom they took many rich prizes. Having cleared the Mediterranean ſea of thoſe pirates, the year after they obtained a golden bull from the emperor Conrad the third, confirming their privilege of coining money; in gratitude for which favour they decreed, that the name of Conrad ſhould be ſtamped upon their money; and calling in the bruneti, publiſhed a new coin. A few months after the Ventimiglians revolting, the Genoeſe the following year inveſted their city by ſea and c land, and quickly obliged it to ſurrender, having at the ſame time reduced the whole county, and obliging all thoſe under its juriſdiction again to renew their allegiance with the republic. During the two following years the Genoeſe were not engaged in any enterprize of importance; but the year after they took Montpelier, which they reſtored to its proprietor, who, in return for their aſſiſtance, granted them a ſettlement in that city, with a ſmall territory in Thoulouſe, and an exemption from all duties in his dominions [d]. The Genoeſe about the ſame time, ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, who, after long ſolicitation, at length obtained from pope Lucius the ſecond, a remiſſion of the annual tribute of a pound of gold for the iſland of Corſica, with many other privileges, and a confirmation of all their rights in Syria [e].

The Genoeſe turn their arms againſt the Moors. A. D. 1134. A. D. 1139. A. D. 1144.

d As the Moors again infeſted the Mediterranean, the Genoeſe about two years after fitted out a fleet of twenty-two gallies, and ſix other veſſels, and ſent them under the command of Caffarus and Oberto Torre to Minorca. Caffarus, landing his troops at the port of Furnelles, ravaged a great part of the iſland, and the fourth day after returned with the booty to the port, when he was almoſt ſurpriſed by three hundred Mooriſh horſe, with a large body of foot: though he had only one hundred horſe, yet he immediately attacked the enemy, and after an obſtinate diſpute, repulſed them and purſued them eight miles. He afterwards took and plundered the chief city of the iſland; and, embarking his troops with the booty, he ſailed over the coaſt of Granada, and in the harbour of Almeria ſeized a great many Mooriſh ſhips. Having then landed his troops, he inveſted the city, which ſtruck e the Moors with ſo great a panic, that they immediately offered a large ſum of money to the Genoeſe, on condition that they would quit their territories. The offer being accepted, part of the money was directly paid, and hoſtages given till the remainder of the ſum ſhould be collected. The king in the mean time abſconding with his treaſure, the Moors elected another chief, who promiſed to fulfil the engagements of his predeceſſor; but the time limited for the payment elapſing, the Genoeſe, who now deſpaired of taking the city, ravaged the country in its neighbourhood, and in the beginning of winter returned to Genoa.

A. D. 1146.

The Moors of Granada, about this time, making frequent irruptions into Caſtile, the king of Spain earneſtly ſolicited pope Eugenius the third to intereſt himſelf in his behalf. f The pope accordingly, for that purpoſe, the following year ſent a legate to Genoa, whoſe endeavours being ſeconded by the archbiſhop, the Genoeſe were perſuaded to lay aſide their domeſtic diſſentions, which even then began to diſturb the tranquility of the republic, and with great ardor made immenſe preparations for an expedition againſt the infidels. The women having even contributed to the expence of the armament, about four months after the firſt reſolution, a powerful fleet was equipped, conſiſting of ſixty-four gallies and one hundred and ſixty-three tranſport veſſels, which ſailed to Almeria, under the command of ſix of the conſuls. The Genoeſe, after their arrival upon the coaſt of Granada, being joined by a few gallies and troops belonging to the count of Barcelona, immediately inveſted Almeria; and being reinforced by the arrival of the king of Spain, with one thouſand foot and four g hundred horſe, they quickly made a breach in the wall, and, on the eighteenth of October, took the city by ſtorm, when, 'tis ſaid, twenty thouſand Moors were ſlain, and ten thouſand made captives, who were afterwards carried to Genoa. The booty of the city, with the money paid by the Moors, who ranſomed themſelves, was computed at ninety thouſand crowns of gold, the greateſt part of which was diſtributed by the conſuls to the ſoldiers and mariners. a ALMERIA being thus reduced, the Genoeſe left a garriſon of one thouſand men in the city, and ſailed with the reſt of their forces to Barcelona, where, at the entreaty of the count, they fixed their winter ſtation, in order to aſſiſt him the following year in an expedition againſt Tortoſa. Accordingly, in the beginning of July, having received conſiderable ſupplies from Genoa, they ſailed up the Ebro, and being joined by the counts of Barcelona and Montpelier, and by ſeveral Engliſh knights templars, they inveſted the city, which they quickly made themſelves maſters of by ſtorm. The citadel, however, did not ſurrender till near ſix months after, as the Genoeſe during the ſiege had been deſerted by all their allies. Upon the reduction of the place, the count of Barcelona, who had remained after the deſertion of his troops, granted a third part of the city and all the booty to the Genoeſe, who returned in a triumphant manner in the beginning of the following year to Genoa [f]. b

Make themſelves maſters of Tortoſa. A. D. 1148.

DURING the remaining part of the year, and the four following annual conſulſhips, the Genoeſe were engaged in no enterprize of importance, which is attributed by Folieta partly to their opulence and internal diviſions, and to their apprehenſion of their arrival of the emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa, whoſe fierce and impetuous diſpoſition had alarmed all Italy, as he had been threatening for two or three years utterly to deſtroy thoſe Italian cities that ſhould refuſe obedience to his commands. Caffarus informs us, that about this period the whole ſtate ſeemed to be ſeized with a lethargy; ſo that the conſuls who were choſen at the following election, with difficulty were prevailed upon, by the moſt preſſing entreaties of the archbiſhop, to accept of the conſulſhip. Having at length entered upon the magiſtracy, they immediately ordered a great many new gallies to be built, and cauſed others to be repaired: they likewiſe applied themſelves to diſcharge the public debts, which in a ſhort time they partly accompliſhed. Before the expiration of their conſulſhip, the emperor Frederic arriving with an army at Ronkalia, in the plains of Lombardy, they ſent their archdeacon and the hiſtorian Caffarus to his camp, to take the oath of allegiance to him in the name of the republic. Caffarus has even omitted to give us any detail of his ambaſſy, and only mentions that they were received with great honour by the emperor, with whom they had many ſecret conferences, in which he was very liberal of his promiſes to the republic. But we are informed by Folieta, that Frederic, who wanted to make uſe of the Genoeſe naval forces in his expeditions in Italy, concluded nothing abſolutely with the ambaſſadors, hoping by keeping the republic in ſuſpence to prevail with it to ſecond his deſigns. His expectations, however, were diſappointed; for the following conſuls refuſed to agree to his demand, or to ſend hoſtages to his camp for their fidelity. The Genoeſe, apprehenſive of his reſentment, which they heard he openly expreſſed againſt them, immediately began to prepare for their defence, and to fortify the city with great ardour. By their vigorous meaſures the emperor was deterred from advancing into their territories, and declared himſelf ſatisfied with their oath of allegiance. c d e

A. D. 1155.

THE conſuls, in the mean time, redeemed all the mortgages upon the revenues of the republic, and concluded an alliance with the Greek emperor, who promiſed to pay a large ſubſidy yearly to the republic, granted the Genoeſe a ſtreet and church in Conſtantinople, and lowered the duties on commerce to them forty per cent. through all his dominions. They probably obtained theſe advantageous terms by refuſing to concur with the emperor Frederic; for we find a few years after the Greek emperor rejected the offered alliance of the Piſans, becauſe they would not agree to abandon the intereſts of the emperor of Germany [g]. During the ſame conſulſhip, the Genoeſe eſtabliſhed their authority in the Italian territories upon a more certain foundation, and ſent an ambaſſador to the pope to make a complaint againſt the king of Jeruſalem, the prince of Antioch, and the count of Tripoli, who had infringed the privileges of their ſubjects in their dominions. Adrian the fourth, who was then at Benevento, having conſidered the remonſtrances of the Genoeſe, immediately wrote to the three eaſtern princes, threatening them with excommunication, if they did not without delay reſtore the ſubjects of the republic to their privileges. f

A. D. 1156.

THE following conſuls ſent an ambaſſy to William the firſt, king of Sicily, with whom they concluded a treaty of commerce, and prevailed with him to expel all the Provincial and French merchants from his dominions; which he was eaſily perſuaded to, as one Bernard, a French pirate, had ſeized and plundered many veſſels belonging to his ſubjects [h]. The year after, the count of Ventimiglia at length voluntarily ſubmitted to the republic; and upon g a taking the oath of allegiance, received the inveſtiture of all his eſtates from the conſuls. While the Genoeſe were thus occupied in extending their commerce and aggrandizing their ſtate, they were again alarmed with the news of the emperor's arrival in Italy in a hoſtile manner, attended by a formidable army, compoſed of different nations. Frederic, by beſieging and reducing Milan, ſtruck a terror into all the cities of Lombardy, who immediately ſubmitted, acknowledged themſelves tributary to him, and renounced the regalia, or rights of ſovereignty, which they had aſſumed. The Genoeſe, however, ſtill abſolutely refuſed to renounce their regalia, or to give him hoſtages, inſiſting that they had been exempted from tribute by former emperors, in conſideration of defending the coaſts of the Mediterranean betwixt Rome and Barcelona from the ravages of the infidels. The citizens in the mean time, b being firmly reſolved to oppoſe the emperor's demands, both men and women, young and old, wrought at the walls, the foundation of which had been extended, and begun about four years before, without intermiſſion; ſo that in eight days they compleated what by any other city of Italy would have been reckoned the work of twelve months. The emperor, finding them inflexibly bent upon defending their liberty, and conſidering the great difficulty of attacking their city, which was ſtrongly garriſoned and open to the ſea, conſented to a treaty with them, and upon promiſing them his protection, received their oath of fidelity, and a preſent of one thouſand two hundred marks [i].

As the emperor ſtill continued in Lombardy, and became every day more formidable, the Genoeſe thought proper the following year to complete the wall of their city, which we are c told by Caffarus and Folieta extended 5520 feet, and was ornamented with 1070 merlans, but at the ſame time comprehended only one half of the city, which towards the ſea was naturally fortified by ſteep precipices. The factions of the city were by this time become very violent, ſo that the two parties ſometimes committed hoſtilities againſt each other; but by the prudence of the following conſuls, Caffarus informs us, they were greatly ſuppreſſed. The ſuſpenſion of their civil animoſities was perhaps chiefly owing to their being engaged anew in foreign expeditions; for we find the next year one of the conſuls, Oberto Spinola, ſailed with five gallies to Spain, and obliged one of the Mooriſh kings, whoſe ſubjects had lately infeſted the trade of the republic, to agree to a peace for fifteen years; in which treaty it was ſtipulated, that he ſhould pay a certain ſum yearly to the Genoeſe, and d allow them the freedom of trade in his dominions. A few months after the return of the conſul, Alexander the third arrived at Genoa, in his way to France, being obliged to leave Italy, on account of the protection granted by the emperor to the anti-pope Victor. The pope, in return for the kind reception he met with from the Genoeſe, enlarged the privileges of their ſee, and, according to Folieta, created the archbiſhop perpetual legate of the provinces beyond ſea.

They oblige the Moors of Spain to agree to a peace. A. D. 1161.

While Alexander was preparing for his departure from Genoa, the emperor Frederic on the firſt of March obliged the city of Milan to ſurrender, after a long ſiege of ſeveral months; and being highly irritated againſt the inhabitants, on account of their breach of faith, he entirely deſtroyed the city, and obliged them to live in four towns, at two miles diſtance from each e other. This example of ſeverity ſtruck a new panic into all the ſtates of Lombardy and Tuſcany, whom he again ſummoned to his court at Pavia. The Genoeſe deputies, being privately urged by his courtiers to ſubmit quietly to his demands, they declared their willingneſs to obey, but inſiſted that the emperor, in return, ought to diſtinguiſh them above the other cities of Italy. Frederic, being pleaſed with their ready compliance, accordingly entered into a treaty with them, by which he confirmed their privileges, and extended their juriſdiction over all the coaſt of Liguria, from the city of Monaco to the river Macra, great part of which had hitherto been ſubject to different marquiſſes, who had never acknowledged their authority. The Genoeſe, for theſe favours, promiſed to aſſiſt the emperor with their fleets and forces in all his expeditions [k].

A. D. 1162.

f The republic had no ſooner concluded this treaty with the emperor, than it was engaged in a new war with the Piſans, which was occaſioned by a quarrel betwixt the ſubjects of the two republics at Conſtantinople. According to Caffarus, one thouſand Piſans, being aſſiſted by ſome Venetians and Greeks, attacked three hundred Genoeſe in their quarter, and after an obſtinate diſpute drove them from the city, and killed ſome of thoſe they took priſoners in cold blood. The Genoeſe immediately declared war againſt the Piſans, and hoſtilities commenced betwixt the two republics with various ſucceſs; but the emperor interpoſing his authority, deputies from both ſtates waited upon him at Turin, and in the end of the year agreed to a truce till his return from Germany. About two years after, the emperor returning to Italy, deputies immediately waited upon him from Genoa and Piſa, g for negotiating a peace, which, however, was interrupted upon the following account. One Bariſſo, a judge or governor of one of the four provinces of Sardinia, by the perſuaſion of the Genoeſe, who had a great party in that iſland, ſent an ambaſſador to Frederic, aſking the crown of Sardinia, offering to pay him an annual quit-rent, and to give him directly four thouſand marks of ſilver. The emperor, who graſped at every opportunity of extending his dominion over the Italians, readily hearkened to this propoſal; and, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Piſans, who inſiſted with great warmth that the ſovereignty of Sardinia belonged to them, he created Bariſſo king of the iſland, and ſolemnly put the crown upon his head in the church of St. Syris in Pavia. The Genoeſe, in oppoſition to the Piſans, ſtrenuouſly alledged, that Sardinia belonged to them; and, as Bariſſo wanted money, they paid the four thouſand marks for him to the emperor, and upon his return to Genoa lent him other conſiderable ſums, which he promiſed to pay before he landed on the iſland. The Genoeſe accordingly accompanied him thither; but perceiving he had ſome intrigues with the Sardinians and Piſans, they would not allow him to land till the money was paid. After various delays, finding the Sardinians intended only to deceive them, they carried back the king to Genoa, and committed him a priſoner to ſome nobles.

THE civil diſſentions at the ſame time were very violent in the city. Tumults and ſkirmiſhes were very frequent; and in the month of November, one of the conſuls was murdered at his country ſeat by the plebeians. The following conſuls, immediately after their election, applied themſelves to put a ſtop to the civil diſcords, and obliged all the citizens to go unarmed, and agree to a truce during their conſulſhip. As the Piſans, about the ſame time, were accuſed of violating the truce which had hitherto ſubſiſted, by plundering a Genoeſe veſſel which had been ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Sardinia, the conſuls of the two republics appeared before one of the emperor's chaplains at Porto Venere, whom Frederic had appointed arbitrator of their differences. After long debates, the conferences were broke off without any effect, and hoſtilities were renewed with great animoſity, and mutual damage to each republic. The Genoeſe made a deſcent upon Sardinia, which was almoſt wholly under the dominion of the Piſans, who ſurpriſed and burnt Albenga and another town in the Genoeſe territories. The war continued with various ſucceſs to each of the parties for ten years, during which time the Genoeſe conſuls with great dufficulty could ſuppreſs their domeſtic factions. Six of the chiefs of each party having agreed to fight ſingle combats, the conſuls granted them permiſſion, and a day was appointed to decide their quarrel; but the combatants, with many other citizens, being then aſſembled in the archbiſhop's palace, where the ſacred relicks were produced, the ſerious exhortations of the prelate had ſuch an effect, that both parties dropt their animoſities, and embraced as friends. The archbiſhop of Mentz, in the mean time, who was chancellor of the empire in Italy, was perſuaded by the Piſans to grant them the inveſtiture of Sardinia. The Genoeſe, to occaſion a diverſion to their enemies, entered into an alliance with the Luccheſe; and the Piſans, on the other hand, concluded a treaty with the Florentines: but all parties at length being weary of the war, they referred their diſputes to the arbitration of the emperor, who had returned a fifth time to Italy, and was then at Pavia. Frederic, after conſidering the claims of both republics, principals in the war, divided the iſland of Sardinia betwixt them, without any regard to the inveſtiture formerly given to Bariſſo, who was ſtill a priſoner in Genoa, though we are informed by the continuator of Caffarus, that a few years before he had been carried to Sardinia, and had made a ſecond unſucceſsful attempt to raiſe the money he owed to the Genoeſe. By this peace, the Genoeſe were likewiſe ordered to demoliſh a caſtle which they had built againſt the Piſans; and theſe laſt were prohibited from coining falſe Luccheſe money [l].

As the ſaladin of Egypt, about this time, was threatening to attack the Chriſtians in Paleſtine, the Genoeſe, two years after the peace with the Piſans, concluded an alliance with him, by which he promiſed not to moleſt their territories in Syria, provided the republic ſhould give no aſſiſtance to his enemies [m]. During the nine following years the Genoeſe enjoyed great tranquility, the violence of their factions being moderated by the prudence of the conſuls. They were, in the mean time, obliged to ſend a body of troops againſt ſome towns in their eaſtern and weſtern territory, which had committed ſeveral outrages againſt their neighbours. The conſequence of thoſe diſturbances was the ſubmiſſion of the city of Nice, which put itſelf under the protection of the republic. The following year the animoſities which had formerly diſturbed the ſtate, were again revived, on account of the murder of one of the conſuls, and two other nobles. The aſſaſſins being diſcovered were baniſhed the city, and their houſes and all their effects were deſtroyed. The Piſans about the ſame time, in violation of the late treaty, having attacked the Genoeſe merchants in Sardinia, and expelled them from the diſtrict of Calaris, the republic immediately raiſed an army, and fitted out a ſtrong fleet, which they ſent to Porto Venere, with the intention of revenging the inſult: however, at the interceſſion of the emperor's ſon Henry, they recalled their land

a forces; but Fulco di Caſtello, with ten gallies, ſailed to Corſica, and deſtroyed a caſtle which had been erected on the coaſt by the Piſans.

In the mean time, news arriving in Italy that the ſaladin of Egypt had taken Jeruſalem, and entirely defeated the Chriſtians, who had loſt all their territories in Syria, except Tripoli, Tyre, and Antioch, Clement the third, who, the following year was promoted to the pontificate, publiſhed indulgences over all Chriſtendom for a new cruſade againſt the infidels; and that the diſpute betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans might not interrupt the ſacred expedition, he prevailed upon the two republics to agree to a peace. The city of Genoa being likewiſe in great confuſion by the violence of the two oppoſite factions, who were continually ſkirmiſhing with each other, the pope intereſted himſelf alſo in their diſputes; and by means of a b cardinal legate perſuaded the two parties to agree to an amicable accommodation, which, however, was of very ſhort continuance; for the next year hoſtilities were again renewed, and with great difficulty quelled by the conſuls. The kings of France and England, in the mean time, making immenſe preparations for a new expedition to the Holy Land, and requeſting the aſſiſtance of the Genoeſe, the republic ſent an ambaſſador to England, and another to France, declaring their great readineſs to ſecond the enterprizes of the cruſards. At the ſame time ſeveral of the conſuls ſailed from Genoa with a large body of horſe and foot, who aſſiſted at the ſiege of Acon, which, two years after, was taken chiefly by means of the battering engines that they brought with them, and conſtructed after their arrival [n]. The year following another fleet of cruſards and pilgrims ſailed from Genoa.

c The factions in the mean time diſturbing the city, and becoming every day more violent, the conſuls at length reſolved to imitate ſome other ſtates of Italy, and to commit the government of the republic to a foreigner. Accordingly, after mature deliberation, Manegold de Tetocio, a citizen of Breſcia, of great reputation for prudence and juſtice, was choſen podeſta. The daring inſolence of the factions may be eaſily perceived from the behaviour of Fulco di Caſtello, who with ſome of his family, ſoon after broke into the room where the podeſta and conſuls were aſſembled, and killed Lanfranc Piper, one of the conſuls. Manegold next day called a general council; and after addreſſing the people, he put on his armour, and went with ſome forces to the palace of Fulco, which he ordered to be directly razed. The aſſaſſins eſcaped puniſhment by abandoning their native country, and taking refuge in d Placenza. A. D. 1190.

As the ſucceſſion to the kingdom of Naples was at this time diſputed betwixt the emperor Henry, and Tancred, a royal baſtard, the Genoeſe entered into a treaty with Henry, who, on condition that they would aſſiſt him againſt his competitor, confirmed to them the privileges granted by former kings of Sicily, and beſides gave them the city of Syracuſe, with a large territory in that iſland. Upon the concluſion of this treaty, the podeſta immediately fitted out a fleet of thirty-three gallies, which in the end of ſummer ſailed to the coaſt of Naples; but the emperor being prevented by ſickneſs from proſecuting the war, a few weeks after the fleet returned to Genoa, without having been engaged in any action [o].

The Genoeſe, finding no good effects from the alteration of the form of government, the A. D. 1191. e following year reſtored the conſuls, who enjoyed, however, a mere ſhadow of authority, the violence of the factions filling the whole city with confuſion and anarchy. The chiefs of the oppoſite parties aſſaulted each other's houſes and towers with battering engines, while their partizans were continually engaged in ſkirmiſhing; ſo that the conſuls, at length intimidated, renounced their office, and hid themſelves in their houſes. Theſe tumults continued near three years, till the arrival of Marcoald, ſeneſchal of the emperor, who fearing leſt the civil diſſentions would prevent the equipping of a fleet for the Sicilian expedition, called a general aſſembly of the people, and prevailed with them to ſuſpend their animoſities, and to chuſe Oberto d'Olivano, a nobleman of Pavia, of a diſtinguiſhed character, as the podeſta for the remaining part of the year, and the year following [p].

f HENRY ſoon after arrived at Genoa, and declaring, that if Sicily was conquered, it A. D. 1194. would wholly belong to the republic, as he intended to ſpend his life in Germany, he cajoled the Genoeſe to eſpouſe his intereſts with ardour; ſo that in the month of Auguſt the podeſta, having appointed a vicar to govern in his abſence, ſailed with a numerous fleet to Naples, and from thence to Sicily; where he performed many ſignal ſervices to the emperor. A quarrel happening betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans at Meſſina, in which the Genoeſe were worſted, the diſgrace ſo affected him, that he ſickened and died; but his ſucceſſor in command ſtill continuing to aſſiſt the Germans, they at laſt made themſelves maſters of the whole iſland of Sicily. Henry, however, who was noted for his perfidy and tyrannical diſpoſition, inſtead of fulfilling his engagements to the Genoeſe, deprived them of all their former privig leges, in Sicily; prohibited, under pain of death, any of their ſubjects from taking the title of conſul in his kingdom; and threatened, if they ſhould expreſs any reſentment, to deſtroy their city.

THE Genoese immediately quitted Sicily and returned home, when James Munerius of Milan was chosen podesta for the ensuing year. During his government, the Genoese were employed in repressing the insults of the Pisans, who in a piratical manner took many of their ships, and rebuilt the castle which had been formerly destroyed in Corsica. The republic, during the two following years, was governed by the same podesta, namely Drudus Marcellinus, a nobleman of Milan, of great activity and resolution, who, being assisted by eight collegues, exerted himself both against the Pisans and the seditious nobles. He ordered all the towers of the city, which were the chief receptacles of the factious, to be lowered to the measure of eighty feet; and by punishing some criminals of note, struck a terror into all offenders. He was succeeded in authority by another noble citizen of Milan, Albert de Mandello, who, being likewise assisted with eight collegues, governed the republic with great pru- b dence and success. His successor was Beltram Christian of Pavia, who was assisted by six rectors; and, in the beginning of his government, sent eight gallies to meet and convoy the ships returning from the Levant. As the inhabitants of Ventimiglia that year revolted, the Genoese invested their city by land and sea for two months; but, from some treachery in the army, the siege proving unsuccessful, it was raised in the end of August, when the troops returned to Genoa. Two years after, however, the Ventimiglians came and voluntarily submitted to the consuls, to whom the government of the republic was again committed.

Ventimiglia revolts and is besieged without success. A. D. 1199.

UPON the expiration of their consulship, the Genoese again chose a podesta, named Guifredottus Grassellus, a nobleman of Milan, who governed the republic three years. As a proof of the great extent of the Genoese commerce at this period, Folieta informs us, that the re- c public obtained several privileges from the king of Armenia, who besides granted them a church, and a certain district, in three of his cities [q]. The new podesta, desirous of putting an end to the piratic war, which, from the quarrel at Messina, had now subsisted near eight years betwixt the Genoese and Pisans, had a conference with several Pisan deputies for a peace. An accommodation, however, could not be effected, and hostilities still continued, to the mutual damage of both republics. After the conferences, the podesta entered into treaty with the marquisses of Gavi, who, upon receiving a large sum of money, and being created citizens of Genoa, resigned their whole territories, situated in the Alpes Cottiæ, to the republic [r]. Guifredottus, in the last two years of his government, was engaged in quelling the factions among the nobles, and accommodating some particular differences betwixt seve- d ral towns and districts of the territories of the republic. He was likewise attentive to prosecute the war against the Pisans, who had seized Syracuse, and expelled the bishop and a great many of the inhabitants. Great numbers of the Genoese ships having assembled at Crete, in their return from the Levant, a resolution was formed by their commanders to attack Syracuse, which they accordingly made themselves masters of by assault; and, putting the Pisans to death, restored the bishop and inhabitants, but gave the command of the city to one of their own citizens.

TOWARDS the end of his government, the Genoese attacked and seized a Venetian ship returning from Constantinople, loaded with wealth and many precious relicks, among which was the real cross presented by the empress Helena to her son. The Genoese annalists e assign no reason for this rupture with the Venetians: perhaps the republic of Genoa espoused the interests of Alexis Commines, who the year before had been expelled by the Venetians and crusards from the throne of Constantinople, which he had usurped from his brother [s]. However it be, we find the Genoese the following year, when Fulco di Castello, by the interest of his faction, had caused himself to be elected podesta, again attacked the Venetians in the Archipelago, and took from them two rich ships, on board of one of which were upwards of nine hundred men [t]. At the same time they gave assistance to the count of Tripoli against the Turks in Syria, and relieved the city of Syracuse, which was besieged by the Pisans, who venturing a naval engagement were entirely defeated, and lost about twenty vessels. This was one of the most considerable actions that had been done for several years; for though there f was great rivalship and enmity betwixt the two republics, yet the war was carried on without any general plan by both of them, who were chiefly intent upon extending their commerce. The military expeditions seem to have been most frequently undertaken by private adventurers, and the whole operations of a summer to have been confined to the taking of a few trading vessels and gallies. The war continued in this manner for three years longer, when a truce was agreed to, which the year after was converted into a perpetual peace.

THE consuls, in the mean time, were again restored, and the island of Crete was taken from the Venetians by a noble Genoese, Henry count of Malea, by some called Malta, who, having received considerable reinforcements from Genoa, defeated the Venetian fleet, and took Raynerius Dandulus, the doge and admiral, prisoner, who died a few days after [u]. a the Venetians, however, made great preparations for recovering the iſland, the Genoeſe, tho' again at war with the Piſans, who in a few months had violated the peace, fitted out a formidable fleet in ſupport of count Henry; and to defray the expence of the armament, impoſed a new tax for ſix years. Mean while the emperor Otho the fourth arriving in Italy, by his mediation a ceſſation of hoſtilities was again agreed to betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans for two years. The republic the following year elected Raynerius, or Renatus Cotta, a citizen of Milan, podeſta, who began his government with appointing a board of eight nobles to proſecute a war againſt the Marſilians, who had countenanced ſome of their ſubjects in depredations upon the trade of the Genoeſe. The Marſilians, being quickly diſtreſſed by the Genoeſe armaments, in the end of the year ſent ten of their nobles to Genoa, who prevailed on b the republic to grant them a peace for twenty-one years. The Genoeſe, at the ſame time, were obliged to puniſh the inſolence of the inhabitants of Nice, who, though they had formerly put themſelves under the protection of the republic, now piratically ſeized the Genoeſe ſhips. The ſame podeſta enlarged the territories of the republic by purchaſing Corvaria, ordered the marquis of Gavi, who had revolted, to be impriſoned for ten years, and cauſed ſome public roads to be made for the conveniency of inland commerce. The following year the Genoeſe again committed the government to conſuls, who were ſo ſucceſsful as to conclude a truce with the Piſans for five years, and with the Venetians for three (A). A. D. 1211.

BEFORE the expiration of the truce with the Venetians, the Genoeſe enlarged their territories by the acquiſition of the eſtates of the marquis Caretto, who reſigned them voluntarily A. D. 1215.
c to the republic: they likewiſe fortified the caſtle of Monaco, and made ſeveral alterations in the ſtate of the revenue, which they ordered to be farmed annually. Soon after they received the ſubmiſſion of the Niceans; and being informed that ſome Venetian, Piſan, and Provençal gallies, had ſailed from Conſtantinople, and ſeized ſeveral Genoeſe ſhips in Sicily, they ordered preparations to be made for an expedition to the Levant; but the year after, hearing that the Venetians were making no warlike preparations in Romania, they likewiſe deferred their armament.

ACCORDING to Folieta, the Genoeſe about this time ſent an ambaſſy to the king of Armenia, who confirmed to them their privileges in his dominions, particularly the freedom of juriſdiction. Though they always inſiſted on a free juriſdiction in foreign countries, yet, d what is remarkable, this year they introduced a new eſtabliſhment at home, and for the firſt time committed the deciſion of civil cauſes to five foreign judges [w]. The following year A. D. 1216.
the government of the republic was again committed to a podeſta; and by the interceſſion of pope Honorius the third, who was very deſirous of forming a third general cruſade to the Holy Land, a peace was concluded betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans; which, not many months after, was followed by an accommodation betwixt the republic and the Venetians. The Genoeſe, about the ſame time, conducted a great many French barons to the Holy Land; and the year after, ſent ten gallies to the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtians at the ſiege of Damiata in Egypt.

THE two following years were ſpent in expenſive and ineffectual expeditions againſt the e Ventimiglians, who, being, aſſiſted by the Provençals, made many ſallies againſt the beſiegers, in which they were generally ſucceſsful; but the entrance of their harbour being at length blocked up, they were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion to the podeſta, who generouſly granted them a pardon. Soon after the ſubmiſſion of the Ventimiglians, the Genoeſe having received ſome injury from the Piſans in Acon, which is not particularized by their hiſtorians, after a ſhort engagement drove the Piſan from the city: but their enemies being countenanced by the king of Jeruſalem, they themſelves retired from Acon, with all their effects, to Berytus. The Ventimiglians again revolt. A. The immoderate expence of this war, and the arrival of the emperor Frederic the ſecond at Cremona, tempted the inhabitants of Savona and Albenga the following year to revolt, and put themſelves under the protection of the count of Savoy, the Imperial vicar in Italy. (A) The continuator of Caffarus relates, that one Nicolas, a German boy, arrived this year at Genoa in the habit of a pilgrim, followed by upwards of ſeven thouſand men, women, and children, who had taken the croſs with the intention of proceeding to Syria, being actuated by a ſuperſtitious opinion that the ſea was to be dried up, to allow them to walk directly to Jeruſalem. The conſuls ordered them immediately to quit the city; but as they had no home, many of them, who laid aſide the thoughts of their pilgrimage, were allowed to continue.

hauſted as they expected, and the emperor neglecting to give them any aſſiſtance, they were obliged the year after again to ſubmit to the Genoeſe, who about the ſame time concluded a peace with Tortona and Alexandria, by the mediation of the inhabitants of Milan. The republic was no ſooner freed from foreign wars than the domeſtic diſſentions again revived, it being diſcovered that a ſociety had been ſecretly formed by many of the nobility for dividing among themſelves all the offices of the ſtate, to the excluſion of the other citizens. The podeſta, however, found means of pacifying the oppoſite parties, as the republic was ſtill threatened with a renewal of the war with the Alexandrians, who appeared diſſatisfied with the late accommodation, and the following year treacherouſly ſurpriſed Capriata. This

THE Genoeſe being now freed from all apprehenſions of diſturbances in Italy, the next year ſent ſeveral ambaſſies to the Levant, to renew their alliances with the eaſtern princes. They

The Genoeſe were greatly alarmed and irritated by theſe proceedings, and immediately ſent ambaſſadors to the confederated cities of Lombardy, with whom they propoſed to enter into an alliance. The podeſta, however, privately ſent an ambaſſador to the emperor; but Frederic rejecting all accommodation, the republic with great ardor fitted out ſeveral gallies, and diſpatched them to Tunis and the Levant. THE republic, during the two following years, was engaged in quelling an inſurrection
A. D. 1233. of the peaſants, and aſſiſting the king of Ceuta on the coaſt of Africa againſt the Spaniſh cruſards. Though the Spaniards were repulſed by the aſſiſtance of the Genoeſe admiral, yet the Mooriſh king, inſtead of fulfilling his engagements to the republic, aſſaulted their gallies, and burnt the houſes and merchandize of the Genoeſe in the city. He excuſed himſelf the following year to the ambaſſador of the republic, by alledging that the citizens, without his permiſſion, had quarrelled with the ſailors; but ſtill deferring to fulfil his engage- e ments, the ambaſſador declared war againſt him, and retired to Spain, where he died. His ſucceſſor, aſſembling all the Genoeſe ſhips on the Spaniſh coaſts, returned before Ceuta, and by his vigorous aſſaults quickly obliged the Moors to offer an honourable accommodation.

NOTHING remarkable happened during the three following years, excepting the concluſion of a peace and alliance betwixt the Genoeſe and Venetians for nine years, by the mediation of the pope, and the revolt of Savona, Albenga, and Ventimiglia, which were ſoon obliged to

The following year, however, Savona and Albenga again revolted, with ſeveral marquiſſes in their neighbourhood, at the inſtigation of the emperor, who being offended that the Genoeſe refuſed to take the oath of homage to him, made large promiſes of aſſiſtance to the rebels. On account of this new revolt, the Genoeſe fitted out thir- f teen gallies, which quickly reduced all the weſtern coaſt, excepting Albenga, and Savona, while the podeſta repulſed Oberto Pallavicini, the emperor's vicar, who had made an incurſion into the territories of the republic.

As the animoſities which had long ſubſiſted betwixt the emperor and the pope now broke out into an open rupture, the Genoeſe, who were ſoothed by Gregory, and irritated by Frederic, eſpouſed the party of the former, and this year entered into the confederacy of the Lombard cities, and allowed the pope's legate to preach a cruſade againſt the emperor in a ſoon privately embraced the party of the emperor, and afterwards openly eſpouſing his intereſt retired to Savona, which they made their head-quarters. Savona, in the mean time, having received a German garriſon, the Genoeſe troops the following ſpring did not think proper to inveſt the city; but after plundering its territories, returned to Genoa. Soon after their return the podeſta, having diſcovered a letter of the emperor to ſeveral of the nobles incloſed in a cake of wax, he immediately ordered their houſes, which were too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, to be inveſted, and equipped twenty-ſeven gallies, which about the end of April ſailed from Genoa, with a great number of prelates, for the council of Rome. By the imprudence of the admiral, who refuſed to ſail round Corſica, a few weeks after they fell in with the imperial and Piſan fleet, and after a ſharp engagement were almoſt all b taken or ſunk, five of the whole number only eſcaping y. A. D. 1241.

THE news of this diſgrace ſtruck the Genoeſe with conſternation; their vigour, however, was not thereby abated, for they immediately ordered fifty-two gallies to be put upon the ſtocks, and commanded all their ſubjects to be ready to take arms at a moment's warning. Many of theſe gallies, about three months after, were completed, and ſailed out to attack the emperor's fleet, which had appeared off the harbour. The imperial admiral, who was a Genoeſe, declined an engagement, but ſoon after entered the harbour during the night, and unſucceſsfully attempted to deſtroy the ſhipping. Many of the imperial party, who were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Maſcarati, having by this time been expelled the city by the other faction, who were called Rampini, Pallavicini, at the requeſt of the exiles, c again invaded the Genoeſe territories, but was quickly obliged to retire z. The following podeſta, who was a citizen of Breſcia, notwithſtanding the diſtreſſes of the republic, entered upon his office with great ſpirit; and hearing that the emperor had been ſolicited by William Spinola to invade the Genoeſe territories, he ſurprized and deſtroyed many of the caſtles belonging to that nobleman. Being informed ſoon after that the emperor was making immenſe preparations, with intention of entirely deſtroying the Genoeſe naval force, which he found the greateſt interruption to his deſigns, he with great diſpatch fitted out eighty-three gallies, and ſixteen other veſſels, and gave orders through the whole Genoeſe territory that all ſhould be ready with arms and proviſions to man the fleet. The enemy carefully ſhunned all ſummer to encounter with this formidable armament; and in the end d of the year, after they had loſt ſeveral veſſels near Corſica, retired to Sicily a.

THE following ſpring the Genoeſe, being under no apprehenſion from the Imperialiſts, reſolved, if poſſible, to reduce Savona, and inveſted the city for ſeveral weeks; but the emperor, having ordered his baſtard ſon Hentz, or Henry, whom he had created king of Sardinia, to ſail to the relief of the beſieged, the podeſta, on the nineteenth of April, made a general aſſault, but without ſucceſs, which obliged him to raiſe the ſiege. A few months after, when the troops were allowed to go to the country on account of the vintage, the Piſan and imperial fleets, to the number of one hundred and thirty-five ſail, appeared off the city; but upon the appearance of the Genoeſe gallies, they immediately retired. A. D. 1243.

POPE Innocent the fourth, a native of Genoa, about this time being promoted to the pa- e pal chair, the Genoeſe expreſſed the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; and the following year, being informed that he was in danger of being taken a priſoner by the emperor, they conducted him by ſea to Genoa with twenty-two gallies, where he continued about three months, and then proceeded by land to France. The Genoeſe the following year were not engaged in any remarkable expedition: they conducted their trading fleet in ſafety from the Levant, and deſtroyed ſeveral Piſan gallies, which had endeavoured to intercept them; but on the ſixteenth of December, the greateſt part of their gallies were ſunk or daſhed to pieces by a moſt violent ſtorm, which alſo broke down part of the mole. Being informed that their enemies intended to take advantage of this calamity, with great ardour and diſpatch they repaired their ſhattered veſſels, ſo that in a few months they were again able to put to ſea f with a formidable fleet, and could even ſpare ſixteen new gallies, which were hired by St. Lewis to conduct him to the Holy Land. The following year they made another unſucceſsful attempt to reduce the Maſcarati, or rebels of Savona, Albenga, and ſome other places of the weſtern coaſt, or Riviera. A. D. 1244.

As the naval preparations the next year were again renewed for the paſſage of St. Lewis, Frederic was apprehenſive leſt the Genoeſe intended to make a conqueſt of the iſland of Sicily; he accordingly ordered Pallavicini to march with a large body of forces into their territory, and ſent for twenty-five gallies from Naples to aſſiſt the Piſan fleet in blocking up the harbour, propoſing to command in perſon againſt the city: but ſoon after, being entirely defeated by the garriſon of Parma, which city he had beſieged near two years, all his g ſchemes were baffled, and the Genoeſe were freed from their apprehenſions of a ſiege. The city of Savona ſubmits to the republic. A. D. 1251.

As the emperor died two years after, about the middle of December, the Genoeſe the following ſpring marched with a powerful army againſt the rebels of Savona and Albenga, who were now in the utmoſt conſternation. Upon the approach of the army, they ſent deputies to the podeſta begging a peace, which with ſome difficulty was at length granted them, by the interceſſion of the counts of Lavagna, the pope's nephews, who were connected by friendſhip and alliances with many of the Maſcarati; and the year before, by their unwearied entreaties, had ſoftened the other party, and prevailed upon them to refer all their differences to the arbitration of their uncle Innocent [b]. Soon after the ſubmiſſion and reconciliation of the rebels, two Venetian deputies arrived at Porto Venere, and renewed the alliance betwixt the two republics for ten years. Though the Maſcarati, who with all the other Imperialiſts began to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Gibellines, were now reſtored to their native country, yet it happened otherwiſe to almoſt all of that faction in Italy; for the pope, now returning from France, the Guelfs, who had been the greateſt ſufferers during the war, began to retaliate the injuries they had formerly received from the other party. b

A. D. 1253. THE Genoeſe, about two years after, according to the terms of accommodation made with the rebels, filled up the ditch of Savona with the ruins of the walls, which were entirely levelled with the ground; and during the three following years, in conjunction with the Florentines and Luccheſe, with whom they had concluded an alliance, they ſo diſtreſſed the Piſans, that they obliged them to offer very diſadvantageous terms of peace. That republic, however, prevailed on the Florentines and Luccheſe to agree to a ſeparate peace, abſolutely refuſing any accommodation with the Genoeſe, unleſs they would renounce the alliance concluded a few months before with the marquis of Calaris in Sardinia, who had put one of his towns into their poſſeſſion, on condition of receiving a Genoeſe lady for his wife, and being protected from the judge of Arborea, who was ſupported by the Piſans. c

THE following year is remarkable for a new alteration in the form of government, which the Genoeſe annaliſts only ſlightly mention, without aſſigning any reaſons of ſo memorable a tranſaction. When the podeſta, according to cuſtom, ſhould have entered upon his office, part of the nobility raiſed a furious ſedition; and calling out that they would have a captain of the people, they were immediately ſeconded by the commons, who, in a tumultuous manner, directly choſe William Buccanigra captain for ten years. If he ſhould die within that time, one of his brothers was appointed to ſucceed him, and next day thirty-two of the people were choſen by the title of Ancients, to aſſiſt him as a council. The captain and his council ſoon after nominated a podeſta, who now became an inferior officer. d

A rupture betwixt the Genoeſe and Venetians. A. D. 1258.

IN the ſecond year of his government, a rupture happening betwixt the Genoeſe and Venetians, Alexander the fourth, who had ſucceeded Innocent, ordered the two republics and the Piſans to ſend their deputies to Rome, to treat of an accommodation. This diſpute, which engaged the Genoeſe in many ruinous wars, that in the end quite enervated and exhauſted the republic, was firſt occaſioned in Acon, by a quarrel betwixt a Venetian and Genoeſe, which laſt being ſtruck by his antagoniſt, excited his countrymen to revenge the affront. The Genoeſe accordingly attacked the Venetians, and ſeized almoſt all their ſhips in the harbour, which the Venetian doge being informed of, he made loud complaints to the republic. A congreſs was appointed this year at Bologna, for accommodating the difference; but the Genoeſe delaying to ſend their deputies, the Venetians privately fitted out ſeveral gallies, and ſent them with their trading fleet to Syria. The Genoeſe, having intelligence of this armament, ſent likewiſe armed veſſels with their Levant fleet; and upon hearing that more gallies had gone from Venice, they immediately ordered a ſecond ſquadron to ſail to Syria. e

An accommodation concluded betwixt them at Rome.

The pope, in the mean time, intereſting himſelf in the diſpute, prevailed with the Genoeſe, Venetian, and Piſan deputies at Rome, to agree to an accommodation: but in the ſame month, or according to Folieta, on the ſame day that this treaty was concluded, the Venetian fleet in Syria, being joined by the Piſan, Provençal, and Marſilian gallies, amounting in all to eighty ſail, entirely defeated the Genoeſe, who loſt twenty-five gallies, and were obliged to abandon Acon. Though the treaty of peace was nevertheleſs put in execution, yet this unfortunate engagement heightened the rivalſhip and animoſity betwixt both republics, which broke out with greater violence afterwards. f

BUCCANIGRA, in the mean time, abuſing his authority, and governing in an inſolent and arbitrary manner, a conſpiracy was formed againſt him by the nobility, which however, ſerved only to eſtabliſh his dominion more ſecurely, and to encreaſe his arrogance; for their deſign being diſcovered, the following year many of them were obliged to fly from Genoa, and a larger revenue and guard were aſſigned to the captain. Two years after Mi- g a chael Paleologus, recovering Conſtantinople from the Latins, who had poſſeſſed it about ſixty years, the Genoeſe immediately ſent an embaſſy to him, offering him their aſſiſtance to expel the Venetians from the iſlands of the Archipelago. An alliance was accordingly concluded betwixt him and the republic, who being put in poſſeſſion of the city of Smyrna, and, according to ſome, of the iſland of Chios, and Pera, one of the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, ſent a fleet of ten gallies and ſix ſhips to the Archipelago, which enabled the emperor to fruſtrate the efforts of the Venetians. The pope, who favoured the Latins, immediately denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt the Genoeſe, as violators of the treaty lately concluded at Rome [c]. A. D. 1261.

THE following year is remarkable for the depoſition of Buccanigra, whoſe deſpotic and b oppreſſive government had rendered him odious to the whole republic. In the end of May, a numerous party of the nobility and commons ſeized all the gates of the city, whilſt another body marched againſt the captain, who, being deſerted by his guard, and his brother being killed, was forced to reſign his authority, which was conferred on a podeſta for the remaining part of the year. The republic, during the following year, was likewiſe governed by a podeſta, who having received many accuſations againſt the Genoeſe commanders in the Archipelago, where by their infamous proceedings they had diſhonoured the republic, before he reſigned his government, obliged all the maſters of ſhips to give ſecurity for their behaviour, and appointed a board of three nobles to puniſh thoſe who had committed any injuries in Romania. His ſucceſſor was intent upon proſecuting the war
c againſt the Venetians; and, in the month of June, ſent a fleet of twenty-two gallies and two large ſhips, towards the Archipelago, which engaged and defeated the enemy off Durazzo.

THE city in the mean time, was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, by the ambition of the Spinolæ, the Doriæ, the Grimaldi, and the Fieſci, which four families, exceeding the other nobles greatly in wealth and number of dependants, had been endeavouring for ſeveral years to ſeize the ſupreme authority. The Spinolæ and Doriæ were the chiefs of the Gibelline faction, and the other two families were at the head of the Guelfs. Oberto Spinola having perſuaded his faction, that the only means to ſuppreſs the Guelfs was to confer the ſupreme authority upon a Gibelline, on the firſt of October at midnight, he ſurpriſed and impriſoned the podeſta, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed captain of the republic by his
d followers. Next day he endeavoured to have his authority confirmed in a legal aſſembly; but finding the other party more powerful than he expected, he willingly hearkened to an accommodation; by which it was ſtipulated, that he ſhould not be puniſhed for what he had done; and that Guido Spinola and Nicolas Doria ſhould govern the city for the enſuing year. They behaved, during their government, with ſo much moderation and mildneſs, that upon the expiration of their office they received univerſal applauſe. The year following the government was again committed to a podeſta, who was a native of Parma. As the war ſtill continued with the Venetians, the republic, in the month of April, ſent a fleet of twenty-ſeven gallies to Sicily, under the command of Lanfranc Barbarini, who allowed his whole fleet to be ſeized by the enemy, by baſely declining an engage-e ment, and chaining his veſſels together near the ſhore, ſo that they could make no reſiſtance. Upon his return to Genoa, he was fined and baniſhed, and the command of another fleet of twenty-five gallies was given Oberto Doria, a young man of great reputation, who in his cruiſe took ſeveral veſſels from the enemy, and plundered and burnt a town on the coaſt of Crete. Some inconſiderable advantages were gained during the ſummer by the private adventurers. A. D. 1264. A. D. 1266.

THE following year the Genoeſe were abſolved from the ſentence of excommunication, and were ſolicited by the pope, and the kings of France and Naples, to agree to an accommodation with the Venetians. The propoſal of peace was not, however, acceptable to the republic, which at the ſame time carried on the war in a languid manner, and only ſent
f one fleet to Syria of twenty-five gallies, five of which were taken by the Venetians before Acon. The year following the young Conradin, grandſon of the late emperor Frederic, being defeated and taken priſoner by Charles of Anjou, who a few years before, by the aſſiſtance of the pope, had made a conqueſt of Naples, the Genoeſe the year after entered into an alliance with Charles. About the ſame time, they concluded another treaty with St. Lewis, and promiſed to furniſh him with a great number of gallies and tranſports for another expedition againſt the infidels. The fleet, conſiſting partly of veſſels of two decks, accordingly ſailed from Genoa the year following, having on board upwards of ten thouſand Genoeſe, ſome of whom were deſigned for navigating the royal gallies. This expedition was very fatal to the Genoeſe; for the French king, and great part of the army, died of an epi-
g demical diſtemper before the city; and upon their return in the end of November, many more periſhed in a ſtorm in the port of Trapani, which deſtroyed ſeveral of their gallies. This dreadful calamity was heightened by the rapacity of king Charles, who, inſtead of relieving the diſtreſſed, ſeized all that was ſaved of the wreck, as belonging to his exchequer. a

MEAN while not only the city, but even the whole territory of the republic, was filled with diſſention and ſtrife, which tempted Oberto Spinola to renew his ambitious deſign of ſeizing the ſovereign authority. At the election of a podeſta in Ventimiglia, one of the family of the Grimaldi had, by fraudulent means, procured the dignity, and forcibly expelled his competitor, who having recourſe to the Gibelline faction in Genoa, returned with an armed force to Ventimiglia, where he was a ſecond time repulſed, and many of his followers made priſoners. Grimaldi refuſing abſolutely to ſet his priſoners at liberty, Oberto Spinola and Oberto Doria, on the twenty-eighth of October, aſſembled the people, and perſuaded them to declare them captains of the republic, with an unlimited authority, having on the ſame day ſeized the podeſta, and defeated the Guelf faction, which had attempted to oppoſe their deſigns. They afterwards compelled the whole city to take the oath of fidelity to them, and arbitrarily baniſhed ſome of the chief citizens, who they ſuſpected would never cordially ſubmit to the new government. To ſoothe the commons, and retain their affection, they created a new magiſtrate, who was called abbot of the people; and alſo allowed a podeſta to be elected for the following year: however, they dropped the office of podeſta the year after, when they were alarmed with the news that the exiles, by the perſuaſion of cardinal Fieſco, had entered into a treaty with the king of Naples, then at Rome, and promiſed to deliver up the city to him, on condition of recovering it by his aſſiſtance from the Gibellines. b c

A. D. 1272. THAT tyrannical and ambitious prince, without regard to his treaty with the republic, immediately cauſed all the Genoeſe merchants and their effects in his dominions to be ſeized, while the exiles returned from Rome, and in vain endeavoured to raiſe inſurrections in the eaſtern and weſtern Riviera. Charles, who was a favourite of the pope's, by whom he had been appointed vicar of Tuſcany the following year, ordered the Alexandrians, and the marquiſſes of Caretto and Saluces, to invade the Genoeſe territories. The Genoeſe, having concluded a truce with the Venetians, exerted themſelves ſo vigorouſly in oppoſing their new enemies, that they prevented them from gaining any advantages of conſequence during the whole ſummer. The Luccheſe, and ſome other Tuſcan ſtates, who at firſt had baſely complied with Charles, even ſent ambaſſadors to Genoa, excuſing their proceeding, and renewing their alliances. The year after, the republic concluded an alliance with the marquis of Montferrat, and the cities of Aſti and Pavia, againſt king Charles; and hearing that a Provençal fleet had made a deſcent upon Corſica, they immediately armed twenty-two gallies, and ſent them thither under the command of Pignatarius. The Genoeſe admiral, finding that the enemy had retired, ſailed to Sicily, attacked the city of Trapani, and burnt all the veſſels in the harbour. After continuing ſome time in the Sicilian ſeas, and taking ſeveral of their ſhips, he ſailed to Naples, where he cauſed all his gallies to row after each other cloſe by the ſhore, and in the king's preſence to tear the enſigns of France, and to throw them into the ſea. After his return to Genoa, forty Provençal gallies made their appearance before the harbour, but retired in the evening, and in their courſe to Naples pillaged the iſland before Porto Venere. The exiles in the mean time, by the intereſt of cardinal Fieſco, prevailed on the pope to excommunicate the republic, which it was alledged d e

A. D. 1276. had ſeized ſome of the cardinal's revenues. Two years after, however, Innocent the fifth, who ſucceeded Gregory, having received an ambaſſy from the republic, prevailed on the king of Naples to agree to a peace. He died immediately after, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Fieſco, who ſurvived his election about a month, but before his death abſolved the republic from the ſentence of excommunication. In conſequence of the peace, the exiles were reſtored, when the count of Lavagna, one of them, ſold his extenſive territories to the republic. f

THE following year, the republic likewiſe made ſeveral large purchaſes of eſtates within their territory; and the two captains, having diſcovered that the exiles who had returned, were endeavouring to raiſe new diſturbances, condemned a great many nobles of the Guelf faction to perpetual baniſhment. Theſe exiles, the year after, entered into a new confederacy with their friends in the city againſt the ruling faction, and in the end of March, having aſſembled one thouſand two hundred foot, and three hundred horſe, ſurpriſed Chiavari, where they committed all manner of hoſtilities. Upon the approach, however, of Oberto Doria, with a large body of horſe and foot, next day they abandoned the place, and retired to the valley of Trebia, where they diſperſed. The captain having deſtroyed ſeveral caſtles belonging to them, returned to Genoa; and, to protect the republic from their future inſults, ſent to Pavia, and hired a body of auxiliaries. Two years after, the Venetians violated the truce with the republic, by attacking ſeveral of their rich ſhips in their paſſage to Conſtantinople. g a tinople. The war, however, was not then renewed betwixt the two republics; for the Genoeſe, proving victorious, generouſly ſet at liberty the aggreſſors, who appear not to have been countenanced by their government.

THE following year the Genoeſe were ſolicited, by the reſtleſs and ambitious king of Sicily, to join him and the Venetians in an expedition againſt the Greek emperor, whom pope Martin, in complaiſance to king Charles, had excommunicated with all his ſubjects, as ſchiſmatics. The Genoeſe excuſed themſelves from entering into an alliance with the king; and immediately ſent a galley to Conſtantinople, to inform the emperor of the intended invaſion, which Charles was prevented from executing by the famous revolt of Sicily, that happened the year after in the end of March. While Charles was ruining his army in a vain attempt b to reduce Meſſina, a new war broke out betwixt the Genoeſe and Piſans, which continued about five years with great animoſity, till the Piſans, whoſe power and wealth were then quite exhauſted, ſubmitted to the terms preſcribed by the Genoeſe. The rupture was firſt occaſioned by the revolt of one of the four judges of Corſica, who with great inſolence plundered the Genoeſe in the iſland, and made incurſions into the other judicatures. Finding himſelf, at length, unable to reſiſt the Genoeſe, he fled to Piſa, and prevailed on the Piſans, by ſwearing fidelity to them, to eſpouſe his cauſe. The Genoeſe in vain endeavoured to perſuade the Piſans to deſiſt; they therefore ſent a conſiderable force towards the iſland in the month of Auguſt, which, however, did not then proceed, but ſtopped at Porto Venere, where the troops were ſet at liberty on account of the vintage: their troops in Corſica returned c to Italy a few weeks after for the ſame reaſon, being ſtill in hopes that the Piſans would not protect the judge. The Genoeſe, having thus imprudently laid aſide their armament, the judge returned to Corſica, and recovered all his caſtles, and the Piſans made a deſcent upon the iſland of Porto Venere, which they plundered, and carried off the bells of the church. The war being now unavoidable, the Genoeſe reſolved to proſecute it with the utmoſt vigour; and for that purpoſe they elected a council of fifteen perſons, called the Credentia, to aſſiſt the captains, who immediately ordered one hundred and twenty gallies to be fitted out, and laid an embargo upon all ſhipping for ten months. The Piſans likewiſe made great preparations; ſo that the following year both parties put to ſea with numerous and formidable fleets. The Genoeſe gained ſeveral conſiderable advantages, and took ſome rich prizes; d but they, as well as the Piſans, ſeem to have avoided coming to any deciſive action.

A new war betwixt them and the Piſans.

A. D. 1282.

THE Piſans, being diſſatisfied with the conduct of their commanders, to whoſe miſbehaviour they imputed their loſſes, the following ſummer committed the ſupreme adminiſtration of their republic to Albert Maurocenus, a noble Venetian, in hopes thereby of engaging the Venetians to aſſiſt them in the war, as Albert was related to the doge, whoſe power and authority at that time was much more extenſive than at preſent. The Genoeſe, in the beginning of May, having defeated twenty-four of their gallies, eight of which they had taken, the Piſans fitted out ſeventy-two gallies, and two other large veſſels, to recover the honour of their arms, boaſting that they intended to ſhoot ſilver arrows, and balls covered with ſcarlet, into Genoa. This formidable fleet ſoon after appeared before the city, when a conſie derable number of the Genoeſe gallies were abſent. The Genoeſe, however, who before had ordered the militia of the eaſtern and weſtern Riviera to be ready to embark, with great ardor equipped and armed in one afternoon fifty-eight gallies, and eight larger veſſels, which a few days after, being joined by other thirty gallies that had returned from a cruiſe, ſailed in queſt of the enemy, whom they ſoon diſcovered near the iſland Meloria. A general engagement enſued, which ended in the total rout of the Piſans, ſixteen thouſand of whom were killed, drowned, or taken priſoners. Among the priſoners were the podeſta Maurocenus and a great part of the Piſan nobility. The Genoeſe, after this deciſive action, which was fought on the ſixth of Auguſt, returned home in triumph, with twenty-nine gallies taken from the enemy, and many thouſand priſoners, ſo that it became f a proverb in Tuſcany, 'Thoſe that want to ſee Piſa muſt go to Genoa[a].'

The Piſans routed with the loſs of 16,000 men.

The Guelfs in Tuſcany reſolved to ſeize this opportunity of re-eſtabliſhing their faction in Piſa. Accordingly the Florentines, the Luccheſe, the Sienneſe, Piſtorians, and other Tuſcan ſtates, concluded an alliance againſt the Piſans with the Genoeſe for thirty years. The Piſans, confounded with the news of this confederacy, immediately begged a peace: but their requeſt being rejected by the Genoeſe, they conferred the ſovereign power of their ſtate upon count Ugolino, a Guelf, for ten years; which revolution ſatisfying the Tuſcan ſtates, they forthwith renounced their new alliance with the Genoeſe.

No military expeditions of conſequence happened during the three following years. Beſides the taking a few Piſan ſhips, the Genoeſe made prizes of ſeveral Venetian and Neapolitan veſſels g laden with Piſan merchandize; and being informed that the ſultan of Egypt had ſeized one of their ſhips in Alexandria, they ſent ſix gallies to the Levant, which obliged him to make

The year after, the government of the captains having expired, the people in the month of March, choſe Oberto Spinola and Conrad Doria, the ſon of Oberto, captains of the republic for five years; but ſo great was the moderation of theſe nobles, that they would only accept of the government for three years. A few weeks after this election, a peace was concluded betwixt the republic and the Piſans, by means of the Piſan priſoners, who had been negotiating for thirteen months. This peace was very much againſt the inclination of Ugolino, the Piſan podeſta, who, not daring openly to oppoſe the treaty, privately ordered the Sardinian corſairs ſtill to continue hoſtilities againſt the Genoeſe; which ſo exaſperated the Piſans, that in the month of July they roſe againſt him, and impriſoned him, with his children in a tower, where they died of hunger. a

A peace concluded with the Piſans.

THE Genoeſe the following year ſent a fleet to the relief of Tripoli againſt the ſultan of Egypt; but the Chriſtians, with all their auxiliaries, not being able to defend the city, the Genoeſe conducted as many of the inhabitants as they could to the iſland of Cyprus. About the ſame time they ſent another fleet to Corſica, which recovered all the places in that iſland that had revolted during the Piſan war. Mean while, the Grimaldi and ſeveral other noble Guelf families formed a conſpiracy againſt the captains of the republic, which, after they A. D. 1289. had plotted ſix months, they endeavoured to put in execution on the firſt of January, by aſſaulting the houſe of the abbot of the people. After a ſharp diſpute they were obliged to ſubmit, and four of them only being baniſhed, the others were generouſly pardoned. Before this conſpiracy broke out, the republic had renewed the war with the Piſans, who, contrary to the articles of the late peace, had delayed to deliver up the caſtle of Cagliari in Sardinia. They had, however, offered full ſatisfaction and ſecurity to the Genoeſe, if they would indulge them with the delay of twelve months; but the republic, unreaſonably rejecting their requeſt, again choſe a Credentia of fourteen perſons, and concluding an alliance with the Luccheſe, in conjunction with them attacked the harbour of Piſa, ſituated at the mouth of the Arno. After ravaging the Piſan territory in that neighbourhood, they deſtroyed all the towers that ſecured the harbour, and returned in the end of the year to Genoa, carrying with them ſeveral pieces of the chain of the harbour, which near three hundred years after were to be ſeen as trophies of their victory, hanging in different parts of the city. b c

A new rupture with the Piſans.

A. D. 1290. THE Genoeſe, in the mean time, according to their uſual fickleneſs, being diſſatisfied with the government of the captains, and longing for a new form of adminiſtration, Oberto Doria, the father of Conrad, conſulting with ſeveral others, drew up a new plan of government, by which it was ordained that the captain of the republic, for the future, ſhould always be a foreigner, elected annually; and that one half of the counſellors and antiani, and all others in office, ſhould be choſen from the nobles, and the other half from the people. The captains accordingly the following year, at the feaſt of Simon and Jude, peaceably reſigned their office; and Lanfranc de Suardis, a nobleman of Bergamo, was choſen captain of the republic. The new captain exerted himſelf vigorouſly in proſecuting the Piſan war; but the Piſans, being aſſiſted by the Catalans, recovered the iſland of Ilba, which was the chief ſcene of the tranſactions during the ſummer (B). As the Chriſtians this year had been totally expelled from Syria, the following captain allowed Manuel Jacharia and Theodoſius Doria to enter into the ſervice of the church, with twenty gallies, to defend the iſland of Cyprus from the infidels, tho' at firſt he had reſolved to fine them for having made an agreement with the ſee of Rome without his permiſſion. The Genoeſe, at the ſame time, having taken a Catalan ſhip of three decks carrying corn to Piſa, the captain being afraid of the reſentment of the famous Roger di Loria, immediately excuſed the proceeding to the viceroy of Sicily, and made good the damage to the Catalans. d e

A. D. 1292. THE injuries which the Genoeſe daily received from the Catalans, did not yet provoke them to declare war againſt them, though they were at this time earneſtly ſolicited by the count of Artois, the apoſtolic legate, and the French ambaſſador, to declare for the king of Naples, againſt the Sicilians and Catalans. The diſputes in the city on this ſubject were ſo violent, that the neareſt relations fought with each other in the ſtreets, which ſerved the captain with an argument for ſtill adhering to a neutrality. The French ambaſſadors immediately left the city in great diſcontent, and upon their arrival in France cauſed ſeveral Genoeſe merchants to be arreſted, who, nevertheleſs, were quickly after ſet at liberty, the Genoeſe having ordered a repreſentation to be made to the French court. The Genoeſe, in the mean time, fitted out twenty-one gallies and five galleons, for the Piſan war; but the Piſans during the whole ſummer not appearing at ſea, the fleet took only a few corſairs, and returned to Genoa. f

(B) Foliета informs us, that this year Theodoſius Doria and Ugolino Vivaldo, with two gallies, fitted out at their own expence, paſſed the ſtraits of Gibraltar, and ſailed weſtward, in ſearch of the Indies; but what afterwards became of them, he ſays, there is no account (1).

a THE great proſperity of the republic, which had now humbled its once formidable rival, and flouriſhed above all the ſtates of Italy, began to awaken the jealouſy of the Venetians, who conſidered the encreaſing grandeur of the Genoeſe as a diminution of their own (C): they therefore reſolved, without regarding the truce, to ſeize the firſt opportunity of renewing hoſtilities; and this ſummer four of their gallies ſailing to Cyprus, and having on board the crews of two other gallies, attacked ſeven Genoeſe trading veſſels, returning from the Archipelago. The Genoeſe, being haled by the Venetians, went on board their gallies, and ſatisfied them who they were, and where they were bound; but perceiving them preparing for an engagement, they returned immediately to their own veſſels, and received the attack of the enemy with reſolution. After a ſhort diſpute they took the Venetian gallies, and b killed three hundred of their men: however, after blaming them for violating the truce, they directly ſet them at liberty, and returned to Genoa. To prevent a rupture, the republic ſent two Dominican friars to Venice; and a conference being agreed to, four ambaſſadors of each ſtate aſſembled at Cremona, to terminate all differences; but the Venetians, ſhewing no deſire of an accommodation, the Genoeſe deputies, at the end of three months, proteſted that they were ready to obſerve the truce, and returned to Genoa. The republic, ſtill deſirous of avoiding a war, in the beginning of January ſent another ambaſſador, with a public notary, to Venice, who made the ſame proteſtation before the doge.

A rupture betwixt the Genoeſe and the Venetians. A. D. 1293.

THE Venetians ſtill declined giving any ſatisfaction; and a few months after ſome of their gallies took three Genoeſe veſſels, and committed hoſtilities againſt the ſubjects of the c republic in different parts. The Genoeſe, rouſed at length, determined to have recourſe to force; and the captains of twenty of their trading veſſels, having unladen their merchandize at Pera, choſe Nicholas Spinola, the reſident at Conſtantinople, for their admiral, and went in queſt of the Venetian gallies: however, they firſt ſent two Franciſcans to demand reſtitution of the late captures. Their requeſt being denied, they ſoon after attacked the Venetian fleet, conſiſting of thirty-two gallies, and gained a complete victory, taking twenty-five, or, according to ſome, thirty of the enemy's ſhips. This engagement thoroughly animated each republic to proſecute the war. The Venetians immediately laid an embargo on all their ſhipping, and propoſed an alliance againſt the Genoeſe, with the Catalans and Sicilians; and likewiſe with the cities of Treviſo, Padua, Ferrara, and Cremona. The Genoeſe in the mean time, d without ſoliciting any foreign alliance, made great preparations againſt the enemy: they ordered all their ſubjects to return home, laid an embargo on their ſhipping, and committed the management of the war to a council, or Credentia, who cauſed ſeveral new gallies to be built, ſo that the fleet amounted to two hundred ſail.

A. D. 1294.

The Genoeſe take thirty Venetian gallies.

THAT the war might not be interrupted by their domeſtic factions, a reconciliation was effected in the month of January, betwixt the Maſcarati and Rampini, by the mediation of the archbiſhop James de Varagine, who mentions the rejoicings on that account in the end of his chronicle. Boniface the eighth, in the mean time, being informed of the great warlike preparations of each republic, ordered both ſtates to obſerve a truce, under the pain of excommunication, till Midſummer, and for three or four months endeavoured to effect an e accommodation at Rome. The endeavours of the pope proving fruitleſs, the Genoeſe, upon the concluſion of the truce, prepared for the expedition with the greateſt ardour, the council being even obliged to hinder many volunteers from embarking. As the Venetians had threatened to appear before Genoa, the captain and the Credentia wrote to them that they would ſave them one half of the voyage, and would meet them off Sicily. Oberto Doria, the admiral, accordingly in the end of ſummer, ſailed from Genoa with one hundred and ſixty-five gallies, on board of which were ſaid to be forty-five thouſand men. He continued eighteen days on the coaſts of Sicily, waiting for the enemy, who having never appeared, he returned to Genoa in a triumphant manner before autumn.

THIS ſucceſsful commencement of the war was ſoon followed by a moſt violent ſedition
f in the city. A few days after Chriſtmas, the two factions attacked each other in the ſtreets with ſuch fury and animoſity, that many were killed and wounded. Many houſes were burned, and the cathedral church was not even ſpared, its roof being totally burned down, in hopes of expelling one of the parties that had ſeized the ſteeple. Theſe diſturbances continued without intermiſſion till the ſeventh of February when the Grimaldi and Fieſci being at length expelled, Conrad Spinola and Conrad Doria, the ſons of the two Obertos, were choſen captains of the repulic.

A violent ſedition in the city. A. D. 1296.

(C) At this period the Genoeſe ſtate ſeems to have been at its greateſt height of power, opulence, and grandeur. All the cities and towns both in the eaſtern and weſtern Riviera, with ſeveral other territories over the Appennine ridge, ſubmitted to the republic, which, ſince the commencement of the laſt Piſan war, had armed 627 gallies. Seventy ſail of trading veſſels belonged to Genoa, and a greater number to the maritime cities of their territory. Their woollen and ſilken manufactures were very conſiderable, and the revenues of the republic very large (1).

(1) Foliet. Caffar. l. 10.

TRANQUILITY being thus again eſtabliſhed, the Genoeſe renewed their preparations for the war. The Venetians, however, ſeem to have taken the advantage of the diſſentions of their enemy, and this ſummer ſurpriſed Pera at Conſtantinople, and another city not far from Smyrna. After the Genoeſe fleet had returned from an unſucceſsful cruize, they put to ſea with their gallies, and likewiſe took a great many Genoeſe veſſels on the coaſts of Sicily. The year after their fleet ſailed into the Euxine ſea, and took the city of Theodoſia or Caffa, in Crim Tartary, which had long been ſubject to the Genoeſe [c]. The republic, being exaſperated by theſe and many other loſſes, which, though not mentioned by the Genoeſe, are particularized by the Venetian writers, the following year fitted out a formidable fleet of ſeventy-eight, or, according to the Venetians, of eighty-five gallies, which, in the end of ſummer, ſailed into the Adriatic, under the command of Lamba Doria, one of the captains who reſolved, if he did not meet with the enemy's fleet, to proceed to Venice. On the third of September, having diſcovered the Venetian fleet, conſiſting of ninety-five ſail, near the iſland of Curzola, on the coaſt of Dalmatia, he boldly attacked the enemy; and, after a deſperate and bloody action, gained a complete victory, taking ſixty-five, or, according to Stella, eighty-five of their gallies. The Genoeſe give no account of their own loſs; but Dandulus informs us, that in the beginning of the engagement they loſt ten gallies; and adds, what
A. D. 1298. appears improbable, that though they gained the victory, they ſuffered as much as the Venetians (D). The admiral having pillaged Curzola, and burnt all the enemy's gallies he had taken, excepting eighteen, returned with ſeven thouſand priſoners to Genoa, where he was received by the whole city with the greateſt tranſports of joy [f]. This deciſive action was Peace concluded. followed a few months after by a peace betwixt the two republics, which was concluded on
A. D. 1299. the twenty-fifth of May, by the mediation of Matthew Viſconti of Milan [g].

THE Piſans, being apprehenſive that the Genoeſe would now turn their whole force againſt them, purchaſed a truce for twenty-ſeven years from the republic, by paying 135,000 Genoeſe pounds for the expences of the war, reſigning all they poſſeſſed in Corſica, and delivering up the city Jurritana in Sardinia. A few weeks after the concluſion of the peace, the captains reſigned their office, when the government of the republic was again committed to a foreign podeſta. During his adminiſtration, the Grimaldi entered the harbour in the night with five gallies, and immediately diſperſed their followers through the ſtreets, in hopes of ſurpriſing the other faction; but the citizens aſſembling at the ſound of the alarm bell, they were repulſed, and many of them taken priſoners. As the republic at this time favoured the king of Sicily againſt the Neapolitans, Boniface, on the eleventh of November, denounced a ſentence of excommunication againſt the Genoeſe; but the following year the ſentence was removed, upon the concluſion of a peace betwixt them and the king of Naples.

THE republic for the four following years enjoyed great tranquility; but the year after the civil diſſentions were again renewed. The great power of the family of Spinola had now raiſed the jealouſy of the family of Doria, which being perceived by the Guelfs, who had been reſtored upon the concluſion of a peace with the king of Naples [h], they excited
A freſh commotion in the city. the Doriæ to take arms againſt their rivals to their own confuſion; for, after a bloody diſpute, Opicio Spinola remained conqueror. Next day all the chiefs of the oppoſite faction were baniſhed, and Opicio Spinola and Bernabo Doria, who alone of all his family adhered to Spinola, were declared captains of the people. The exiles the following year having made an incurſion into the Genoeſe territories, and ſeized Tabia and Oneglia, Bernabo Doria marched againſt them; but, inſtead of proceeding to hoſtilities, he concluded an accommodation;
A. D. 1306. and the Doriæ and Grimaldi being reſtored, in the end of December, they took the oath of fidelity to the captains.

THIS reconciliation, however, was of very ſhort continuance; for Spinola having given his daughter in marriage to the marquis of Montferrat, raiſed a new jealouſy againſt himſelf. The nobles of the oppoſite faction perſuaded Bernabo Doria to give his daughter in marriage to the marquis of Saluzzo; and ſoon after the families of Doria and Grimaldi diſtinguiſhed themſelves by wearing cloaths of the ſame faſhion and ſame colour, which was interpreted by Opicio as the mark of a ſecret conſpiracy againſt his government. To anticipate their deſigns, he attacked them on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, and again expelled them from A. D. 1309. the city. His reſentment was next turned againſt his collegue Bernabo, who had rivalled him in his alliance with the marquis of Saluzzo. The next year, in the month of Novem-

a ber, his uncle Edward ſeized Bernabo while he was attending at a council, and conducted him with a body of armed men to priſon. About a month after Bernabo was depoſed, and Opicio was declared ſole and perpetual governor of the republic. Bernabo ſoon after eſcaped, and joined the exiles, who had ſeized Albenga, Andoria, and ſeveral other places, and daily became more powerful by the continual concourſe of the partizans of the Guelf faction.

OPICIO was very diligent in making preparations to oppoſe them; and the following year, on the tenth of June, being informed that they were approaching the city with a large body of forces, he marched out againſt them with five hundred horſe and ten thouſand foot. A battle was fought within four miles of the city, when Opicio was entirely defeated, and obliged to fly to Gavi. The victors entered the city in triumph; and having deſtroyed b the houſes of Opicio and two of his relations, they choſe twelve governors of the republic, ſix nobles and ſix commoners, who, with the abbot of the people, aſſumed the ſupreme adminiſtration. Spinola, in the mean time, with his ſon-in-law, arrived in the ſuburbs with ſix hundred horſe and about eight thouſand foot, in hopes of raiſing an inſurrection in his favour; but being diſappointed, he took and deſtroyed Montaldo and Vultabia, while one of his relations, who was in poſſeſſion of Monaco, fitted out a galley to cruiſe againſt the Genoeſe. This veſſel, however, was quickly taken, and the crew hanged; and Francis Fieſco, the general of the republic, ravaged the territories belonging to Opicio. After both parties had glutted their reſentment, a reconciliation was effected in the month of July, when Spinola, who was condemned to two years exile, received a very large ſum for the damage done to his c eſtates. A. D. 1310.

As the emperor Henry the ſeventh about this time entered Italy, Opicio the following year waited upon him in Aſti, begging his aſſiſtance to be reſtored to his native country. Henry at the ſame time receiving an embaſſy from the republic, reſolved to viſit the city, in order to put an end to the diſturbances: he accordingly arrived at Genoa on the twenty-firſt of October, accompanied with Opicio and ſix hundred German horſe, being received five miles without the gates by the nobles, clergy, and people, who were cloathed with the greateſt magnificence in ſilk and embroidery. The Genoeſe were ſo charmed at the amiable character of Henry, who was one of the beſt princes that ever exiſted, that they ſubmitted all their differences to his deciſion, gave him a donative of ſixty thouſand florins, and even d choſe him governor of the republic for 20 years [k]. How the Genoeſe, who were ſo jealous of their liberty, could ſo inconſiderately ſubject themſelves to a foreign dominion, is not eaſily to be accounted for. It was probably owing to the inveterate animoſity of the two factions, who would rather ſee the ſtate diſhonoured or ruined, than ſuffer each other to enjoy the ſupreme adminiſtration. A. D. 1311. The emperor Henry the ſeventh choſen governor of the republic for twenty years.

THE emperor dying the following year in Auguſt, and the vicar whom he had appointed to govern Genoa, a few months after going to Piſa, the diſſentions in the city again revived with greater violence than ever. The Gibellines, immediately after the departure of the vicar, expelled the chiefs of the Guelfs from the city, and committed the government to twenty-four of their own faction, twelve of whom were nobles, and twelve commoners. e A diſſention, however, quickly aroſe betwixt the families of Spinola and Doria, which the following year, notwithſtanding the endeavours of the podeſta, who was a foreigner, broke out into an open rupture. Both parties fought in the ſtreets for twenty-four days without intermiſſion; they raiſed battering engines againſt each others houſes, and filled the city with blood. The Spinolæ at length, finding their rivals ſupported by the Guelfs as well as Gibellines, in the end of the year thought proper to quit the city, and retired to their territories in the Appennines, where the war continued during the two following years with various ſucceſs. The Spinolæ the year after made offers of accommodation, which were rejected with diſdain by the Doriæ: but the Fieſci and Grimaldi, whoſe chief aim was to weaken the Gibellines, privately entered into an agreement with the exiles, and on f the fifteenth of September admitted them in the night into the city unarmed. The Doriæ ſtill refuſed a reconciliation, and a few days after left the city with many followers, which encouraging the Guelfs to take arms, on the tenth of December they declared Charles Fieſco and Gaſpar Grimaldi captains of the republic, who nevertheleſs allowed the podeſta the ſhadow of ſupreme authority. A. D. 1312. A. D. 1317.

THE family of Spinola, alarmed at this revolution, a few hours after again quitted the city, which was very acceptable to the Guelfs, who were ſolicitous to eſtabliſh their authority through all the territories of the republic. The cities of Albenga and Savona, however, declared for the Gibelline exiles, who, having made an alliance with Viſconti of Milan, Canis Scaliger of Verona, and with the marquiſſes of Clavexana, Ceva, and Caretto, and the counts of Ventimiglia, fortified Savona, which they made their head-quarters. Having formed a large army at Gavi, compoſed chiefly of the Lombard auxiliaries, under the command of A. D. 1318.

Marc Viſconti, they paſſed the ſtraits of the Appennines, and on the twenty-fifth of March inveſted Genoa. After the ſiege had continued three months the Guelfs, finding themſelves greatly diſtreſſed, ſolicited the aſſiſtance of Robert king of Naples, who immediately ſent them by ſea twelve hundred horſe, and a few days after arrived himſelf with twenty-five gallies, and a ſtrong reinforcement. The Genoeſe received him as their deliverer, and on the twenty-ſeventh of July conferred upon him, and pope John the twenty ſecond, the ſovereignty of their ſtate for ten years. The Guelfs of Florence, Bologna, and Sienna, encouraged by this new revolution, likewiſe entered into an alliance with the beſieged, and ſent them about eleven hundred horſe. The garriſon, being now very numerous, on the eighth of Auguſt ſallied out on the beſiegers; but were repulſed with the loſs of three hundred men. The beſieged being routed afterwards in ſeveral other ſkirmiſhes, the king at length reſolved to attack the poſts of the beſiegers by ſea, and on the fourth of February embarked fourteen thouſand foot, and eight hundred and thirty horſe, who, after a deſperate engagement, repulſed the enemy from the ſhore, while the king in perſon attacked their intrenchments towards the mountains, and drove them from thence. The Gibellines, finding their attempts thus fruſtrated, were ſtruck with a panic, and at night retreated with precipitation, leaving their arms and baggage, and in their flight even abandoning their wives and children, many of whom periſhed in the ſnow.

THE ſiege being raiſed, the Guelfs ravaged all the country abandoned by the Gibellines; and the king of Naples, a few weeks after, ſailed with ſeveral gallies to Avignon to viſit the pope. After his departure, the Gibellines, who were in poſſeſſion of almoſt all the weſtern Riviera, and all the territories of the republic beyond the Appennines, and were privately aſſiſted by the emperor of Conſtantinople, the Venetians, Piſans, and Luccheſe, fitted out a fleet at Savona, and in the month of Auguſt again inveſted Genoa by ſea and land[1]. The ſiege continued during the whole following year with various loſſes to both parties. The Guelfs made an excurſion as far as Albenga, which was ravaged by their Provençal and Neapolitan auxiliaries: they likewiſe deſtroyed the palaces of the Doriæ and Spinolæ, and other Gibellines in the city, while the beſiegers, being joined by forty gallies of the king of Sicily, commanded the ſea, and took and deſtroyed ſeveral of the enemy's ſhips. In the month of Auguſt, the famous Caſtruccio Caſtracani of Lucca, entered the eaſtern Riviera, with five hundred horſe and upwards of twelve thouſand foot, with a deſign of aſſiſting the beſiegers; but the Florentine Guelfs, in his abſence, invading the Luccheſe, he was obliged to return in a few weeks to defend his own territories, having only taken a few places in the Riviera.

THE Gibellines at length, wearied with the ſlow progreſs of the ſiege, in the beginning of January withdrew part of their army and inveſted Noli, which, after a moſt vigorous defence, ſurrendered on the ſixth of February. The caſtle, though battered daily by the engines of the beſiegers, did not capitulate till the ſixth of April. The Genoeſe, in the mean time, had made an unſucceſsful attempt to relieve the place by ſea, and had ſeveral times attacked the poſts, which were ſtill held by the Gibellines on the rocky mountains commanding Genoa. The city was not only harraſſed by the enemies from without, but expoſed alſo to the rapine of many of its own inhabitants, who became quite licentious, and, under pretence of defending their country, plundered without controul, the king's vicar not having authority to put the laws in execution. To put a ſtop to the diſorders, a committee was appointed of ten of the chiefs of the people, who executed ſummary juſtice upon all offenders. The beſieged ſoon after were greatly comforted with the pope's bull, granting indulgences to all who ſhould take the croſs againſt the Viſconti of Milan and their adherents. The bull being publiſhed on the firſt day of Lent, was oſtentatiouſly hung up in view of the Gibellines, who in a very ſhort time tore it to pieces with arrows and ſtones. To exaſperate the pope againſt them, it was in this manner ſent to Avignon.

THE Gibellines were now in poſſeſſion of ſome of the ſuburbs; but their confederates in Lombardy, being hard preſſed by the cruſards, and the beſieged receiving reinforcements by ſea, the whole year was ſpent in daily skirmiſhes, their country being ruined by both parties, while neither gained any ſuperiority. The following year, about the middle of February, the beſieged ſallied out into the valley of Biſagno, and, after a deſperate engagement, ſeized a poſt on a hill in that neighbourhood, which ſtruck the Gibellines with ſuch conſternation, that they immediately abandoned the ſuburbs. A few months after, the pope offered his mediation to reconcile the two parties; but the conferences held for that purpoſe only ſerved to inflame the diſſentions; and the deputies, after attending two months at his court, returned in the beginning of November. Hoſtilities ſtill continuing in the neighbourhood of the city, the king of Naples, with his queen and many nobles, in the end of April, entered the harbour with forty-five gallies. Having aboliſhed ſeveral congregations, or tribu-

a nals that were looked upon as unconſtitutional, and procured a prolongation of his government for ſix years more after the expiration of the firſt term, he proceeded on his voyage to Naples.

NOTHING remarkable happened during the two following years. The hoſtilities were carried on in a languid manner, and the ruin and deſolation occaſioned by the war cooling the animoſities of the two parties, who began to treat each other with marks of generoſity, they mutually reſtored the captives without ranſom; and when their fleets met at ſea, inſtead of engaging, they ſaluted each other as friends [m]. The commerce of both parties being now leſs interrupted, Frederic, king of Sicily, the following year gave leave to the Guelfs A. D. 1327. to trade freely in his dominions. Caſtruccio, in the mean time, having repulſed the *Flo*b rentines, and ſecured his own territories, again entered the eaſtern Riviera, and took poſſeſſion of ſome places belonging to the Guelfs, who were ſtruck with conſternation upon hearing that the emperor Lewis of Bavaria had arrived in Italy. They expected that he would enter their territories with an army in behalf of the other faction. Lewis, however, having held an aſſembly of the Gibellines, proceeded to Piſa, where he was received by Caſtruccio, whom he created a duke; and in the end of December went with him to Rome. Next year both parties were chiefly engaged in ſending ſuccours to their reſpective allies. The Guelfs, in the month of July, ſent about forty gallies to the aſſiſtance of Robert, king of Naples, who was apprehenſive of being attacked by the emperor, in conjunction with Frederic of Sicily and the Gibelline party. The Genoeſe exiles, at the ſame time, ſent thirty-three gallies c to the aſſiſtance of the emperor; but he being obliged to abandon Rome, and Caſtruccio dying a few weeks after, the intended expedition againſt Naples never took place.

DURING the two following years, hoſtilities were continued betwixt both parties, chiefly at ſea, where the advantage was generally in favour of the Gibellines. The king of France, about this time, likewiſe offered his mediation for a peace; but though each faction ſent A. D. 1330. their deputies to the French court, the conferences broke off without any accommodation. A violent diſſention, in the mean time, ariſing in the city betwixt the people and the nobles on account of an exile who had been concealed in a nobleman's houſe, the nobles, finding the people ſupported by the Fieſci and Grimaldi, declared that they would rather deliver the city to the Gibellines than to the mob. The diſſention weakening the Guelf faction, at length d made them think of a reconciliation. Accordingly the following year, on the firſt of March, a truce was agreed to betwixt both parties for four months; and, on the ſecond of September, a perpetual peace was concluded by the mediation of the king of Naples, by which it was ſti- A. D. 1331. pulated, that the exiles ſhould be allowed to return to the city; that the republic ſhould be governed by the king's vicar; and all offices of the ſtate equally divided betwixt the Guelfs and Gibellines.

SUCH was the concluſion of this moſt ruinous war, by which the Genoeſe coaſt, formerly adorned with palaces and vineyards, was now reduced to the appearance of a barren waſte. So great was the general deſolation, that, according to Petrarch, the ſpectators that ſailed along were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment and horror [n]. Villani, a cotemporary author, relates, e that it was ſuppoſed by the learned, that greater exploits had not been performed at the ſiege of Troy; and that the damage and loſſes ſuſtained by each party were ſufficient to have purchaſed a kingdom, the Genoeſe republic, he aſſures us, being in his time the richeſt and moſt powerful ſtate in Chriſtendom [o]. The annaliſt Stella informs us, that before the war the moſt extravagant profuſion and luxury prevailed among the Genoeſe; but that towards the end, many noble families were reduced to poverty and indigence: ſo that about a hundred years afterwards it became a faſhion for the nobles to live in a plain manner, without any ſhow or magnificence.

THE accommodation betwixt the two parties was in a great meaſure owing to their apprehenſion of a foreign enemy. The Catalans, who had long diſturbed the Genoeſe trade, f this year made preparations for invading their territories, in hopes of making advantage of The Catalans invade the coaſts of the Genoeſe. the diviſions of the republic. They actually arrived in the end of July with forty gallies at Monaco, from whence, being repulſed with loſs, they ſailed to Savona, and from thence to Genoa, being more formidable in appearance than in reality. After burning a monaſtery, and ſome houſes in Chiavari, and deſtroying the vines at Porto Venere, they retired in Sep- A. D. 1332. tember towards Piſa. The Genoeſe the following year returned the viſit with forty-five gallies to Catalonia, where they took and deſtroyed a great many of the enemy's ſhips, and made ſeveral deſcents upon the coaſts. Hoſtilities likewiſe continued during the two years following, to the great detriment of the Catalans, who in the end were ſo reduced that they durſt not appear at ſea.

g THOUGH the Genoeſe were now under no apprehenſion from any foreign enemy, yet the jealouſies and animoſities of the two factions prevented them from enjoying tranquility.

The Gibellines imagined they perceived great partiality in the king's vicar towards the Guelfs, and on that account held ſeveral conferences to conſult about their own ſecurity. Upon the arrival of a new vicar, of a rigid and ſevere diſpoſition, who, according to Folieta, was commiſſioned by the king to foment the diſſentions, the conferences of the Gibellines became more frequent, which ſerved the vicar and the Guelfs with a pretext for attacking them on the twenty-fourth of February. The aſſailants, however, met with a vigorous reſiſtance; and the Gibellines, having fortified ſeveral places of the city, immediately ſent to Savona and the two Rivieras for aſſiſtance. The moderate of both parties, with the ſixteen abbots of the people, in vain endeavoured to compoſe the differences. The Gibellines, who had taken arms, being ſoon joined by their friends from the country, obliged their enemies to abandon the city, when they behaved with great moderation, allowing the king's vicar, with his guard of one hundred and thirty horſe, to depart unmoleſted, and prohibiting by proclamation, any of the Guelf faction from being injured, who had a mind to continue in the city. On the ninth of March, Raphael Doria, who had lately been admiral of the king of Sicily, and Galeotto Spinola, were choſen captains of the republic for two years, and the government was ſettled on them, and a foreign podeſta, with an abbot of the people, and ancients [p].

A peace betwixt the Genoeſe and Catalans. A. D. 1336.

THE new governors immediately fitted out ſeven gallies againſt the Catalans, which returned a few months after with a great many ſhips, taken from the enemy on the coaſts of Sicily, Barbary, and Catalonia. The Catalans, affected by theſe loſſes, in the beginning of the following year agreed to a truce, which ſoon after was converted into a treaty of peace. The Guelf exiles, in the mean time, having ſeized Monaco, fitted out a conſiderable fleet, which, cruiſing along the coaſt of Italy, attacked both friends and enemies without diſtinction. The captains of the republic, having armed ſeveral gallies for the defence of the coaſts, next year, on the twenty-fifth of March, obtained a prolongation of their government for three years, with the ſupreme authority, the office of podeſta being dropped, and the abbot of the people left to their nomination. The year after, both parties ſuſpending their private animoſities, ſent two fleets of twenty gallies each into the German ocean, to the aſſiſtance of the king of France, who was engaged in a war with Edward the third, king of England.

The Genoeſe in a tumultuous manner create a duke. A. D. 1339.

THIS naval expedition proved very memorable to the Genoeſe, and was the occaſion of a moſt remarkable revolution in their form of government. The ſailors of the fleet, the following year, thinking themſelves injured by their officers, whom they accuſed of defrauding them of their pay, proceeded to an open mutiny, and having expelled the admiral and the other commanders, ſeized the gallies. The king of France, who was choſen arbitrator, deciding in favour of the officers, and impriſoning ſixteen of the chiefs of the mutineers, ſeveral of the ſailors immediately left the fleet, and returned to Genoa, where they went round the coaſts repeating their mutinous complaints, which were greedily hearkened to, upon a falſe report that the mutineers, who had been impriſoned, were broke upon the wheel. The ſailors belonging to Savona, and the three vallies of Genoa, having at length warmed the reſentment of the people againſt the nobles, about the middle of September ſurpriſed Savona, and committed the government of the city to two rectors of their own chuſing, who were aſſiſted with a council of twenty artificers, and as many ſailors. The factious ſpirit ſpreading to Genoa, the Genoeſe inſiſted in a tumultuous manner on having an abbot of their own chuſing; and twenty of the people, with the conſent of the captains, accordingly aſſembled for that purpoſe. While the mob were impatiently expecting their deciſion, a forward mechanic, who was looked upon as a fool, leaped up on a bench, and called out, "Let Simon "Buccanigra be abbot." He was inſtantly ſeconded by his audience, who ſurrounded Buccanigra, and compelled him to accept of a ſword, as the badge of his office. The twenty electors, terrified with their noiſe, immediately broke up their aſſembly. and joined in the common voice. Buccanigra having at length quieted their clamours, thanked them for the honour they intended him; but as none of his family had condeſcended to be abbots, he deſired them to chuſe another, and returned the ſword. They were for a moment mute; but quickly called out with greater impetuoſity than before, "Be lord! Be lord!" The captains then alarmed, under pretence of preventing diſturbances, begged him to acquieſce with the people. Buccanigra accordingly declared, that he was ready to be abbot, or lord, or whatever they pleaſed, when the mob, with one common voice, bawled out, "Be lord! Be "lord! not abbot!" He again addreſſed them, and ſaid, he perceived their intention, that he ſhould be lord with the two captains: but they loudly anſwered, "No!" which being repeated ſeveral times, they at length cried out, "Let him be duke! Let him be duke!" The commons, having thus transferred the government from the nobles to one of their own body, vainly imagined that they might now, without reſtraint, commit the greateſt enormities, and immediately began to plunder the houſes of the nobility; when Buccanigra with great ſteadineſs oppoſed their fury, and at length quieted them by cauſing ſome of the chief

a rioters to be executed on the ſpot. A few days after, however, he connived at a ſecond riot, when the mob burnt all the books belonging to the cuſtom-houſe, and the public regiſters of debts. He was at this time ſolemnly confirmed in his office during life; and fifteen counſellors, or officials, were elected from the commons, to aſſiſt him in the adminiſtration; when a decree likewiſe paſſed, diſqualifying any of the Guelf faction from being elected duke [q].

ALMOST all the ſubjects of the republic quietly ſubmitted to the new governor; but the nobility, with great reluctance, acknowledged his authority; and the following year, ſome of them being diſcovered to have entered into a conſpiracy againſt him, were publicly executed as traitors. The Genoeſe, in the mean time, having been inſulted by the Turks in the b Black Sea, aſſembled all their force in thoſe parts, and attacked the infidels, whom they entirely defeated, taking eleven of their veſſels, and, according to Villani, killing ſix thouſand of their men. This advantage was counterbalanced by the loſs of ſix gallies, valued at two hundred thouſand florins, which were taken by the Engliſh on the coaſt of Brittany [r]. As the king of Caſtile was at this time at war with the Moors of Granada, who were aſſiſted by the infidels in Barbary, the duke the following year ſent twenty gallies into the ſervice of the king of Spain, under the command of his brother, whom he created an admiral. At the ſame time he armed another fleet for the aſſiſtance of the inhabitants of Albenga, who were attacked by the marquis of Final. He not only obliged the marquis to raiſe the ſiege; but, being a ſtrenuous aſſertor of his own dignity and that of the republic, compelled him likec wiſe to come and ask pardon at Genoa, and to deliver Final and all his caſtles to the republic.

Some nobles, who had conſpired againſt him, are put to death. A. D. 1340.

THE duke was now in poſſeſſion of all the territories of the republic, excepting Ventimiglia and Monaco, which were held by the four chief families of the nobles and the other exiles. Some of the family of Doria, however, the following year prevailed on the inhabitants of the valley of Oneglia to revolt; but the podeſta, who was a native of Ugubio, marching againſt them with a body of troops, they were quickly obliged to ſubmit. The exiles, ſtill continuing to promote diſaffection, the year after ſeveral perſons were diſcovered who had undertaken to betray Genoa, Cervi, Noli, and Taxaroli, to the lords of Milan. The traitors were put to a cruel death; and, as the exiles at Monaco had fitted out ſome veſſels to diſturb the Genoeſe trade, the duke the following ſpring armed ſix gallies for the defence of the coaſts, d three of which proceeded to Monaco, where they ſeized one of the piratical gallies. The Genoeſe, in the mean time, in conjunction with the gallies of the pope and the Venetians, took Smyrna from the infidels; but in the Black Sea they ſuffered a great loſs by the treachery of the Tartars, who, being baffled in the ſiege of Caffa in Crim Tartary, pretended a deſire of peace, which gave them an opportunity of ſurpriſing the Genoeſe, who had again ventured to trade in their dominions.

A. D. 1342.

A. D. 1344.

DURING theſe tranſactions the exiles had aſſembled a conſiderable army, and advanced into the valley of Polſevena, with the intention of beſieging the city. As it was reported that many of the nobles and people favoured their deſign, and ſeveral towns in the valley upon their approach expelling the podeſtas, the city was ſtruck with conſternation, and the e duke ſent to the nobility, deſiring their advice and aſſiſtance. A council was accordingly formed of ſix nobles and ſix commoners, for the government of the city; but the exiles, in the mean time, advancing into the ſuburbs, frequent conferences were held betwixt both parties, when it was agreed that the duke ſhould diſmiſs his guard of 700 men, and the exiles be admitted without arms into the city. Buccanigra, alarmed at this treaty, after accuſing the Genoeſe of violating their engagements to him, reſigned his office; and a few days after retired to Piſa with his family and relations, taking with him, according to Villani, upwards of one hundred thouſand florins of gold. On Chriſtmas day the hired guards departed, and the treaty was concluded; but it being perceived that the exiles, contrary to the ſtipulation, deſigned to enter the city armed, the gates were immediately ſhut, and in the evening f a new duke was elected, with the concurrence of the nobility. The duke, whoſe name was John de Murta, or, according to ſome, de Valente, immediately declared that he would accept of no other revenue, than what was ſufficient to defray the expence of his table, and deſired to be bound by articles like the duke of Venice. About a fortnight after the council for the war ordered the arms of the nobility to be delivered up, which freeing the people from their apprehenſions of a ſurprize, they ſallied out upon the exiles, and drove them from the ſuburbs. The pope, and the lord of Milan, ſoon after offering their mediation, in the month of July a peace was concluded, by which all the exiles, excepting eleven of the chiefs, were allowed to return to Genoa, and be reſtored to their poſſeſſions.

A. D. 1345.

SEVERAL of the exiles diſdained to accept of theſe terms, and ſtill keeping poſſeſſion of g Monaco and Roccabruna, the following year armed thirty gallies, and aſſembled a body of ten thouſand foot. The Genoeſe, being informed of theſe preparations, fitted out twenty-

D. 1346. nine gallies by private ſubſcription; but the exiles, inſtead of hazarding an engagement, a ordered their fleet to retire to Marſeilles, and afterwards allowed their forces to ſail to the aſſiſtance of the king of France againſt the Engliſh in Flanders, from whence they never returned, the greateſt part of them being ſlain in the battle of Creſſy. The fleet of the republic, returning from Monaco, proceeded on a voyage to the Black Sea, to protect the Genoeſe merchants in thoſe parts. On their way thither they obliged the count of Fondi to raiſe the ſiege of Terracina, which city voluntarily ſubmitted to the republic. From thence they ſailed to the iſland Negropont, where they were ſolicited, by the dauphin of Vienne, to join him in an expedition againſt the iſle of Chios, which the Greek emperor, according to Stella, had lately taken from the Genoeſe, though at that time it was held independent either of Genoa or Conſtantinople. The Genoeſe admiral rejected the dauphin's propoſal, and ſailed b immediately to Chios, which he quickly reduced: he afterwards made himſelf maſter of both the Foziæ on the Aſiatic coaſt, though there was a large army of Turks in the neighbourhood; and on the ninth of November returned with great reputation to Genoa, where a decree paſſed, appropriating all the revenues of the conquered places, for twenty years, to thoſe who had fitted out the gallies, ordaining likewiſe, that if the debt was not paid before that term, that they ſhould enjoy the revenues for ever; but that the ſovereignty ſhould be veſted in the republic. The Genoeſe were not diſturbed either with foreign or domeſtic wars, during the remaining part of the government of the duke, who died about four years after in the beginning of January, greatly regretted on account of his diſintereſtedneſs and public ſpirit.

The Genoeſe reduce the iſland of Chios.

c A few days after the death of John de Murta, the merchants aſſembled in the church of St. George, and choſe John de Valente as duke, who was aſſiſted by a council compoſed of an equal number of nobles and commoners. One Luke Facio had aſſembled two thouſand men in another part of the city, with the deſign of uſurping the government by force; but being informed of the election of Valente, he diſmiſſed his followers, and came and ſubmitted to the duke. A few months after his election, a new war broke out betwixt the republic and the Venetians, the cauſes of which are not mentioned by the Genoeſe annaliſts; but the Venetians relate, that they were obliged to fit out a fleet to vindicate their liberty of commerce in the Black Sea, where the Genoeſe had ſeized a great many of their ſhips. This fleet, which conſiſted of thirty-five gallies, upon their arrival at Negropont, found four- d teen Genoſe trading veſſels in the harbour of Caſtro, ten of which they immediately ſeized, and inſtead of entering the Black Sea returned to Venice. About two months after, four of the Genoeſe ſhips that had eſcaped, being joined by five others at Chios, returned to Caſtro, which they took by ſtorm and plundered, carrying off with them next day twenty-three Venetian ſhips.

A new war with the Venetians.

THE war, having thus commenced without any formal declaration, the Venetians immediately entered into an alliance with the king of Arragon, and the emperor of Conſtantinople, againſt the Genoeſe; and the year following, in the end of October, each of the allies ſent a fleet to ſea, which when united conſiſted of eighty-nine ſail, forty-five of which belonged to the Venetians, and thirty to the Catalans. The Genoeſe fleet, of ſixty-ſix gallies, in the e mean time had ſailed to the Archipelago, and after an unſucceſsful attempt upon Negropont, proceeded to Pera, where, on the ninth of March, they came to a general engagement with the enemy, which continued during the whole night with great animoſity, notwithſtanding a furious wind and heavy rain. The Venetian writers ſay, that neither party could claim the victory; but the Genoeſe relate that it was deciſive in their favour, they having loſt only about ſeven hundred men, and the Venetians and Catalans four thouſand. In the beginning of the engagement, they loſt thirteen gallies; but recovered ten of them afterwards, and took thirty Venetian and eighteen Catalan veſſels, the Greeks remaining only diſtant ſpectators of the action [*].

A. D. 1353.

THE following year was likewiſe memorable for another general naval engagement off f Sardinia; in which the Genoeſe, on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, were entirely defeated by the ſuperior fleet of the allies, and loſt forty-one of their gallies. Upon the return of the nineteen remaining gallies to Genoa, the city was filled with terror and confuſion. The two oppoſite factions with great animoſity threw the blame of the miſcarriage on each other; ſo that the council, being apprehenſive of a civil war, thought proper to confer the government of the republic on John Viſconti, archbiſhop and lord of Milan (E). John de Valente

(E) The annaliſt Stella relates, that the archbiſhop made the Genoeſe a preſent of a curious machine, which, by ſtriking a bell, diſtinguiſhed every hour of the day and night. About the ſame time, Francis Gataluxi, a noble Genoeſe, having aſſiſted the Greek emperor, Palæologus, to expel the uſurper Cantacuzenus, received the emperor's ſiſter in marriage, and the iſland of Lesbos, or Mytelene, for himſelf and his poſterity.

a accordingly reſigned his office; and the tumults being quieted by the arrival of the marquis Palavicini, the archbiſhop's vicar, the Genoeſe again applied themſelves to repair their fleet. The following ſpring, they gave the command of thirty-five gallies to Paganus Doria, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the victory off Pera. The admiral, after cruiſing along the coaſt of Catalonia, entered the Venetian gulph, and ſailed as far as Iſtria, plundering Parenzo, and taking many of the enemy's ſhips. In his return, on the fourth of November, he ſurpriſed the Venetian fleet in a harbour on the coaſt of the Morea, and, with little reſiſtance, made himſelf maſter of thirty-five gallies, and thirty-four ſmaller veſſels, carrying with him to Genoa 5400 priſoners, among whom was the Venetian admiral [t]. This loſs ſo affected the Venetians, that the following year they made propoſals of peace, which, by b the mediation of Mapheo, Bernabo, and Galeas Viſconti, the nephews of the late archbiſhop, was concluded on the firſt of June; when, according to the Venetian chronicle, the navigation of the Black Sea was declared free to each republic. A few weeks before, the Genoeſe had ſent fifteen gallies againſt the African corſairs, which fleet took and plundered Tripoli, and returned to Genoa with an immenſe booty, and a great number of captives.

A. D. 1355.

Peace concluded.

THE peace with the Venetians was ſoon followed with another revolution in Genoa, which was owing to the ambition of the Viſconti, who attempted to exceed the terms of the convention with the republic. One of the nobles, who had been moſt active in oppoſing their demands, being ſummoned to appear at Milan, inſtead of obeying the command, ſpirited up the nobles to take arms againſt the governor, who, however, was vigorouſly defended c by the people. During their ſkirmiſh, Simon Buccanigra, who had returned from Piſa, attacked the governor's palace with two hundred men, whom he had perſuaded to ſupport his private intereſt. According to Folieta, the people who oppoſed the nobles acted in concert with Buccanigra, who, being admitted into the palace, immediately ordered the alarm bell to be rung, which ſtrengthened his party, and obliged the nobles to retire. Next day, which was the fifteenth of November, Simon was again in a tumultuous manner choſen duke; when he baniſhed the moſt wealthy and powerful of the nobles, ordered thoſe that remained to deliver up their arms, and ordained, that, for the future, no nobleman ſhould enjoy any office in the commonwealth, or command any galley, or trading veſſel. He likewiſe concluded an alliance with the marquis of Montferrat againſt the Viſconti; and appointing his d brother general of the troops, carried the hoſtilities into the Milaneſe, even almoſt to the gates of Milan. Buccanigra, during the five following years, governed the republic in great tranquility, being aſſiſted by Nicholas de Caneto, a wealthy Guelf commoner, and Leonard de Montaldo, a Gibelline, of a very active diſpoſition, who had raiſed his fortune in his ſervice. However, the year following, in the month of October, a conſpiracy againſt him was diſcovered, in which many of the commons, as well as nobles, were concerned. The conſpirators were baniſhed into Lombardy; but a few weeks after, a ſecond conſpiracy being diſcovered, one of the conſpirators, who was to have been elected duke, was publicly beheaded before the palace. Notwithſtanding this vigilance and ſeverity, the duke, a few months after, was cut off by poiſon, which was adminiſtered to him at the country ſeat e of one of the nobles, where he dined with the king of Cyprus, who had come to Europe to aſk the aſſiſtance of the chriſtian princes againſt the Turks.

He is poiſoned. A. D. 1363.

UPON the death of Buccanigra, which happened on the fourteenth of March, his three brothers were immediately impriſoned, and the people proceeded to the election of a ſucceſſor. They at firſt choſe twenty citizens, who elected other ſixty: theſe ſixty nominated forty, by whom twenty-one others were elected, who choſe ten electors. Theſe laſt ten, on the ſame day, choſe Gabriel Adorno, a commoner of the Gibelline faction, as duke, who had acquired a great reputation for prudence and diſintereſtedneſs; this laſt part of his character he ſoon forfeited. Next day ſix counſellors were elected to aſſiſt in the adminiſtration; and the late duke, who by his arbitrary behaviour had loſt his popularity, was buried in a f private manner, not one honouring his funeral with his attendance. The nobility being ſtill excluded from all offices, many of them enrolled themſelves as commoners; but the four chief noble families, with many others who were in exile, formed new deſigns for recovering their ancient grandeur in concert with the nobles in the city, and having entered into an alliance with the Viſconti of Milan, two years after they invaded the territories of the republic. The marquis of Final at the ſame time revolted, but was quickly obliged to ſubmit; and the rebels were repulſed from Saſſello by the troops of the republic, commanded by the duke's ſon-in-law. Ambroſe Viſconti, however, in the beginning of December, advanced as far as Chiavari, filling all with conſternation; and the Guelfs in the city prompted one Leonard de Montaldo to raiſe an inſurrection. Leonard's attempt upon the palace proving fruitleſs, he was obliged to fly to Piſa, which in ſome meaſure diſconcerted the ſchemes g of the rebels under Viſconti, who, nevertheleſs, in the following ſpring, advanced into the valley of Biſagno, and even to the walls of the city. Leonard, at the ſame time, joining them with reinforcements from Piſa, they ſurrounded the city on all ſides, which obliged the duke to enter into a treaty with the Viſconti, to whom he promiſed to pay yearly four thouſand crowns of gold, to furniſh them with four hundred croſs-bowmen, and to allow the noble exiles to return to Genoa, Leonard de Montaldo, with the other exiles, being baniſhed for two years. a

THOUGH by this treaty tranquility was again reſtored, yet Adorno, by his avarice and extortion, ſoon alienated the affections of the people, and gave occaſion for new diſturbances. About four years after they aſſembled in the church of St. Mary, with the two vicars of the city, and from thence in a tumultuous manner ruſhed to the palace, the gates of which they immediately ſet fire to, which obliged the duke to retire with precipitation by a private paſſage. The people, being maſters of the palace, choſe Dominic Fulgoſio for duke, who was aſſiſted by a council of commoners. The new duke, who was elected on the thirteenth of Auguſt, in order to ſecure the poſſeſſions of his dignity, the following year impriſoned Gabriel Adorno in the caſtle of Vultabio, and ordered two citizens, who were accuſed of conſpiring againſt the government, to be beheaded before the palace. About the ſame time, he likewiſe ſent ten gallies againſt the pirates of the iſland of Malta, and the city of Mazaria in Sicily, who were quickly extirpated by the Genoeſe, and all their ſtores and wealth carried to Genoa.

A rupture betwixt the Genoeſe and the Cypriots. A. D. 1372.

THE year after a rupture happened betwixt the republic and the Cypriots, which, according to Folieta and Stella, was owing to a diſpute about precedency betwixt the Venetian bajulus and the Genoeſe conſul, at the coronation of the young king of Cyprus. Each nation ſupported their claim in a tumultuous manner; but the diſpute being decided, by the king's uncles, in favour of the Venetians, the Genoeſe reſolved to aſſert their right by open force, and for that purpoſe came to the palace next day with arms under their cloaths. The Venetians, having ſecret notice of their intention, accuſed them of a deſign againſt the king's life; and the arms being found upon them, they were immediately put to death without any trial, which was likewiſe the fate of all the other Genoeſe in the iſland, except one who eſcaped grievouſly wounded. The republic, inflamed with reſentment againſt the Cypriots and Venetians, decreed a large fleet to revenge the indignity, and in the mean time ſent ſeven gallies to Cyprus, under the command of Domianus Cataneus, who ſailed from Genoa in March, and upon his arrival at the iſland quickly alarmed the Cypriots, by his frequent deſcents upon their coaſts. He cunningly created factions and diviſions among the nobles, by plundering and burning the eſtates of ſome, and ſparing thoſe of others. On the ſixteenth of June he took Nicoſia, and a few days after made himſelf maſter of Paphos. c d

THE duke, in the mean time, made great preparations at Genoa for the conqueſt of the iſland: he raiſed, by a general tax, about one hundred and four thouſand florins, and equipped thirty gallies, and a great number of tranſport-ſhips, on board of which were embarked a large body of horſe and foot, with many very large battering engines. This fleet, in which were many noble volunteers, arrived at Cyprus in the beginning of October, under the command of Peter Fulgoſio, the duke's brother, who a few days after made himſelf maſter of Famagoſta, the capital of the iſland, when he ordered ſome of the grandees, concerned in the maſſacre of the Genoeſe, to be put to death. He ſoon after reduced the whole iſland, and took one of the king's uncles, with two ſons of another uncle, and ſixty nobles and knights, priſoners. He afterwards reſtored all his conqueſts, except Famagoſta, to the king, who promiſed to pay annually, for a certain term of years, 40,000 florins to the Genoeſe. As a ſecurity for the performance of the treaty, the king's uncle and his two couſins above-mentioned, with ſeveral nobles, were ſent the following year on board ſixteen gallies to Genoa. The admiral continued a year longer at Cyprus, when appointing a garriſon in Famagoſta, and leaving five gallies for the defence of the iſland, he ſet ſail for Genoa, where he was received with the greateſt honours. A preſent was made him of 10,000 florins; he and his eldeſt ſons were exempted from all taxes during their lives; and an anniverſary ſolemnity was appointed to be held on the tenth of October, the day on which Famagoſta ſurrendered. e f

A. D 1376. THE Genoeſe ſeem now to have claimed the excluſive privilege of trading to Cyprus[u]; and the following year appear to have intended alſo to appropriate to themſelves the trade with the Greeks. It was probably with this view that they eſpouſed the intereſt of Andronicus, who had had been impriſoned for a conſpiracy againſt his father Paleologus, or Calojoannes, emperor of Conſtantinople. The old emperor favouring the Venetians, the Genoeſe entered into a correſpondence with Andronicus, and by force placed him upon the throne, perſuading him likewiſe to give his beautiful ſiſter as a concubine to the Turkiſh bey, to procure his friendſhip. Calojoannes, with his empreſs and children, were thruſt into priſon, and all the g a Venetian merchants at Conſtantinople were alſo plundered and impriſoned. The Genoeſe, as a reward for their ſervices, obtained the iſland of Tenedos from the unnatural uſurper; but the Greek governor, being faithful to the dethroned emperor, at his deſire, ſurrendered the iſland to the Venetians, by whoſe aſſiſtance, the following year he was again reſtored to his throne w.

HOSTILITIES, in the mean time, had commenced betwixt both republics. The Genoeſe had concluded an alliance with the king of Hungary, the duke of Auſtria, the lord of Padua, and the patriarch of Aquileia, which the Venetians being informed of, immediately entered into a treaty with Bernabo Viſconti of Milan, and the young king of Cyprus, who married Bernabo's daughter Valentina. The bride the year after was conducted by twelve gallies to b Cyprus, which fleet likewiſe gave aſſiſtance to the king, who for ſeveral months had been beſieging Famagoſta, in conjunction with the Venetians. The Genoeſe, being wholly intent upon proſecuting the war, granted a pardon to all the exiles, and ſent ten gallies to the relief of Famagoſta, which, however, in their paſſage, ventering to attack fourteen Venetian gallies, were entirely defeated, with the loſs of five of their number. The marquis of Final, in the mean time, by the perſuaſion of the Viſconti, revolted from the republic, and ſeized Albenga, Noli, and the caſtle of Final.

A war betwixt them and the Venetians. A. D. 1377.

A. D. 1378.

THESE loſſes filled the city of Genoa with murmuring and confuſion, which inſpired ſeveral of the wealthy and ambitious citizens with the deſign of cauſing a revolution. They therefore encreaſed the panic, by publiſhing falſe intelligence; and having written to the c duke that the Viſconti were paſſing the Apennines with a powerful army, and that the Venetians had arrived with a numerous fleet at Porto Venere, they procured an order for the people to arm, and next morning, being the ſeventeenth of June, attacked the palace and ſeized the duke. A few hours after, Nicolas Guarco was choſen his ſucceſſor, who having ſelected one half of his council from the nobles, ſubſcribed, according to cuſtom, the articles of capitulation, by which Fulgoſio and his brother Peter, though accuſed of no miſconduct, were condemned to perpetual baniſhment; ſo deceitful and tranſient is popular favour! The new duke concluded a peace with the Catalans, and recovered Albenga and the other places ſeized by the marquis of Final; while Lucianus Doria, who was appointed admiral in chief, ſailed with ſeventeen gallies into the Venetian gulph, and being joined by three others at Zara, d or Jadra, took ſeveral ſhips of the enemy. The Venetian authors mention only the tranſactions of their own fleet, which, about the ſame time, made ſeveral deſcents upon the coaſts of Dalmatia, then under the dominion of the Hungarians.

A. D. 1378.

THE following year, on the fifth of May, the two fleets came to a general engagement off Pola in Iſtria, when the Genoeſe obtained a complete victory, and took fifteen of the enemy's gallies, with 2400 priſoners, whom they conducted to Zara. The particulars of the action are narrated differently by the hiſtorians of each republic; but they all agree that the victory was deciſive in favour of the Genoeſe, who, however, loſt their admital Doria, who was greatly regretted. Victor Piſanus, the Venetian admiral, eſcaping to Venice with ſix, or, according to ſome, with four gallies, was immediately impriſoned, with all thoſe who had e returned with him. The Genoeſe, after their rejoicings for the victory, ſent Peter Doria as admiral, with a reinforcement of fifteen gallies, to Zara, who was ſoon after joined by nine others, which in their paſſage had forced a ſmall Venetian ſquadron to retire from their coaſts. The new admiral, in the beginning of Auguſt, ſailed from Zara with forty-ſeven gallies, and many other ſmaller veſſels, and coaſting along Dalmatia, plundered ſeveral towns belonging to the enemy. On the ſixteenth of the month, being joined by the Paduan troops and veſſels, he ſtormed the city of Chogia, ſituated on a ſmall iſland commanding one of the entrances of the Venetian harbour, though ſtrongly fortified, and garriſoned with upwards of three thouſand men.

The Genoeſe gain a ſignal victory over the Venetians. A. D. 1379.

THE loſs of Chioggio, according to the Genoeſe writers, ſtruck the Venetians with conſter- f nation. They buried their moſt valuable effects, and amuſed the Genoeſe admiral with an offer of peace, while they ſunk a large veſſel in the chief channel that conducted to the city, and armed a great many boats with a ſmall cannon in each, which was the firſt appearance of that deſtructive engine in Italy. The Aquileians and Paduans, in the mean time, cut off all ſupplies from the city by land, and the Hungarians, under Charles of Durazzo, attacked Trieſte, which the Venetian writers acknowlege, though they make no mention of the offer of peace made to the admiral; who, by his extravagant terms, is ſaid to have rendered the Venetians deſperate, and by his too great confidence to have loſt the opportunity of taking the city. He continued the ſiege, however, ſome months, while the Genoeſe ſurpriſed and cut off four thouſand freebooters ſent into their territory by the Viſconti; and by their vigorous g efforts in the Archipelago, obliged the Greeks to conclude a ſeparate peace. Before his arrival, however, Doria was killed by a cannon ball, and the Venetians, being assisted by the English, drove the Genoese from one of the islands which they had seized, destroyed upwards of twenty of their gallies, and cut off the retreat of the others within the channel by stopping it up. By this means the Genoese, who were in Chioggia, were in their turn besieged, and on the twenty-second of June obliged to surrender prisoners of war. The enterprize against Venice proving thus unsuccessful, the Genoese, with the gallies that remained, sailed from thence, and took Capo d' Istra, Pola, and some other places on that coast. They were soon, however, obliged to retire, the Venetians becoming masters of the gulph, under the command of Pisanus, whom in their late desperate situation they had taken out of prison, and restored to his dignity. a

But are obliged to retire with loss.

DURING these transactions, the Genoese had repulsed a body of horse, which had advanced as far as the valley of Pulsevera, and had likewise defeated several exiles who had attempted to approach the city with some forces, in hopes of causing a revolution. While the duke's brother was expelling the rebels from the eastern Riviera, the remains of the fleet from Venice, in the beginning of January, entered the harbour of Genoa, bringing home with them only a few relicks, as the fruits of all their dangers and fatigues. All parties being now weary of the war, they submitted to the mediation of the count of Savoy, by whose endeavours, on the eighth of August, a treaty was concluded betwixt the two republics and their respective allies, excepting Bernabo Visconti, lord of Milan. By this treaty it was agreed, that the castle of Tenedos should be demolished, and that no settlement should ever be established in the island by either republic. The Venetian governor, however, absolutely refusing to evacuate the island, the Genoese the following year sequestered all the merchandize in their territories belonging to the Florentines, who had guarantied the performance of the treaty, under a penalty of one hundred and fifty thousand ducats. The Venetians, having at length compelled the governor to submit, the fortresses of the island were demolished the year after in the presence of a Genoese syndic, and the goods of the Florentines were restored. b c

A peace betwixt the two republics.

A. D. 1381.

A. D. 1383. THE peace soon proved almost as pernicious to the Genoese as the late war; for a few months after the factions in the city again revived, and tumults succeeding, the duke on the sixth of April was forced to abandon the palace, which was immediately possessed by two different parties, who chose no less than three dukes. Next day, however, two of them resigned in favour of Leonard de Montaldo, a lawyer, who had promoted the disturbances; and to prevail with the people to acquiesce in his favour, promised to resign the dignity in six months. The historian Stella, who was an eye-witness of this revolution, informs us, that the new duke acted with great prudence and moderation. He granted a pardon to his predecessor, with full liberty to return to Genoa: he lessened the taxes; and as the young king of Cyprus had died some time before, he entered into a treaty with his uncle, who remained a hostage in Genoa, and was declared his successor. The new king, having granted Famagosta to the Genoese in perpetuity, and stipulated to pay a large annual tribute to the republic, embarked with his queen and retinue on board ten gallies, and on the second of June sailed for Cyprus. Montaldo, at the end of the six months, seemed to have forgot his promise of resigning the government; but his administration afterwards was so prudent and equitable, that he was even respected by all parties, and honoured also by foreign princes. d e

A. D. 1384. WHILE he seemed thus firmly established in the government, he was seized with an epidemical fever; and, after three days illness, died on the fourteenth of June. As many people had fled from Genoa, on account of this contagious distemper, which carried off about nine hundred people weekly, Antonioto Adorno next day was chosen duke without any dis-

A. D. 1385. turbance. He at first followed the footsteps of his predecessor, retained his retinue and guards, and confirmed the same counsellors and rectors; but in the beginning of the following year, he imprisoned the late duke Nicolas Guarco, who had been betrayed into his hands by the marquisses of Final. Being of an aspiring disposition, he formed a design of making himself mediator in the grand schism of the church; and, in hopes of establishing the pope's court at Genoa, he offered his assistance to Urban the sixth, who was then closely besieged by the king of Naples at Nocera. Urban accordingly being conducted to Genoa about the middle of September by ten gallies, Adorno immediately wrote to the emperor, and to other christian princes, desiring to be appointed their vicar or proxy in terminating the schism; but according to Stella, his request was rejected by all those potentates. Urban mortgaged some revenues of the bishopric of Albenga for the payment of sixty thousand crowns expended in fitting out the fleet that brought him from Naples, and granted indulgences to those who visited the church of St. Laurence in Genoa, as extensive as those pertaining to the church of St. Mark in Venice. The duke, however, not humouring his morose disposition as he expected, the year after he left Genoa about the middle of December, and went to Lucca. f g a Soon after the departure of Urban, a conſpiracy was diſcovered againſt the duke. Francis Raphael and Leonard Juſtiniani, the ſons of Garibald, who were the chief conſpirators, immediately fled; but ſeveral others being apprehended, were put to the torture, fined in about eight thouſand florins, and then tranſported to the diſtant provinces. Mean while, as it was reported that the king of Tunis was making preparations for attacking Genoa, the duke next year fitted out twelve gallies for an expedition againſt the Moors; and three others being equipped for Manfred Chiaramonte, admiral of Sicily, the fleet about Midſummer ſailed under the command of the duke's brother to Africa, being joined alſo by five Piſan gallies in Manfred's pay. Having reduced the iſland of Gerbæ, or Zerbi, on the African coaſt, the Genoeſe reſigned their ſhare of the conqueſt to Manfred, for which they received b thirty-ſix thouſand florins. Antonioto, encouraged by this ſucceſs, exerted himſelf with greater activity; and the following year, having prevailed with Charles the ſixth of France to engage in an expedition againſt the Moors, he fitted out forty gallies and twenty large tranſports, and about the middle of December gave the command of the fleet to John Centurio, his relation. Many of the Engliſh nobility likewiſe engaged with great ardor in this expedition againſt the infidels; and a truce then ſubſiſting betwixt that kingdom and France, they joined the French nobleſſe and other forces under the command of the duke of Bourbon, the king's uncle, and marched with them to Genoa, where they embarked the following ſummer, and on the twenty-ſecond of July landed in Africa, the Engliſh archers obliging the Mooriſh army to abandon the ſhore. They directly inveſted Tunis; but the city being c ſtrongly garriſoned, and their army greatly diſtreſſed by the ſudden incurſions of the Mooriſh light horſe, they gladly hearkened to the offers of accommodation made by the infidels, and concluded a treaty with them; by which the Moors engaged not to make any deſcents on the coaſts of Italy or France, on the iſlands of the Mediterranean, not to moleſt the chriſtian traders, to pay forthwith ten thouſand crowns of gold, and to reſtore all the chriſtian captives [x].

A. D. 1387

A. D. 1390.

Before the fleet ſailed from Genoa, Antonioto had diſcovered a new conſpiracy againſt himſelf. Not thinking it ſafe to irritate his rivals too much, he obliged the conſpirators and their friends only to give ſecurity for their future fidelity, and baniſhed them the city; but a few months after, finding that he had in a great meaſure loſt his popularity, and d that his rivals were acquiring more influence, in the beginning of Auguſt he embarked privately at his villa in the ſuburbs, and abandoned the government. Upon the news of his flight, the people immediately run to arms; but recovering from their ſurprize, on the ſame day they elected, in a peaceable manner, James Fulgoſio, whoſe father had lately been duke. Antonioto, ſoon repenting of his precipitate flight, in the beginning of the following year came by ſea to Seſto, according to Folieta, deſiring to be admitted into the city as a private citizen; which requeſt, he ſays, was denied. Stella, however, relates, that he was driven back from Seſto by bad weather; and that he then formed a deſign with the marquiſſes of Final, of recovering the government of the republic by force. The news of his preparations greatly alarmed the friends of the duke; but he himſelf appeared in- e ſenſible of the danger, and gave no orders for any defence. Antonioto accordingly, on the fifth of April, entered the city without oppoſition, and the next day, being again declared duke, took poſſeſſion of the palace, and entertained his predeceſſor at dinner with himſelf.

A. D. 1391.

A few months after, however, he was again in hazard of being expelled, having provoked the inhabitants of Savona to revolt, by giving aſſiſtance to thoſe of Signo, with whom they were then at war. To ſtop the murmurs of the Genoeſe, he proceeded to violent meaſures, and cauſed two of the chiefs of the ſeditious to be put to death. Some others, the following year, being put to death and impriſoned, the diſturbances increaſed; and Antonioto having by open force in vain endeavoured to ſuppreſs the revolters, on the ſixteenth of June was, at length, obliged to abandon the palace to Antony de Montaldo, who was f created duke with great acclamations, though then only twenty-three years of age.

A. D. 1392.

The confuſion and tumults were encreaſed by this revolution, and the year after began to ſpread into the neighbouring vallies, where the Guelfs and Gibellines with great animoſity deſtroyed each other's poſſeſſions. Antonioto, being again in hopes of recovering his dignity, appeared with an armed force before the city in the beginning of June, but was repulſed with conſiderable loſs. The whole territories of the republic were now filled with anarchy and diſorder, and the citizens were all in arms, and divided into ſeveral factions; one of which on the fifteenth of July expelled Montaldo from the palace, and choſe Peter Fulgoſio as duke, who in the evening thought proper to reſign to his more powerful competitor Clement de Premontorio. Next day, however, the people declared they would accept g of neither, and began to propoſe the committing of the adminiſtration to the lord of Milan, or ſome other foreign prince. At length, ten electors choſe Francis Juſtiniani duke for one year. The hoſtilities, nevertheleſs, ſtill continuing in the city, ſuburbs, and neighbouring fortreſſes on the mountains, Juſtiniani, on the laſt of Auguſt, reſigned the government, when Antonioto in the afternoon broke into the city with five thouſand men, and was immediately joined by two thouſand friends in arms. After a long and bloody diſpute he was repulſed, that ſame evening, by the followers of Antony de Montaldo, who was next day

The malcontents of the valley of Biſagno, with the other two vallies, on the firſt of January, however, openly took arms againſt him: but about two months after they were forced to ſubmit. Many of the Guelfs ſtill continued in open rebellion; but, inſtead of attacking the city, aſſaulted the Gibellines, who were followers of Antonioto, and exiles as well as themſelves. His friends in the vallies and ſuburbs renewing their hoſtilies, Montaldo, ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded with difficulties, on the 24th of May at night, left the city, and abandoned the government. Next day, the ten electors choſe Nicolas Zoalio for duke, who being oppoſed by Adorno, Guarco Fulgoſio, Montaldo, and their friends, about three months after reſigned his dignity. Upon his reſignation the other competitors again filled the city with tumults and mobbing, very few being killed, though each of the chiefs were attended by ſeveral hundred armed men. On the third of September, Antonioto Adorno was again choſen duke by artful means; which diſguſted all the nobility, and exaſperated Montaldo againſt him, to whom in the morning he had promiſed, as a means of reſtoring tranquility, not to accept of that dignity.

By theſe continual diſſentions the power of the republic began at length ſenſibly to decline, which excited the watchful ambition of the French, who attempted to make a conqueſt of its territory; they were, indeed, invited by ſome of the family of Doria, who, in conjunction with the marquiſſes of Final, conducted the French forces into the weſtern Riviera. The invaders immediately ſeized Diano; but finding more difficulty in the enterprize than they expected, they ſoon after abandoned the place, and in the end of the year evacuated the Genoeſe territories [y]. This invaſion, however, did not ſuſpend the civil diſſentions; for hoſtilities continued during the whole following year betwixt the duke and the adherents of Montaldo and Guarco. Some of the Grimaldi, at the ſame time, ſeized the caſtle of Monaco, which, with Porto Fino and Porto Venere, became the head quarter of
A. D. 1390. the Guelfs, who, without joining the faction of Montaldo, declared themſelves equally enemies to the duke. Antonioto, according to Stella, had privately favoured the French invaſion; and the following year, finding the power of his rivals increaſing in conſequence of the ſuccours they received from Galeas Viſconti of Milan, while cardinal Fieſco, who had been general of the papal forces, arrived on the coaſt with twelve gallies to the aſſiſtance of the Guelfs, to put an end, if poſſible, to all their diviſions, he reſolved to give the dominion of the city and republic to the French king. After conſulting with the nobles and commoners of both factions in the city, and with cardinal Fieſco, who declared himſelf the protector of the Guelfs, with their conſent, he ſent an ambaſſy to France, with an offer of the ſovereignty of the republic. Accordingly on the 25th of October, articles were agreed to betwixt the duke and council and the French deputies; by which the king of France and his ſucceſſors were declared lords of Genoa, and all its territories, ſaving the rights of the empire. It was beſides ſtipulated, that the king's vicar, who ſhould not be an Italian, ſhould govern according to the laws of the republic, with the advice of the council; and in all deliberations ſhould have two votes, and be allowed a yearly revenue of about 7000 florins; that the council ſhould conſiſt of an equal number of nobles and commoners of both factions, not leſs than ſix perſons of each faction, and might give a deciſive ſentence even in the abſence of the governor, in which caſe a Gibelline ſhould be preſident; that the king ſhould have no authority to impoſe taxes on the Genoeſe; and when he ſhould require any ſhips or troops from them, he ſhould pay them out of his royal revenues; that the Genoeſe ſhould reckon the friends and enemies of the king likewiſe their friends and enemies, excepting only the Greek emperor and the king of Cyprus; that the king ſhould defend the republic againſt all its enemies, and recover all the territories and rights it had loſt within four years and four months; for which purpoſe ten of the chief caſtles of the republics ſhould be garriſoned with French ſoldiers, to be paid by the Genoeſe [z].

The ſovereignty of the republic conferred on the king of France.

A. D. 1397. About four weeks after, Antonioto made a ſolemn reſignation of the government to the French deputies; but was, however, allowed to act as vicar till the following March, when the French, governor arrived with two hundred horſe, and a conſiderable body of foot. Before the concluſion of this treaty with the French, the inhabitants of Savona had put themſelves under the protection of the duke of Orleans, who now reſigned his right to the king; but for ſome weeks the Savoneſe refuſed to acknowlege the new governor: they

a however, ſubmitted in the end of April, and two months after, Guarco and Montaldo, with their followers, likewiſe acknowledging the governor, tranquility was quickly reſtored thro' all the Genoeſe territories; and, in order to prevent future diſturbances, a captain of juſtice was appointed, whoſe authority in puuiſhing delinquents was not reſtricted by the laws. As the plague was brought this ſummer to Genoa in a Turkiſh ſhip, and raged greatly in the city, the governor in the end of the year appointed a lieutenant, and returned to Paris.

THE following ſummer the inhabitants of the three vallies took arms, under pretence that the king's vicar acted with partiality in favour of the Guelfs; and having ſurpriſed the city, were immediately joined by the Gibellines, who barricadoed all the ſtreets in their poſ- An inſurrection againſt the French governor. A. b ſeſſion, and for ſeveral weeks daily aſſaulted the other party, obliging the French governor at length to retire to Savona. Each party ſent for auxiliaries from the country; but Gaſper Coſſa arriving with three Neapolitan gallies in his way to France with the pope's legate, prevailed on both to agree to an accommodation. About a fortnight after, hoſtilities were renewed with greater fury, each party ſetting fire to the houſes of their adverſaries. Peace was again embraced by both for a few days, when they ardently renewed their hoſtilities, which were followed by a third accommodation. This was again interrupted; but at length, on the fifth of September, a total ceſſation of arms was agreed to, which was confirmed by the king's governor. Though very few were killed during theſe tumults, yet the damage done to the city was computed at a million of florins.

c A FEW weeks after, Colard de Callaville, one of the French king's counſellors, arrived as governor; but the following year, in the beginning of May, he was likewiſe obliged to A. D. 1399. abandon the palace, to ſhun the fury of ſome of the populace, who had taken arms becauſe the nobles were admitted into the council of ſtate. The chiefs of the Gibellines protected the governor; and to appeaſe the tumult, the council of ancients was new modelled, and compoſed wholly of commoners. However, at the following election, four months after, the nobles were again admitted into that council; but, to prevent the people from murmuring, on the firſt of December a new council was appointed, conſiſting of four tradeſmen, called priors of the arts, with twelve artificers as aſſiſtants, upon whoſe deliberation the governor and council of the ancients had a negative. This new council was empow-
d ered to propoſe all matters for the public good to the governor, and was inveſted with the ſupreme direction of the city militia, who took the oath of fidelity to the priors, excluſive of all others. A few weeks after, however, ſome of the people attempted to expel the French governor; and about the middle of January raiſed ſuch a tumult in the city, that he was obliged to abandon the palace. After the city had remained ten days without a gover- A. D. 1400. nor, the people choſe Baptiſt Buccanigra, who took the title of captain of the king's guard. His authority, however, was diſregarded by the factions, who continued ſkirmiſhing with each other; and about two months after, he alſo abandoned the palace, when the city was again without any government. In a few days, Baptiſt de Franchis ſucceeded to the government; but being unable to quell the tumults, quickly reſigned. Many aſſemblies of the e moderate citizens, mean time, were held for reſtoring tranquility, and in the end of October, de Franchis was again choſen governor; but acting with too great zeal in repreſſing the diſorders, the people the following ſpring again took arms againſt him, and were with dif- A. A few months after, a council of eight citizens being appointed, he was depoſed by them, and the government committed to Antony Juſtiniani and George Adorno, till the arrival of a new governor from France. The two governors, inſtead of granting a full pardon to all delinquents, which had been uſual at every revolution, baniſhed all murderers who could not be apprehended, for fifty years.

ON the laſt day of October, John le Meingle, ſurnamed Boucicard, a marſhal of France, of great reputation, entered Genoa as governor, attended by one thouſand horſe and foot.
f Two days after he ordered Baptiſt Buccanigra and Baptiſt de Franchis to be ſeized, and ſentenced them both to be beheaded in the evening before the palace, for having uſurped the government without the king's permiſſion. Buccanigra was accordingly beheaded; but the guards who attended the execution, fearing to be aſſaulted by the populace, were thrown into diſorder, ſo that de Franchis, though his hands were tied, made his eſcape. Boucicard, Tranquility re-eſtabliſhed. A. D. 1402. by this example of ſeverity, having ſtruck a terror into all offenders, publiſhed a general pardon, from which ſeven perſons only were excepted: he declared, however, that the rebels who ſhould be guilty of the ſlighteſt crime, ſhould be puniſhed for their former rebellion; and, on this pretence, the following year executed ſeveral malcontents in the city and the valley of Biſagno. At the ſame time he ordered all the arms in the city and g three vallies, excepting the ſwords and the common bows, to be brought to the palace: he likewiſe aboliſhed the priors of the arts, eſtabliſhed ſeveral taxes, prohibited the people from holding any aſſemblies, and ſent three gallies to the relief of Famagoſta, which was then beſieged by the king of Cyprus, aſſiſted by a Catalan fleet. Having reſtored order and tran-

tranquility, he became at length ſo acceptable to the Genoeſe, that they ſent an ambaſſy to the king, and by their entreaties obtained that he ſhould continue governor during life [a]. a

The Greeks emperor aſks the aſſiſtance of the Genoeſe.

THE Genoeſe ſettled at Pera, mean while, at the deſire of Tamerlane, erected his ſtandard. After his conqueſt over Bajazet, however, he reduced Smyrna, and Old and New Fozia, for which the Genoeſe annaliſt aſſigns no reaſon; but, according to Niem, the governor of Smyrna had refuſed to raiſe the ſtandard of the Tartars [b]. The Greek emperor Emanuel, who was then in France, ſoliciting aſſiſtance againſt the Turks, hearing of the victory of Tamerlane, the following January arrived at Genoa, in his way to Conſtantinople; and having obtained a preſent of three thouſand florins from the Genoeſe, prevailed on them to fit out three gallies to act againſt the Turks in the Archipelago.

A. D. 1403.

AFTER his departure, Boucicard reſolved to go himſelf with a powerful fleet againſt the king of Cyprus. Having ſent a new governor to Corſica, which now quietly ſubmitted to the Genoeſe, he ſailed from Genoa, on the fourth of April, with nine gallies, a large galleon and tranſport, and ſeven ſhips; and upon his arrival at Cyprus, obliged the king to agree to a peace, and to pay all the expences of the expedition. He ſailed from thence to Cilicia, obliging the lord of Candelorum to agree to a perpetual alliance with the French and Genoeſe. He afterwards plundered Berytus; but an epidemical ſickneſs ſeizing his fleet, he ſet ſail for Genoa, being joined by a galley from Chios, and another belonging to the knights of Rhodes. Upon his arrival at the Morea, he fell in with a Venetian fleet of thirteen gallies, which, after accompanying him for ſome time, at length attacked him, and after a ſharp diſpute took three of his gallies, loſing, however, one of their own. The Venetian writers accuſe the Genoeſe of committing the firſt hoſtilities; but Boucicard the following year wrote to the doge and Venetian admiral throwing the blame of the violation of the peace upon them, and offering to juſtify himſelf by ſingle combat [c]. During his abſence ſome malcontents in the vallies had openly revolted againſt his lieutenant; and Caſanus Doria and Baptiſt de Franchis had the impudence to publiſh a manifeſto, declaring war againſt the republic. Upon his return the commotions were quieted, and a few months after the peace was renewed with the Venetians. b c

A. D. 1404.

ABOUT the ſame time Boucicard was put in poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Leghorn, by Gabriel Viſconti, lord of Piſa; who, imitating the Genoeſe, declared the French ſovereigns of his territories, and erected their ſtandard. The governor ſoon after ſent ſubſidies to Francis Cararia, lord of Padua, Verona, and Vincenza, who, to defend himſelf againſt the Viſconti of Milan, and the Venetians, likewiſe took the oath of homage to the French king. The Genoeſe in the mean time, began ſecretly to murmur againſt the ſeverity and rapacity of the French, who puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour thoſe who expreſſed the leaſt diſſatisfaction at the preſent government; and beſides impoſed the moſt grievous and oppreſſive taxes. The diſaffection becoming general, and many people in the vallies the year after taking arms, and killing ſome of the tax-gatherers, and even the podeſtas of the towns, Boucicard, by aboliſhing ſome of the moſt heavy taxes, again reſtored tranquility. d

A. D. 1405.

ABOUT two years after, his conduct being again cenſured for aſſiſting the Florentines againſt the Piſans, who had revolted from their lord, to quiet the murmurs of the Genoeſe, he made a preſent of Leghorn to the republic, who gave him twenty-ſix thouſand florins, as an equivalent for the expences that city had coſt him. The Florentines, making themſelves maſters of Piſa, the podeſta of Sarzana, rather than ſubmit to the conquerors, ſold that city to the Genoeſe, who by that means extended their frontier to the eaſtern ſide of the Magra. e

A. D. 1408.

The year after, finding that the two contending popes wanted to prolong the ſchiſm, by rejecting all means of an accommodation, they imitated the example of the French, and renounced the authority of each of them. News ſoon after arriving, that the merchants ſettled at Chios had declared againſt the government of Boucicard, and, under pretence of a loan, had ſeized all the merchandize in the iſland, valued at fifteen thouſand florins, their relations at Genoa the following year were impriſoned in the citadel which Boucicard had cauſed to be built; and Conrad Doria was ſent with three gallies and three large tranſports to reduce the rebels. He arrived at Chios on the eighteenth of June, and in three days, having taken the ſuburbs of the city, he obliged the citizens again to acknowledge the French king, pardoning their revolt, and only baniſhing ſome of thoſe who had promoted the inſurrection. f

A. D. 1409.

BOUCICARD had now ruined the republic of Piſa, and enriched himſelf by the ſpoils of that ſtate; for he had not only obtained Leghorn from Gabriel Viſconti, but had perſuaded him to betray Piſa to the Florentine army, and had afterwards executed him at Genoa, under pretence of plotting againſt his government, and ſeized his wealth as a lawful forfeiture.

a The Genoeſe, who at firſt had been ſtruck dumb by his ſeverity, no longer concealed their diſcontent, and complained that all his ſchemes tended only to the eſtabliſhing of his private power, or the grandeur of the French, at the expence of the republic. He, however, diſregarded their murmurs; and, thinking he had ſecured their ſubmiſſion, formed a deſign of ſeizing the Milaneſe, the poſſeſſion of which dutchy was then conteſted by the two brothers John Maria and Philip Maria Viſconti. He accordingly borrowed large ſums of money at Genoa; and aſſembling five thouſand horſe, and about as many foot at Gavi, marched to the aſſiſtance of John, who was in poſſeſſion of Milan. Philip, who reſided at Pavia, was aſſiſted by the marquis of Montferrat, and Facinis Canis, lord of Alexandria, who being at enmity with Boucicard, were perſuaded by the exile de Franchis to march di-
b rectly to Genoa. Upon the approach of their forces, the Genoeſe inſtantly took arms againſt the French, maſſacring all thoſe who were not ſo fortunate as to ſave themſelves in the caſtles. The marquis of Montferrat was then invited into the city, and the ninth of September declared captain of the republic. Boucicard, who in the mean time had obtained the government of Milan, haſtened back with his army; but, upon hearing the ſtrength of his opponents, he thought it was in vain to paſs the Apennines.

GENOA ſtill continued in arms under four Gibelline leaders; and the council of ancients, and all other officers of the republic being choſen from that faction, they diſarmed the Guelfs, who, though they equally hated Boucicard, yet wanted to have a new governor from France. The Genoeſe, having expelled the French from the citadel, and the fol-c lowing year obliged the Guelfs in Porto Fino, to ſubmit to the new government, on the twenty-firſt of April publiſhed a decree in a numerous council of three hundred Gibellines, appointing the marquis governor of the republic for five years. They now declared for Ladiſlaus, king of Naples, againſt the duke of Anjou; and Ladiſlaus's fleet acting in concert with the Genoeſe gallies, under the command of Othoboni Juſtiniano, in the beginning of June they took Ventimiglia by ſtorm, which had hitherto held out for the French. The admiral aftewards made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Porto Venere, whilſt the troops by land attacked ſeveral places held out by the Fieſci in the eaſtern Riviera. Though the attempts of the land-forces were likewiſe fruitleſs, yet in the end of the year the Fieſci at length ſubmitted to the marquis, who granted them a pardon, and reſtored to them their ſhare in the d bank of St. George, the proprietors of which had been eſtabliſhed into a regulated ſociety three years before (F).

A. D. 1410.

A FEW months after, Orlando Fulgoſio raiſed a freſh tumult in the city; but was obliged to retire to Savona, where he was murdered. About the ſame time, the French deſpairing of recovering Genoa ſold Gavi, Montaldo and Pallodio, towns belonging to the republic, to Facinus Canis; and Porto Venere, l'Erice, Sergianello, and Falcinello, to the Florentines, who, the following year, bribed ſeveral of the diſcontented Guelfs to cauſe other towns belonging to the republic to revolt, and ſubmit to their dominion. Many of thoſe who had entered into an unlawful correſpondence with the Florentines, being diſcovered, were put to death as traitors; and a fleet, which was ordered to repreſs the inſults of the Catalans, ſailed
e to Porto Piſano; but, after ſome ſlight hoſtilities, was obliged to retire. The Genoeſe, however, taking four Florentine ſhips laden with corn, and three Engliſh veſſels bound for Florence with cloth, to the amount of forty-eight thouſand florins, they ſoon obliged their enemy to think of peace, which was concluded the following year at Lucca on the twenty-ſeventh of April; when the Florentines agreed to reſtore all the places belonging to the Genoeſe republic. A few weeks before the concluſion of this treaty, the Genoeſe, with their uſual fickleneſs, had renounced the authority of the marquis of Montferrat, and conferred the government of the republic on George Adorno, with the title of duke. The marquis having failed in an attempt upon Savona, came to an accommodation with the republic, which, as an equivalent for all his claims, agreed to pay him 24,500 florins, or crowns of gold.

The Genoeſe again create a duke.

(F) The republic, for a long time, had contracted a great debt, the intereſt of which was paid to the creditors from the public revenues by certain citizens appointed by the duke to overſee every different tax. The debt and taxes encreaſing, began to occaſion great confuſion, to avoid which, all the public creditors were at length formed into one body, by the title of the ſociety of St. George, governed by eight directors choſen annually, not by the duke, but by the creditors. The directors and their aſſiſtants were alſo declared independent of the duke and council, with a right of determining abſolutely all affairs relating to the ſociety, the members of which were bound to ſubmit to their deciſions; and the governors of the republic, upon aſſuming the adminiſtration, took an oath never to violate their privileges. This ſociety encreaſing their ſtock by future loans to the government, became, about a hundred years after, ſo rich and powerful, as to purchaſe the whole iſland of Corſica, and many other territories of the ſtate; ſo that, according to Folieta, who then flouriſhed, two different republics ſeemed included within the ſame walls. It may, however, be queſtioned, whether the grandeur of this company may not be reckoned one of the cauſes of the decline of the Genoeſe ſtate (1).

(1) Foliet. Hiſt. Gen. l. 9. An. 1407.

THE city being now again freed from a foreign dominion, and being undisturbed by the factions, twelve chief citizens were chosen with full authority to compose a new form of government, in order to prevent any future intestine commotions. They accordingly published a great many salutary laws, ordaining, among other matters, that the duke, for the future, should be a citizen of Genoa, of fifty years of age, a Gibelline commoner, and a merchant. These prudent regulations were not, however, sufficient to repress the factious spirit of the Genoese. The following year, the family of Guarco attempted to surprise the palace; but were repulsed, and some of the rioters were banished. Notwithstanding their bad success, in the month of December, the family of Montaldo made a second insurrection against the duke; who, to put an end to the hostilities, which continued several days, consented to abdicate the government. His sons, however, interrupted the accommodation, and both parties, on Christmas-day, only concluded a short truce. The week after, they again took arms, and continued skirmishing till the sixth of March, when a peace was at length concluded; by which the duke agreed to resign upon honourable terms, being allowed a pension during life. On the twenty-eighth of March, he was succeeded by Barnabas Goano, doctor of laws, who was acceptable to both parties; so that the shares in the bank of St. George immediately rose forty-four per cent. Barnabas had not enjoyed his new dignity three months, when he was attacked by George Adorno and Thomas Fulgosio, with their followers, and obliged to abandon the palace. Thomas Fulgosio was then chosen duke, who soon after, to conciliate the affections of the people, eased them of several taxes, and mortgaged his own estate to the amount of sixty thousand florins, to pay off part of the public debt. Though he introduced great magnificence and splendor into his court, yet he gave an assiduous attention to the affairs of state. He conferred several chief commands upon his six brothers, by whose assistance he repressed an insurrection of the Corsicans, and recovered several places, formerly belonging to the republic, from the marquisses of Malaspini. He likewise agreed to a truce for ten years with the French; who, being invaded by an English army, and reduced to great distress, hired six hundred Genoese bowmen, eight gallies, and as many large ships. One of these gallies was shipwrecked, and of the other seven, three were taken by the English, being deserted by the French during the engagement.

ALTHOUGH the great services performed by the duke were very conspicuous, and universally acknowledged, yet the year following the families of Montaldo, Guarco, and Adorno, formed a design of expelling him from the government; and prevailed with the duke of Milan, the marquisses of Montferrat and Final, to favour their enterprize. On Christmas-day they appeared before the city with one thousand five hundred horse, and two thousand foot, expecting an insurrection in their favour; but being disappointed by the vigorous measures taken by the duke, thy quickly retired towards the mountains, and seized Gavi. Having then declared Jeramo Adorno duke, they soon after returned to the city, and seized several posts in its neighbourhood. During the whole summer, hostilities continued betwixt the two parties with various success, but generally in favour of the duke, who by his vigilance and intrepidity, preserved peace and tranquility in the city; and on the last of September forced the rebels to retire to the mountains. Jeramo Adorno, their duke, being thus frustrated before Genoa, reduced the territories of the republic beyond the Appennines, which, however, he was obliged to divide with his allies, giving the greatest share to the duke of Milan. Some commotions, in the mean time, happening in the eastern Riviera, the duke found it necessary to part with Leghorn, which he sold to the Florentines for a hundred and twenty thousand florins. The rebels, finding the duke's authority so firmly established, did not appear in arms during the two following years; in the last of which Genoa was again visited by an epidemical distemper, which carried off great numbers of the inhabitants.

Alphonso of Arragon invades Corsica without success.

ALPHONSO of Arragon, in the mean time, having invaded Corsica with a fleet of thirteen lage ships, and twenty-three gallies, on board of which were ten thousand men, took Calvi, and invested the town of Boniface, which was strongly situated on an abrupt rock, near a most commodious harbour, which run a mile into the land. The duke exerted himself with great vigour to save the place; and tho' Genoa was then almost desolate, by the death and flight of its inhabitants, he caused seven large ships to be fitted out, and furnished with stores and provisions for the besieged, raising thirty thousand crowns for that purpose, by pledging his plate and jewels to the bankers of Lucca. This small fleet sailed from Genoa, under the command of his younger brother, on the twentieth of December: though they found the mouth of the harbour blocked up, by five gallies chained to each other, batteries erected on the land, and the gallies within drawn up in a line, yet they boldly advanced, and, after a most furious engagement of seven hours, broke the chain, and proceeded to the town, where they continued five days, landing their stores: they again broke thro' the enemy's fleet, by throwing it into confusion by a small fireship. Alphonso, now despairing of taking the place, raised the siege, which encouraged the inhabitants of Calvi, in the beginning a ginning of the following year, to revolt and admit a Genoese garrison, tho' all the reſt of the iſland was at this time independent of the republic, and governed by different lords [d].

THE rebels, mean while, by their continual ſolicitations, again prevailed upon the duke of Milan to eſpouſe their cauſe: he accordingly publiſhed a declaration of war againſt Fulgoſio; and in the beginning of ſummer ſent a powerful army, commanded by Guido Torelli, againſt Genoa. Another army marched into the weſtern Riviera, under the command of the count of Carmagniola; but his troops meeting with greater oppoſition than he expected, he fitted out two gallies at Final, which were joined by ſeven others hired from the Catalans, in order to block up Genoa by ſea. Fulgoſio, though he was greatly diſtreſſed for want of money, immediately fitted out ſeven gallies, which, under the command of his brother Baptiſt, attacked the enemy, but were defeated with the loſs of four gallies, in one b of which was the admiral. The enemy, now becoming maſters at ſea, Fulgoſio was obliged to enter into a treaty with the duke of Milan, promiſing to reſign the government to him under certain conditions, as it was formerly granted to the king of France. The duke's army was accordingly admitted into the city, in the month of November, when the territory of Sarſana, and thirty thouſand florins, were granted to Fulgoſio, and fifteen thouſand to his brother Baptiſt. Carmagniola, who commanded in the name of the duke of Milan, allowed the old council ſtill to retain their authority, but perſuaded them to ſubmit to the duke without conditions. Twenty-four Genoeſe deputies accordingly went to Milan the following ſpring, and took the oath of fidelity to the duke, in the name of the republic. Soon after, four of the duke's counſellors arrived at Genoa, as deputy-governors; c and on the laſt day of March, in the afternoon, took upon them the government by the expreſs order of the duke, who, according to the uſual cuſtom, had conſulted the ſtars on that occaſion. The hiſtorian Stella informs us, that he aſſiſted as chancellor of the republic at the conſultations of theſe governors, who, at the deſire of the Genoeſe, on the fifth of December were ſucceeded by the count of Carmagniola.

A. D. 1422.

THE new governor inſiſted on having a revenue of thirty thouſand florins, which had formerly been granted to Boucicard; and the following year he perſuaded the Genoeſe, tho' with great difficulty, to fit out a large fleet to the aſſiſtance of Jane the ſecond, queen of Naples, and her adopted ſon Lewis of Anjou, againſt Alphonſo of Arragon, alledging, that it would be for the advantage of the republic to prevent the Catalans from poſſeſſing d Naples. The Genoeſe, in conſequence of their furious and moſt fooliſh diſſentions, were now ſo greatly exhauſted, that every armament diſtreſſed them: they ſeemed, however, at length voluntarily to comply with the deſires of Carmagniola, finding themſelves not in a condition to hazard a denial, and decreed two hundred thouſand florins for the expedition. Carmagniola, exerting himſelf with indefatigable aſſiduity, on the firſt of December a fleet of twenty-four gallies, thirteen ſhips, and one brigantine, was fit for ſea, eight of the gallies being equipped in Provence by Lewis of Anjou. Guido Torelli arriving from Milan, and taking the chief command, Carmagniola was greatly diſguſted, and many of the Genoeſe refuſed to embark. The fleet, nevertheleſs, in the end of the month ſailed to Naples; and, after performing ſignal ſervices to the queen, returned in the end of May, when the e Genoeſe, much againſt their inclination, were obliged to ſend their flag as a trophy to Milan. A few months after Carmagniola abandoned the government, and withdrawing his effects, deſerted the duke's ſervice, and retired to Piedmont, and from thence to Venice, exciting that republic againſt his old maſter. He was ſucceeded in Genoa by James Iſolani of Bologna, a cardinal deacon, whoſe revenue was ſettled at thirteen thouſand florins.

THE Florentines, mean while, in concert with the Venetians, preparing for war againſt the duke of Milan, Fulgoſio was perſuaded by them to make an attempt upon Genoa. In the beginning of April he accordingly ſailed from Leghorn, with twenty-four Catalan gallies, and appeared off the mole; but, being repulſed by the Genoeſe, he returned to the eaſtern Riviera, and took Porto Fino, Sigeſtro, and Monella, his fleet commanding all the coaſt. f The Genoeſe, by the duke's order, fitted out eighteen gallies and ten large ſhips, to oppoſe the invaders. Some land-forces were alſo aſſembled, and in the month of June, Opicino d'Alzate arrived as commander in chief both by ſea and land. Great things were expected from his experience, and ſtrict attention to a rigorous diſcipline. The whole ſeaſon, nevertheleſs, paſſed off without any action of conſequence: the duke did not even deſire a ſpeedy concluſion of the war, but wiſhed to ſee the Genoeſe exhauſted by their civil broils, in hopes of fixing more ſecurely the yoke of ſervitude upon them. With this deſign, the year after, he allowed Francis Spinola and Iſnard Guarco to ſeize ſeveral territories of the republic, as a ſecurity for the payment of twelve thouſand five hundred florins, which they affirmed they had expended in the public ſervice; and having concluded a peace with the g king of Arragon, and hired ſome of his gallies, he gave him in pledge the caſtles of Porto Venere, and l'Eryce; which proceedings greatly alarmed the Genoeſe.

THE rebels, in the mean time, were allowed to ſtrengthen their party in the eaſtern Riviera. In the beginning of September, about four hundred of them entered the city at night, under the command of one of Fulgoſio's brothers, and ſeized ſome ſteeples; but not being joined by any citizens, they retired next morning not without conſiderable loſs. a

A. D. 1427. Tho' the citizens ſhewed no inclination to revolt, Thomas himſelf the following year, in the end of July, marched to the city with a ſmall force, and, after continuing a few days in the ſuburbs, attempted the walls by ſcalade, but without ſucceſs. He retired upon a report, that great ſuccours were marching from Lombardy to the relief of the city; but about the middle of December he again entered the ſuburbs, and for three days attempted to ſcale the walls; but was always repulſed with loſs, and in a ſally from the city the greateſt part of his followers were made priſoners. During theſe tranſactions, the duke of Milan again irritated the Genoeſe, by giving the city of Ventimiglia to Charles Lomellino, for ten years, in conſideration of three thouſand crowns which he had borrowed from him. b

A. D. 1428. THE following year Bartholemeo de la Capra, of Cremona, archbiſhop of Milan, arrived at Genoa, as governor of the republic; and ſoon after his arrival a peace was concluded betwixt the duke of Milan and the Venetians and Florentines. The rebels, however, did not think proper to ſubmit; but the year after advanced as far as the valley of Pulſevera, and fifty-eight of them attempted to ſurpriſe the citadel of Genoa: they were diſcovered and repulſed after they had entered the out-works, a prieſt to whom they had truſted having betrayed them. Nicolas Picinino, about the ſame time, arriving from Lombardy, in the end of November they thought proper to retire. Nicolas, who was a ſoldier of fortune, and an experienced commander, advanced again the rebels, notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon, and in the beginning of February drove them from ſome poſts on the mountains: he then entered the valley of Pulſevera, and with great difficulty was prevented from extirpating the whole inhabitants. He pardoned them, however, at the entreaty of the council of ancients, but ſent fifty-ſeven of their chief priſoners to Lombardy, obliged many others to give ſecurity for their future obedience, and took away all the bells from the churches, which had ſerved only to excite them to rebellion. Having treated the other two valleys in the ſame manner, during the ſummer he recovered many places from the rebels; and, in the end of the year, being joined by one thouſand Genoeſe bowmen, he marched to the relief of Lucca, and routed the Florentine army, which for ſeveral months had been beſieging that city. c d

A. D. 1431. UPON this victory the Luccheſe and Sienneſe entered into an alliance with the Genoeſe againſt the Florentines, the Luccheſe, according to Folieta, agreeing to chuſe annually a Genoeſe governor. James Appiano, lord of Piombino, ſoon after joined in this alliance, and put himſelf under the protection of the Genoeſe. The Florentines, in the mean time, had recourſe for aſſiſtance to the Venetians, who again declared war againſt the duke of Milan and the Genoeſe, ſent a fleet of ſixteen gallies and two large ſhips to infeſt the Genoeſe coaſts. About the end of Auguſt, this fleet, on board of which were ſeveral Genoeſe exiles, having been joined by three Florentine gallies and two brigantines, advanced within a few miles of Genoa, when it was attacked by the Genoeſe admiral, who, after a long engagement, was entirely defeated, and taken priſoner, with the loſs of nine gallies. A few weeks after the marquis of Montferrat, who was then in alliance with the Venetians, ſent Barnabas Adorno, an exile, with ſome forces into the weſtern Riviera, where he took poſſeſſion of ſome towns; but, on the ninth of October, he was defeated and taken priſoner, with almoſt all his forces, by Nicolas Picinino, who allowed his troops to plunder the country of the rebels, and to treat them with the greateſt barbarity; and then marched into Montferrat, which he likewiſe plundered. The Venetians, in the mean time, ſent a large armament againſt the Genoeſe ſettlement in the iſland of Chios; but, after beſieging the place two months, they were obliged to retire with the loſs of near two thouſand men.

The Venetians declare war againſt the duke of Milan, and attack the Genoeſe.

A. D. 1432. THE following year, both the Genoeſe and the Venetians fitted out conſiderable fleets; but no action of great importance was performed by either of them; and the year after, in the month of May, by the mediation of the marquiſſes of Ferrara and Saluzza, a peace was concluded betwixt the duke of Milan and the Venetians and Florentines, with their reſpective allies. Soon after the concluſion of this peace, the Genoeſe, being informed that the Greeks had ſurpriſed one of their ſettlements in Leſſer Tartary, they immediately began to fit out a fleet for the protection of their trade in the Black Sea, the command of which was given to Charles Lomellino, who ſailed from Genoa in the month of March, with ten gallies and as many large ſhips, on board of which were upwards of ſix thouſand troops. The Genoeſe admiral, upon his arrival in the Black Sea, quickly obliged the Greeks to ſurrender their late conqueſt; but afterwards, attacking an inland place belonging to the Tartars, he was ſurrounded by an immenſe multitude of that people, and with great difficulty eſcaped with a few of his men. e f g

A peace concluded.

A. D. 1433.

A. D. 1435. MEAN while, the queen of Naples, and her adopted ſon, Lewis of Anjou, both dying, Alphonſo of Arragon, who was then in Sicily, reſolved to make another attempt to obtain a the kingdom of Naples, where he had a numerous party. Being put in poſſeſſion of the caſtles of Capua by his friends, he inveſted Gaeta by ſea and land; but the city being zealous for the family of Anjou, and garriſoned partly by Genoeſe, his inveterate enemies, baffled all his efforts for ſeveral months. The republic being ſolicited by the beſieged, fitted out a fleet of thirteen ſhips, which ſailed to their relief, under the command of Blaſio Aſſereto, one of the public notaries, who, on the fifth of Auguſt, came to an engagement off the iſland of Ponza with the fleet of Alphonſo, tho' doubly ſuperior to his own in number of ſhips and men. The battle continued from ſun-riſing to the evening, when the Genoeſe gained a moſt complete victory, all the enemy's ſhips being taken except one, Alphonſo, with two of his brothers, and about one thouſand Spaniſh and Sicilian barons, being made priſob ners. The news of this victory filled the Genoeſe with the moſt extravagant joy, which, however was ſoon turned into diſappointment and dejection; for the duke would not allow them the ſatisfaction of ſeeing the chief priſoners; but ordered the fleet to return to Savona, from whence Alphonſo and ſome others were conducted to Milan, where, in contempt of the republic, they were treated with the greateſt honours, and ſet at liberty. Philip evan entered into an alliance with Alphonſo, and ordered the Genoeſe to fit out ſix ſhips to conduct him to Naples; which command they complied with, tho' hardly able to ſtifle their reſentment and indignation. The hiſtorian Stella concludes his annals at this period with bitter complaints againſt the perfidy of the duke, who, he ſays, was the moſt capital enemy of their orphan republic. Philip, to appeaſe the murmurs of the Genoeſe, with which he

c began to be alarmed, aſſured them, that he had prevailed with Alphonſo to reſign Sardinia to the republic; but, under pretence of tranſporting a garriſon to the iſland, ſending two thouſand men to Genoa, the nobles were ſtill more exaſperated, and immediately formed a deſign to throw off his burthenſome yoke.

Alphonſo of Arragon defeated and taken priſoner the Genoeſe.

ABOUT the end of December the whole city took arms, under the direction of Francis Spinola, who had commanded at the ſiege of Gaeta, and having killed the governor in the tumult, quickly obliged the garriſon to ſurrender. Savona directly followed the example of Genoa, and in a ſhort time almoſt all the caſtles held by the duke in the territories of the republic, were reduced. Eight perſons were then choſen, with full authority to regulate the form of the new government, provided they did not aboliſh the council of ancients, or d any old laws. Philip, in the mean time, ordered Picinino to march with a powerful army againſt Genoa, which prompted the Genoeſe, without delay, to ſtorm the citadel, and ſend to the Venetians and Florentines for aſſiſtance againſt their common enemy. Picinino, finding it impracticable to attempt Genoa, marched into the weſtern Riviera, and beſieged Albenga; while the Genoeſe, inſtead of continuing unanimous againſt the enemy of their republic, moſt imprudently renewed their former animoſities. After long and warm conteſts, Iſnard Guarco was declared duke; but ſeven days after he was expelled by Thomas Fulgoſio, who had returned to the city, and, being ſupported by a great many friends, was reſtored to the government, in conſequence of his former election. Fulgoſio immediately ſent ſuccours to Albenga, the ſiege of which ſoon after was abandoned by Picinino. The Genoeſe, in the e mean time, had recovered Porto Venere and l'Eryce; and having concluded an alliance with the Florentines and Venetians, had conſiderably reinforced their army with recruits from Tuſcany.

The Genoeſe revolt from the duke of Milan. A. D. 1436.

THE following year Philip, in hopes of recovering Genoa, had recourſe to fraud; and, by great promiſes to Baptiſt Fulgoſio, perſuaded him to ſeize the palace, and uſurp the government. The duke was then at church; but being inſtantly joined by a great number of citizens, without difficulty he recovered the palace, and apprehended his brother, whom he pardoned and reſtored to his friendſhip, giving him the command of ſeven gallies ordered to aſſiſt the duke of Anjou, who the year after, in the beginning of April, entered the harbour with five gallies from Marſeilles. The duke was received with the greateſt honours, f as king of Naples; and in the end of the month left Genoa, and proceeded to take poſſeſſion of his new kingdom. After his departure, Pelegrus Promontorius ſailed with four veſſels againſt ſome Catalan pirates; but his forces mutinying for want of their pay, he was obliged to return before he could find out the enemy. The ſame admiral ſailed the year after with ſeven ſhips to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Anjou, who, by means of the Genoeſe the following year, made himſelf maſter of the caſtles commanding the city of Naples. The eagerneſs with which the Genoeſe attached themſelves to the party of Renatus of Anjou, at length diſturbed the tranquility of their ſtate.

A. D. 1437.

A. D. 1438.

A FEW months after the taking of the citadels of Naples from the Catalans, the republic entered into an alliance with pope Eugenius againſt Alphonſo; and the pope having raiſed
g four thouſand horſe, Fulgoſio ordered a fleet to be immediately prepared, appointing his brother as admiral. This nomination gave great offence to the nobility, eſpecially to John Antony Fieſco, who, failing in an attempt to create a tumult in the city, retired to his eſtate in the mountains, where, being assisted by Philip Visconti, he raised a considerable body of men, and invaded the territories of the republic. The coasts at the same time were harrassed by the vessels of Alphonso, which were assisted by the marquis of Final. The duke exerted himself with great activity against his enemies; but the distress of the republic, preventing the intended voyage of the fleet, the pope exclaimed against him with great bitterness. The year after, Alphonso made himself master of Naples; and Renatus, despairing of his cause, re-

FIESCO still continuing in arms, and the discontents in the city being encreased, on account of the great funeral honours bestowed by the duke on his brother Baptist, great precautions were taken by Fulgosio to prevent any tumults. Being informed that Fiesco had
A. D. 1443. concerted a scheme with the malcontents to enter the city, on the tenth of December, by the steep rocks, which towards the sea served instead of a fortification, he ordered those passes to be lined by a guard. But the weather being extremely cold, and a strong west wind rendering the sea tempestuous, the soldiers concluded it would be impossible for the enemy to advance, and left their station. The wind immediately becoming favourable to Fiesco, he embarked his troops in small boats, and in about three hours entered the city. Fulgosio, finding it impossible to make any effectual opposition, referred the decision of the contest to sixteen citizens; but before any sentence could be given, he was expelled from the palace by Fiesco, and the government of the city committed to eight of the chief citizens. About the middle of January, however, Rapheal Adorno was created duke, and four citizens were, at the same time, vested with the power of establishing new laws.

NOTWITHSTANDING this revolution, tranquility was not restored to the republic; for Fiesco, remaining still discontented, retired from the city, and seizing the towns of Recco and Porto Fino, plundered the neighbouring territories. At the same time, Peter Fulgosio, being exasperated against the republic on account of the expulsion of his family from the government, fled to the duke of Milan, who put him in possession of Novi, from whence he made continual excursions against the subjects of the republic, and carried off a hundred and twenty French mules laden with merchandize and military stores for France. While the republic was exposed to the ravages of these two malcontents, its commerce by sea was dis-

ABOUT the same time, the equity and moderation of the duke disgusting his own family, who expected more licence under his government, they persuaded him that it would be for the advantage of the republic that he should resign the administration. The same day that
A. D. 1447. he abdicated, they, in a tumultuous manner, elected Barnabas Adorno; but Janus Fulgosio, a few weeks after, entered the harbour with a single galley, and being followed by eighty-five young men, made himself master of the palace, although Barnabas had received a guard of six hundred men from Alphonso. This is the account given us by Folieta; but Monstrelet, a cotemporary author, relates, that some of the family of Fulgosio and Doria, in the end of the foregoing year, arrived with five ships at Marseilles, and made an offer of the sovereignty of the republic to the king of France. While they were making an agreement with the king's deputies, Janus Fulgosio, assisted by some French, took possession of Genoa; but afterwards refused to deliver it to the French ambassadors, who retired disappointed, and seized Final[e].

JANUS recalled Peter Fulgosio from banishment, and appointed him general of the city militia. As the marquis of Final made continual incursions into the territories of the republic, the duke assembled a considerable body of forces, which, in the beginning of the
A. D. 1448. following year, marched against Final, two ships soon after being fitted out to annoy the enemy by sea, against whom the Genoese were so exasperated, that, according to Folieta, they ordered the money which belonged to them in their public funds to be confiscated. Mean while Janus Fulgosio dying, the city, as a testimony of their regard, ordered a public monu-

D. 1449. ment to be erected to him; and chose Lodovico Fulgosio as his successor, who the following spring ordered several gallies to be fitted out against the Corsican and Provençal pirates. Final soon after being reduced, the citadel of the place was demolished, and the suburbs pillaged. The inhabitants of the city, however, upon taking the oath of fidelity to the Genoese, were pardoned, and the third part of the city, according to stipulation, was granted to Marc Caretto, who had assisted in the siege against Galeotto the marquis. After the reduction of Final, the duke published a severe edict against those who should bring from Rome any pontifical letters or rescripts contrary to the privileges of the republic; but, in the fol-

a lowing year, finding that the citizens began to murmur againſt his government, he voluntarily reſigned his dignity.

THE ſupreme adminiſtration was again offered to Thomas Fulgoſio at Sarzana; but he, excuſing himſelf on account of his great age, adviſed the citizens to chuſe Peter Fulgoſio, who was accordingly unanimouſly elected. Peter had raiſed his reputation by reducing Final; but he quickly gave great offence to the people by the rigour he uſed towards thoſe who were ſuſpected of diſaffection to his government. The following year, he ordered a monk to be hanged before the church of St. Francis, on account of ſome reflections uttered by him againſt his adminiſtration, and cauſed a board to be hung to his feet with this inſcription, "This man talked of what he ought not." The French, towards the end of the year, b ſeizing Final and Petra, he ſent conſiderable garriſons to the neighbouring places; and the following year, being informed that Mahomet the ſecond was making immenſe preparations in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople, he ſent a reinforcement of nine hundred men to the garriſon of Pera. The Turks, however, the year after making themſelves maſters of Conſtantinople, Pera was likewiſe obliged to ſurrender to them, which greatly confounded the Genoeſe; eſpecially as Alphonſo about the ſame time, made himſelf maſter of part of Corſica. Deſpairing of being able to protect their ſettlements in that iſland, and in the Black Sea, they diſpoſed of them to the ſociety of St. George, which flouriſhed at this time in a ſurpriſing manner, notwithſtanding the diſtreſs and diſaſters of the republic.

A. D. 1450.

A. D. 1453.

ABOUT two years after, Alphonſo, inſtigated by the malcontents and exiles, attacked Ge- c noa by ſea and land. The duke, being chiefly apprehenſive of the diſaffected within the city, reſolved to make them diſcover themſelves, and to quell them before he proceeded againſt the invaders: for this purpoſe he put a ſtrong garriſon in the palace, and pretended to go out of the city to view the enemy, retiring, however, by a private way into the caſtle. The oppoſite faction, believing him really gone, took arms and aſſaulted the palace; but being attacked from behind by Peter, they were routed and diſperſed with great loſs, and many of thoſe who ſurvived were publicly executed. The enemy, finding their friends in the city thus cut off, deſpaired of ſucceſs, and retired in the beginning of winter, leaving only a few gallies upon the coaſts. Theſe ſhips the following year, by furniſhing ſuccours to the malcontents, created ſome diſturbances in Albenga and the weſtern Riviera, which at length d induced the duke to think of reſigning. He found himſelf every day leſs able to ſtruggle againſt the power of Alphonſo, who was obſtinately bent upon depoſing him from his dignity, and reſtoring the family of Adorno, and the other exiles. That his enemies, however, might have no reaſon to triumph, two years after he ſent ambaſſadors to France, with an offer of the ſovereignty of the republic to Charles the ſeventh, who agreed to the conditions formerly ſtipulated with Charles the ſixth, and ſent John of Anjou, titular duke of Calabria, to Genoa, who was put in poſſeſſion of the city and fortreſſes. This revolution greatly exaſperated Alphonſo, who immediately fitted out a large fleet, which he ſent againſt Genoa, while the rebels, by his aſſiſtance, inveſted the city by land; but the king dying in the end of June, the fleet diſperſed, and the land forces were obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

Alphonſo of Naples ſends an army and fleet againſt Genoa. A. D. 1455.

The Genoeſe confer the dominion of their ſtate on the king of France. A. D. 1458.

e ALL the reſources of the exiles being now cut off, Peter Fulgoſio began to regret the loſs of his dignity, which he now perceived he had reſigned with too great precipitation. He retired to Novi, which, with another town, had been mortgaged to him for money owing to him by the republic. Having demanded the payment of his money ſeveral times in a preſſing manner, he at length began to threaten the republic, on which account his brothers and relations were baniſhed the city. The neighbourhood of the French being diſagreeable to Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, Peter by his means was reconciled to Ferdinand of Naples, who promiſed to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power, in expelling the French from Italy, being jealous leſt they intended to invade his kingdom, which was now diſjoined from Aragon. Peter, receiving conſiderable ſubſidies from him, the following ſpring he aſſembled f a large body of forces, and being joined by John Philip Fieſco, with his vaſſals, advanced within half a mile of the city. Fieſco being ſoon after killed by a ſhot from the walls, great part of his army diſperſed, which obliged him to retire to the eaſtern Riviera, where he ſeized ſome towns, which, however, were quickly recovered by the Genoeſe.

A. D. 1459.

THE governor, being now freed from any apprehenſions of the rebels, made great preparations for the conqueſt of Naples, receiving ſixty thouſand crowns from the republic, and as much from the private citizens, with which he fitted out ten gallies and three large ſhips, which were to be joined by twelve gallies, equipping by his father Renatus at Marſailles. To avert theſe formidable preparations, Ferdinand preſſed Fulgoſio again to attempt the recovery of the city. Peter accordingly, having received a large ſum of money from him, aſſembled g a new army, and about the middle of September ſurpriſed the city, and entered with his forces within the outer wall. Next morning, after a long engagement with the Anjou party, he entered one of the gates of the inner wall with a few of his followers, who, being ſo imprudent prudent as to leave the gate unguarded, was ſhut into the city; by which means Peter, being purſued through ſeveral ſtreets on horſeback, was at length taken priſoner, and died next day of his wounds. His followers, upon the news of his death, quickly diſperſed; and a few weeks after the governor ſailed with his fleet to Naples. a

The Genoeſe revolt from the French. A. D. 1460.

WHILE he was engaged the following year in his Neapolitan expedition, the Genoeſe artificers, alledging they were oppreſſed by the unequal method of raiſing the taxes, took arms for the redreſs of their grievances. The ſedition was probably fomented privately by the family of Adorno, who, knowing the averſion of Æneas Sylvius, or Pius the ſecond, to the French, ſent ambaſſadors to Rome to conſult about the means of driving them from Italy [f]. While the people ſeemed inclined to an accommodation, Proſper Adorno, and Paul Fulgoſio the archbiſhop, and brother of the late Peter, entered the city, and excited them to renew the hoſtilities: they accordingly drove the French into the caſtle, and by the perſuaſion of the archbiſhop Paul, who affected great moderation, choſe Proſper Adorno duke. Having received ſome money and troops from the duke of Milan, they beſieged the caſtle, the garriſon of which ſtruck a great terror into the citizens, by firing a great number of bombs among the houſes in different quarters of the city. The king of France, in the mean time, ſent a body of ſix thouſand veteran troops, and a conſiderable fleet, under Renatus of Anjou, to the relief of the beſieged; but after they had advanced to the city, they were repulſed by the archbiſhop, who ſlew fifteen of the moſt obſtinate of them with his own hand. Proſper, who before the arrival of the French, had acted in an abſurd and arbitrary manner, was now apprehenſive leſt the popular favour ſhould be transferred to the archbiſhop, and therefore, after the victory, excluded him from the city. A ſkirmiſh betwixt the two parties immediately enſued, when Adorno was expelled from the palace, and Spineta Fulgoſio, the archbiſhop's couſin, was elected duke. The French, in the mean time, abandoned the citadel, which was forthwith occupied by Lodovico Fulgoſio, who two days after ſucceeded as duke. The archbiſhop, however, the following year, offended that others ſhould reap the fruits of his fatigues, about the middle of May ſeized the government: this occaſioned a new tumult among the citizens, who, dreading a governor of his impetuous and reſtleſs diſpoſition, about a fortnight after obliged him to reſign. Four rectors were then choſen from the body of artificers, who governed only a few days, and Lodovico Fulgoſio was again reſtored to his dignity. About two years after, Ludovico was again expelled by the archbiſhop, who, according to Folieta, obtained from Pius the ſecond, leave to adminiſter a ſecular government. b c

A. D. 1463. d

THE king of France, in the mean time, being apprehenſive of an inſurrection of his nobility, who were greatly diſcontented, and held frequent conferences together, reſolved to ſecure the friendſhip of Francis Sforza, and reſigned to him the city of Saona, with all his rights to the city and territory of Genoa; for which purpoſe he wrote to all the princes of Italy, prohibiting them, under the pain of his reſentment, from aſſiſting the Genoeſe againſt Sforza. Francis accordingly the following year took poſſeſſion of Saono, and ſoon after Albenga, and the other towns in the eaſtern Riviera ſubmitted to him. The archbiſhop, in the mean time, giving a full ſwing to his impetuous temper, harraſſed the Genoeſe more than a conquering enemy. Having collected a guard of ruffians, he openly murdered and plundered the moſt worthy citizens, by which means he quickly thinned the city, the inhabitants running into voluntary baniſhment. Many of the chief citizens retired to Saona; and, by their ſolicitations, perſuaded Sforza to ſend an army againſt the archbiſhop, who, upon the approach of the duke's forces, abandoned the city and proceeded to ſea with three gallies, to wait for an opportunity of recovering the government. e

The Genoeſe ſubmit to the duke of Milan. A. D. 1464.

The Genoeſe, with great joy, took the oath of fidelity to the duke of Milan, who was reſpected by all the Italian ſtates, for his many civil and military virtues. His moderate government, at length, put an end to the commotions, tumults, ravages, baniſhments, murders, and other calamities, which, for a long courſe of years, had been gradually exhauſting the miſerable republic; ſo that before this revolution, the ſhares in the band of St. George had fallen ſixty-ſeven per Cent. He was ſo acceptable to the Genoeſe, that the ſociety of St. George the year after voluntarily reſigned to him the iſland of Corſica. Upon his death, which happened the following year, in the beginning of March, the Genoeſe, who deeply regretted his loſs, renewed the convention with his ſon Galeazo, whoſe principles and conduct were very oppoſite to thoſe of his father. f

GALEAZO, in the beginning of his government, diſguſted the Genoeſe by treating their ambaſſadors with leſs regard than thoſe of the Florentines; and five years after, he gave great offence to the republic by diſdaining to accept of the honours the chief counſellors intended him upon his viſiting their city. They furniſhed public lodgings with great magnificence for him and his retinue, and provided valuable preſents, among which were four golden g a bowls, each of twelve pounds weight. He entered the city, however, without any ceremony; and, after continuing three days in the caſtle, went away in ſuch confuſion and hurry, as though he had been flying from an enemy. A few months after his departure, Sixtus the fourth, a native of Savona, being choſen pope, the Genoeſe ſent eight of their chief citizens to congratulate him upon his promotion; who were received by him in a courteous and reſpectful manner, and obtained from him a bull, granting them ſeveral diſtinguiſhed privileges. The republic now declined with great precipitation, and quietly ſubmitted to the oppreſſive government of Galeazo, dreading the return of their domeſtic confuſions, if they ſhould attempt another revolution.

About four years after, their important ſettlement of Caffa, in Crim Tartary, fell into
b the hands of the Turks; which misfortune was owing to the avarice and villainy of the governors of the colony. The city under the Genoeſe had become very conſiderable, and was at this period the center of a moſt extenſive traffic. The emperor of the Tartars, ſenſible of the great advantage he reaped from that ſettlement, ordered all the diſputes of his ſubjects in the adjacent diſtricts to be terminated at Caffa, and allowed the Genoeſe governors to have a negative in the election of the captain of the province. The governors of the colony abuſed this privilege, and expelled ſome captains who had been juſtly elected to admit others from whom they had received large bribes. The ejected captains immediately fled to the Grand Seignior, whom they perſuaded to ſend a fleet againſt Caffa of four hundred and eighty ſail, under the command of the baſhaw Geduc Achmet. The baſhaw, in a few days, c made himſelf maſter of the place, when he ſent fifteen hundred youths as captives to Conſtantinople, ordered all the Italians to quit the city, and ſeized one half of the poſſeſſions of thoſe that remained.

The colony of Caffa taken by the Turks, A. D. 1475.

The loſs of Caffa was not ſo ſenſibly felt by the Genoeſe, their domeſtic grievances being then their chief concern: their minds were exaſperated by the continual oppreſſions of their governors; and, inſtead of finding redreſs from Galeazo, their deputies were treated by him with the utmoſt contempt. He even ordered a canal to be made from the caſtle to the ſea through the middle of the city; but being affrighted by the commotions of the Genoeſe, he dropt the undertaking, which would have ruined a great many fine palaces. Soon after the hopes of the Genoeſe were revived, by the news of the death of Galeazo, who was aſſaſ-d ſinated in the church of St. Stephen at Milan, on the twenty-ſixth of December. To prevent any commotion during the minority of his ſon, who was then only a boy, the Genoeſe choſe a council of eight citizens, with an ample authority to puniſh any rioters. This council ſoon after added a body of two hundred foot to the ordinary guard of the governor. The families of Guarco, Adorno, and Fieſco, however, immediately began to raiſe commotions in the vallies, and not long after ſurpriſed the city with a handful of men, when the governor, though at the head of one thouſand horſe and foot, retired with great precipitation into the caſtle. Several perſons were then appointed under the title of the preſidents of the liberty of the Genoeſe, who made great preparations for the defence of the city. The regents of Milan mean while ſent a conſiderable army, under the command of Robert Sanſeverino, to e recover the city; and having ſet Proſper Adorno at liberty, promiſed him the perpetual government of the republic if he would join their forces. The army being likewiſe reinforced by the family of Spinola and their adherents, after an obſtinate engagement defeated the rebels, and recovered the city. During theſe diſturbances, the Catalans harraſſed the coaſts of the eaſtern Riviera; and ſoon after Thomaſin Fulgoſio endeavoured to raiſe an inſurrection in Corſica. Fulgoſio, however, was quickly reduced, and Lodovico Rivarolo, with ſix gallies, obliged the Catalan cruiſers to retire from the coaſts.

Mean while, the government of Milan becoming jealous of Proſper Adorno, had formed a reſolution to oblige him to reſign the adminiſtration of the republic. Proſper, having intelligence of their deſign, the following year entered into an alliance with Ferdinand of Na-
f ples, and having received conſiderable ſubſidies from him, openly renounced the title of vicar of the duke, and was created rector of the republic, with abſolute authority. About the ſame time, thirty-eight counſellors were elected, one half of whom were merchants, and the other tradeſmen; and a decree paſſed, excluding the nobility from all public offices. Hoſtilities immediately commenced betwixt the forces of Sforza and thoſe of the Genoeſe, which laſt were commanded by Robert Sanſeverino, who, in the former commotion, had ſerved the duke. Soon after, an army of fourteen thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe arrived from Lombardy; but, after ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, it was at length entirely routed by the Genoeſe, who ſold their priſoners as galley-ſlaves to the Catalans. This victory was no ſooner gained than the factions in the city revived betwixt the families of Adorno and g Fulgoſio. After ſeveral diſputes, Proſper Adorno was at laſt expelled from the city, and Baptiſt Fulgoſio was created duke, with a council of eight citizens, whoſe authority was not limited by the laws [g]. The year following, the Turks having made a deſcent in Calabria, and ſeized Otranto, all Italy was ſtruck with conſternation. The Genoeſe immediately ſent two gallies to the assistance of the king of Naples; and the year after hired twenty four gallies to the pope, which assisted at the siege of Otranto, and performed many signal services in that expedition. A few months after the recovery of Otranto, the Genoese, by the persuasion of a Franciscan friar, sent four gallies to the Archipelago, in hopes of recovering the island of Mitylene from the Turks; but the enterprize proved unsuccessful. a

About two years after, Baptist, having rendered himself odious to the Genoese by his arrogance and pride, and besides, being suspected, or rather accused, of a design to subject the republic to the emperor, and to receive it from him as a vicariate for himself and his posterity, his uncle Paul, who was now elevated to the dignity of cardinal, formed a party against him, and drawing him unwarily to his palace without any guards, forced him, by a threatening speech, to abdicate the government, and deliver up the castles, being solemnly declared next day his successor by the votes of three hundred citizens. Baptist, to alleviate his disgrace, addicted himself wholly to study, and composed, in the manner of Valerius Maximus, nine books of memorable actions and sayings; in which he inveighs with great bitterness against the perfidy of his uncle, accusing him of the most enormous crimes, and most scandalous vices [h]. b

A war betwixt the Genoese and Florentines.

The cardinal had not enjoyed his new dignity many months when a war broke out betwixt the Genoese and Florentines, about the territory belonging to Sarzana, on the east side of the river Magra. Augustine Fulgosio had sold the city to the Florentines; but some quarrel afterwards happening betwixt him and that republic, he resigned the same city to the society of St. George, who immediately sent a strong garrison thither. The war, in the beginning, was carried on with great vigour by the Genoese; but their generals, allowing themselves to be bribed by the enemy, soon lost the fruits of their first successes. Hostilities continued betwixt the two republics all the following year; but in the beginning of the year after, a peace was concluded by the mediation of the pope, by which it was agreed that the Florentines should renounce all pretensions to Sarzana, and that the Genoese should transfer to them all their rights to Pietra Sarta. This treaty was solemnly ratified by both parties; but the Genoese, having offended the pope, he entered into the interest of the Florentines, who were thereby encouraged to refuse fulfilling their engagements. c

A. D. 1484.

A. D. 1487.

The government of the cardinal, in the mean time, creating universal discontent, the following year ten citizens were chosen, with absolute authority, to administer the affairs of the republic, and those of the society of St. George: the cardinal, however, still enjoyed the title of duke. Soon after the establishment of this new form of government, the Florentines again entered the territories of Sarzana with an army, and encamped on the east side of the Magra. The Genoese immediately fitted out a fleet of ten gallies, which sailed with three thousand land-forces to l'Eryce, in the neighbourhood of which city a battle was fought betwixt them and the Florentines, who gained a complete victory, and a few days after made themselves masters of Sarzana. The Genoese, having no resource to carry on the war by land, were forced to leave the enemy in full possession of their conquest. They, nevertheless, still reserved their claims, in hopes of making them effectual at another opportunity. Thomasin Fulgosio and Paul Lecca, in the mean time, raising disturbances in Corsica, and seizing several territories in that island, some forces were sent thither, and Fulgosio, being defeated and apprehended, was confined in the castle of l'Eryce, which so exasperated the cardinal and his son, that they caused one of the ten presidents of the republic to be assassinated. d e

A. D. 1488.

The cardinal at length, beginning to dread the resentment of the people, thought of means to secure his own safety. To prevent his enemies from having the supreme authority, he persuaded the Genoese to put themselves under the protection of Lewis Sforza, who governed the duchy of Milan, as regent for his young nephew, but in reality had usurped his inheritance. Sforza received the Genoese ambassadors very graciously; and the cardinal's son, following them to Milan, he contracted an alliance with him, by giving him the bastard sister of his nephew to wife. The news of this marriage alarmed the jealousy of the opposite factions, who, to prevent the cardinal from confirming his tyranny by the power of Sforza, immediately formed a conspiracy against him, which soon became so formidable that he could with difficulty save himself in the castle, which was immediately besieged. During the siege, the city suffered so much by the fury of both parties, that the most moderate citizens sent an ambassy to the king of France, begging his interposition, and likewise solicited the pope to interest himself for the safety of his native city. These ambassies producing no immediate effect, they sent ambassadors to Sforza, excusing their proceeding against the cardinal. Soon after, by the policy of Sforza, an accommodation was concluded, whereby the duke of Milan was declared sovereign of the republic, and Augustine Adorno his vicar for ten years. The cardinal, finding himself abandoned by Sforza, surrendered the castle, f a and ſoon after retired to Rome, being allowed a yearly penſion of ſix thouſand crowns, till the pope ſhould confer upon him eccleſiaſtical revenues to that value [i].

DURING the four years that immediately followed this new eſtabliſhment, the Genoeſe enjoyed great tranquility, and their ancient ſpirit began to revive. The palaces which were burnt down during the ſiege of the caſtle, were rebuilt with greater magnificence; the value of the ſhares in the bank of St. George increaſed; the city abounded with proviſions; and both Guelfs and Gibellines, ſeeming to forget their ancient animoſities, applied themſelves with ardor to manufactures and traffic. To gratify Sforza, the republic conſented, though with great reluctance, to a truce with the Florentines, which was afterwards renewed under the title of a ceſſation of hoſtilities. The war with the Catalans, indeed, ſtill ſubſiſted; but
b its effects were ſcarcely felt by the Genoeſe, who very rarely ſeized or loſt any veſſels. The A. D. 1493.
following winter was remarkable for the immenſe degree of cold, which was ſo exceſſive, that the ſea was frozen round the mole; ſo that for two days no veſſels could ſail out of the harbour. This rigorous ſeaſon was ſucceeded in the ſpring by a dreadful peſtilence, which proved ſo fatal, that ſcarce every fifth perſon of thoſe that remained in the city eſcaped alive.

THIS year it was that Charles the eighth of France entered Italy with a powerful army, A. D. 1495.

him, if he did not immediately ſurrender the duchy of Milan into the hands of his nephew
c John Galeas; and an alliance with the French monarch furniſhed the only probable means of being able to oppoſe the power of Alphonſo. Lewis equipped at Genoa four large ſhips and twelve gallies, to act in concert with the French fleet, already ſailed with a favourable wind. On the other hand, Alphonſo, to make a diverſion, entered into ſtrict alliance with the pope, and by this means engaged the cardinal Fregoſa, and Biet Fieſco, then at Rome, to excite freſh diſturbances in Genoa. With ſome other diſaffected perſons, they joined the Neapolitan fleet, and laid ſiege to Porto Venere; but were repulſed by the intrepidity of Balbi, who commanded, and forced to embark with precipitation, after loſing a great number of men [k].

WHILE the Neapolitan fleet was engaged in matters of little importance, the duke of Or- d leans arrived in Genoa, in order to counteract the meaſures of the diſaffected, and induce the whole city to declare unanimouſly for Charles the eighth. Having intelligence that the Neapolitans had taken Rapallo, he ſet out with a ſtrong body of Genoeſe, aſſiſted by ſome Swiſs corps, to attack the enemy, and regain that place. To the ardor and courage of the Genoeſe we may attribute his ſucceſs: they firſt mounted the enemy's entrenchments, drove them before them, and left nothing to the Swiſs but the purſuit and plunder. Lawrence Fregoſa and ſeveral of the diſaffected were made priſoners, Biet de Fieſco eſcaping with the utmoſt peril in diſguiſe.

WHEN the Swiſs returned to Genoa, they committed ſuch diſorders as rendered their inſolence intolerable, and made the people take arms to drive them out of the city. The populace were ſo enraged, that had not the duke and ſenate interpoſed, ſcarce any of theſe e mercenaries would have eſcaped their fury [l].

CHARLES the eighth was at Aſti, when the news of the victory gained over the Neapolitans arrived. It was expected he would have made Genoa a viſit; but he contented himſelf with ſending ambaſſadors to engage the republic to declare war againſt Florence. His conqueſts were ſo rapid, that Lewis Sforza became jealous: he was now in full poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, by the death of his nephew, whom it was ſuſpected he had poiſoned; and apprehended that Charles would not bound his ambition to his ſucceſſes in Tuſcany and Naples. To ſecure himſelf he changed ſides, and entered upon a freſh alliance with the pope, the king of Spain, and the republic of Venice. Soon after this alteration of meaſures, the French monarch returned to Piſa, and was perſuaded by cardinal Fregoſa of upon this enterprize; but they were both defeated by Adorno, and Spinola, ſurnamed the Moor. Rapallo was afterwards retaken, the French and Swiſs garriſon made priſoners, and the ſuccours landed from the fleet forced to retreat to the ſhips in great confuſion [m].

To theſe advantages the Genoeſe added ſeveral others: Sarzana was recovered at the price of a ſum of money paid to the governor, and the Venetians diſappointed of their deſigns upon it, notwithſtanding their alliance with Lewis Sforza. Adorno endeavoured to gain poſſeſſion of Pietra Sarta in the ſame manner; but the Luccheſe interpoſed, and begun a treaty about this place with the marquis Entrague. The duke wrote to Sforza, requeſting him to intercede with the Luccheſe; but this he declined, and by that means occaſioned the ſepara-tion of the republic from his intereſt. Soon after, however, he viſited the ſenate, and ac- a quired the affection of the republic, by his affability, rich preſents, and careſſes, which no man knew how to beſtow with greater addreſs [n].

THE Genoeſe had juſt cruſhed a rebellion excited by Laviano in Corſica, when they received advice that Charles the eighth was preparing again to enter Italy, and meditating to revenge the perfidy of Sforza, and his loſſes in Naples, by an attack on Genoa. He was in expectation of forming a conſiderable party within the city by means of John Baptiſta Fre-goſa, and of profiting by the diviſions between the duke and the Fieſco family: in a word, he imagined the Genoeſe would eaſily be induced to change their protector, on account of their chagrin at the late conduct of Lewis Sforza, duke of Milan. Trivulcio was ſent with a ſtrong detachment to Genoa, with orders to join Fregoſa and the cardinal St. Pierre. Other b detachments were made in order to ſtraiten the duke; but he was not eaſily diſconcerted. He reconciled the duke with the Fieſco family, and procured the latter to march with all the troops that could be got ready, againſt Trivulcio. Novi had ſurrendered to the French general, without ſtriking a ſingle blow; and by this means the Genoeſe territories were expoſed to the enemy's incurſions, who did not fail to gratify their reſentment and avarice by exacting heavy contributions. In the mean time the Genoeſe marched forward; but were diſappointed in coming to a battle by the retreat of Trivulcio, who pretended that the ſcarcity of forage and proviſion rendered the expedition impracticable.

Lewis the twelfth conquers Milan. and the Genoeſe dominions. A. D. 1499.

AT the death of Charles the eighth, Lewis the twelfth claimed the dutchy of Milan, in right of his mother; and conquered it, and all the Genoeſe dominions, in one campaign. c
The government of the city he gave to Raveſtein; and as for Pietra Sarta, he kept it in his own hands, until the ſeveral claims of the republic and Lucca could be determined [o].

ITALY was no ſooner delivered from French tyranny by the departure of Lewis the twelfth, than its repoſe was again diſturbed by the contentions of Florence and Piſa. The republic of Genoa ſided with the latter. Piſa was beſieged, and a thouſand Genoeſe were ſent under Renier de la Sarette, a Spaniſh officer of experience, to attempt the relief of the garriſon by land, at the ſame time that a ſmall ſquadron endeavoured to throw in proviſions by ſea, from which the city is diſtant about two miles. Bardelle, who commanded this little convoy, found means to eſcape all the vigilance of the enemy, to puſh up to the mouth of the Arno, and throw in ſtores; notwithſtanding which, the beſieged were ſoon reduced to great extremities. Determined, however, not to ſurrender to the Florentines, the inhabi- d tants offered to put the city under the protection of Genoa; a propoſition which it ſeemed the intereſt of the republic to accept, although it met with great oppoſition, particularly from John Lewis Fieſco, who carried his point ſo far, that the ſenate refuſed returning any anſwer to the perſons, before they had obtained the conſent of the French king, on whom the republic depended. An ambaſſy was accordingly ſent to Lewis the twelfth, to ſound his inclinations; and the monarch, averſe to any augmentation of the Genoeſe power, rejected the propoſition. In conſequence of the king's inclinations, the ſenate ſent but faint ſupplies to Piſa, though their allegiance to Lewis was but of ſhort duration [p].

The revolt of Genoa. A. D. 1506.

WHAT Lewis had foreſeen of the Genoeſe inconſtancy came to paſs in the year 1506.
They threw off their allegiance to him, and obliged the perſon he had appointed governor e to quit the city. Mutual reſentments had always been harboured in the breaſts of the nobility and people. Neither could bear with temper to ſee the offices of the ſtate divided, each being deſirous of engroſſing the whole to themſelves. A band of mechanics, filled with theſe notions, flew to arms, attacked and wounded many perſons belonging to the Doria family. The magiſtrates aſſembled to quell the tumult; but could not ſucceed, except by a promiſe, that the nobility would content themſelves with a third of the public employments. For a little time this ſatisfied them; but new ſeditions were ſoon excited by certain factious perſons, who grounded freſh pretenſions and expectations on the facility with which the late conceſſions were made. They again aſſembled, and plundered the houſes of ſeveral nobility, obliging the whole body to retire, to avoid worſe conſequences. Raveſtein, the f French governor, had made a viſit to his native country previous to this inſurrection, leaving his command to Rocabertin, who was forced by neceſſity to comply with the former demands of the diſcontented. On notice of the tumult, Raveſtein returned, and entered Genoa with a body of five hundred horſe and ſeven hundred foot. He believed that he ſhould be able to awe the mutineers; but finding his authority contemned, and the force he endeavoured to exert ineffectual, he retired to the fort or citadel.

Tribunes appointed.

THE people became more daring by his retreat, committed the charge of public affairs to eight perſons of the loweſt claſs, whom they called tribunes; and, not ſatisfied with the poſſeſſion of the capital, they endeavoured to extend their ſovereignty over all the other parts of the Genoeſe dominion. They gained poſſeſſion of Spezzia, which Lewis Fieſco held g a in the king's name; and, in a word, became so successful in establishing confusion and anarchy, that their situation was no longer tolerable to the nobility, who resolved to carry their complaints to the throne. This they accordingly did; and the people soon after pleaded their own defence by their deputies, alledging, they had taken arms only because the insolence and power of the nobility became altogether intolerable and oppressive; that they had seized on Spezzia with no other view than to secure their commerce; and that they would observe the same obedience to his majesty as before. Lewis inclined to the side of the nobility; but he dissembled his sentiments, because the popular party was strongest. He feared that should he oppose them, they would throw themselves into the arms of the emperor Maximilian. He directed his measures accordingly, promising pardon to the ring-

b leaders of the sedition, and to approve their distribution of the government, if they would restore Spezzia into the hands of his officers. These concessions were not attended with the expected effects. The tribunes, contrary to the advice of the senate, refused to restore Spezzia, and the other places they had seized; nay, they directed their troops to attack Monaco. Ravestein did all in his power to oppose the progress of the malecontents; but finding his endeavours vain, he returned to France, to solicit a proper reinforcement.

Incensed at the obstinacy of the popular faction, the king determined to march in person with an army to chastise them. They heard of the preparations making in France against them; but such was their obstinacy, that they still kept Monaco besieged by a squadron of gallies, and six thousand men, commanded by Tartalin, a general sent them by the Pi- c sans. They remained for several months before this place; and at last raised the siege, on the approach of Guy de Alegre, who advanced at the head of all the nobility in the country to relieve the garrison.

Their disappointment before Monaco served only to augment their discontent, irritate their passions, and remove from their minds all respect for the sovereignty and power of Lewis, and natural influence of the nobility. They pulled down his majesty's arms from all public places, and elected Novi, a silk-dyer, their duke; an office which had never been conferred on any man beneath the rank of a citizen, of the middle class between the nobility and the vulgar. They next published a declaration, asserting the liberty of the city, and making it unlawful ever to subject it to a foreign prince; notwithstanding, a few days
d after they put up the imperial arms. A change of measures, in favour of the emperor, was brought about so suddenly, that all men believed the insurrection was fomented by his agents; a suspicion that was corroborated by his letter of interception to Lewis, requesting that he would abstain from all violence, and suffer the people to regulate the government of themselves and their own city, in the manner most agreeable to them [q].

A silk-dyer made duke.

The Genoese then committed the defence of the city to Tartalin and Jacobo Corso, two of the best officers at that time in Italy. The latter remained in the city, while the former marched with a detachment to attempt relieving Vintimella, besieged by Trivulcio. After the departure of Tartalin, Corso laid siege to the citadel, which he battered with heavy cannon, without effecting a breach, while his troops were constantly harrassed by brisk sallies
e made by the French garrison. At last he compassed by artifice what he could not effect by force: he ordered it to be insinuated to the besieged, that all hopes of succour were now cut off, by the defeat of the king's army, the plundering of his camp, and seizing upon all the passes: he artfully mixed menaces with promises, and cunningly procured a capitulation, granting the garrison honourable terms, to which he paid little regard when he had them in his power. All the French were cut in pieces; and such was the cruelty of this infatuated mob, that they filled a caldron with the blood of those brave victims, and gloried in dipping their hands in it: they spared neither age nor sex, disregarding those infirmities which ought to have excited compassion [r].

Cruelty of the rebels.

Having thus treacherously gained possession of the fort, situated in the mountains, and f commonly called the citadel, they next attacked the fort on the plain, likewise defended by a French garrison. It is probable, that the fear of sharing the fate of their countrymen redoubled the courage of the garrison: they, indeed, made extraordinary efforts in their own defence, and often drove the besiegers out of the place, after they had got footing within the walls.

In this situation was unhappy Genoa when king Lewis arrived at Aste. However insolent the mutineers had been, while danger was at a distance, they became now perfectly humble, and sent six deputies to his majesty to apologize for a conduct that would admit of no palliation, on account of its cruelty. Had manly liberty alone inspired them, posterity at least would have done justice to their fame; but it was faction, cruelty, and licentiousness, that actuated their measures. His majesty easily perceiving that their supplications and g pretended repentance served only to amuse him, until the Florentine succours arrived, and they had fortified all the passes to the city, ordered Charles de Amboise to march forward with the army, while he waited being joined by ſeveral Italian princes. After forcing all the paſſes the mareſchal arrived at Rapallo, a village in the valley of Poſeveri: here he maintained the ſtricteſt diſcipline, contenting himſelf with repulſing any attacks that ſhould be made by the Genoeſe, until the king's arrival in the camp. a

The French king lays ſiege to the city. A. D. 1507.

LEWIS no ſooner joined the army than he ordered the mareſchal to attack the Genoeſe forts on the mountains, and aſſiſt the garriſon beſieged in the fort on the plain. Immediately the army, conſiſting of eight hundred lances, eighteen thouſand light horſe, ſix thouſand Swiſs, and an equal number of other infantry of all nations, was drawn out in the king's preſence. All things were diſpoſed for the attack on the twelfth of April: Gonzaga, marquis of Mantua, and colonel Mercato, were ſent with ſtrong detachments to make a circuit round the hills, and attack the Genoeſe in the rear, while he charged them in perſon in front. A part of the cavalry he left to defend the paſſage of the valley of Poſeveri, leſt the Genoeſe ſhould attack the French in their rear, while they were aſcending the mountains. In this manner the aſſault began with great vigour on all ſides: the marquis of Mantua ſoon rendered himſelf maſter of the enemy's camp, while they thought of nothing but ſtanding their ground in the valley. He then charged with ſo much reſolution, that the Genoeſe believing the enemy greatly ſuperior in number to themſelves, ſoon gave way, and were put in confuſion. At laſt a total rout enſued, ſome taking flight to the mountains, others to the citadel they had lately reduced. The ſon of the marquis d'Alegre purſued them with the regiment of Gaſcons to the walls, on which he planted the colours in the king's name. On this occaſion the Genoeſe loſt near three thouſand men killed and made priſoners. b

The Genoeſe defeated.

The ſenate ſupplicates peace.

THESE loſſes without the walls excited ſo great a conſternation within, that the ſenate were for ſurrendering the city to his majeſty. Juſtiniani, attended with ſeveral other ſenators, waited on Lewis with propoſitions to this effect, after having obtained a truce for twenty-four hours. The king refuſed to ſee them, but they obtained an audience of the mareſchal. They fell upon their knees, and with tears in their eyes beſought him to have compaſſion on the miſerable ſtate to which they were reduced: they repreſented to him that they had no authority in the city, and that the diſobedience of the Genoeſe roſe ſolely from the fury and infatuation of the populace. Their government, they ſaid, was divided into three claſſes; the nobles and burghers compoſed the ſenate; they had frequent quarrels, but always ſupported each other againſt the third claſs, which includes artificers and mechanics of all ſorts, the embroilers and peſts of government, and now the occaſion of all the misfortunes of Genoa. In a word, the deputation pleaded ſo pathetically, that the mareſchal, having reported their prayers to his majeſty, it was determined to pardon the mutineers upon their ſubmiſſion. c d

THE brutality of the mob, however, deſtroyed the effects of this reſolution: they refuſed to lay down their arms, and added contemptuous terms and ſcornful inſolence to their refuſal. They determined once more to try their fortune in the field, and hoped it would prove more favourable than the laſt effort. They perſuaded themſelves that the king's army was leſs numerous than the ſenate pretended, and that theſe were not the troops who conquered Naples; but an army of new recruits, who were ſufficiently tired of fighting, from the warm reception they met with in the late action. Ideas ſo flattering elevated their courage ſo high, that they were fired with deſire of repairing their diſgrace, and regretted every moment that was ſpent in deliberation. e

THIS freſh tumult greatly embarraſſed the citizens. On the one ſide they feared the king's reſentment, becauſe they paſſed a promiſe it was not in their power to perform; and, on the other, they dreaded the perils to which they were expoſed in combating the opinions of a headſtrong multitude, with arms in their hands. They ſaw the ſeditious running through the ſtreets, threatening, and even inflicting blows on ſuch as did not follow their example. In the morning, the mob determined to make trial of their courage, went out of the town in a tumultuous manner at break of day, gaining the tops of the mountains by ſecret paths, known only to the peaſants. They attacked the fort the French had taken in the laſt action; but met with more reſiſtance than they expected, which helped to cool their ardour. They ſtill, however, continued the attack; but advice of their motions being received in the camp, the greateſt part of the army marched againſt them, and they were driven, like a flock of ſheep, back to the city, after loſing a great number of men, moſt of whom were preſſed to death in the crowd, or overturned and tumbled over the rocks in their flight. f

THE night following the mutineers ſallied out of the city, with all their families and effects, headed by their duke, Paulo Novi. Moſt of them retired to Piſa, and the reſt to ſome or other of the maritime towns. Thoſe who were not reſolute enough to go into voluntary baniſhment, laid down their arms, were reconciled to the ſenate, and determined to undergo the ſame fate. In the morning, all was quiet in the city, and the ſenate ſent freſh g a ambaſſadors to Lewis, to implore his mercy, and excuſe the late outrage. Their petition was granted, and part of the army ordered to take poſſeſſion of the city. After the mareſchal had ſeized the principal poſts, and placed guards in the proper ſtations, he ordered all the arms of the people to be carried to the arſenal, and themſelves to lodge in the higher ſtories of their houſes, making room in the lower for the French troops.

NEXT day, Lewis made his public entry with great magnificence; and aſſembling the ſenate, ordered all the public acts and old records to be burnt in his preſence, with a view that Genoa ſhould henceforward have no laws but ſuch as himſelf and ſucceſſors ſhould preſcribe; a reſolution truly barbarous and Gothic. He then ordered a declaration to be regiſtered, importing, that the city and ſtate of Genoa ſhould remain unalienably annexed to b the crown of France; that the Genoeſe ſhould continue faithful to him and his ſucceſſors, who would protect and defend them againſt all their enemies: that all crimes committed during the late troubles ſhould be pardoned: that all contention among the different claſſes of the people ſhould ceaſe, and a perfect union be eſtabliſhed among them: that the Genoeſe ſhould build, at their expence, a citadel in a certain part of the town, upon a plan given by his majeſty: that the houſe of St. George ſhould enjoy its antient privileges: that the Genoeſe ſhould be at all the expence of ſupporting ſuch garriſons as the king ſhall think ſufficient for the defence of the city and Genoeſe territories: that they maintain four gallies and four ſhips of war, to be diſpoſed of at his majeſty's pleaſure: that the city be governed by magiſtrates choſen annually; but that their power extend not to make alterations c in the police, form alliances, declare war, &c. all which ſhall be deemed royal prerogatives: that they judge in all civil cauſes, with an appeal, if thought convenient, to his majeſty: that the city, and all the Genoeſe dominions, obey the orders of the mareſchal Amboiſe, whom the king has conſtituted his lieutenant on this ſide the mountains; and before whom it ſhall be lawful for parties to appeal from the common courts of judicature.

Lewis the twelfth is maſter of the city, and regulates the government. A. D. 1508.

BESIDES the articles contained in this declaration, his majeſty obliged the city to pay all the expences of the war, which he deemed nothing more than the equitable puniſhment of their inconſtancy. He ordered all the old money to be recoined, and took every other meaſure that could deſtroy the leaſt veſtige and remembrance of the antient republic.

IT was the following year that the emperor made ſome abortive attempts to wreſt Genoa d out of the hands of the French, by means of a ſecret correſpondence with Baptiſta Juſtiniani and Fregoſa, two baniſhed noblemen. In 1509, Julius the ſecond endeavoured to ſurpriſe Genoa, aſſiſted by the Venetians, who had likewiſe their own ſecret deſigns. His holineſs equipped a fleet, which was joined by four large Venetian gallies. The armament was joined by great numbers of refugees and baniſhed nobility; among others, by the archbiſhop of Genoa, ſon of Biet Fieſco. It was propoſed to inveſt the city by ſea and land, intelligence of which coming to Chaumont, who commanded in Genoa, he ſent a ſquadron to give battle to the enemy. The two fleets coming in ſight of each other off Porto Venere, began a canonading, which continued for two hours; after which the pope's admiral ſteered for Seſtri, without making any farther efforts.

A. D. 1509.

e NOTWITHSTANDING a ſeries of intrigues carried on with the refugee Genoeſe, at different courts, to draw the city from her attachment to France, the Genoeſe continued faithful, and even raiſed a conſiderable army in ſupport of the French government. The attempts of John Baptiſta Fregoſa rendered it neceſſary to ſolicit a reinforcement from Trivulcio, which his circumſtances would not admit of ſparing. Fregoſa profited by this conjuncture in the month of June to recover the ducal dignity. He approached the city; and the French commandant, believing himſelf too weak to reſiſt, retired into the citadel. It was certain that he entertained ſuſpicions of the fidelity of the citizens, as he refuſed to return at their moſt preſſing intreaties. He even carried his jealouſy to ſuch a length as imprudently to fire upon the city from the citadel; a conduct that incenſed the Genoeſe greatly, and induced f them to receive Fregoſa, who was elected duke on the twenty-ninth of June.

A. D. 1511.

THE new duke immediately retorted the hoſtilities commenced by the French governor. At the inſtigation of the pope's legate the forts were inveſted, and batteries erected, which played with great vigour and ſucceſs. Several of the forts were ſurrendered; but the French found means to throw in ſuccours into the ſouthern fort, which withſtood all the efforts of the Genoeſe. In the mean time, the king, informed of the revolt of the city, ordered all the Genoeſe ſhips and merchandize in his ports to be ſeized.

THE duke, apprehending that the Fieſco family carried on ſome ſecret deſigns with the Adornos, to re-eſtabliſh the French government, determined to defeat their meaſures. Jerome Fieſco, being upon a viſit to the duke on the twenty-third of May, attended by his two bro- g thers, ſome words aroſe between him and Mobo Jomatin, in the anti-chamber. Young Fregoſa took part with Jomatin, and his two brothers with Fieſco. In an inſtant an hundred ſwords were drawn on both ſides, and much blood would have been ſpilt, had not the duke interpoſed his authority, and effected an accommodation. This reconciliation, however, was not ſincere; for Jerome Fieſco was aſſaſſinated a few days after by Zachary Fregoſa; and the two remaining brothers were taking meaſures to revenge his death, when the Adorno family marched with three thouſand men into the valley of Pozzeveri. The duke employed a body of troops to give them battle. The whole Fregoſa family took arms, engaged the enemy, and were defeated with great loſs. Upon this the Adorno family relieved fort Louthan, which had been long beſieged. In a word, ſo ſucceſsful were the two families of Fieſco and Adorno, that they obliged the duke to quit the city, and again reſtored the French dominion. Zachary Fregoſa now ſuffered the juſt puniſhment of murder; after being pierced with numberleſs wounds, his legs were tied to the tail of a horſe, and his body dragged round the city. a

Now the Genoeſe eſtabliſhed a new council called della Boglia; and diſpatched Melchior de Negroni, Anſaldo Grimaldi, Vincent Santi, and Auguſtin Ferrara, to the general of the fleet, to oblige him to return to Genoa, and ſubmit to the French king. But while the Adornos were thus working the reſtoration of the French government in Genoa, his majeſty loſt the battle of Novaro; and Octavian Fregoſa embraced this opportunity of expelling the Adorno family. He got together a body of troops, which Antonio Adorno was ſo far from oppoſing, that rather than involve his country in a freſh civil war, he voluntarily laid down the dignity of duke, which he held from the French king; an inſtance of patriotiſm, which may poſſibly be attributed to neceſſity. Certain it is, that for the ſhort term of his government, he gained the affection of the people in a very extraordinary manner, and was loaded with their bleſſings as he now departed the city. b

PREJON, who commanded the Genoeſe fleet, quitted the coaſt by the king's order, after having ſupplied the ſouthern fort with all neceſſaries; and Octavian Fregoſa was elected duke without oppoſition. The Genoeſe had kept this fort cloſe beſieged, when Fregoſa aſſumed his dignity: he reſolved to puſh the ſiege with vigour; and one of the boldeſt actions recorded in hiſtory was performed by Cavallo, on this occaſion. With three hundred men he cut the cable by which a Dalmatian veſſel, laden with proviſion, was tied to the fort, and carried her off amidſt a thick fire of cannon and muſquetry of the garriſon. The boldneſs of the action aſtoniſhed, but did not appall, the beſieged, who continued the defence with their uſual reſolution. Several attempts had been made to undermine the fort; but they were all fruſtrated by unſurmountable difficulties: the ſea waſhing the baſtions, retarded the miners, and the cannon of the fort ſunk all the boats aſſiſting the workmen. However, one Pietro Toſcano, an ingenious engineer, contrived a plan from which the beſiegers had great expectation. He built a large veſſel, the ſides of which were fortified with wool-ſacks, to prevent the effects of the cannon-balls. On board of this veſſel he embarked the miners, and the whole difficulty lay in bringing her along-ſide the fort. This was very nearly accompliſhed, when the garriſon ſallied out ſo briſkly, that the whole project was defeated, many of the workmen killed or drowned, and Toſcano with great difficulty ſaved. c d

Although Toſcano was foiled in this enterprize, all allowed it to be ingenious and bold, and the Genoeſe relied much on his abilities. Their enemies had now received reinforcements of Milaneſe and Swiſs, with which the Adorno and Fieſco families took the field, to the number of ſix thouſand men, gaining, in a ſhort time, poſſeſſion of Chiavari, and Portoſino. The duke ſent Nicolas Doria againſt them, with five hundred foot; and he was immediately followed by Frederic Fregoſa, ſeveral other nobility, and reinforcements. Aſſiſted by Andrea Doria, who commanded the fleet, they battered Chiavari for two days, but could not ſucceed. In the mean time, the enemy increaſed to ten thouſand, and were marching to inveſt Genoa. Adorno encamped for the ſpace of ten days at Biſagno, and ſeemed preparing all things neceſſary to puſh the ſiege with vigour, when of a ſudden he quitted his camp with ſo much precipitation, that he left his artillery behind. Thus Genoa was, for this time, relieved from the impending ſtorm; but ſtill the duke could not accompliſh the reduction of the forts, particularly the ſouthern fort, againſt which he bent all his endeavours. At laſt, however, having intercepted a convoy intended for the garriſon, he obliged the governor to capitulate, after he had been reduced to the moſt deplorable neceſſity [r]. e f

A. D. 1514. The joy produced by this event was ſo tumultuous, that it afforded the Adorno family with an opportunity of attempting the city by ſurprize. They marched with five hundred men in the night, hoping to become maſters of the palace with little trouble, in conſequence of ſecret intelligence they held in the town; but the roads were ſo bad, and their march ſo tedious, that day-light broke in, and diſcovered their deſign before they arrived at Caſtellazzo. After holding a council of war, it was determined to purſue their march. Accordingly they arrived at Genoa on the twenty-ſeventh of December, ſeizing on Carbonara gate, g a with little reſiſtance. Puſhing on to the palace, they cried out, 'Long live Adorno and 'Fieſco!' They awaked the duke in attempting to force the gate, and found him a more vigorous enemy than they expected. Forming his men in the beſt order, he ſallied out at their head, ſword in hand, and made dreadful havock. The wounds he received ſerved only to whet his ardour, and he continued the fight, till the enemy, no longer in a condition to oppoſe ſo much valour, turned their backs, left a clear victory to the duke, who took Adorno, Fieſco, and Camillo, priſoners, and totally baffled the deſign.

In this ſituation were things, when Francis the firſt mounted the throne of France. He immediately reſolved to recover Milan and the Genoeſe territories, which had been wreſted from his predeceſſor. For this purpoſe he endeavoured to form an alliance with Leo the b tenth; but his holineſs had juſt concluded a treaty againſt Francis with Charles the fifth, two days before the arrival of the French ambaſſador. There was not in Italy a man of quality more beloved by his holineſs than Octavian Fregoſa: he employed all his authority with the Spaniards to have him made duke, when the city fell into their hands, and he obtained the dignity for him in prejudice to the right of the elder brother, who had ſolicited this high office at the ſame time. On his ſide, Fregoſa had always expreſſed a juſt ſenſe of the pope's friendſhip, and regulated his conduct by no other rule than the inclination and intereſt of his benefactor. He had done him many good offices in return, and was highly inſtrumental in his exaltation to the head of the church. He governed Genoa by the will of Leo; and diſcovered all the intrigues of the French to diſunite him from the holy ſee; but c now the pope's friendſhip grew burthenſome, and Fregoſa began to tire of an alliance which hourly endangered his life, and made him run the hazard of aſſaſſination. France protected the Adorno and Fieſco families, his greateſt enemies, who had now twice brought him on the brink of ruin. He ſaw that their attacks would never ceaſe, as long as they were protected by France and he at enmity with that monarch; he therefore formed the reſolution of entering into the meaſures of king Francis, and putting himſelf in the place of his rivals, the Adornos and Fieſcos. His ingratitude to Leo, he thought, would be ſufficiently excuſed by the urgency of the circumſtance, and the hazard which would attend his continuing his friendſhip longer.

Francis the firſt endeavours to recover Genoa. A. D. 1513.

On the other hand, the duke of Milan was Fregoſa's ſworn enemy, on account of the d connections he had formed with the Adornos, and his pretenſions upon Genoa. The Swiſs had vowed never to forgive the injury done them, when he made his application to the Spaniards to be reſtored to his dignity, rather than to themſelves. Thus, he was certain of being deprived of his dignity by either of the contending intereſts that ſucceeded in their ſchemes; and while he was balancing, the conſtable of Bourbon ſeized the opportunity, and fixed him in the intereſt of France. All the conſtable apprehended in this treaty was, its coming to the pope's knowledge; but this he prevented, by making it the firſt article in the alliance that it ſhould be kept ſecret. The duke of Milan, however, got ſome intelligence that a French gentleman was concealed in the duke's palace: he ſent notice of it to the pontiff, and requeſted that he would lend him the four thouſand Swiſs cantoned in the e eccleſiaſtical dominions, with which he promiſed to ſecure Genoa to the holy ſee. Leo gave no credit to an information which he attributed to Sforza's malice, and refuſed to let him have the troops. Thus, Fregoſa was allowed to purſue his ſcheme with France unmoleſted.

FRANCIS, having determined to invade Italy, ſent the cardinal de Sion into Piedmont with an army of twenty thouſand men; and, to open a paſſage for him, Aymard de Prie, one of the moſt experienced officers of his time, was detached with a ſquadron, on board which were embarked five thouſand veteran foot, and four hundred lances, to Genoa, to join the duke, who had engaged to raiſe a certain force. This junction was formed, as they pretended, for their own defence. It was neceſſary to enter upon part of the Milaneſe beyond the Po, and to ſurpriſe the towns of Tortona, Alexandria, in order to lodge the Swiſs f poſted in Suza, and prevent themſelves from being attacked in front and rear. The duke and de Prie were unſucceſsful in their ſcheme, having taken Tortona, Alexandria, and all thoſe territories of the Milaneſe beyond the Po; but the proſecution of their deſign in thus opening a paſſage for the French troops proved unneceſſary, the duke of Savoy having pointed out an eaſier road.

The following year his holineſs and the Spaniards concerted a plan for ſurpriſing Genoa; but it was diſcovered and fruſtrated by Fregoſa. At laſt Colonna formed a ſcheme againſt it, which had better ſucceſs, in ſpite of all the diligence and ability of the duke. Genoa was beſieged by the Spaniſh and eccleſiaſtical forces; it was bravely defended by the duke, reinforced by the French, but at laſt forced to capitulate. Adorno was made duke in the g room of Fregoſa: the ſame form of government that had continued for ſo many years before the French came into Italy was reſtored, and the republic's fleet put under the imperial admiral's command for three years. While the capitulation was ſettling, the Spaniards, obſerving that the Genoeſe relaxed in their duty, ſeized the opportunity, and forcing themſelves into the city, pillaged it in a cruel manner. The only reſiſtance they met with was in the ſtreet, where a body of three hundred French were poſted. To theſe Fregoſa and the count de St. Paul joined themſelves, and fought with ſuch deſperate fury, that for three hours the Spaniards could not break this handful of men: at laſt theſe heroes were ſurrounded, and forced to ſurrender priſoners of war, the count de St. Paul alone eſcaping into a garret (A). a

The Spaniards enter Genoa and pillage it.

THE pillaging of Genoa, the richeſt town at that time in Europe, except Venice, brought on diſputes among the confederate generals. Colonna accuſed Peſcara of having broke the faith of kings, by abandoning the city to the licentious humour of the Spaniſh ſoldiers, in order to curry favour with the infantry; and Peſcara contented himſelf with replying in a maxim often repeated by Commines in his memoirs, 'That he who is ſucceſsful in war 'carries off all the honour.' b

FROM this time Genoa took no ſhare in public affairs; at leaſt it would be impoſſible to ſeparate the affairs of the republic from the general tranſactions of the war between Francis the firſt, and the emperor Charles the fifth, which we have had ſo frequent occaſion to mention in the courſe of our hiſtory.

A. D. 1252. ALTHOUGH the republic made no great figure in this war, ſome Genoeſe individuals greatly ſignalized themſelves, and among theſe Andrea Doria, who commanded a ſquadron belonging to the French king. He defeated the Spaniſh admiral Moncade after a bloody battle, that raiſed his reputation to the higheſt pitch of ambition, and performed ſeveral other gallant actions, which placed him among the greateſt commanders of the age: what, however, gained him more honour than all his military exploits, was the revolution he effected in Genoa in the year 1528. c

Doria quits the French ſervice, and forms ſchemes for reſtoring liberty to the city.
A. D. 1528.

BEFORE this time Doria had quitted the French ſervice, and employed his mind in ſetting ſchemes on foot for reſcuing his country out of the hands of foreign princes. He well knew the fickle diſpoſition of his countrymen, and encouraged this humour with great addreſs, to promote their intereſt, and reſtore their long loſt liberty. As he had a great number of friends in the city, with whom he maintained a conſtant correſpondence, he loſt no occaſion to excite diſcontents againſt the preſent form of government, or rather the preſent adminiſtration. He perſuaded the people that the French, under the notion of protecting them againſt their enemies, left them only a ſhadow of liberty, governing with all the deſpotiſm of conquerors. To the nobility he repreſented the diſgrace of ſuffering the reins of government to be directed by foreigners, and putting their poperty, liberty, and lives, in the power of men leſs worthy of authority than themſelves. In a word, he formed a ſtrong faction, laid a plan, and judiciouſly fixed upon a ſeaſon for the execution, when the violence of the plague had carried off three-fourths of the garriſon (B). d

He gains poſſeſſion of Genoa.

He advanced with five hundred men, his friends opened the gates to him, he ſeized the principal poſts in the city, and thus became maſter of Genoa without drawing his ſword, the French garriſon having retired to the forts. Trivulcio himſelf withdrew to the citadel, from whence he wrote to the confederates that he would undertake to drive out Doria if they would ſend him three thouſand men. This reinforcement not coming, however, at the time expected, Trivulcio blaſted the laurels he had been collecting in a tedious war, by ſigning ſcandalous articles of capitulation, in order to ſave his own treaſures. e

No ſooner were the French driven out of Genoa than Doria's name was ecchoed in every ſtreet: ſome expreſſed their real ſentiments by their demonſtrations of joy, others followed the current of fortune, and many thought to conceal their averſion to this hero, and the liberty of the republic, by joining in the public acclamation. Doria, without examining into the real opinions of individuals, reſolved to profit by the general appearances, and the preſent humour of the people. Immediately he aſſembled the nobility, and reſtored the government into their hands, declaring that he pretended to no greater ſhare in it than became him as a nobleman. He re-eſtabliſhed the antient form of the republic, and received from his country all thoſe teſtimonies of gratitude, which a conduct ſo diſintereſted merited. f

(A) Foliета obſerves, contrary to the teſtimony of all other writers, that Fregoſa was, at this time, confined to his bed with the gout; but ordered himſelf to be carried to the window on hearing that the marquis Peſcara had taken the count St. Paul priſoner. This nobleman he demanded, in order to ſkreen him from the fury of the Adornos. The favour was refuſed, and he was ſo mortified with grief, that his diſtemper aſcending to his ſtomach, put an end to his life (1). Other writers aſcribe his death to the fatigue of this action, and the chagrin of ſeeing himſelf ſtripped of all his power by the Adornos (2).

(B) It appears, from all the circumſtances of this relation, and the concurring teſtimony of authors, that Genoa was, at this time, under the protection of France, though it does not appear when the city had ſhaken off the yoke of the confederates, after they took it by ſurprize, A. 1521.

AFTER

a After finiſhing this glorious enterprize Doria retired to his palace, under pretence of avoiding the jealouſy of his fellow-citizens; but in effect to enjoy in tranquility the fruits of his paſt labours. His country admired his moderation and prudence, they honoured him with the title of father of his country, and the reſtorer of public liberty; and, to tranſmit to poſterity the memory of their obligations to him, they erected a ſtatue with the following inſcription,

In the mean time the Genoeſe did not ſuffer their joy ſo wholly to engroſs their minds as to divert their attention from the neceſſary buſineſs of the ſtate. b To enjoy the ſole fruits of their liberty, it was requiſite to gain poſſeſſion of all the dominions of the republic, and to expel the French garriſons out of ſeveral of their towns and forts. They began with Savona, which they cloſely blocked up. Montjean made ſeveral attempts to relieve the beſieged; but all his endeavours were foiled by the vigilance of the Genoeſe. However, his ill ſucceſs put him upon a ſcheme which ſerved, at leaſt, to raiſe his reputation. It was to ſurprize Doria in his palace, the one ſide of which was waſhed by the ſea, and the other joined to the walls of the city. Taking with him fifty horſe and two thouſand foot, picked out of the whole French army, he ſet out for Genoa, travelled twenty-two Italian miles in one night, and arrived about day-break at the place appointed for a rendezvous. Under favour of a morning fog, he ſeized upon all the avenues leading to the palace without being diſcovered, and c was firſt ſeen by a footman, when the French were within a very ſhort diſtance of the palace. Immediately he awaked Doria, who ſcarce had time to ſave himſelf by the back-door, and throw himſelf into a ſmall boat, that carried him to the gallies lying in the road (C).

Not long after the count St. Paul attempted to ſurpriſe Genoa, but was diſappointed by a heavy ſtorm of rain, which rendered the ways impaſſable. Next year Charles the fifth was crowned at Bologna, at which ceremony the ambaſſadors of Genoa and Sienna, diſputing about precedency in the church, came to blows with their fiſts, and were both turned out by the emperor's order.

This year Hercules Fregoſa and Guy Rincon, made an attempt to ſurpriſe Genoa: they were A. D. 1536. entered the valley of Poſeveri, when Andrea Doria, with the emperor's conſent, detached d Spinola and Antonio Doria, with ſeven hundred men, to the relief of his countrymen. When they arrived they found the city in the utmoſt conſternation, and the women flying with their children to the mountains. Rincon had already arrived at the gate of St. Thomas, and planted his ſcaling ladders againſt the walls, while Fregoſa made another attack on the ſide of Biſagno. Baptiſto Corſo had ſuſtained the firſt ſhock of the enemy, but was juſt on the point of yielding to ſuperior force, when Spinola and Doria came up, renewed the engagement, drove Rincon from the walls, and thus delivered Genoa from the moſt dangerous attack ſhe had ever ſuſtained. Doria was like the tutelar deity of the ſtate; he firſt gave it liberty, and then protected it by his vigilance and foreſight, though removed at a diſtance.

While the republic was heaping honours upon him, he took a ſtep which greatly ſurpriſed his moſt profound admirers: it was his adopting Jeannetin Doria, a diſtant couſin, to ſucceed him, not only in his eſtate, but employments. Jeannetin was the ſon of Thomas Doria, a nobleman reduced to want: he was bred a ſilk-weaver, an employment no way ſuited to his birth: he was young and handſome, but ignorant, vulgar, raſh, and inſolent. It is probable that Andrea Doria did not perceive his defects, or if he did, that he attributed them to want of education, which conſequently would wear off as he became better acquainted with life. He introduced him to the Imperial ſervice, and recommended him to many Spaniſh officers of diſtinction, with intention, that their protection ſhould ſupport Jeannetin in the dignity to which he ſhould be raiſed at his death; and he gradually accuſtomed the Genoeſe nobility to treat him with that reſpect they would naturally pay their ſuperiors in birth and merit.

f On the other hand, Jeannetin did not ſupport his elevation with all the prudence and circumſpection neceſſary. Far from refuſing thoſe extraordinary deferences paid him, he ſeemed to claim them as his right: he demanded the homage of his equals with the inſolence of a ſuperior, obliged many to be his enemies, who bore his couſin the ſtrongeſt affection; and, in ſhort, became hated and deſpiſed, in ſpite of the public reſpect for Andrea Doria[t].

The riſe and progreſs of the revolution attempted by John Lewis Fieſco.

At this time, the moſt conſiderable nobleman in Genoa was John Lewis Fieſco, head of one of the moſt ancient and illuſtrious families in the city. Lewis Fieſco was ambitious, bold, popular, and wanting in none of thoſe qualities requiſite for undertaking the moſt daring enterprizes. The indolence in which the Genoeſe nobility lived, was no way ſuitable to his diſpoſition. He ſought for means of ſignalizing himſelf, and obliging fortune to do juſ-

ttice to his merit. However, the want of proper conjunctures had ſet bounds to his ambi- a ion; and he ſaw himſelf reſtrained to thoſe narrow limits to which perſons of his rank were confined by the laws of his country. Jeannetin's elevation deſtroyed all his hopes of ever procuring an employment ſuited to his dignity and ambition. Doria's adoption gave to that upſtart the command of the republic's armies in war, and the preſidency of her civil œconomy in peace. Nothing remained for Fieſco but to accept of a ſubaltern employment under the perſon he deſpiſed.

In theſe mortifying circumſtances Fieſco began to revolve in his mind whether a revolution in the form of government might not be effected, by which he might raiſe himſelf to thoſe offices which he claimed in right of his rank and merit. He diſſembled, however, his intentions; but others, who had formed the ſame deſigns penetrated into his views, and a b coalition of intereſts was immediately ſtruck up. In the proſecution of this ſcheme, Fieſco was aſtoniſhed to find ſuch numbers of diſcontented nobility among thoſe he always reputed the faſt friends of Doria; nay, to find himſelf the moſt ſtrenuouſly ſolicited by thoſe men to reſcue the government out of Doria's hands. His firſt care was to prove the ſincerity of this new party: next he put himſelf in a condition to oppoſe the Spaniſh fleet and the Milaneſe troops, who would undoubtedly lay ſiege to the city, ſhould any alteration be introduced into the government. But it was impoſſible to oppoſe the formidable power of Charles the fifth, without applying for foreign aids; and France alone could afford the neceſſary aſſiſtance, or find its intereſt in ſupporting the views of Fieſco and his faction.

A commission was given to Cæſar Fregoſa, to ſound the French monarch's inclinations; c but Fregoſa's negociation proved abortive, from the obſtinate ſilence he preſerved with reſpect to the names of the heads and principal perſons concerned in this deſign. Fieſco did not reproach him with his ill ſucceſs; but he ſent another agent, the famous Gonzaga, more expert in buſineſs, to treat with Francis. Gonzaga took the moſt effectual means to ſucceed; he demonſtrated, in a few words, that the only means of driving the emperor out of the Milaneſe, was to cut off the communication between that dutchy and his other dominions, which could only be done by reſcuing the republic of Genoa out of Doria's hands, and conſequently detaching it from the emperor's intereſt.

This remonſtrance had the deſired effect. It was determined in council to aſſiſt the pro- d jected revolution; but Gonzaga did not quit the court before he obtained a ſolemn promiſe, that Francis would renounce, in favour of Fieſco, all his claims to Genoa, as ſoon as the revolution ſhould be accompliſhed. He likewiſe received the neceſſary powers for aſſembling the troops cantoned in Piedmont, and calling them to his aſſiſtance whenever it was found expedient; and he ſelected out of the whole fleet in the harbour of Toulon a certain number of ſhips, to compoſe a ſquadron for the ſame purpoſe.

After ſecuring the friendſhip of France, Fieſco meditated how he ſhould ſtill ſtrengthen his intereſt, by drawing the pontiff into his meaſures. He made an excurſion to Rome, under the pretence of pleaſure; but in reality with a deſign the more eaſily to communicate his plan to Paul III. The occaſion was ſeaſonable; for Doria had a diſpute with the holy ſee about the effects of biſhop Doria, his couſin, in Naples, who in his laſt will, made him e ſole heir and exceutor. This will was conteſted by the officers of the holy ſee, who inſiſted, that all the eſtate of the deceaſed biſhop deſcended of courſe to the pope, as head of the church, and immediate patron of that dioceſe. The affair was carried to Rome, and decided by the rota againſt Doria, who found in the ſame perſons his judges and opponents. Hence proceeded a coldneſs between Doria and his holineſs, of which Fieſco hoped to make his advantage. He firſt opened his deſign to cardinal Trivulcio, the moſt brilliant character in the ſacred college; who not only received it with approbation, but entered ſtrongly into the ſcheme, which he promiſed to ſupport with all his intereſt. It was indeed no difficult matter to gain his holineſs; a variety of circumſtances concurred to make Fieſco's journey as ſucceſsful as he could wiſh; the pope not only encouraged him in his purpoſe, but furniſhed f him with freſh means of accompliſhing it.

Although Trivulcio approved of Fieſco's project, as far as it related to France, yet he deemed it highly chimerical with reſpect to himſelf; and ſtated it in ſuch a manner to Fieſco, that he was frequently upon the point of renouncing it; but the inſolence of Jeannetin, determined him to run every hazard. On his return from Rome, he was treated ſo magiſterially by that young gentleman, that with the utmoſt difficulty he reſtrained his temper, and ſuppreſſed his reſentment, the giving way to which would infallibly deſtroy his whole ſcheme. In the mean time, he began with endeavouring to augment the number of his adherents by the utmoſt affability, liberality, and generoſity. His conduct, however, was perfectly circumſpect, and a medium between too much neglect and too eager ſolicitude. He never railed at the adminiſtration, or teſtified any impatience to ſee meaſures altered. His mind appeared tranquil, and his life eaſy, and diveſted of all public care.

a care. Nothing escaped him that could rouse the suspicion of his enemies; the more his ambition stimulated him, the more eager did he seem studious of repose and privacy. In a word, his whole carriage was artful, cautious, and politic; yet his designs were penetrated by Spanish emissaries, maintained at the public expence in Genoa. Fernando Gonzaga, who succeeded the marquis d'Este in the government of Milan, gave notice of the conspiracy to Doria; but his great soul discredited the report, which he attributed to a mean and insidious attempt to destroy the character of Fiesco. He relied upon his own integrity, the public affection, and the services he had done his country, without reflecting upon the prejudices conceived against him on account of Jeannetin. There were, at the same time, some peculiar circumstances in the information, which made Doria suspect it; and every
b thing seemed to concur in rendering Fiesco's designs successful, and effecting the revolution.

When matters were sufficiently ripe, the plan of execution was fixed, their places assigned to each, the day, the hour, and the signals agreed upon. The first attempts were made on Doria's palace, as seizing upon his person would be more than half the business; but his good fortune once more interposed, and rescued Doria from the very jaws of destruction. On the first alarm, he mounted his horse, and retired to a neighbouring castle, finding that all endeavours to oppose a revolt, apparently so general, would be of no effect. All their other attempts, however, were successful; and the senate and friends of Doria in a fair way of being driven out of the city, if Fiesco had not, unfortunately for his party, lost his life by an accident. The sudden change consequent on his death was a proof of Fiesco's im-
c portance. As if the whole faction had been planet-struck, every man ready to give the blow was arrested, the sword fell harmless, the senate and Doria's party took courage, and the scale of fortune suddenly turned, by one of those circumstances that cannot rationally be accounted for. Certain it is, that when Fiesco perished, by the giving way of a board over which he was crossing a canal, no attendant was with him. His death was known by accident; and yet, as if his whole faction had certain forebodings of his fate, a panic seized them in the career of prosperity, when hardly any thing opposed them, and just as Genoa was on the point of becoming the reward of their bravery and well schemed designs.

It must be owned that the senate on this occasion acted with the utmost prudence and intrepidity. At first they made several weak attempts to resist Fiesco; now, on intelli-
d gence of his death, they seized the opportunity, rallied their small party, and pushed the dispirited enemy with great resolution. The most sanguine of the conspirators were astonished; many of them, who had not the same confidence in Jerome Fiesco, the surviving brother, fell off from the party and joined the senate: but it was not the intention of this body to depopulate the city by bloodshed, but to heal the wounds of discord by the salutary balm of peace. They entered upon a negotiation with the conspirators, and promised a general pardon, provided they laid down their arms; a proposition no sooner made than accepted. Three of the principal conspirators, Ottobon, Verina, and Co-laagno, not chusing to trust to promises which had not been ratified by old Doria, set sail for France; and one happy consequence at least attended this insurrection, as it occasioned the e death of Jeannetin, whose insolence, temerity, and harsh manners, had given the first disgust, and set Fiesco on rescuing his country from falling into the hands of a person unworthy to succeed Andrea Doria [u].

The tumult being thus appeased, the senate sent a deputation to Andrea Doria, to console him on the death of Jeannetin, and request him to return to the city, where he was received with all imaginable honours. His old age, which enfeebled his arm, added greatly to the respect of the people, who were easily persuaded to enter into his sentiments of revenge. Doria went next day to the senate, and, under the veil of patriotism, strenuously advised a revocation of the pardon granted by the senate, which, he said, was an encouragement to incendiaries and parricides. Having obtained the senate's consent, he declared all
f those who were concerned in the late insurrection traitors to their country, and began the punishment with the body of Fiesco, which he ordered to be ignominiously treated and thrown into the sea: his magnificent palace was next razed to the ground, and his memory rendered infamous: his brothers were proscribed, all the ringleaders out-lawed, and the meanest individual concerned in this unfortunate affair banished the city for fifty years; a severity unworthy of the great Doria, and attributed to a mind enervated by old age, and soured with infirmity and grief at the loss of his adopted son. Jerome Fiesco was ordered to surrender Montobio to the commissaries who were sent to him; but this was a point not so easily settled as the others: Montobio was strong by nature, and Fiesco had bestowed great pains in fortifying it, from the time that he had harboured the first resentment against ; Doria. Jerome refused to comply with the demand of the commissaries; and the senate, fearing it would be difficult to force him, set on foot a negotiation; but this too proved unſucceſsful, Jerome being ſo much incenſed at the perſecutions he ſaw going on againſt his family, as not to hearken to any propoſitions whatever. The emperor's miniſters dreaded leſt this obſtinacy would again light up a war in Lombardy, and Montobio be put into the hands of the French. The place was of the utmoſt importance to the emperor; he, therefore, urged Doria to beſiege it, promiſing to ſupport the whole expence. a

ACCORDINGLY Auguſtino Spinola, an officer of great ability, was ordered to inveſt it, which he did with ſo much vigour, that the garriſon was forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. Doria had the good fortune to take priſoners in this place the greater number of his enemies, many of whom had returned in diſguſt from France, to ſignalize themſelves in the defence of Montobio. Moſt of the ſenators were inclined to mercy; but Doria's authority prevailed. The Fieſco family could not exiſt, even in the meaneſt ſituation, without exciting jealouſy in that of Doria: they were rivals, and conſequently implacable enemies; it was, therefore, determined to extirpate, or at leaſt puniſh the conſpirators with all the ſeverity the law admitted. Jerome Fieſco, Verina, Colaagno, and Oſſurato, were ſentenced to death: Ottobon Fieſco, and all his poſterity, were out-lawed. Scipio Fieſco, the youngeſt of the four brothers, about ten years of age, and then a ſtudent at Padua, was included in the puniſhment, though of too tender an age to be deemed guilty of the crime: he was ſtripped of all his effects, forced to take refuge in France, and his poſterity, to the fifth generation, prohibited from ſetting foot in Genoa. Such were the effects of a conſpiracy which, after having been planned with wiſdom, ſecrecy, and addreſs, and juſt on the point of execution, was ruined by an unforeſeen accident, and the loſs of Fieſco count of Lavagna, who was the ſoul and animating principle of the whole faction. b c

The emperor viſits Genoa. A. D. 1548.

THIS year his Imperial majeſty viſited Genoa, and was received with all the honours due to his high rank and heroic character. His retinue was ſo numerous, that it excited the jealouſy of the republic, and obliged the magiſtrates to place guards in every ſtreet, for the protection of public liberty. A few days after their fears were augmented by a propoſal which Charles made to the ſenate of building a citadel in the ſuburbs, in which he ſhould keep a Spaniſh garriſon for the defence of the city, and to ſuppreſs tumults and conſpiracies, which became ſo frequent and ſo dangerous. This was a propoſition not at all reliſhed by the ſenate; it was rejected with one voice, in ſpite of all the arguments urged by the emperor.

FROM this time there appeared a certain coldneſs between the Spaniards and Genoeſe; it ſoon roſe to an unconquerable averſion, which at length broke out in the following manner. The court of Madrid had given ſecret orders for arreſting a Spaniſh criminal, who fled from juſtice and took ſhelter in Genoa: his name was Doza, and he was arreſted in the ſtreet by Dr. Mignaca, and committed to priſon. Afterwards he was removed, with intention to be put on board a Spaniſh galley, and ſent to his own country to take his trial; but the populace roſe and endeavoured to reſcue the priſoner: this obliged the guard to fire upon them, which killing a Genoeſe mechanic, ſet the whole city in an uproar. Doria ſent Spinola to appeaſe the tumult, who on his arrival found the people beſieging about fifty Spaniards in a houſe: he diſperſed the mob, and conducting the Spaniſh guard and the priſoner to the neareſt gate, let them out, and returned to Doria with an account that the ſedition was quelled. This, however, was not the caſe; for the Spaniards were again ſtopt at the ſecond gate by the guard, who prepared their pieces, and threatened to fire on them if they did not releaſe the priſoner; but being informed of Doria's orders, they permitted them to paſs without farther moleſtation. d e

The people attack the Spaniards.

ANOTHER affair of no great moment occaſioned great diſturbances in Genoa about this time. At the emperor's command Mendoza ſeized on Piombino and the iſle of Ilna, belonging to Ferdinand Appian, with intention to prevent its falling into the hands of the French. Mendoza ceded that place to Coſmo de Medicis, who promiſed to fortify and keep it for the uſe of his Imperial majeſty. He laboured indeed with ſuch diligence on the fortifications, that it raiſed ſuſpicions in the Genoeſe merchants of ſome deſign to reſtrain their commerce. The people mutinied, and accuſed the nobles of betraying their country, becauſe they did not oppoſe Coſmo, and declare war upon Florence. Doria employed all his influence and authority to appeaſe the ſedition; but finding the people obſtinate, he conſulted the ſenate on the means of ſatisfying the mutineers. It was determined to ſend an ambaſſador to the emperor, offering him two millions, if he would cede the place to the republic; but Coſmo fruſtrated the effects of this propoſition, by artfully repreſenting, that the Genoeſe were upon terms with Leon Spozzi, to put it into the hands of the French. One good effect attended this ambaſſy, for by it the people were convinced, that the nobles harboured no deſign againſt the public good, and maintained no correſpondence with Coſmo, grand-duke of Tuſcany. f

A. D. 1550. Two years after a cordelier was ſeized, on ſuſpicion of carrying on a ſecret correſpondence in Genoa, with a view of betraying the city to the French. He was put to the queſtion, g a and accuſ-d Baptiſto Fornari of being an accomplice in the conſpiracy. No notice, however, was taken of this accuſation, unſupported by credible proof, and the cordelier was diſmiſſed, and baniſhed. Next year, Spozzi made an attempt to ſeize the perſon of Doria, as he was conducting the king and queen of Bohemia into Spain. The deſign, however, was diſcovered, and fruſtrated by the prudence and circumſpection of Doria[w].

In the year 1553, the marquis de Termes invaded Corſica, with an army of two thouſand five hundred choſen troops. In a ſhort ſpace of time, he reduced Sans Fiorenzo and Bonifacio, two places of great importance on account of the intelligence and communication they held with Ornano. All the other towns ſubmitted in a few days to the conqueror, who had now no other difficulty than to ſecure his conqueſts with ſo ſmall an army. The The French invade Corſica.

b marquis immediately ſent to Marſeilles for reinforcements; he began repairing the fortifications of Fiorenzo and Ayazzo, and putting them in a ſtate of defence. On the firſt advice of this deſcent, the ſenate gave orders for new levies, and beſtowed the command of all their forces by ſea and land on the aged Doria, putting the ſtandard of St. George into his hands, which he gave to his grand nephew Andrew Doria, ſon of Jeannetin, declared admiral of the whole fleet. A. D. 1553.

As the Genoeſe did not think their own ſtrength ſufficient to drive the French out of Corſica, they ſought aſſiſtance from the emperor; and he wrote to the grand duke of Tuſcany, to whom the iſland lay moſt contiguous, to reinforce them: he likewiſe gave the viceroys of Naples and Sardinia directions to oppoſe the French by ſea and land; but theſe orders were

c ſo general, that the republic was in a manner left to fight her own quarrel. It is true, indeed, the Neapolitan galleys conveyed the Genoeſe troops, to the number of ſeven thouſand men, into Corſica, by which means the campaign began earlier than it would have done had they waited for the republic's fleet. Immediately Doria inveſted Fiorenzo; and the trenches being opened about a month, the garriſon began to be in great want of proviſion. The marquis de Termes reſolved to throw in a convoy, and Doria uſed every expedient to prevent their receiving any ſuccours. Jean de Turin commanded the French detachment, who, after maintaining an obſtinate battle, was killed and his party defeated: however, the diverſion Turin made, furniſhed two French frigates with an opportunity of puſhing into the harbour, to the great joy of the diſtreſſed garriſon, now enabled to prolong their defence.

d As the ſiege was likely to turn out tedious, young Doria divided his army into ſeveral corps, and reduced the whole iſland, except Ayazzo, Rozzella, and Bonifacio, under the dominion of the republic.

Many of the Corſicans, who had firſt joined the French, now changed ſides, and followed fortune. By theſe Doria's army was conſiderably encreaſed, and the marquis de Termes proportionably weakened; and to encreaſe his misfortune, the few troops that remained became mutinous for their pay. At laſt Jourdain des Urſins, governor of Fiorenzo, was forced to ſurrender the place towards the latter end of February, A. 1554. Several of the emperor's Neapolitan ſubjects were made priſoners here, and tried, condemned, and executed as rebels.

e After the loſs of Fiorenzo the marquis was forced to croſs the mountains and retire to Ayazzo: his army was too weak and mutinous to keep the field: ſeveral companies abſolutely ſeparated themſelves from the main body of the army; and the marquis was forced to coin baſe money for their uſe, which he promiſed to take in exchange for good as ſoon as ſupplies ſhould arrive from France.

At laſt reinforcements came, and the war was renewed with vigour on both ſides. Doria laid ſiege to Ayazzo, and took Colombino with little reſiſtance. In the year 1557, the Genoeſe were reinforced by a body of two thouſand five hundred Germans, and eight hundred Italians, which rendered them ſo much ſuperior to the enemy, that Jourdain des Urſins, who had the command, could not keep the field: he, therefore, put ſtrong garriſons in thoſe

f towns which yet remained in his hands, and retired with the remainder to the mountains, where he encamped in a very advantageous ſituation.

The following year the republic was alarmed leſt the Turks, who were ravaging the coaſts of Italy, might chance to make a deſcent on Corſica. To prevent this, they negotiated a peace with the Porte, and effected it by means of their liberal preſents to the baſhaw. It contained in ſubſtance, that there ſhould be perpetual peace between the Grand Seignior and the republic; that the Genoeſe ſhould maintain a bailiff at Conſtantinople; in the ſame manner as the Venetians, for the protection of their trade; that they ſhould not ſend more than three ſhips to the Dardanelles; and laſtly, that if any accident ſhould happen to break the harmony ſubſiſting between the Porte and the republic, both ſides ſhould give timely notice of their intention before the commencement of hoſtilities. A. D. 1558.

In

In the year 1559, the emperor Charles the fifth dying, peace was concluded between his ſon Philip the ſecond, king of Spain, and Henry the ſecond of France. By the ſeventeenth article of this treaty, it was ſtipulated, that Henry ſhould reſtore to the Genoeſe, or houſe of St. George, all the places which he held in Corſica; but that the artillery and warlike ſtores ſhould belong to the army, and be drawn off with the troops. a Doria dies. A. D. 1560.

The year following was remarkable by the death of Andrea Doria, prince of Melfi, the greateſt captain of his age, and moſt experienced and ſucceſsful naval officer. Doria was truly the father of Genoa: he reſcued it from the uſurpation of foreign princes, raiſed it to the higheſt pitch of glory, by his wiſdom and military attchievements, and would have died with a character unblemiſhed, had he not polluted his hands with the blood of his countrymen after the laſt inſurrection, and proſecuted the unhappy family of Fieſco with a ſeverity unbecoming a great mind. So happy was Doria in all his enterprizes, ſo wiſe in his ſchemes, ſo intrepid and alert in executing them, that the republic always thought their army invincible under him, and for that reaſon created him perpetual duke and commander in chief of all the republic's fleets and armies. b

In 1563, the Genoeſe ſeized on the marquiſate of Final, the property of the marquis Caretto, which they pretended ought to devolve to them by the crime of felony, of which the marquis had been convicted. Caretto appealed to the emperor Ferdinand; but the republic refuſed to ſtand by his award: however, at the requeſt of his Catholic majeſty, juſtice was done to the marquis.

About this time the war broke out afreſh in Corſica. A treaty had been concluded between the king of Navarre and Philip the ſecond, whereby the former relinquiſhed his pretenſions to Navarre, receiving in exchange from Philip the iſlands of Sardinia and Corſica, the latter of which he promiſed to conquer by the aſſiſtance of Peter Corſo, who had married Vannima d'Ornano, daughter of Francis Ornano, ſurnamed St. Pietro Corſo. Corſo went to Conſtantinople to ſolicit aſſiſtance from the Porte, or at leaſt to engage the Grand Seignior to countenance the enterprize; but the death of the king of Navarre fruſtrated the treaty, and deſtroyed Corſo's ambaſſy. From Conſtantinople he returned to France, where, in a fit of jealouſy, he murdered his wife Vannima. After reſiding ſome time at court, he made a deſcent on Corſica with a handful of men, excited to the enterprize, in all probability, by Mary de Medicis, with whom he had frequent converſations. He ſeized upon Ilna, and formed a ſcheme to ſurpriſe Fiorenzo; but it was diſcovered, and diſconcerted. c d

In the mean time, the Genoeſe fleet arrived at Baſtia, where the admiral found the commiſſary of the iſland, with eleven companies of Corſican foot. Having landed his troops, he marched to Bourg, within ten miles of Baſtia, and there held a council of war, in which it was reſolved to paſs to Caccia. On their arrival in that province, the Genoeſe found that Corſo had advanced to Omeſſa, and that the Corſican auxiliaries, which had joined them on their landing, were filled with traitors, who daily deſerted to the enemy. A ſecond council was called, to deliberate on the means of preventing deſertion, and regulate the operations of the army. The members that compoſed the council were divided in opinion; the Genoeſe officers maintained, that the army ought to march along the valley running along the banks of the Goyro; and the foreign officers inſiſted upon a very different route, in order to avoid engaging in a place where their rear was expoſed to the attacks of the peaſants. Captain Antonio Bolagina Corſo, always faithful to the republic, repreſented to the general, that his rear would certainly be attacked by the peaſants in the valley, while Corſo was charging him in flank and front; but his opinion was diſregarded, and the road through the valley choſen, againſt the dictates of military experience and common ſenſe. e

Every thing fell out as had been predicted. The Corſicans from all hands poured like a torrent on the Genoeſe, with loud ſhouts. A ſtout reſiſtance was made; the Genoeſe under every diſadvantage, fought with unparalleled bravery; but fortune did not ſecond their endeavours; they were broke and defeated with great loſs, numbers taken priſoners, ſtripped to the ſhirt, and driven, like ſheep, naked to the next town [x] (A). f

[x] Barth. Senareg. ap. Murator. A. 24. col. 515. & ſequent.

(A) Among other perſons of diſtinction taken in this battle, was Andrea de Coſta Corſo, an officer in the French ſervice, who had come to marry a young lady of Corſica. The Genoeſe commander offered him a regiment in the army of the republic, which he refuſed, ſaying, he could not with honour receive the pay of two maſters. He ſerved, however, as a volunteer in the engagement, as a ſubject of Genoa, and was taken priſoner. When he was brought before Pietro Corſo, that fierce officer was ſo incenſed at his carrying arms againſt him, that he drew his ſword and would have put Coſta to death, had not his own officers interpoſed, and threatened to deſert him, if he offered any violence to ſo brave and reſpectable a character. Upon this, Coſta was ſent priſoner to a ſtrong tower, where he was ſtrictly guarded (1).

(1) Vid. Hiſt. de Gen. l. 11.

The

a THE directors of St. George having intelligence of the defeat of the army, and revolt of the whole iſland, reſolved to ſend Stephen Doria, whoſe courage and conduct they could rely on, to take charge of the army. Corſo, who was acquainted with the abilities of this general, perceived that he would have a different game to play; he, therefore, enjoined the ſtricteſt diſcipline, and recommended it to all his officers to keep diligent watch on all their poſts.

DORIA embarked for Corſica, with conſiderable reinforcements, and arriving on the iſland, marched directly to the reſidence of the biſhop, where he pitched his camp, and employed five hundred mules in carrying proviſion of flour and biſcuit from the fleet. Corſo approached him with an army of fourteen thouſand men. Next morning, he detached b four thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, to attack the Genoeſe convoy. Carlo Corafolo commanded the convoy; and received the enemy with ſuch undaunted courage, that, after a warm diſpute, they were defeated, leaving ſeven hundred dead upon the field. Upon this Corſo retired, and deeply entrenched himſelf at Campalorè; whither he was purſued by Doria with the vanguard, while the rear of the army was ordered to take a circuit by Olleria, in order to attack the enemy in the rear. Doria began the attack with great fury, and met with a vigorous oppoſition. At laſt, however, on the coming up of the reſt of the army, Corſo, finding himſelf too weak, retreated with precipitation, leaving behind large quantities of wine, bread, and other proviſion. Doria then marched and ſurrounded a lake, in which ſtood an iſland, where Corſo kept his ſtores and proviſion. He likewiſe ſent a detachment to c reſcue Coſta, who was confined at a ſmall diſtance; but a diſeaſe that prevailed among the troops, prevented the ſucceſs of either enterprize. A reigning dyſentery, from drinking new wines, ſwept off prodigious numbers of the Genoeſe, and the malady was encreaſed by the means uſed to put a ſtop to it. The lake water was ordered by the phyſicians to be diluted with the wine for common drink; which, joined to the exceſſive heat, the moiſt vapours exhaling from the lake, and the damp ſituation of the camp, aggravated the diſeaſe to a degree ſcarce inferior in violence to the moſt cruel plague. Fearing to be attacked in this miſerable ſituation, he determined to retreat to Baſtia, though the diſtance was near fifty miles. During this long march, the rear of the Genoeſe was continually harraſſed by the enemy; and all the ſick would have been killed or taken priſoners, but for a generous d reſolution of ſome gentlemen who had ſerved as volunteers in the army, to guard them, and ſuſtain all the attacks of the Corſicans. On the arrival of the army at Baſtia, the diſeaſe encreaſed to ſuch a height, that hundreds periſhed in a day. It attacked the peaſants as well as Genoeſe, the cattle died for want of forage, ſcarcity of proviſion was added to the terrors of an epidemical diſeaſe; and of twenty-two battalions of Italian ſoldiers which Doria had with him, two only were fit for action (B).

DORIA had ſent part of his fleet to Genoa to bring over a reinforcement, and the gallies now returned with eleven battalions of Spaniſh infantry, who were oppoſed in their landing at Porto Vecchia. Upon this Doria advanced with his army while the gallies made ſo terrible a fire with their cannon, that the garriſon ſurrendered at diſcretion, inſtead of pree venting the landing. Proviſion growing ſcarce, Doria embarked the artillery and infantry for Calvi, the cavalry being ordered to go by land in eaſy marches. In this paſſage the fleet was attacked by a violent ſtorm, which deſtroyed ſome ſhips, damaged others, ſwallowed up the whole artillery, and did incredible miſchief that greatly retarded the operations of the campaign. As to the cavalry, they executed their orders, but with great fatigue and danger; after which the troops were put into winter-quarters, and cantoned round Capo Corſo [y].

IN this ſituation Corſica remained till the year 1565, when the directors of St. George determined to exert all their endeavours in cruſhing the rebels. To effect their purpoſe they ſent orders to the generals to deſtroy the crops of the inhabitants, ſet fire to their houſes, f rob them of all ſuſtenance and protection from the inclemency of the climate, and the attacks of famine; and the more eaſily to execute this plan, a ſtrong reinforcement was ſent to Doria. About the middle of March, Doria ſet out at the head of the army, to execute the barbarous inſtructions he had received, which he did moſt effectually, mowing down the corn about a foot long, burning all the villages, and ſpreading terror and deſolation over the whole face of the country. Once the Spaniſh cavalry was attacked by the rebels; but they ſoon repulſed them with great ſlaughter, and regained the camp.

(B) Now it was that Coſta made his eſcape, and, conducted by a ſhepherd, took ſhelter in the caſtle of Souvezara, from whence he wrote to Doria. Such was the regard Doria expreſſed for this noble ſtranger, that he ſent ſeveral gallies to eſcort him ſafely to the camp, where he was received with loud acclamations (1).

HAVING diſpatched his buſineſs, Doria reſolved to attack Corſo, who was entrenched to the teeth, and ſtrongly fortified near Cortè. To gain this place, it was neceſſary the Genoeſe army ſhould croſs the river Goyro, in which they were oppoſed by the enemy. Corſo made ſeveral motions with his infantry, in order to make them appear more numerous: the ſtratagem anſwered in this particular; for report augmented an army of 3000 men to 10,000, which, however, profited him nothing upon the whole. He was attacked, defeated, and almoſt made priſoner, his army cut in pieces, his camp plundered, and a moſt complete victory gained over him. Corſo was ſaved by the generoſity of one of his officers, who lent him his horſe, and ſuffered himſelf to be taken by the Genoeſe, who barbarouſly hanged him on the next tree, with this label, 'Behold the price of generoſity!' a Doria defeats the rebel general.

DORIA then marched to Cortè, which he hoped to take by ſurprize; but in this he was diſappointed, and his army almoſt cut off by an ambuſcade, extremely judiciouſly laid by the enemy. From thence he marched to Toulon, a ſtrong fortreſs, encompaſſed with numerous batteries, well planted with heavy cannon. Pietro Corſo was encamped under the walls of this place; he made ſeveral vigorous attacks on the flanks of the Genoeſe army, but was conſtantly repulſed with the loſs of a number of priſoners. Doria, finding his enterprize againſt Toulon more difficult than he imagined, decamped next morning with ſeeming precipitation, leaving a body of light horſe in ambuſh. The Corſicans, ſeeing the camp abandoned, flew with eagerneſs to pillage it, were attacked by the light horſe, and ſuffered the juſt reward of their temerity and avarice. b

PROVISIONS growing ſcarce the Genoeſe army mutinied, and obliged the general to carry them to the ſea-coaſt, where they were plentifully ſupplied, contrary to the courſe he had ſketched out. In this march they paſſed through ſeveral ambuſcades, laid by the enemy in narrow defiles, where only one horſeman could go a-breaſt; but ſuch was Doria's circumſpection that he prevented all bad conſequences. After harraſſing and laying waſte almoſt the whole iſland, he returned to Cortè, which he beſieged by order of the ſenate: his approaches were made with ſuch diligence, that a conſiderable breach was made in the wall on the fourth day, orders given to ſtorm it, and the garriſon forced to ſurrender at diſcretion. c

WHILE the Genoeſe general was employed in the ſiege of Cortè, Pietro Corſo encamped at a paſs through which Doria muſt paſs near Omeſſa. His army was compoſed of nine thouſand muſqueteers, three thouſand picquets, all intrenched under the cannon of the town. He had every advantage over Doria, and victory in all appearance was in his hands; but the intelligence of a cordelier, whom Pietro had taken priſoner, and was now eſcaped to the Genoeſe army, ſaved Doria. His own prudence, indeed, and the excellent uſe to which he applied the cordelier's intelligence, not only extricated the army, but very near reduced Corſo to the ſame difficulties he had planned for the enemy. In a word, the campaign ended in marches and counter-marches, in which both generals diſtinguiſhed their abilities, but ſtruck no blow that was deciſive. The army being ſent into winter-quarters, Doria ſet out for Genoa, to give an account of the ſucceſs of their arms to the directors of St. George; and Corſo took this opportunity, of going to Marſeilles, where he levied a great number of recruits with French money. d

A. D. 1566. IN the beginning of the ſpring, Pietro Corſo found himſelf at the head of a formidable army; and, thinking it was incumbent on him to ſeize the opportunity, he marched to Balagna, where he deſtroyed a magazine belonging to the Genoeſe army. Nothing more of conſequence, however, paſſed during the campaign, which was employed juſt as the preceding, in marches, counter-marches, and ſkirmiſhes. The following incident deſerves to be recorded: While the cordelier, who had furniſhed Doria the laſt year with the important intelligence we mentioned, was priſoner with Corſo, that rebel had often put him to the queſtion, and was preparing the moſt cruel death for him, juſt as he fortunately found means to eſcape. From that time he ſought the means of revenging himſelf on the rebel; and, as nothing is impracticable to a man who devotes his time and attention to any particular purſuit, the cordelier brought matters to this iſſue: he firſt gained over an old ſervant of Corſo's, greatly truſted by his maſter, in whoſe family he had reſided for thirty years. He ſlept conſtantly at his maſter's chamber-door, and Pietro feared no alarm while this faithful dragon was upon the watch. The cordelier made himſelf maſter of the affections of this fellow, ſettled a plan with him for betraying Corſo and the whole army. An ambuſcade was deſigned, which would draw Corſo to an action, in the heat of which the inſidious Vitello (for that was the ſervant's name) engaged to ſhoot his maſter. Fornari, the Genoeſe general, was appriſed by the cordelier of this project, and he was baſe enough to ſecond it with the neceſſary forces. Corſo fell into the ambuſcade, while he was making aſtoniſhing efforts to extricate himſelf, and giving admirable proofs of his intrepidity, he was ſhot in the ſhoulder by the baſe Vitello. The wound brought him immediately to the ground, but not till he had firſt diſcovered the hand that gave the blow: upon this he upbraided e f g a braided Vitello, and cried out to his ſon, about ſeventeen years of age, 'Fly, my ſon, we 'are betrayed;' but the ſon ſtaying to reſcue his father, was ſurrounded by a number of horſemen, the relations of his mother, who ſought to revenge her death by the blood of Corſo. He fought violently againſt his own uncle and couſins, and at laſt fell by their hands near the body of his father [z].

AFTER the death of Pietro Corſo the rebels loſt heart. Finding themſelves hard preſſed by the Genoeſe, they offered the ſovereignty of the iſland to the grand duke of Tuſcany; but this wiſe prince, who was a lover of peace, rejected the propoſal, and acquainted the ſenate of Genoa of what was intended. The ſenate gave notice of it to their general in Corſica, that he might take his meaſures accordingly. The weakneſs of the rebels was attended
b with one bad conſequence to the Genoeſe: the ſoldiers, imagining they had no enemies to combat, abandoned their poſts for want of pay, and diſperſed themſelves in little corps round the country. Another circumſtance augmented the confuſion of the army, which, as it was a little extraordinary, deſerves to be particularly related. Pietro Andrea de la Coſta, a Genoeſe captain being ſent with a detachment to reconnoitre a party of the rebels in the neighbourhood of Omeſſa, met with captain Paul Baptiſta, an old military acquaintance. Baptiſta told him, that ſince the defeat at Cavia he had quitted the Genoeſe ſervice for that of Corſo, where preferment was more rapid; upon which Coſta drew his piſtol, and ſhot him as a traitor to his country, from ſordid views, and not from principle or miſtaken opinion. The other rebels hearing the report of the piſtol were alarmed, by which means the inten-
c tion of examining their ſtrength and ſituation was fruſtrated. On his return, this action being related to general Fornari, he ſeverely reprehended Coſta, and would have ſuperſeded him, had not the other officers and the ſoldiers with one voice ſtood up in his defence. Coſta, however, found that the general embraced every opportunity of perſecuting him; he, therefore, quitted his corps, ſet out for Genoa, laid his complaints in perſon before the ſenate, and was redreſſed in a manner extremely honourable, being aſſigned a penſion till the campaign was ended, when it was propoſed to give him the command of the army in Fonari's room.

ABOUT this time Corſica was torn by two factions, diſtinguiſhed by the appellations Black and Red. The former had found means to engage Fornari in their party, and perſuade him to drive the oppoſite faction out of the iſland. A plan was propoſed, to which the general
d acceded, though the Red faction, deemed more loyal, was better beloved by the republic. Upon more mature deliberation the general entertained ſome ſcruples about entering on a buſineſs of ſuch importance, without the authority of his conſtituents: he wrote, therefore, for the opinion of the directors of St. George, who referred the whole to his diſcretion. Being now at liberty to purſue his own inclinations, he diſpoſed every thing for the execution of his deſign. His firſt ſtep was to engage the inhabitants of the mountains to aſſiſt in retaking a fortreſs, which the Reds had taken ſome little time before from the Blacks: this was attempted and proved abortive, captain Camillo, who commanded the expedition, having almoſt fallen into the enemy's hands. Irritated at this diſappointment, the Blacks bee gan a perſecution againſt ſome priſoners confined in Fiorenzo ſince the laſt engagement with Corſo, who had embraced the Red faction. Several of them they ſtrangled with the general's permiſſion; and in parttcular one captain Jacques, of a noble family, whom they firſt put to death in priſon, and then expoſed for ſeveral days to public view.

The Corſicans divided into two factions. A. D. 1567.

REPRISALS were made by the Reds: Lucio, who commanded in the fort, on which Camillo had made an unſucceſsful attempt, was ſummoned a ſecond time by the general to ſurrender it; but this he refuſed to the Blacks, though he ſaid he would willingly put it into the hands of a Genoeſe garriſon. Fornari, having no ſuſpicion of his ſincerity, ſent an officer with fifty men, who were immediately admitted, then ſurrounded, ſtripped, and thrown in priſon, but releaſed about a month after, and ſent back. Nothing, indeed, could be more rancorous than the hatred theſe two factions bore to each other.
f Fornari ſent Chriſtopher de Negro with a ſtrong detachment and two pieces of cannon to lay ſiege to the fort; an employment that naturally devolved upon him, as he commanded the party impriſoned, and uſed with ſo much ſeverity. The enterprize, however, failed, and it was thought through deſign, Negro bearing a grudge to the general, which ſuppreſſed the dictates of revenge upon the enemy. Happily, however, all theſe diviſions terminated with Fornari's employment: he was now recalled, and peace in a manner ſucceeded his departure.

WHILE matters went on thus in Corſica, Genoa was not altogether in tranquility. John Baptiſto Lercaro, the duke, having finiſhed the two years of his office, was intriguing to have himſelf made perpetual procurator; a favour that was poſitively refuſed, on account of his being ſtrongly attached to Spain. Stephen Prejon, his ſon, imagining that his father's g diſappointment aroſe from the influence of Lucca Spinola, vowed revenge. Aſſiſted by a band of deſperate aſſaſſins, he attacked that nobleman in the ſtreet, killed Pinelli, one of the cenſors, ſuppoſed likewiſe to have oppoſed Lercaro, and dangerouſly wounded Spinola. One of the assassins betrayed Prejon, confessed the fact, and gave so distinct an evidence, that young Prejon Lercaro was arrested, imprisoned, tried, condemned, and beheaded, notwithstanding strong interest was made by the Spanish admiral, Garcias de Toledo, to have his life saved [a]. a

When Fornari was recalled, the directors of St. George appointed George Doria to the command of the army in Corsica, and Costa for his lieutenant. The moderation and prudence of these generals soon put an end to the rebellion, and healed all the divisions among the Corsicans themselves. All party-distinctions were carefully abolished; forts built in proper places, both to keep the nobles in awe, and secure the coasts against the incursions of the Turks. After which Doria returned about the end of the year to Genoa, having done more in a few months for the service of his country than his predecessor in as many years.

Previous to the civil war we are about to relate, it may be necessary that we give the reader a short view of the changes wrought in the government at that time when Andrea Doria rescued it out of the hands of foreigners, and bestowed liberty with all its blessings on his country. It was, indeed, put under the protection of the emperor, who created Doria prince of Melfi; but under such restrictions that this tutelage drew nothing off from the public freedom. b

DORIA having taken all possible precaution, with respect to the external security of the republic, put the reins of government into the hands of twelve reformers, chosen from the old and new nobility. The first regulation made by these reformers was, that all those names should be abolished which kept up distinctions, and preserved the memory of their civil discords; that Guelfs and Gibelines, Whites, Blacks, and Reds, should be no more; that the nobility and people should be indifferently admitted into public employments, provided they possessed the qualifications requisite for holding such an office. They ordained that a duke and eight counsellors should be chosen; that no affair of importance should be determined or passed into an act the same day it was proposed; that the duke, the governor, and procurators, have power to make what changes they thought necessary in the ancient ordonnances, and frame new laws, provided they have no tendency to enlarge or extend their own authority. The more firmly to establish a perfect harmony among the people, it was resolved to admit, on the first day of every year, ten citizens into the number of the ancient nobility; and to remove all cause of contention, it was ordained that all the new nobility should incorporate themselves with the ancient, adding to their own proper names that of the ancient family in which they ranked themselves. Some alterations likewise were made with respect to the qualifications of a senator. In a word, all the institutions of the reformers were directed to the noblest ends, the establishing peace, freedom, and concord. They chose Aubert Lazari duke; and their election was confirmed by the unanimous voice of the people. In this they regarded his wisdom more than family, for he was not of patrician rank. The governors and procurators were created at the same time, some from ancient, others from new-raised families, with no other distinction than what their merit occasioned. c d

The Genoese, to shew their sense of the obligations they owed Andrea Doria, reduced the five syndics, or censors, to one, conferring the office solely upon him: they likewise made the office perpetual, and exempted him and his posterity from all taxes, and public impositions. In consequence of these happy alterations, an entire liberty of voting, either verbally, or by ballot, was introduced. However, as no human institution is void of imperfection, or no government so wise as not to be weakened by time, the ancient nobility began to murmur, that more citizens and artificers were placed in public employments than of their body; and that no equality was observed in the election of a duke, although this had particularly been enjoined in the law made by the reformers, with respect to elections. This abuse, they said arose from the perversion of the constitution; that of a grand council composed of four hundred nobility, scarce a third were ancient families; hence it was, that the young nobility carried all before them; a circumstance which bred dissention and jealousy among the different families. They alleged, that notwithstanding the qualification-law, numbers had crept into the senate without the requisite qualifications. They urged besides, that admitting into the high council of the nation persons of low birth, fortune, and education, was sinking the dignity of a senator, making illiterate ignorant persons govern the helm of state, and preferring those to offices of trust and profit, whom nature, had never intended for higher stations than that of common mechanics. It is not surprising indeed the republic of Genoa should undergo such a variety of revolutions, when the mob became legislators. Experience has constantly shewn, that democratical governments have been more subject to violent alterations; and that the people who have attempted to raise themselves above the nobility, became in time the slaves of the nation. Athens, Lacedemon, Pisa, Sienna, and Milan, all lost their liberty in this manner [b]. e f a TOWARD the close of the year 1571, Jeannetin Lommelin was elected duke, according to the usual formalities. Lommelin, shutting his ears to all the public complaints of the abuse of power, which had lately been loudly uttered both by the old and young nobility, began a violent persecution against Matteo Senarega, grand chancellor and first secretary of the republic, a man illustrious by his birth, his eloquence, and his erudition, upon whom the senate rested the most important affairs with a confidence never before reposed in any of the new nobility. Jealousy and private resentment alone actuated the duke's conduct, which he nevertheless covered with the sacred veil of justice. He resented that Senarega alone should sign the state dispatches, and proposed, that they should henceforward be counter-signed by himself and two senators. Had he taken this precaution from generous b views, and for the public good, the duke would have merited praise; but it was more apparent that he more regarded mortifying Senarega, than advancing the interest of his country. The severity with which the order was executed sufficiently discovered the motives.

As the enmity between these two magistrates daily encreased, it was believed with some shew of reason that Senarega excited the young nobility against the old. The latter had lately gained the ascendant in the management of affairs, and he had the boldness to set the former upon recovering their influence. The memorials requiring that the magistrates should be created, some by lot, and some by votes, were supposed to be drawn up by him, for this reason, that they were elegant, eloquent, and nervous. The utility of the law was in itself obvious; and it was no difficult matter for Senarega, c so perfectly versed in the nature of the constitution, so skilled in politics, and so deeply learned, to support it with arguments which seemed irrefragable, and engage the minds of the people to a revolt should it be disputed.

ON the following year, an accident occurred which encreased the mutual animosity of the parties. Balthazar Rottalé, adopted into the Palavicini family, was arrested in Spain for debt, and he pleaded his release, in consequence of a law in that kingdom, by which no constraint can be laid on the person of a nobleman. His creditors denied him the benefit of this law, because they disputed his title; upon which the senate of Genoa sent a certificate, testifying that Francis Rottalé, father of the prisoner had always lived with the splendor of a nobleman, had been reputed such at Genoa, and was a cadet of the Palavi-
d cini family: but some of the ancient nobility, to whom Rottalé owed money, procured a clause to be inserted in that certificate, whereby it appeared that he had not entered into the Palavicini family till the year 1528. The friends of Rottalé extremely lamented this obstacle to his release, and had address enough to make his particular affair the cause of the whole body of young nobility, who found their privileges affected in the distinction. The dispute was carried before the senate, argued with great warmth, but no resolution formed. Origin of the revolution A. D. 1572.

To these causes of dissention we may add another, which had considerable weight. In the year 1528, the reformers had ordained that the revenues of the house of St. George should be applied to portioning the daughters of ancient noble families, and to the other
e necessities of the old nobility. Some of these families, in order to exclude the new nobility, and engross the whole benefits to their own body, made out their genealogy, lopping off from the original stem all the new engrafted branches. The Lommelin family in particular ordered their genealogical tree, pruned in this manner, to be registered among the public archives, obtaining for this purpose a decree of the senate, in spite of all the opposition made by the new nobility. Upon this occasion it was said, 'That this tree would one 'day bear extremely bitter fruit, destructive of public tranquility and poisonous of liberty.'

THIS affair of Lommelin's made more disturbance than all the rest: their passions were already raised high, and wanted only this addition to flame out with violence. Interest now was immediately affected, whereas before nothing more than certain privileges and f rank were the objects of contention. Some of the more moderate persons, who had nothing in view but the good of the community, proposed that a committee should be chosen of men of probity and wisdom, who could not be suspected of prejudice or bias, to determine the affair, and make such new regulations as they saw necessary. But this expedient was opposed by the young nobility, who believed that if the committee was equally chosen out of both parties, they would lose their cause.

A FRESH alarm was likewise given by the arrival of certain Spanish gallies at Savona, which they alledged the ancient nobility had invited to lay an undue restraint on the public resolutions. Although these gallies made but a short stay, yet the new nobility made a pretext of this circumstance to declare, that unless their grievances were soon redressed, they
g would immediately seek more effectual means for defending their rights. John Andrea Doria, at that time in Sicily, knowing that the civil divisions would encrease with the ensuing election of magistrates, posted back to Genoa, in hopes of opposing by his influence the heats and animosities of the state; but all his endeavours were ineffectual. Soon after, Grimaldi Durazzo, a man beloved by the whole city for his moderation, affability, and social virtues, was elected duke, after a series of intrigues, plots, and cabals, on both sides. a

A. D. 1573. TOWARDS the beginning of the following year, his catholic majesty sent Idiaquez to Genoa, to endeavour, by his advice, eloquence, and address, to heal the civil divisions, which threatened the entire ruin of the republic. He spoke with such irresistible elocution in the senate, that his harangue seemed to make a sensible impression; but the effects were soon effaced by an incident which occasioned a renewal of the disputes. During the election, the old magistrates assembled a body of their vassals for the protection of their persons. This the new magistrates construed into an attempt on them; but as the peasant militia was made constitutional after the election, the affair passed without giving any farther disturbance, and the city enjoyed a tolerable degree of tranquility for the remainder of the year. b

The designs of the old and new nobility. IN 1574, the civil divisions again broke out from a variety of circumstances: both parties endeavoured to gain an ascendant in the administration, to raise themselves on the ruin of their competitors, and destroy that equipoise of government, which alone could preserve harmony and freedom. The young nobility attempted to strengthen their own body by incorporating in the ancient families several citizens who deserved well of the state. They petitioned the senate to this purpose, and received a harsh refusal. They were now connected with the people by the tie of interest, and would not lose so fair an opportunity of strengthening their faction: in fact, they entered into the strictest alliances, and the cause of the young nobility now became the cause of the whole body of subjects in the Genoese dominions. Cabals were formed for carrying their point, and civil discords rose now to a higher pitch than ever. c

The city divided into three factions. SOME of the more thinking of the young nobility proposed an accommodation: a negotiation for this purpose was set on foot; but the people resenting it, they were forced to break it off for fear of losing their interest. Insensibly, however, this proposition divided the republic into three factions, each of which had a distinct name, according to the quarter of the city they inhabited. A second time the incorporation of the people with the old nobility was proposed to the senate; but rejected with contempt, which augmented their animosity, and produced the closest harmony between the young nobility and the people. Sebastian Cerone, and Bartholemy Montobi, names scarce known in Genoa, were the leaders of the popular faction. They were patronized by the young nobility, who found their characters well suited to their purposes. Both had a sort of rough fluent eloquence, excellently adapted to influence a mob, and direct those brutal minds abandoned to their conduct. In the end, they raised seditions, and were the immediate instruments of the civil war that ensued. They flattered the people into hopes of a more indulgent form of government, and thus rendered them more eager and ardent in the pursuit of whatever they prompted. They promised to diminish the taxes as soon as they could accomplish their scheme of government; that the price of labour should be raised, provisions sold more reasonable, justice distributed more equally, and the much wished for incorporation effected. They likewise wrought on the credulous disposition of the populace, by joining motives of fear to hope, insinuating, that the ancient nobility had formed a design, in conjunction with Spain, to reduce the people to the most shameful and abject servitude. d e

FILLED with imaginary fears and expectations, the people held assemblies to deliberate on the means for attaining the one, and avoiding the other. Seditious harangues were pronounced in every quarter; and the streets, which used to be the scenes of industry, were now converted into theatres of war, and occupied by armed soldiers. The people thought, spoke, and acted without controul; the most horrid crimes were committed with impunity. The magistrates were insulted, the nobility murdered, and every species of disorder reigned, without a tribunal that presumed to take cognizance of such trespasses against society and government. Every post in the city was filled with guards, shops were shut up, and the gates, arsenal, and granaries, seized by the mutineers. Nay, they even had the insolence to enter the senate-house with an armed force, and renew their demands, with menaces in case of refusal. In a word, all was leading to universal confusion and anarchy, if Senarega, seeing that matters were pushed too far, had not taken compassion on his country, and determined to disabuse the people. He assembled the populace, and pathetically represented to them the miseries their turbulence would bring upon the republic, and the consequences of that seditious humour, which had ruined the most flourishing and opulent commonwealths. He demonstrated to them the little benefit they could expect from the promised changes in the constitution; and the better to adapt his reasoning to their capacities, he repeated that celebrated fable of the belly and the members. In fine, he convinced them, that unanimity was absolutely necessary to ths existence of government; and that a republic could flourish only when the direction of affairs was left to those who, by birth, by nature, f g a by education, and habit, were qualified for this important truſt, and not to the giddy, headſtrong, and diſcordant multitude.

SENAREGA's harangue had the deſired effect: the people were ſatisfied of the truth of his arguments; but he no ſooner quitted the aſſembly than paſſion took place of reaſon, the ſeditious uſurped their power, and every trace of this patriot's harangue was erazed out of their memory [c].

The indolence of the ancient nobility.

• It was amazing to ſee how little the ancient nobility exerted themſelves to ſtem the torrent of abuſe: they contented themſelves with guarding their houſes againſt being pillaged, and praying the ſenate to apply ſome remedy to the public calamity. Several aſſemblies, indeed, met to deliberate on this ſubject, ſome adviſing force, and others perſuaſion, to re-
b duce the people to obedience; but there appeared not that vigour of action or debate which might be expected from the greatneſs of the danger. After ſeveral conſultations nothing more was determined, than that the guards of the city gates ſhould be doubled, to prevent ſtrangers from entering, and that all perſons ſhould be prohibited from carrying arms in the night.

STILL the new nobility urged their demands, became very importunate, and talked of a new form of government in the moſt public manner. The ſumptuary law was the great point contended againſt, which they ſaid was introduced for the general advantage of the people, and failing in that end ought to be annulled for the ſame reaſon. The ancient nobility offered to ſubmit their differences to the deciſion of the pope and king of Spain, or any two foreign princes, unbiaſſed with their prejudices, and unintereſted in their parties;
c but this the others refuſed, inſiſting upon a general council, where they hoped to carry their point by dint of ſuperior numbers. The old nobility implored the protection of John Andrea Doria; and requeſted that as he inherited his uncle's eſtate, ſo he would diſtinguiſh the ſame patriot ſpirit, and exert the ſame diligence and influence in the ſervice of his country. Upon this Doria aſſembled the mechanics and citizens, whom he entreated not to enliſt in any party, but reſt ſatisfied in guarding the city, and ſuppreſſing all riots and ſeditions. He repreſented to them the obligations themſelves and anceſtors owed the ancient nobility: he reminded them that his uncle Doria had reſtored liberty to their country; had, upon different occaſions, defended Corſica againſt the attacks of the French and Turks; and had beautified and adorned the city with a number of public edifices and endowments.

d AT firſt Doria's harangue made ſuch an impreſſion, that the mob promiſed to do whatever he deſired; but the memory of obligations makes only a ſlight impreſſion on the minds of the vulgar: they ſoon forgot what they owed to the Doria family; they altered their ſentiments, and, with a fickleneſs natural to the multitude, returned to their former ſeditious humour. The tumult, indeed, roſe ſo high, that the ancient nobility ſhut themſelves up in their houſes, which they guarded with great numbers of peaſants drawn from their eſtates in the country.

IN this ſituation of affairs the ſenate demurred: they feared incurring the diſpleaſure of the young nobility by determining againſt them, and to grant their demands would occaſion a revolution deſtructive of public liberty: but though numbers were on the ſide of the peo-
e ple, the capacity and experience of ſome of the ancient nobility gained them great advantages. At laſt Idiaquez, the Spaniſh miniſter, wrought on the minds of the leading perſons in both factions ſo effectually, that a truce for three months was agreed on. His apparent intention was to perſuade the people, during this receſs, to lay down their arms; but the perſons he employed to influence the people, ſecretly excited them to revolt. In the mean time, the ancient nobility, to ſhew their moderation and regard to their word, laid down their arms, permitted all foreigners to paſs and repaſs as uſual, and forbid their tenants the cuſtomary office of guarding their houſes, and protecting their perſons, which had been conſtantly done ſince the late diſturbances. The ambaſſador produced in the ſenate the treaty for a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities, and engaged the principal perſons on both ſides to ſign it;
f and now the people, ſeeing the nobility diſarmed, would not loſe ſo fair an occaſion of reſtabliſhing themſelves, or rather of cruſhing their opponents. In an inſtant every place was filled with ſoldiers, the ſtreets barricadoed, the Germans poſted on the mole to guard the artillery, driven away by the people, and the cannon pointed againſt the ducal palace. On the other hand, the German and Italian officers, in the republic's pay, ranged themſelves in order of battle to oppoſe the populace, and defend public liberty. Immediately the ſenate met to apply remedies to thoſe wounds which muſt occaſion the violent death of the community. The new nobility pretended to be greatly embarraſſed, though they were at the bottom of the inſurrection, and alledged that the demands of the populace muſt be granted to appeaſe them; the old nobility were for checking their fury by vigorous meaſures, and g warm altercations reſulted. The one urged that the ducal palace would be demoliſhed, the ſenate murdered, and the city laid in aſhes, ſhould any oppoſition be made; and the others

no leſs ſtrenuouſly affirmed, that anarchy and confuſion muſt reſult from giving way to the multitude. a

In the midſt of theſe diſputes John Baptiſta Lercari, a ſenator highly eſteemed for his incorruptible integrity, public ſpirit, and perſuaſive eloquence, roſe up and addreſſed himſelf with great warmth to the ringleaders of the ſedition, whom he obſerved ſtanding before him. He ſpoke in pathetic terms of the blind ignorance, the paſſion, and the unjuſtifiable deſigns of thoſe, who, to ſerve the purpoſes of ambition, would lay their country in ruins, trample upon ſociety, and lay freedom expiring on the ground, for the villainous honour of heading a faction, and being the firſt men in a community of ſlaves. He demonſtrated that their civil diviſions would certainly lead to that diſmal cataſtrophe; that nothing could be more raſh than to attempt reformations in government, while the ſcourge of ſervitude hung over their heads, and powerful foreign monarchs watched the occaſion for ſwallowing up their liberty, ſo lately and providentially recovered; and he concluded with exhorting the ſenate to ſet the menaces of the rabble at defiance, puniſh the ringleaders, and, by a vigorous exertion of their power and dignity, reſcue their country from thoſe evils with which it was menaced. b

The abettors of the popular faction and the new nobility could no longer ſupport this diſcourſe; they interrupted Lercari, and affirmed that it was no time to aſſert the dignity of the ſenate, when the people appeared with diſplayed ſtandards before the ducal palace, and were in poſſeſſion of all the gates, the artillery, arſenals, and granaries. Theſe were circumſtances, they ſaid, when it was glorious to yield; and it would be the height of folly to expoſe themſelves to certain death, from a vain notion of glory, which could only be entertained by wrongheaded knights-errant and adventurers, tired of a life in which they were deſpiſed. Fear operated more powerfully than glory on the minds of the ſenators; they agreed to the abolition of the law, in ſpite of the oppoſition made by Lercari, Catenec, and Grimaldi, who proteſted againſt their proceedings, and declared they would ſubmit to the moſt cruel indignities rather than aſſent to a reſolution ſo diſhonourable. c

Demands made by the people.

Soon after the people, perceiving they had not reaped the promiſed advantages from the revocation of this law, and that they were made the tools of the young nobility, the mere dupes of their ambition, demanded that five hundred of their number might be admitted into the ſenate; that the duties on wine retailed in ſmall quantities might be aboliſhed, the price of labour raiſed, and an amneſty granted to all thoſe who had taken up arms in the late commotions. At that time the ſenate was in a diſpoſition to refuſe nothing: fear had rendered them compliant; they choſe to aſſent without heſitation to what they knew could be extorted by force, and acquieſced in all that was demanded. Lercari, however, bravely ſtood out, declaring to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, before his grand vicar and ſecretary Senarega, "That he was aſhamed of living in a community, where inſolence and obſtinacy triumphed "over reaſon and juſtice [d]." d

The new nobility had procured the ſatisfaction they required, and confirmed their own power in this victory; yet did they not reſt ſatisfied. What they uſurped by the ſtrong hand, they apprehended might be loſt, as ſoon as an opportunity offered for the ancient nobility to exert themſelves in recovering their dignity. To prevent the evils they dreaded, a preſident and commiſſary were diſpatched to the valley of Poſeveri, to raiſe the inhabitants and rouſe them to a ſenſe of the danger which might reſult from permitting troops from Lombardy to enter Genoa; a miſchief to be warded off only by ſecuring the paſſes. On the other ſide, the Spaniſh ambaſſador held frequent conſultations with the ancient nobility, on the means of opening the paſſes. To accompliſh their ſeveral ends, each entered on the moſt vigorous meaſures. The ancient nobility, in conjunction with Idiaquez, had got together ſo formidable a force as made their enemies tremble, yet were not themſelves eaſed of their fears. It was dangerous for them to ſtir out of their houſes; and they were obliged to aſſemble in the moſt private manner in Genoa, for fear of being ſacrificed to popular reſentment. Divers expedients were propoſed, and ſome adviſed to ſeize upon Savona, which others objected to as a meaſure that would give umbrage to the court of Madrid. e

The ancient nobility retire out of the city.

Many were of opinion, that as no ſecurity of their lives could be depended on in the city, they ought to forſake an ungrateful people, and baniſh rather than embroil themſelves in a civil war. This proved their determination, and ſeveral of the oldeſt families abſconded before next day. By this precipitate retreat, the young nobility gained all the advantage they could deſire: the trumpet was ſounded, and thoſe perſons cited to attend the aſſembly who it was well known had abſented themſelves. Upon their not appearing, they were formally depoſed from their offices and others of inferior birth ſubſtituted in their places [e]. f

The voluntary receſs of ſome of the ancient nobility, gave great uneaſineſs to thoſe moderate perſons who laboured to effect a reconciliation: they ſent to all thoſe who ſtill re- g a mained intreating them not to depart. The new nobility too, apprehenſive that if they once got into the country it would be difficult to deſtroy them. joined their intreaties, promiſing to diſarm the people, to double the guards, and terminate matters amicably. It was true, that experience had taught the ancient nobility that little confidence was to be placed in ſuch ſoothing promiſes; however, not knowing how to remedy themſelves, they determined to diſſemble. Next day they appeared in public, and ordered a ſolemn maſs to be celebrated, at which the whole body aſſiſted. Finding no oppoſition, the new nobility proceeded to re-eſtabliſh the law of 1528, whereby certain citizens were incorporated with the body of nobility, and to elect their magiſtrates according to the diſpoſition made that year. The more effectually to deſtroy their opponents, they enacted, that whoever ſhould pre-b ſume to cenſure the preſent form of government, ſhould be puniſhed as a diſturber of the peace; which ordonnance they got ratified by the ſenate.

NEXT they levied troops, introduced a quantity of arms into the city, fortified the frontiers, and took the moſt effectual ſteps to prevent foreign princes making attacks on their liberties, not doubting but their enemies would throw themſelves into the arms of France or Spain. The young nobility levy forces.

ABOUT this time the arrival of the pope's nuncio gave the alarm. The young nobility apprenended that he formed deſigns againſt them; to ſecure themſelves from which, they obliged the people to ſwear, at a public maſs he celebrated, that they would not ſuffer the leaſt alteration in the preſent government. The nuncio was highly offended at their proc ſtituting a place, deſtined for the worſhip of the Supreme Being, to prophane purpoſes; and Genoa was threatened with the laſh of the holy ſee juſt as the pope died.

THE new nobility, who now wholly compoſed the ſenate, apprehending that Gregory the thirteenth would reſent their impiety, ſent Senarega in quality of ambaſſador extraordinary to Rome, to juſtify what they had done, and implore his holineſs to continue his protection to the republic; to heal their diviſions, and order both parties to lay down their arms; to prevent the weaker from calling to their aſſiſtance the Hugonets of France, by which the purity of their religion would be deſtroyed. Senarega executed his commiſſion with great addreſs. He obtained all the pope could grant, that was a legate, whom he ſent to Genoa to exert the influence of the holy ſee (C). In conſequence of the legate's endeavours, ſeveral
d aſſemblies were held to deliberate on the means of reconciliation; but the ancient nobility not chuſing to run the hazard of attending at theſe, nothing could be ſettled; and the breach grew wider on occaſion of the enſuing election for magiſtrates of the towns dependent on Genoa, ſome propoſing to follow the old law, and others that of 1528. The event of this diſpute was, that the people determined to abandon the new nobility, and recal the old, to prevent a deſign they formed of ſeizing on Savona, and make ſtill greater alterations in the government by enlarging their own power. To prevent a meaſure of ſuch important conſequence to them, the new nobility publiſhed a report, that ſeveral perſons were gone in ſearch of the legate, to demand alterations in the government, inconſiſtent with lie berty. A report of this nature ſoon wrought on the minds of the populace. They abandoned their deſign, reconciled themſelves to the new nobility; and thus the old nobles, who ventured to return on their invitation, were a ſecond time forced to quit the city.

NOTHING now remained for the ancient nobility but to redreſs themſelves by force. They levied troops with great application; news of which coming to the legate at Genoa, he ſent his ſecretary to Aqui, in Final, where the head-quarters were fixed, to oblige the commiſſioners to diſband the troops, and enter upon a negotiation preliminary to a thorough reconciliation. The ſecretary acquitted himſelf ſo well, that he prevailed on Lercari and Stephen Mario to return to Genoa, to negociate matters with the legate in perſon and the Spaniſh ambaſſador. Their propoſitions to the legate and Spaniſh miniſter appeared ſo equit-
f able, that the new nobility, fearing they would engage them on their ſide, excited the people to inſult Lercari, and oblige him once more to retire from Genoa. Upon this it was plain the ancient nobility had nothing to expect but what they carried by dint of arms; they prepared therefore with diligence for war, and offered the command of their troops by ſea and land to Doria, which he refuſed, under pretence of his not being able to accept it without the conſent of his catholic majeſty, in whoſe ſervice he was. The ancient nobility levy troops.

ALTHOUGH the new nobility had paſſed a decree, whereby three hundred of the commons were to be incorporated with them, yet their great aim was to keep the whole political machine to themſelves. Both factions now appealed to different courts. Philip the ſecond in particular ſeemed to ſide with the ancient nobles; and the ſenate diſobliged Don John of Auſtria, whom they refuſed to receive in the harbour with his whole fleet, although they aſſured him of all manner of refreſhments and civilities, if he would come attended with four four gallies only. On this occaſion it was that Doria, in preſence of count Egmont, gover a nor of Milan, ſaid, that the ancient nobility were reſolved to uſe force to obtain their rights, ſhould the ſenate continue to refuſe them in an amicable manner. He then aſked leave of Don John to command their forces, and to ſerve his friends and countrymen; but Don John did not chuſe to diſcharge him from the Spaniſh ſervices before he conſulted the court.

ABOUT this time an ambaſſy extraordinary from the emperor arrived in Genoa. Both factions made their complaints; and were aſſured, that his Imperial majeſty would ſcrupulouſly examine into the diſpute, and give his protection to that party which had equity on its ſide. The ſenate became jealous of this commiſſion; however, that they might not appear refractory and averſe to all terms of reconciliation, they appointed two of their number to treat with the foreign miniſters; at the ſame time, taking meaſures for filling the b treaſury, levying troops, and putting themſelves in a ſtate of defence, to prepare againſt the worſt. His Imperial majeſty, in appearance, held the balance equal; he gave an audience to Spinola, in behalf of the ancient nobility, in ſuch a manner as to give no umbrage to the ſenate, and at the ſame time wrote to the new nobility, adviſing them to receive ſuch terms of accommodation as his miniſters ſhould think reaſonable, without offending the ancient nobility.

THESE latter had ſeveral meetings, without coming to any certain reſolution. Various propoſitions were made, and all of them liable to objections. Some were for an accommodation upon any conditions; while others were for aſſerting their rights at all events. Doria was of the party that expreſſed the greateſt zeal for maintaining the dignity of the peerage; c and he ſpoke with ſuch eloquence as animated the moſt timid, and warmed the moſt indifferent and phlegmatic breaſt. On the other hand, their opponents raiſed ſome companies of German foot, for the defence of the city. Reineri would have prevented their entering Genoa; but the Imperial commiſſioners required they ſhould have a free paſſage.

WHILE both ſides prepared for war, the fleet on the coaſt of Naples, under Don John of Auſtria, occaſioned great ſpeculation. As he had troops quartered between Milan and Naples, it was apprehended that his ſecret intention was to reſtore the ancient nobility. This rumour gained ſtrength when it was known the fleet ſteered towards Genoa. The people took the alarm, and in leſs than an hour thirty thouſand men were under arms. However, their fears were ſoon diſſipated by Don John's return to Naples. d

ALL Italy dreaded the conſequence of the civil diviſions in Genoa, believing that the weaker party would apply for foreign aſſiſtance, and render Italy the ſcene of freſh wars. Some meaſures taken by Henry the third of France encreaſed their fears; and their ſuſpicions were almoſt confirmed by the march of the Spaniſh forces to the frontiers of the Genoeſe territories. Immediately the ſenate appointed two commiſſioners to preſide over the defence of the city, and ſent reinforcements to the garriſons of Savona and Novi. However, amidſt all their apprehenſions, they received ſome comfort from Don John's releaſing two of their ſhips, which he had long detained. This, however, made them neglect nothing that could contribute to their defence, to prevent their publiſhing a decree, ſetting forth, that as the voluntary receſs of the ancient nobility had occaſioned extraordinary expences to the e republic, it was equitable their eſtates ſhould be anſwerable for theſe charges. They were accordingly confiſcated, and ſold to the higheſt bidders.

The ancient nobility iſſue orders for all of their body to quit Genoa.

THE ancient nobility, at the ſame time, gave the ſtricteſt orders to all their body to retire out of Genoa, and declared the eſtates of all who refuſed lawfully confiſcated; which decree obliged a great number of young gentlemen, deſcended from ancient families, to quit the capital, to the great prejudice of their fortunes. Foreign miniſters laboured, but advanced nothing in the accommodation. The ſentiments and demands of both parties were ſo widely different, that no concluſion could be formed. On the one ſide, great ſtreſs was laid on the troops they had ready to march on the frontiers, on the antiquity of their family, their high deſcent, fortune, alliances, and education. On the other, the ſame f weight was laid upon their being in poſſeſſion of the capital, on the people's ſiding with them, on the advantages derived from the laws of the reformers, and laſtly, upon their being in a condition to defend themſelves. Both ſent ambaſſadors to Madrid; and thoſe of the ancient nobility made ſuch diſpatch, that they obtained an audience two days before the arrival of the others. The one requeſted that Doria might be ſuffered to aſſiſt them with the gallies under his command; and the others, that Don John might be prohibited from entering the port of Genoa. Both ſet forth their ſeveral claims to the protection of his catholic majeſty, the juſtice of their ſeveral cauſes, and the true intereſt of Spain, with the utmoſt elocution. After hearing Doria and Tagliacarne, the ambaſſadors from the rival republicans, his catholic majeſty replied, that it was an eaſier matter to begin than to end a war; g it was, therefore, his advice that they would terminate matters amicably: they were all citizens and neighbours, who ought to put up with each other's failings, and above all things avoid the deſtruction of that harmony upon which depended their very exiſtence: that with a reſpect to himſelf, it was to be apprehended if he declared on either ſide, all Italy would riſe in arms againſt him. In a word, he excuſed himſelf from engaging in the quarrel, and recommended ſtrongly their declining an application to any foreign power, which would in the end deprive them of their independence.

THE year following, Philip deſired a paſſage for ſome troops he intended ſending to Sardinia through the republic's territories, which requeſt was at length granted, after warm debates in the ſenate. All this while the ancient nobility were labouring to raiſe a fund for ſupporting the war, which, notwithſtanding the endeavours of his catholic majeſty, ſeemed inevitable. Doria ſet the example by ſubſcribing a conſiderable ſum, which all the reſt followed in proportion to their zeal and ability. They waited with impatience to commence b hoſtilities; but not preſuming on ſuch a meaſure without Philip's conſent, they reſolved ſecretly that Ambroſe Lommelin and Scipio Campora, baniſhed the republic for ſome miſdemeanour, ſhould, in their own private quarrel, attack the valley of Poſeveri with four hundred foot, and that Francis Vivaldi ſhould enter Lunigiani with another corps. This irruption they were not to appear in, though inſtrumental in raiſing the forces, for fear of giving umbrage to king Philip. By this means they hoped to gain poſſeſſion of Novi and Spezzia, which would ſerve for magazines when the war begun. Theſe troops entered the valley, which they filled with terror; but they were forced to retire, by order of the duke of Gandia, who appeared with a ſquadron off Genoa.

DISAPPOINTED and chagrined at the retreat of Lommelin, and Campora, the ancient no-
c bility ſent deputies to the duke de Gandia, and from his reply were under terrible apprehenſions of Spain's declaring in behalf of their enemies. Their ambaſſadors at Madrid diſcovered, at the ſame time, by the conferences they had with the duke of Alva, that Philip, with all his ſpecious moderation, ſought only an opportunity of rendering himſelf maſter of Genoa, by the civil diviſions of the republic. This appeared plainly from a declaration of the duke's, that the only means to prevent eternal diviſions and tumults in Genoa, would be to build a citadel in the town, to be garriſoned with his catholic majeſty's troops.

IN the mean time the ancient nobility made propoſals to the duke de Gandia, which ſerved more than all they had done before to gain the protection of the court of Madrid. They offered to ſubmit their differences to Don John; to empower him to alter the laws at plead ſure, or to frame new ones, provided it was found neceſſary; a propoſal ſo dangerous to the preſent form of government, it was ſeen would be rejected, and this was, perhaps, the chief reaſon why it was made. In fact, it was rejected by the ſenate, who refuſed to put ſuch power into the hands of any foreigner; a declaration which drew on them the diſpleaſure of the pope's legate, as well as the Spaniſh miniſter and Don John.

SOON after it was reported that Doria had planned with Don John the whole operations of the war; and that he was gone to Naples to get all things in readineſs for that prince to open the compaign. The report was premature; but it proved true ſome time after; for Doria ſet ſail for Naples with twenty-five gallies, accompanied by George Doria and John Baptiſta Spinola. Immediately the new nobility ſpread a rumour that Doria aſpired at the ſovereignty
e of Genoa; and that he had already marched a body of men to ſeize on the gates. The ſenate, being informed of his departure, did not doubt but he had encouragement from Don John; and that Spain had determined to eſpouſe the ancient nobility. It was, therefore, thought expedient to make vigorous efforts in their own defence: accordingly three thouſand men were ſent to Sarzana, moſt of them Florentines and Luccheſe, and all the magazines were put into the beſt order, which laſt precaution became the more neceſſary, as Don John had wrote to the grand duke of Tuſcany, requeſting that he would prohibit his ſubjects from ſupplying the Genoeſe with ball, powder, ſalt-petre, and proviſions.

NEGOCIATIONS for an accommodation were reſumed, but ſuddenly broke off, by the arrival of Doria on the coaſt of Genoa, with a ſtrong ſquadron; upon which the deputies f of the ancient nobility withdrew, by which they gave umbrage to the foreign miniſters, who acted as mediators. As ſoon as Doria appeared off Genoa, he diſpatched a meſſenger to the marquis de Ajamont, governor of Milan, acquainting him with Don John's intention, and requiring him to provide the neceſſary ſtores and ammunition, to order two regiments to march to Spezzia, and take ſuch other meaſures as he thought would promote the prince's views. Two German regiments were alſo taken into the pay of the ancient nobility, ſeveral Italian regiments were raiſed, and twenty independent companies of one hundred men each, all under the command of Doria. Antonio Serra raiſed five thouſand five hundred foot at Milan, in the name of his catholic majeſty, to whom they took an oath of allegiance.

Doria arrives with a fleet on the coaſt of Genoa.

DORIA began the war with erecting the ſtandard of the republic, alledging that the go-g vernment was uſurped by rebels; and he ſent a ſmall ſquadron to attempt gaining poſſeſſion of Porto Venere, which ſucceeded happily. The grand duke of Tuſcany, ſeeing the Genoeſe territories filled with confuſion, and his coaſt covered by a numerous fleet, raiſed ten

thouſand

thouſand men, and fortified all his towns, to prevent being ſurpriſed; nay more, he ſeemed to enter into a kind of friendly correſpondence with the ſenate and new nobility of Genoa. a

By the late vigorous meaſures taken by Doria, it was plain the ancient nobility determined upon war, which wrought more on the ſenate than all the overtures, intreaties, and menaces they had before uſed. The ambaſſadors of the mediating powers obſerving this diſpoſition, aſſembled at the houſe of the legate to contrive means for accommodating matters; but the hoſtilities committed by Doria, and the ſtubbornneſs of both parties, a ſecond time fruſtrated their endeavours. Application was made by both parties to his holineſs, and ſeveral Italian princes for aſſiſtance; but they all ſtrictly prohibited their ſubjects to enliſt with either, except the grand duke of Tuſcany, who took umbrage at Doria's ſucceſs, and ſo powerful an armament in his neighbourhood. The forces of the ancient nobility were, indeed, very numerous, and daily augmenting; while the new nobility were powerful only in the city, and weak in the field. On this account the people began to fall off, many of them deſerted the city and joined Doria, who now undertook the ſiege of Novi; others preſſed the ſenate to an accommodation, inſiſting that the ſubject of diſpute might be ſubmitted to arbitration; that the ancient nobility would agree to nothing till Savona was firſt put into their hands. By gaining theſe two cities they hoped to treat upon an equal footing at leaſt, eſpecially as the army they had in the field was greatly ſuperior to that of the enemy. Several propoſitions were ſet on foot for a peace; but the war went on. Doria made his approaches before Novi, and at laſt opened ſeveral batteries, with which he played furiouſly on the town. The walls, which were feeble, ſoon gave way to his cannon; but as the garriſon was numerous and brave, it was hazardous attempting to ſtorm the breach. At laſt, Spinola, who commanded in the trenches, determined upon a general aſſault; but, to ſpare the blood of his fellow ſubjects, firſt ſummoned the governor to ſurrender. Figarella, the governor, received this ſummons with diſdain, and made no other reply than by a brisk diſcharge of the artillery on the ramparts. Spinola, in revenge, ordered five hundred fuſileers to march in the night, under cover of the fire from the batteries, by a ſecret path undiſcovered, by means of a deſerter, that lead to the city. A centinel diſcovered the detachment, and giving the alarm, the beſieged ſallied out, and a warm action commenced; but the detachment was retreating in good order, when it was attacked in the rear by the garriſon of Gavi, who would have cut Spinola's men in pieces, had he not opportunely come up with a reinforcement. The battle was renewed with redoubled vigour; but was of ſhort duration, the garriſon of Gavi being forced to retreat with loſs and precipitation. Still the governor of that place reſolved to raiſe the ſiege of Novi; for which purpoſe he made frequent ſallies, and at length determined upon one laſt effort. b c d e

Doria beſieges Novi.

With this deſign, Stephen Invrea, Pietro Antonio Chieſa, and Marco Fornari, put themſelves at the head of thirty-two companies, making about five thouſand men, and marched towards Doria's, or rather Spinola's camp. They advanced unobſerved within a very ſhort diſtance of the out-guards, whom they attacked, being ſupported by a furious ſally of the beſieged; but were received by Leonardo Plaſtifer with a courage that ſoon cooled their ardor. He was joined by count Felix of Lodron, who, at the firſt alarm, mounted his horſe, and put himſelf at the head of a ſquadron, with which he repulſed the beſieged with loſs, while the garriſon of Gavi was hotly conteſting victory with Spinola, by whom they were at length defeated. The project was well-laid, and promiſed fair, had it been executed with ſpirit [f]. The conſequence of its miſcarriage was the immediate ſurrender of Novi.

A. D. 1575. As ſoon as Spinola got poſſeſſion of Novi, placing a ſtrong garriſon in it, he went and ſummoned Gavi; but the governor reſolving to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity, the town was inveſted. At firſt the beſieged made Spinola's approaches very difficult by a furious diſcharge from the ramparts, which, however, did not long continue. Fornari, who commanded in the town, evacuated it as ſoon as the beſiegers began to play their batteries, and retired to the citadel. The burghers, afraid of being pillaged, immediately opened their gates to Spinola, who, taking poſſeſſion, proceeded to beſiege the citadel; but his forces not being numerous enough to ſhut up all the paſſes by completely inveſting the place, the garriſon made frequent ſallies into the town, from whence they returned loaded with booty. This obliged Spinola to think of raiſing the ſiege, and endeavour to ſtrike ſome alarm in Genoa, which might help to forward the accommodation ſo long in agitation. His ſcheme ſucceeded; the people imagined the Spaniſh army was advancing to enſlave them. The citizens took ſanctuary, with their children and effects, in the churches. Many deſired leave of the grand council of war to retire; and ſeveral of the elderly perſons, who had ſeen former revolutions wrought by power, doubted not but a duke, with an unlimited and deſpotic authority, would be created by the ancient nobility. f g a NOTWITHSTANDING the conſternation in Genoa was very great, Spinola judged, contrary to the opinion of his officers, that it would not be poſſible to render himſelf maſter of it with his handful of forces. He dreaded loſing his reputation, ſhould he fail in the attempt: he feared likewiſe that deſpair would make the city receive the yoke of ſome foreign power; and he knew by intercepted letters that many of the citizens, wearied of the preſent government, longed for a change in the adminiſtration. While he was thus irreſolute, Doria, who then commanded the fleet, altho' he was generaliſſimo of the whole forces by ſea and land of the ancient nobility, came to Final, to ſettle the operations of war with his conſtituents. However, no military tranſaction of any conſequence happened until the accommodation was in ſuch forwardneſs, that both parties began to lay aſide their animoſities. The vicinity of Spinola

b with the army, and Doria with the fleet, rendered the ſenate and new nobility more compliant; while the king of Spain's ſtopping payment of the intereſt of thoſe large ſums he owed the ancient nobility, rendered them more diſpoſed to peace, from their inability to carry on the war. The mediating ambaſſadors indeed exerted themſelves in a very extraordinary manner to effect a reconciliation. They laboured in this the more earneſtly, becauſe Italy, and conſequently all Europe, was intereſted in the fate of Genoa Above all, the pope applied his influence in a manner ſo judicious, that chiefly by his means the long wiſhed-for reunion of intereſts, and perfect incorporation of the old and new nobility were effected. Hoſtages were exchanged for the mutual performance of their agreement; and the following regulations in the political government were made by the arbitrators: To take away all diſtinction, c the very names of old and new nobility were aboliſhed; and it was decreed, that henceforward they ſhould be one without difference or diſtinction: that as idleneſs is the mother of faction, of every vice deſtructive of ſociety, the cadets of noble families ſhould be permitted to exerciſe mechanical employments, or, at leaſt, merchandize without derogating from their rank: rewards were decreed to perſons of merit, and recompences to all who had ſpent their time upon any diſcovery uſeful to the community; it being deemed a ſufficient qualification for admiſſion into the body of nobility. Four hundred ſenators were choſen out of the nobility to compoſe the high council of the republic: only perſons of diſtinguiſhed virtue, and conſiderable fortune, were to be preferred to certain offices of truſt and power: proper meaſures were likewiſe taken to prevent chicane and fraud in elections for magiſtrates: all
d perſons poſſeſſed of offices which their abilities and character did not merit were degraded: a law was paſſed for the election of great and little officers, and even of the duke himſelf, to prevent diſputes and jealouſies: magiſtrates were obliged to give an account of their conduct at their going out of office; but as the trueſt cement of friendſhip was made up with blood-connections, a kind of nuptial tribunal was formed, or a ſet of gentlemen, who were to tranſact matters of that nature between old and new families: a magiſtrate called conſervator of the laws was created, and it was made criminal to introduce new laws, or any changes in thoſe already eſtabliſhed: carrying arms and all ſeditious aſſemblies were prohibited, under ſevere penalties: trade, with reſpect to weight, meaſure, and the quality of commodities, was ſet on the beſt footing. In a word, every thing poſſible was done to e obliterate the late animoſity, and reſtore the harmony, and conſequently power, wealth, and felicity of Genoa [g]. We have been the more particular in relating the circumſtances of this revolution, as it was one of the moſt important that happened in Genoa, and from it we enter more minutely into the genius of the people, the nature of the conſtitution, and the form of the civil and political government than otherwiſe we could.

A reconciliation effected between the old and new nobility. A. D. 1576.

AFTER the late accommodation, the republic of Genoa enjoyed peace and felicity for the ſpace of forty-eight years, during which time ſcarce any incident, domeſtic or foreign, worth recording occurs. In the year 1624, a diſpute aroſe between the republic and Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, in which Lewis the thirteenth bore a ſhare. Each of theſe princes had his particular reaſon for coming to a rupture with Genoa. The marquiſate of Zuccarel
f was the ſubject of contention with the former; and as for Lewis, his chief intention was to make ſuch a diverſion in Italy, as ſhould engage the principal attention of his Catholic majeſty, and prevent his ſeizing the forts which commanded the paſs in the Valtelin.

War with the duke of Savoy.

BUT, beſides motives of intereſt, the duke of Savoy was impelled to this rupture from punctilio, and a ſcrupulous delicacy in points of honour. The cauſe was extraordinary enough: ſome ſchool-boys at Genoa, of low birth, had formed themſelves for diverſion into two armies, the one ſuppoſed Spaniſh, the other the military force of his highneſs the duke of Savoy. Theſe armies were conducted by the mock princes in perſon, and coming to a pitched battle the duke was defeated, driven out of the town, then taken priſoner, and led in triumph about the ſtreets. The ſenate diſapproved of this play, and puniſhed the g offenders; but the duke was not ſatisfied with that reparation. A treaty was concluded between France and Savoy, and the plan of operations for the enſuing campaign concerted.

France declares againſt Genoa.

[g] Ibid. etiam MAUBLE. l. 12, 13.

In the month of February 1625, the conſtable de Leſdiguieres, governor of Dauphiny, paſſing the mountains, arrived at Turin, and found that his highneſs had got ready a body of troops a to march at the ſhorteſt notice. It conſiſted of twelve thouſand men, a fine train of artillery, with whhich it was determined to lay ſiege to Savona. A council of war was afterwards called, and this reſolution warmly debated. It was ſupported by the conſtable, mareſcal Crequi, and the count Dauriac, and oppoſed by his royal highneſs and the marquis de Uxelles.

As the treaty between France and Savoy could not be kept long ſecret, his catholic majeſty ſent to Genoa, with offers to the ſenate of liberal aſſiſtance, in caſe they found the republic attacked by the confederates; but the ſenate was aware of the inconveniences conſequent on ſuch ſuccours: they had ſeen their own and other republics loſe their liberty, by having recourſe to the protection of powerful monarchs. Truſting, therefore, to the ſtrength and b unanimity of their own ſtate, they returned his Catholic majeſty their humble thanks; but declined his offer, under pretence that the deſtination of the confederate army was very uncertain, and that the forces of the republic were ſufficient to protect the Genoeſe territories.

It was more agreeable to the ſenate to make application to his holineſs, who they requeſted would uſe his influence with the duke of Savoy to drop the war; or, if that would not do, to lend men and money to the republic. The pope, however, declared himſelf neutral, and would promiſe nothing to the Genoeſe. His refuſal did not diſcourage the ſenate: troops were levied with all expedition, and directions given for equipping a ſtrong ſquadron. It was not now a war in which citizen fought againſt citizen, but where every ſubject of the republic aſſiſted with all his power to repel the common danger. Five thouſand c Germans were taken into pay; a ſociety of rich nobility raiſed, at their own private expence, thirty companies of Italian foot, conſiſting of two hundred men each; beſides ſix hundred foot drawn from Corſica. The prince of Bozzolò ſupplied the republic with eight hundred foot and two hundred horſe; Lucca ſent four hundred auxiliaries; and Doria was raiſing a ſtrong body of men upon his own eſtate. In a word, the forces of the republic were ſuch as it was thought would not only protect the Genoeſe territories, but oblige the enemy to keep on the defenſive.

While matters were preparing in Piedmont, the duke de Guiſe, who lay with a fleet at Marſeilles, ſeized two hundred thouſand crowns, which his Catholic majeſty was ſending to Genoa, on board two merchantmen, relying upon the faith of treaties, and the peace between d the crowns of France and Spain. This ſeizure occaſioned great alarms in Genoa, where money was much wanted. All the troops had before been ſent to the frontiers, not doubting but the enemy would make their firſt attacks there, and render themſelves maſters of the barrier towns for a retreat, before they ventured to penetrate into the heart of the country. Seeing the enemy follow a different courſe, they fortified Savona in the beſt manner poſſible, and recalled all the troops diſperſed along the banks of the river Ponant, which they employed in fortifying the paſſes between them and the enemy. They determined to abandon Novi, and Ovada, the better to defend Gavi, a place of great importance, as it commanded the principal avenue to Genoa, through the valley of Poſeveri, and, indeed, the only one by which it was practicable to draw artillery and waggons. Here they placed two thou- e ſand men, ſecured the paſs with lines and batteries, and put two thouſand five hundred men to guard the ſtrong paſs of Ronciglioné.

It was now of the utmoſt conſequence to make choice of a general capable of conducting their military operations. The great eſteem in which John Jerome Doria was held, made this office be conferred on him; his courage and integrity were undoubted, and he had performed a variety of actions in the Spaniſh ſervice, that put his capacity out of all doubt. Carlo Doria, of the ſame family, was appointed to command in the city; an officer equally admired for his abilities as a ſoldier, and his virtue as a man and a citizen. He was duke of Turſis, but had ſpent all his life in the army, ſo that great confidence was placed in his judgment and probity. When he was called into the ſenate to give his ſentiments upon f the operations of the campaign, the duke diſapproved highly of the reſolution taken to evacuate Novi and Ovada, inſtead of which he ordered them to be well garriſoned and provided. It was, he ſaid, the buſineſs of the republic to keep their enemies as long as poſſible from penetrating into the bowels of the ſtate, and touching the capital, where reſides the vital principle. Admitting they would make no long reſiſtance, they would at leaſt amuſe the enemy and give more time to finiſh the fortifications of Genoa. Moved with theſe reaſons, the ſenate ſuffered him to act in the affair as he thought proper; upon which the duke ſent his nephew Georgio Doria to take the command of Novi, while he reſolved to defend Ovada in perſon: but he was forced to alter his plan when he found theſe places totally evacuated, and deſtitute of ſtores, proviſion, and cannon. He then bent his whole endeavours to defend the paſs at Gavi, which was the only way the enemy could poſſibly bring their artillery.

In

a In the mean time the conſtable advanced with his army, too inconſiderable, indeed, to undertake any thing of conſequence. He obliged Aqui and Capriata to ſurrender, and he defeated a detac ment of five companies of Neapolitans, on their march to join Spinola, who commanded a detachment of Genoeſe. This attack of the conſtable's was ſo warmly reſented in Spain, that all the French ſhips in the Spaniſh ports were ſeized; but no actual hoſtilities commenced between the two crowns. The governor of Milan carefully abſtained from every kind of violence, while the towns in the dutchy were ill provided, and the fortifications out of repair: as ſoon, however, as things were put in a proper poſture, and the French army paſt the defiles, the duke de Feria took off the maſk, knowing that the loſs of Genoa would ſoon be ſucceeded by the invaſion of the Milaneſe.

b While the duke de Feria was preparing to ſuccour the Genoeſe, the duke of Savoy forced the paſſage of Ronciglioné, which he attacked with his whole army. The Genoeſe troops behaved in ſo cowardly a manner, as to abandon their poſt at the terror of the enemy's numbers; upon which the duke made himſelf maſter of the trenches they had thrown up, and of the town, without any reſiſtance. After the reduction of Ronciglioné he advanced to St. Judith, and ſummoned the governor to ſurrender, which he refuſed until neceſſity ſhould oblige him. Genoa was all this while filled with terror and diſmay: women and children flocked in thouſands from the country, and conſumed the proviſions: the cannon lay upon each other in the arſenal without carriages, and if they were mounted, without gunners to direct them: the troops, raiſed at a great expence, dwindled away with ſickneſs and deſer-

c tion: both thoſe ſtrong detachments ſent to defend the defiles at Gavi and Ronciglioné were diſperſed through fear only, although three hundred thouſand ducats had been ſent to Milan, the forces promiſed upon this ſubſidy were not yet arrived: the Neapolitan auxiliaries were already cut in pieces by the French. In a word, the face of affairs was totally altered, and without any viſible cauſe, except the panic which had ſeized the whole republic, after the miſconduct at Ronciglioné. This confuſion was ſtill encreaſed by the crowds of women, children, and old men, who poured in hourly from every part of the country, particularly from Voltri, and thoſe towns and villages which lay in the enemy's route. Genoa could now be compared to nothing ſo juſtly as Rome, after the defeat at Cannæ. It was near fifty years that this wealthy city enjoyed profound tranquility, without hearing the ſound of a d cannon, drum, trumpet, or warlike inſtrument, except on public rejoicings. No wonder then if the approach of an enemy proved more alarming to its inhabitants than to others more accuſtomed to war. Women of faſhion fled their country: the rich ſent their moveables to Leghorn, and the mob run about like perſons diſtracted, although they had nothing to loſe [h].

The Spaniards declare in favour of Genoa.

Amidst this confuſion, the ſenate reſolved to recall all the troops they had ſent for the defence of the frontiers. A courier was ſent to John Jerome Doria, ordering him to aſſemble the garriſons round Ottagio, and bring them with the utmoſt expedition to Genoa. Doria, however, was too experienced a ſoldier to obey thoſe orders, dictated by fear and ignorance. Immediately he ſent his reaſons for this conduct to the ſenate, whoſe fears he endeavoured

e to quiet, by aſſuring them it was impoſſible the enemy could form the ſiege of Genoa without their heavy cannon, and that the ſureſt method to retard their operations would be to keep the paſſes blocked up in ſuch a manner, as would render it difficult for the artillery to join the army. Theſe reaſons being examined in the ſenate, were unanimouſly allowed to be judicious; notwithſtanding which, ſuch was the people's confidence in Doria and Spinola, that both were recalled for the defence of the city, and Ottagio and Gavi left to ſhift for themſelves. The garriſons, indeed, were kept in theſe places, but put under the conduct of officers of whoſe ability the ſoldiers had a meaner opinion.

The preſence of Doria and Spinola gave freſh vigour to the Genoeſe, which was ſoon far-

f ther encreaſed by the arrival of Lewis Guaſco with two thouſand Spaniſh foot, and two hundred horſe, from Milan. By Doria's advice the ſenate took ſome effectual ſteps to prevent the confuſion that reigned in the city, by ſtrictly prohibiting perſons, of whatever quality, to move themſelves or effects out of Genoa. They next applied with great diligence to the fortifications; and mounting the cannon on the ramparts, in which employment almoſt every man fit to labour was buſied; even the clergy and women lent a hand.

After all, Genoa owed more to fortune than to her own conduct or prudence. The differences between the duke of Savoy and the conſtable greatly retarded the motions of both. The latter lay before Gavi, without being able to inveſt it for want of cannon, with which the duke promiſed to ſupply him, for doing which he received a very conſi-

g derable ſubſidy paid every month. It was ſuppoſed that jealouſy of the conſtable's reputation made him betray the common cauſe: but certain it is, that the delays occaſioned by his highneſs happened moſt providentially for Genoa. At laſt, the duke of Savoy, having gained ſome advantages over Carracciolo, the Genoeſe general at Ottagio, marched to join the conſtable at Gavi (A). a

WHILE the confederate army was preparing for the ſiege of Gavi, warm debates were carried on in the ſenate, whether it ſhould be evacuated, or vigorouſly defended? Some were for giving it up as untenable, recalling the garriſon for the defence of the capital, and not ſacrificing ſuch a number of men merely from a deſire of procraſtinating the ſiege of Genoa a day or two longer. Others, on the contrary, affirmed, that it ought to be defended to the laſt extremity, as the ſiege of ſuch a place muſt neceſſarily weaken the enemy, and give time for putting Genoa into the beſt poſture of defence. Amidſt a diverſity of opinions, each ſupported with ſtrong arguments, they reſolved to be determined by the ſentiments of the duke de Feria. But while the Genoeſe were deliberating whether they ſhould evacuate the town, the conſtable was trying to reduce it by force. He lodged a b ſtrong detachment in a monaſtery, to cover the workmen employed in erecting batteries on an eminence, which was the only ground from whence the citadel was capable of ſuffering any diſturbance. Here the beſieged evacuated ſome forts, without making hardly any reſiſtance. Next day the beſiegers defeated a body of eight hundred Genoeſe, in the road of Sacavalla and took a hundred and twenty priſoners. While the French were receiving freſh ſpirits and courage from theſe ſucceſſes, the beſieged were thunder-ſtruck with their loſſes: they began to deſpond, and deſpair of being able to make a long reſiſtance. The town-walls were in a ſhattered condition, and a heavy piece of cannon well managed, would have made a practicable breach. Niaſco, who commanded, entreated Juſtiniani, governor of the citadel, to receive him and his people, in caſe they were driven from their poſt; c which Juſtiniani refuſing, he made a ſally, with intention to break through the enemy; but was beat back to the town. Finding nothing could be done by force, he had recourſe to the clemency of his enemies, and demanded of the mareſchal Crequi a ſafe-conduct for himſelf and garriſon. The paſſport was granted, the capitulation ſigned, and Niaſco marched out with his arms, baggage, and other honours of war, wholly deſtroyed by the oath he took never to ſerve the rupublic againſt the French.

JUSTINIANI was incenſed at the retreat of Niaſco; and to expreſs his reſentment, ordered a general diſcharge of his artillery. Next morning he was ſummoned to ſurrender; to which he replied, that the citadel being entruſted to him, he would defend it as long as d he was able. It was repreſented to him that no quarter would be given, if he ſtood an aſſault; upon which he demanded a day to deliberate, and returned an anſwer, when the time was expired, by a briſk fire from the artillery, and a bloody flag, which he hung up in the moſt conſpicuous place. Other batteries were inſtantly erected, which began to play briſkly on the garriſon. A third time Juſtiniani was ſummoned; and then he deſired a paſſport for a meſſenger to go to Genoa, to repreſent the ſituation of the citadel, promiſing to ſurrender if he did not receive an anſwer in three days. The paſſport was granted, and the meſſenger returned within the time, with orders for the garriſon to defend themſelves, as they would ſoon receive powerful ſuccours; but the duke of Savoy arreſted him in the camp; and the time being expired, Juſtiniani was decoyed into a capitulation.

GAVI having ſurrendered, the Piedmonteſe troops took immediate poſſeſſion of the citadel, which highly piqued the French general. The diſputes on this ſubject introduced others ſomewhat prematurely; it being warmly conteſted who ſhould be governor of Genoa, when taken. Beſides this, other jealouſies aroſe between the duke of Savoy and the conſtable, the former alledging, that the latter was ſecretly negotiating a peace with the Genoeſe. Theſe diviſions were very opportunely ſtopped by the king; who gave ſtrict orders that the conſtable ſhould liſten to no terms from the enemy without the duke's approbation; that the army ſhould be reinforced, and ſupplied with ſtores and proviſions; and that ſuch officers as were moſt obnoxious to the duke ſhould be recalled. Orders were likewiſe given to the duke de Guiſe to block up Genoa by ſea, with a ſquadron of ſix f

IN the mean time his highneſs and the conſtable held a council of war on the method of inveſting Genoa; when it was found impracticable to beſiege that large city without a proper train of artillery and proviſions for the army, both which were wanting. It was the duke's buſineſs to provide theſe, and keep the roads in repair for drawing the cannon; and he had given directions to that effect, which were executed but ſlowly. That no time, however, might be loſt, he attacked Piava, a place of ſome conſequence, and carried it after a ſhort reſiſtance. The conſtable, after this, oppoſed laying ſiege to Genoa before the army was properly ſupplied with artillery and ſtores; but the duke made all preparations for Piava taken. The confederates prepare to inveſt Genoa.

(A) Before he joined the mareſchal, he made himſelf maſter of Ottagio, after defeating Carracciolo, with two thouſand Genoeſe foot and two hundred horſe, who made a vigorous reſiſtance, and were juſt on the point of obliging the Piedmonteſe to retreat, when an unaccountable panic ſeized them, and made victory declare for the duke.

a inveſting the city, which he imagined would ſurrender to the terror of his arms, and the report of his ſucceſſes. He formed magazines at Gavi, ſet pioneers to work on the paſs at Ottagio, ordered the artillery to be put in motion, and ſeized upon ſeveral imperial fiefs belonging to the Genoeſe nobility. His natural ſon Don Felix he ſent to attack Savignon, by which he might open a paſſage to the valley Biſagno, which leads directly to Genoa; and this attempt ſucceeded, as all the others had done. Hearing of the loſs of Piava, the Genoeſe turned their whole attention on the defence of the capital, as the laſt ſtake. They made retrenchments, cut ditches, erected baſtions at proper diſtances, built palliſades, and mounted all their cannon. What embarraſſed them moſt was the ſcarcity of money. Remittances were expected from Spain; but the fear of falling in with the French ſquadron
b kept the ſhips from putting to ſea. Private perſons had ſent in their plate to be coined; but ſtill this was inſufficient for the purpoſes of government. As yet the Germans were not come to the Milaneſe, and there was the leſs dependence on them, as their delay was owing to the failure of the promiſed ſubſidy. Thus the Genoeſe had no foreign aſſiſtance to rely on, except a ſmall corps under Pimentel, who now deſerted them likewiſe, and drew off his forces from Tortona to Alexandria, to the great aſtoniſhment of the ſenate. Beſides, the Swiſs, who obſerved the treaſures of his catholic majeſty were exhauſted, ſuffered themſelves to be gained over by the confederates, and abſolutely denied the German auxiliaries a paſſage through their country.

But what proved moſt irkſome to the republic, was the great preparations the enemy
c were making to obtain a ſuperiority at ſea, by which they might either block up Genoa, or make a deſcent on Corſica. It was likewiſe obſerved, that all the princes in Italy ſeemed to have a biaſs in favour of the confederates, from a jealouſy and diſlike of Spain. The grand duke of Tuſcany was aſſembling an army at Piſa, with intention, it was ſuppoſed, to fall on Sarzana or Sarſonello, places to which the Florentines had long formed a claim; and this circumſtance obliged the Genoeſe to divide their forces, in order to make head againſt another enemy, and protect their poſſeſſions. The duke of Mantua kept up the appearance of friendſhip with the republic; but he granted a paſſage through his dominions to the confederates, and entered ſecretly into their intereſt, although he offered to raiſe ſix thouſand men for the defence of Genoa, provided the republic would ſupply levy-money. As to Venice, there d was no ſubject of diſpute between the two republics, except their jealouſy about the ſuperiority in the Mediterranean. For ſeveral years back they lived in friendſhip, yet were the Venetians zealous promoters of this league againſt the ſiſter republic; probably from a diſlike of Spain, and jealouſy of the grandeur of the houſe of Auſtria, with which Genoa was cloſely allied. All, however, that the Venetians did, was to render it difficult to ſend aſſiſtance from Milan, by making a diverſion in the Cremoneſe: however, the old animoſity was ſo far renewed, that the Genoeſe merchants durſt not appear in Venice; and public rejoicings were made in that city upon every advantage gained by the confederates. In a word, the affairs of the republic appeared to themſelves to be in ſo deſperate a ſituation, that they connived at the horrid attempt of aſſaſſinating the conſtable; an attempt which ree flects infamy on the republic, and the baſe projector, the baron de Allegre.

Such was the ſtate of the Genoeſe affairs when a million of ducats arrived from Spain, which was ſoon after followed by five millions more. Matters inſtantly aſſumed a different face: alacrity and ſpirit appeared in every face; the works, which had long languiſhed, were reſumed with ſpirit; levies were ſet on foot; remittances made to Milan, in conſequence of which near eight thouſand troops arrived from that duchy, among whom were two thouſand of the beſt veterans in the ſervice of Spain: to this may be added other advantages equally important. The inclinations of his holineſs and the grand duke ſeemed to veer with the fortune of the republic; for now they made no ſcruple of reinforcing the Spaniſh fleet with a certain number of gallies, which it was believed was inf tended for the ſervice of France.

A council of war was called at Genoa, to determine upon the operations of the campaign; and here it was reſolved to take particular care of the defence of Genoa and Savona; the latter being neceſſary to the ſecurity of the former, and the ſucceſs of all their meaſures. It was farther agreed, that no attempt ſhould be made to recover the places the enemy had taken, ſince they muſt of courſe belong to that ſide which was maſter of the field. At the ſame time theſe circumſtances concurred to defeat the enemy's projects, they were diſappointed of the proviſions expected from England. The king of France wanted all his ſtrength to reduce the Hugonots; an epidemical diſeaſe carried off near half the army: beſides, the Piedmonteſe troops were greatly diſtreſſed, the inhabitants of Montferrat refuſing, on account of ſome ill uſage they had received, to ſuffer convoys to paſs through their country. His highneſs was encamped between Gavi and Ottagio, and not only cut off from proviſions, but greatly moleſted by alarms and attacks from the inhabitants, who ſeized every opportunity of annoying him. Some quarter of the camp, or party of foragers was every day attacked; by which means the army was greatly harraſſed with being conſtantly under arms. But what diſtreſſed the duke moſt, and rendered it impoſſible for him to have his artillery, at leaſt for ſome time, was an order ſent by the ſenate to the inhabitants of Poſeveri to form themſelves into a ſtrong detachment, and ſeize upon five hundred bullocks, which were croſſing the ſkirts of the valley, to go to the camp for the uſe of the artillery. This order was executed with great ſpirit, the eſcort defeated, and the cattle carried off with triumph to Genoa. It was not poſſible for the duke to aſſemble a number of draught-horſes or bullocks ſufficient for his purpoſe, and he was reduced to the neceſſity of waiting for horſes from France. a

Advantages gained by the peaſants.

THE peaſants of Poſeveri were not contented with their late advantage; it had ſo elated their courage, that they determined upon ſome enterpr.ze worthy of men. Accordingly they joined a ſmall corps of regulars, and laid ſiege to Savignon, in which place the duke's ſon, Don Felix, commanded two hundred men. Their attack was ſo ſudden and briſk, that Don Felix muſt have ſurrendered priſoner at diſcretion, had not the duke, on the firſt intimation of his danger, made a forced march with five hundred men to croſs the mountains, and carried him off in the night. This retreat, however, was effected with great danger, as the peaſants purſued him cloſely in the rear, and fell upon him in a defile through which he muſt neceſſarily paſs. b

HITHERTO the duke de Feria's conduct had been irreſolute, through want of money, and the fear of coming to a rupture with France. At length the remonſtrances of the ſenate prevailed, or rather the liberal remittances they made, enabled him to take the field with a powerful army, that greatly perplexed the duke of Savoy and the conſtable. After Feria had put ſtrong garriſons in all the fortified towns, his army amounted to upwards of twenty thouſand fighting men, a force greatly ſuperior to that of the confederates, which did not exceed eight thouſand, harraſſed, ſickly, and ſtarved with hunger. Nothing was now thought of but how to retreat, and a variety of projects were formed to effect even this with ſafety; for as to the ſiege, it was abandoned as a thing impracticable. They were purſued in their march; and ſeveral skirmiſhes happened between the confederates and the Spaniſh troops, but none of any importance. c

Novi and Gavi recovered.

IN conſequence of this retreat, the Genoeſe recovered Novi and Gavi, with ſeveral other little places which had fallen into the enemy's hands. La Grange commanded in Gavi with a ſlender garriſon, which capitulated a few days after the Genoeſe appeared before the town; nor did the citadel, though ſtrong and well ſupplied with neceſſaries, make any defence, as the retreat of the confederate army rendered it impoſſible for them to expect any relief. The governor was, indeed, ſuſpected of corruption, and to have ſurrendered his truſt for a ſum of money. Accordingly he was ſent priſoner to France, and orders were iſſued out for trying him, when he happily died, and avoided a more ignominious end. d

The confederate army retreats.

Peace concluded.

AFTER the retreat of the confederate army, negotiations for peace were ſet on foot, which was accordingly concluded upon equal terms, matters being reſtored to the ſituation they were in at the beginning of the war [b]. e

A. D. 1627.

ABOUT two years after the peace with France and Savoy, the republic was greatly embarraſſed by a reſolution of his Catholic majeſty to leſſen the intereſt of the money he borrowed from the bank of Genoa, or rather ſink the capital an eighth part. Olivarez had done them this office, becauſe the republic had declined lending a large ſum of money, at low intereſt, upon the ſecurity of ſome very precarious funds he offered. Nothing could be more unſeaſonable than any diſpute with Spain, when a circumſtance happened which ſet the republic and the duke of Savoy at variance. Since the late peace at Monçon, general Brancaccio lodged at Pigna, a town under the authority of the republic, but maintaining, at its own expence, a garriſon of three companies of German foot. Part of this garriſon going to Buſſo, a little town within a mile of Pigna, and in its juriſdiction, found ſome Piedmonteſe troops quartered there, which they drove out, after leaving a great number dead on the ſpot. The duke highly reſented this act of hoſtility, and declared that he looked on the peace as infringed, and would act accordingly. The republic puniſhed the offenders; but the duke was not to be pacified, although he was ſenſible that the ſenate had no ſhare in the tranſaction. f

An account of Vachero, and the plot contrived by him.

WHILE his highneſs was contriving means to revenge himſelf on the republic, Vachero came to Turin, to propoſe to him an enterprize which would ſufficiently puniſh the Genoeſe. This Vachero was a young, ambitious, and wealthy plebeian, who, receiving ſome affronts from certain young nobility, reſolved to revenge himſelf on the whole body. He beheld with chagrin perſons of inferior wealth intitled to poſts by their quality, which were refuſed to him. His pride was viſible in the haughtineſs of his gait, and inſolence of his g a look; but his profuſe liberality gained him a number of adherents, and made his houſe the rendezvous of the factious, the daring, and thoſe who wiſhed for a revolution to wipe off their crimes, or their debts. Since his return from Turin, he redoubled his careſſes and liberality, and even found means to draw into his intereſt perſons of better morals, and leſs deſperate fortunes; to whom, however, he communicated but a part of his real deſign, which was no leſs than to extirpate the whole body of the nobility, and to get himſelf made ſovereign of Genoa; ſo ſhort-ſighted is ambition! Merchants, mechanics, and the meaneſt of the people, had acceſs to Vachero's houſe and table; and in a ſhort time the number of the conſpirators was ſo great, and the plan ſo well laid, that Genoa muſt have been the ſcene of blood and confuſion in a few days, had it not pleaſed Providence to interpoſe, and b diſcover their machinations in a manner inſcrutable by human foreſight. He had deferred the day of execution too long from a deſire to concert his meaſures ſecurely. Villainy generally overſhoots the mark, and too much precaution as frequently as too little betrays it. The duke of Savoy had repeatedly urged him to ſtrike the blow, which he delayed for the greater ſecurity. At length, the day was fixed for the firſt of April, 1628; and he had given orders to the conſpirators to aſſemble at the palace in as great numbers as poſſible, and after killing the German guards, to force their way into the chambers, throw the ſenators over the windows, and maſſacre all who fell in their way; aſſuring them, that they would eaſily get the government into their own hands, as there was a body of Piedmonteſe to ſupport them. A. D. 1628.

c THE conſpirators expected with impatience that day, to be rendered ſo deplorably memorable by ſuch a variety of murders; but it pleaſed the Divine Providence to turn the plot upon the contrivers, and make their ambition the ſcourge of their villainy. Vachero, for the greater ſafety, wanted to engage one Radini, a captain, in the conſpiracy. He invited him to his houſe with ſeveral other conſpirators, and treated him with ſuch profuſe generoſity, that Radini was prevailed to engage in this faction, in hopes of raiſing his fortune by performing an action ſo agreeable to his natural ſovereign the duke of Savoy. He took an oath to meet them next day at the palace with his company of ſoldiers; yet, upon farther thoughts, he reflected with horror on the crime he was going to commit, and thought it his duty to ſave ſuch a number of lives by the breach of an oath taken raſhly. Ac-
d cordingly he went over-night to Luke Clavari the duke, informed him of the whole plot, and obtained under his ſign-manual a full pardon for his offence, and the promiſe of a reward adequate to the importance of the ſervice he had done the ſtate. Conſpiracy diſcovered.

FILLED with horror and amazement, the duke immediately aſſembled the ſenate privately, and acquainted them of the danger of their ſituation. After ſeveral warm debates on the means of warding off the blow, it was determined to ſeize the perſons of the principal conſpirators, by entering their houſes in the moſt ſecret manner; and alſo to ſecure their magazine of arms, which buſineſs was committed to Lommelin. This laſt order was executed immediately, and all the arms brought to the palace without the leaſt noiſe or diſturbance; but Barigel, to whom the buſineſs of ſeizing on the conſpirators was ene truſted, betrayed the ſenate, and gave them notice of his order. He happened, indeed, to be a party in the conſpiracy, and took his meaſures ſo well, that not only himſelf, but the chief of his accomplices eſcaped before the morning. Vachero, Zignato, and Fornari, endeavouring to eſcape by ſea, were taken, and publicly executed. Several of the others got ſafe to Turin, from whence they iſſued bitter invectives againſt the government. Some time after, however, they ſuffered the juſt puniſhment of their crimes: endeavouring, with the aſſiſtance of a body of Piedmonteſe, to ſurpriſe Genoa, they were repulſed, beſieged, and burnt in a houſe, to which they retired. In this manner ended a conſpiracy which brought Genoa to the brink of perdition, and nearly ended in the entire extirpation of the whole body of nobility [i].

f As ſoon as the duke of Savoy was informed that Vachero was priſoner, and the conſpiracy diſcovered, he omitted nothing to ſave the lives of that criminal and his accomplices. He declared himſelf to be the author of the whole, in order to revenge the affair of Buſſo: he inſiſted that the priſoners ought to enjoy the benefit of the amneſty paſſed after the late peace, though nothing could be more abſurd than the arguments alleged; and he found means to engage the governor of Milan, and the marquis de Croix, in his ſuit. He even ordered the Genoeſe, taken at the battle of Ottagio, and permitted on their parole the freedom of the city, to be ſhut up in priſon, threatening to make their lives anſwer whatever ſhould be done to the conſpirators. There were, indeed, ſome circumſtances with reſpect to the Genoeſe priſoners, which gave a colour of juſtice to this proceeding, and greatly g embarraſſed the republic and the court of Spain. The ſenate reſolved, however, to run all risks, and even hazard the conſequences of a war, unſupported by Spain, rather than pardon

ſo groſs a violation of the laws of nature and ſociety. Vachero was not only ignominiouſly put to death, but his houſe razed to the ground, and a column, with an inſcription ſetting forth his crimes, erected on the ſpot (A). a

THE ſenate tried Vachero; but a court called the Burning Chamber was eſtabliſhed for the trial of the other conſpirators. The power, however, of this tribunal was limited in ſuch a manner that it could not condemn to death, until the evidence was firſt reported to the ſenate. When the duke of Savoy was informed of the death of Vachero, and the inquiſition erected for the trial of his accomplices, in the firſt tranſport of paſſion, he gave orders that four of the principal Genoeſe priſoners ſhould be puniſhed in the ſame manner; but his choler ſubſiding, he liſtened to the admonitions of his miniſters, who repreſented the inhumanity of ſacrificing innocent lives, and revoked his rigorous orders. The Spaniſh miniſtry b expreſſed great reſentment likewiſe at the little regard paid to the interceſſion of his Catholic majeſty; and the governor of Milan ſet at liberty ſeveral of the conſpirators arreſted in that city at the requeſt of the ſenate. But matters went no farther; the king of Spain was too cloſely connected with the republic in pecuniary matters and in trade, to ſuffer a diſpute of this nature to interfere with his intereſt.

CHARLES EMANUEL, duke of Savoy, dying in 1631, his ſon Victor Amadeus intreated his Catholic majeſty to terminate, by his mediation, his diſputes with the republic; which was done by a treaty ſigned at Madrid by the ambaſſadors of Genoa and Turin. By this treaty it was agreed, they ſhould mutually reſtore the towns, cannon, and priſoners, taken from each other ſince the commencement of the war: that the property of Zuccarel remain c in the republic, on payment of ſixteen thouſand crowns to the duke, at four inſtallments: that a general amneſty be granted to the ſubjects of either ſide who ſerved againſt their country; in which article were included the conſpirators, who were reſtored to their former eſtates and privileges. Both parties exclaimed againſt this article; the Genoeſe thinking it a groſs inſult on the republic, that traitors ſhould be comprehended in a treaty of peace; and the duke complaining that moſt of the conſpirators were already put to death, and only a few now alive to receive the benefit of the amneſty. To compenſate this loſs, he inſiſted on the full reſtitution of his gallies; that his cannon ſhould be ſent to Gavi, together with ſeveral other points, which were at laſt compromiſed, on condition that only priſoners of war be included in the general pardon.

THUS was peace at length concluded with Savoy, after a long and troubleſome war, d which had coſt the republic not leſs than eight millions, if we include the fortifications erected between fort Maurice and Savona, together with the new walls extending from the Lanthorn fort to the valley of Biſagno, great part of which were over mountains, and cut in the ſolid rock (B).

Plague in Genoa.

GENOA was no ſooner eaſed from the calamities of war, than it was afflicted with the ſtill more dreadful conſequences of peſtilence: however, by the excellent regulations of the ſenate, a ſtop was put to its progreſs, and the plague was intirely confined to the city, in which it did no conſiderable damage.

IN the year 1636, the Spaniards attempted to ſurpriſe the city; but notice of the plot e being given to the ſenate, by the republics of Venice and Florence, meaſures were taken to fruſtrate it. Accordingly the Spaniſh admiral was refuſed leave to enter the harbour, the fortifications were diligently inſpected, twenty-four companies of foot put under arms, and Charles Doria, who was ſuſpected to be privy to the deſign, arreſted with his whole family at Savona. The Spaniards diſappointed at ſeeing ſuch preparations, abandoned the enterprize, and the affair was dropt without any conſequences to affect the repoſe of the republic. From this time till the year 1656, Genoa enjoyed all the bleſſings of peace and commerce. On that year the city was moleſted with two evils, each of them calamitous, and

(A) Vachero, to avoid the ſhame of public puniſhment, endeavoured to put an end to his own life; and ſome writers ſay, that he was executed in priſon, to prevent his being reſcued by the mob: but it is agreed, that all his accomplices ended their lives on gibbets erected in the moſt conſpicuous places, with great firmneſs, and a conſtancy worthy of a better cauſe. His wife was put to the queſtion; but neither the intreaties of her friends, or the moſt exquiſite tortures, could prevail on her to diſcover any thing to the prejudice of her husband, whom, ſhe ſaid, it was her duty to honour and ſerve faithfully with all his faults.

a deſtructive of her happineſs. A dreadful plague reigned within the walls, and the corſairs were grown ſo powerful in the Mediterranean, that the trade of the republic was almoſt wholly deſtroyed. All inland traffic was likewiſe ſtopped up by the plague; ſo that the city was reduced to extreme diſtreſs. To remedy theſe evils, every poſſible precaution was taken to check the progreſs of the peſtilence, and a powerful fleet equipped againſt the Moors. On this occaſion, Hippolito Centurioni, the Genoeſe admiral, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in an extraordinary manner. Being ſeparated from the fleet in a hard gale, he fell in with four ſtout corſairs, who attacked him with great fury. The engagement was unequal in force; but Centurioni compenſated the want of numbers by ſkill and intrepidity: though raked on every ſide, and often boarded, he plyed his cannon and ſmall arms with ſuch b dexterity, that the enemy were conſtrained to ſheer off in a very ſhattered condition. This was the only action that happened; for the plague raging with unrelenting violence on board the reſt of the fleet, the admiral put into port, and the ſhips were laid up.

War with the corſairs of Barbary.

Next year the fleet put again to ſea; but were ſoon obliged to return, the plague having carried off near three hundred ſeamen in the ſpace of a week. Centurioni, however, with two gallies kept the ſea, and gained ſeveral advantages over the corſairs, taking ſome of their ſhips, and putting all to the ſword who fell into his hands; a ſeverity which ſomewhat checked their inſolence, and paved the way for a treaty of commerce concluded with the piratical ſtates, and Grand Seignior, on the following year. The treaty with the Porte was conſiderably extended by the marquis Durazzo, who went in quality of ambaſſador to c Conſtantinople in the year 1666. The particulars were mutually advantageous, and ſuch as renewed the vigour of the Genoeſe trade to a pitch beyond what any of the maritime towns experienced, ſince the Dutch had founded their commercial republic, and extended their trade not only to the Levant, but to every quarter of the globe.

For ſome years Genoa lived in peace with all the neighbouring powers, enjoyed domeſtic harmony, and aſſiduouſly cultivated commerce, and whatever could render the republic powerful and happy. Some little jealouſies and differences aroſe between her and Venice, the ſiſter and rival republic; but they were ſuch as terminated amicably, and never gave any diſturbance to the repoſe of Italy. Towards the year 1670, the duke of Savoy began d to renew his claim to ſome of the dependent territories of Genoa, at the perſuaſion of Raphael de la Torré, a young turbulent ambitious man, ſon to Torré, a celebrated civilian of that age. This gentleman was bred at Florence, and afterwards made page to the grand duke. Tired of this employment, he returned to his own country, where he confirmed every bad habit contracted at a wealthy and luxurious court. He afterwards made the tour of Italy, rather to cull vices than to improve his manners; and in coming back, indulged himſelf in the moſt profuſe and criminal diſſipation, to the ruin of his fortune, which he ſought means to repair at the expence of his country, and of his honour. How groſs ſoever his vices were, he had his imitators and adherents; and he linked himſelf in ſtrict ſociety with perſons of his own diſpoſition, who flattered his paſſions, and cajoled his vices, while e his fortune was able to ſupport their own. As his genius was lively, and imagination fertile in the worſt of artifices and calumnies, he profited himſelf of that talent. In a word, ſo eaſily did he extricate himſelf out of all difficulties into which his vices led him, that he was grown daring in the moſt enormous crimes, and inſolent in actions, which would have procured other men a gibbet. A laſt, a robbery on the high ſeas, which he committed, obliged him to fly Genoa; upon which he repaired to the court of Turin, and inſinuated himſelf into ſo much favour, that he obtained offices, which aſtoniſhed all thoſe who were acquainted with his character. Raiſed to the command of a company of cuiraſſiers, he immediately turned his thoughts to revenge the injury done to his reputation, in paſſing upon him a ſentence which he richly merited; for he was condemned to death at Genoa.

Account of La Torré and the conſpiracy he formed againſt Genoa.

f Determined to render his exile fatal to his native country, he firſt fell upon the meaneſt ſtratagems to execute the dictates of that inveterate grudge he bore to the city which gave him birth. The houſe of Cæſar Durazzo was burnt to the ground, and there was the ſtrongeſt preſumptions that Torré was the incendiary; for Durazzo, in quality of perpetual governor of the city, had paſſed ſentence on him. But not contented with a private revenge; he propoſed nothing leſs than the conqueſt of Genoa, and the ruin of the commonwealth, a plan for which he drew up and communicated to the young marquis Livorno, who was diſſuaded from preſenting it to the duke of Savoy by the marquis de Pianezza, his father, who had long governed Savoy in quality of prime miniſter, and now, though retired from buſineſs, was conſulted by all the princes of Italy as an oracle. La Torré, however, was ſo
g preſſing in his inſtances with the young marquis, that he at length procured him an audience of the duke. He found his highneſs's ſentiments favourable to his deſign, and the project was embraced, contrary to the ſentiments of the marquis Pianezza, who gave in ſeveral remonſtrances remonſtrances againſt embracing a ſcheme planned by the diſguſt and revenge of a wrong headed refugee. a

RAVISHED with joy at ſeeing his deſigns ſucceed ſo happily, La Torré indulged himſelf, like another Cataline, in the pleaſing proſpect of reducing the ſenate under his power, oppreſſing his enemies, pillaging the rich treaſures of St. George, and trampling on the liberties of his country. His mind, filled with revenge, rioted in imagination upon all the cruelties he ſhould be able to commit: he beheaded, proſcribed, oppreſſed, and ruined whole families, at pleaſure, glutting his fancy with the enchanting ſatisfaction of committing every vice, which a corrupted heart and fruitful head could invent.

BEING now protected by the duke's countenance, he began to commence hoſtilities, raiſing a gang of deſperadoes, to rob, plunder, and ſpoil his country: but theſe incurſions neither ſatiating his reſentment, his ambition, or his avarice, he reſolved to collect as ſtrong a band as he could, with which he formed a plan to ſurpriſe Savona in the night, than which nothing could be more romantic and wild, ſuppreſſing every circumſtance dictated by prudence, and cheriſhing only thoſe inſpired by his ſanguine expectations. The duke was flattered by his minions in whatever could gratify his ambition: he did not perceive the abſurdity of La Torré's project, becauſe he examined it only with the eye of paſſion and hope; for had he once applied to his reaſon, he could not fail of perceiving the futility, the weakneſs of the meaſure concerted by that rancorous exile. War with the republic was abſolutely determined upon; and count Catalan Alfieri, an officer of approved valour, was ordered to advance to Ceva with three thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe. They arrived here on the twenty-fourth of June, and then took the road to Savona in the night, with the utmoſt ſilence, attended only with petards, the artillery being unneceſſary, as a coup de main and ſurprize were intended. Alfieri, however, falling ill, the command devolved on the marquis Livorno, general of the cavalry. b c

THE ſenate had been advertiſed of the march of the Piedmonteſe army; but as it was in time of full peace, they doubted not but their intention was to go to work on ſome fortifications: however, when certain intelligence arrived of their approaching Savona, all were thrown into conſternation; but ſtill they could not perſuade themſelves that a young wild ſpendthrift, like La Torré, could have formed a plan ſo bold, or acquired influence enough at the court of Turin to have it embraced, notwithſtanding they were informed of his ſecret practices. The confuſion and terror in the capital was augmented by advices that certain companies, ſent to defend the paſſes, were beaten by the enemy. This intelligence, however, proved falſe; for Jerome Spinola, governor of Savona, in order to ſtrengthen theſe poſts and his own garriſon, had aſſembled the militia of the country, fortified the paſſes, and taken every neceſſary meaſure of defence. Some days after, a letter of the marquis Livorno was intercepted, whence it appeared that he had correſpondents in Genoa and Savona. A Piedmonteſe prieſt, who acted as a ſpy, was taken up; but he found means to eſcape the puniſhment he deſerved. d

WHATEVER precautions Spinola had taken for the ſecurity of Savona, the capital could oppoſe no more than a garriſon of three thouſand men, moſtly undiſciplined, to the regular numerous army of Savoy. Levies were ordered to be made, and the principal nobility took upon themſelves the charge of defending the moſt important poſts round the city. Marc Doria was ſent with two hundred Corſicans to Chiavari, to ſuppreſs ſome commotions in that place in favour of La Torré. Indeed the Corſicans exerted a laudable ſpirit on this occaſion, for the ſupport of the government. The nobility of the iſland raiſed companies at their own expence, which they ſent over to Genoa, under the conduct of their ſons, brothers, or cadets of their families. e

TO theſe preparations the ſenate added others of no leſs conſequence. Commiſſaries were ſent to the valley of Poſeveri, to raiſe the peaſants of the valley and neighbouring mountains; ſome ſtout men of war were equipped, the number of gallies augmented, which immediately ſailed for the protection of the maritime towns. All the nobility, and ſome of the citizens, raiſed men at their own expence; and prince John Andrea Doria, then a youth, diſtinguiſhed his patriotiſm in a very extraordinary manner, offering his perſon, his fortune, and all his influence, for the ſervice of his country. His example drew forth the generoſity of the reſt of the nobility; and ſo liberal were their donations, that in the ſpace of a few days the ſum of three millions of livres was raiſed for the public uſe, and about ſix thouſand foot for the defence of the city. Even the women, in ſpite of the natural weakneſs of their ſex, were highly ſerviceable to the government, contributing their jewels and ornaments for the protection of liberty, and the expences of ſo juſt a war. f

IN the mean time, the Piedmonteſe army, which had reſted for ſome days at Ottari, renewed their march; but, as if the elements had conſpired againſt them, they had ſcare advanced g a vanced two miles, when a moſt dreadful ſtorm of thunder, lightning, and rain, fell with ſuch violence as greatly frightened and diſcompoſed them. This incident, and intelligence of the preparations made by the Genoeſe, induced the marquis Livorno to alter his purpoſe, and inſtead of beſieging Savona, to march his troops towards Salicet. Soon after the arrival of the army here, the marquis Catalan, ſomewhat recovered from his illneſs, joined the army, and determined to lay ſiege to Pavia. His march was rapid, and the conſternation of the inhabitants of this place proportioned to the ſuddenneſs of the ſtroke. Their courage failed them, and the town was ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons. Here it was that the marquis publiſhed ſeveral manifeſtoes, declaring the duke of Savoy's motives for ſeizing upon Pavia, which, he ſaid, was rather to ſecure his own poſſeſſions againſt the in- Pavia taken.

b curſions of the Genoeſe peaſants, than to augment his dominions by unjuſt conqueſts. To theſe manifeſtoes the republic made ſeveral ſpirited replies, which were ſent to the Genoeſe ambaſſadors at the ſeveral courts of Europe.

At this time, the duke d'Oſſona was governor of Milan, a man whoſe intereſt the ſenate knew to be very conſiderable at the court of Madrid. It was their buſineſs, therefore, to prevent the duke's falling in with the meaſures of Savoy, which would throw the weight of Spain in that ſcale, and make it greatly preponderate. Upon this conſideration, the marquis Francis Maria Balbi was ſent to Milan, to gain over the duke; and a more fit ambaſſador could not be choſen, both for his illuſtrious rank, and lively engaging addreſs. Notwithſtanding, however, all his arts and remonſtrances, the duke d'Oſſona's reply was exc tremely equivocal, and couched in ſuch terms as gave the ſenate uneaſineſs, although it did not damp their ſpirit. Upon the departure of Balbi, he publiſhed an edict ſtrictly prohibiting all the ſubjects of his catholic majeſty from enliſting in the ſervice of any foreigners; which was the moſt poſitive refuſal of the ſenate's requeſt, that he would ſend them ſuccours. But to preſerve the appearance of neutrality, he made loud complaints againſt the duke of Savoy, particularly of the march of his army through the catholic king's dominions without permiſſion; and of the little diſcipline maintained among his troops, by which his majeſty's ſubjects ſuſtained ſeveral groſs indignities and flagrant injuries.

The Genoeſe ſenate were no ſtrangers to the duke d'Oſſona's real ſentiments; but as he did not declare againſt the republic, they were ſatisfied, and took the moſt vigorous ſteps for d defeating the deſigns formed by the court of Turin. Receiving advice that the enemy were fortifying Pavia, they put all the neighbouring places in a ſtate of defence. What moſt embarraſſed the magiſtrates and generals of the republic, was the terror which had laid hold of the minds of the people, particularly the peaſants, before they had ſet eyes on the enemy. Every perſon who could afford freight, was preparing to move off to ſome foreign country with his family and effects. As nothing could be more pernicious to the public, the ſenate reſolved to put a ſtop to this practice by the moſt ſevere edicts; which, however, proved inſufficient, till the country was put in ſuch a poſture of defence, as bid defiance to all the power of Savoy.

What contributed to the ſecurity of the republic more than all her endeavours, was the Great diſor-
e diſorder that reigned in the enemy's camp. The marquis de Catalan received at Pavia a der in the Piedmonteſe camp. reinforcement of five hundred foot ſent from Mondovi. On their arrival they were ſo fatigued and jaded with their march over deſert rugged mountains, as to be unfit for ſervice, and ſo badly diſciplined, that they abandoned themſelves to every kind of licentiouſneſs, ruining by their example the reſt of the army. The indulgence of their officers encreaſed their abandoned inſolence, and ſet them on committing the moſt flagrant thefts and robberies with impunity. Catalan exerted all his influence to reſtrain them; he cajoled, harangued, and puniſhed them to no purpoſe. The duke of Savoy had particularly enjoined him to treat his new ſubjects of Pavia with the utmoſt indulgence, the ſooner to conciliate their affections. Catalan endeavoured to obey his orders; but all was fruſtrated by the turbulent f mutinous ſpirit which daily encreaſed among the ſoldiery. Daily complaints againſt the army were lodged by the inhabitants; the general puniſhed without remedying the diſorders, and his ſeverity produced no other effect than deſertion, which became ſo general, that two hundred frequently went off in a day to the Genoeſe, and incorporated themſelves in the troops of the republic.

On the other hand, the Pavians, not able to endure the inſolence of thoſe who remained, began firſt with attacking all ſtrollers, whom they ſacrificed without mercy: next, they proceeded to more open defiance, and expreſſed their reſentment by forming a kind of regular army, with which they attacked the works erecting by the Piedmonteſe, and attempted to cut off the communication between the infantry and cavalry. Several skirmiſhes paſſed, g and numbers were ſlain on both ſides; but the Piedmonteſe were generally worſted.

In this ſituation were affairs, when the duke of Savoy ſent D. Gabriel of Savoy, with a ſtrong reinforcement, to take the command of the army, reſtore diſcipline, and puſh the war

war againſt the republic with all poſſible vigour. This prince made ſuch diſpatch, that he arrived on the eighth of July at Pavia, and found the troops greatly diminiſhed by deſertion and ſkirmiſhes with the enemy; the generals at variance; all diſcipline neglected; and the whole in a ſtate of confuſion: however, inſtead of applying remedies to evils of ſo dangerous conſequence, the prince contented himſelf with making replies to the manifeſtoes publiſhed by the republic, in which he ſhewed the quibble of a ſchoolman rather than the talents of a politician. a

WHILE the Piedmonteſe generals were thus making war among themſelves, the republic neglected nothing which could forward their affairs, during this relaxation from hoſtilities. The ſenate well knew, that gaining time was of the utmoſt importance to the defenſive ſide; they abſtained, for this reaſon, from every meaſure which could rouſe and irritate the enemy, contenting themſelves with completing their levies, fortifications, and magazines. The prince of Piedmont repaired to court to receive freſh inſtructions, leaving Catalan in the utmoſt perplexity how to act. Of this the Genoeſe made their advantage; and ſo harraſſed him with perpetual attacks on his foragers and convoys, that he reſolved to leave Pavia, after razing the fortifications, and at length enter upon ſome action, which would ſilence the reproaches of his enemies, eſpecially of the marquis Livorno, who was his rival in command and glory. He was ſenſible of beginning the campaign under great diſadvantages, when all the paſſes were ſtrongly fortified, and the enemy in a poſture of defence: however, regard to his own reputation, and the inſtructions of his court, obliged him to put the army in motion, to keep up the credit of the Piedmonteſe arms. After receiving a reinforcement of ten thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, he begun with attempting to open the paſſes, and chiefly thoſe which led from Pavia to Ormea; and the Genoeſe officers uſed all their diligence to fruſtrate his meaſures. Reſtori, a Corſican officer, taking the command of all his countrymen, who kept up perpetual ſkirmiſhes with the Piedmonteſe: at laſt he came to a more general action, in which he muſt have ſunk under numbers, had he not been ſeaſonably ſupported by Gentile, a Genoeſe general, who maintained the battle upon an equal footing, till the enemy again gained the ſuperiority by the arrival of the marquis Livorno. After this Reſtori drew off his troops in good order; but left the enemy in poſſeſſion of the out-poſts of Pavia, and the bridge of St. Anthony, from the firſt of which he wanted to diſlodge them. b c A battle between the two armies. d

THE advantage gained by the Piedmonteſe on this occaſion did not prevent the Corſican general from harraſſing Catalan's out-guards, and cutting off his convoys in ſuch a manner as greatly diſtreſſed him. This rendered it neceſſary once more to ſend the prince Gabriel to the army, accompanied by the regiment of Piedmont, and a great number of volunteers. This junction no ſooner took place, than the army was divided into two columns, the prince with the ſtronger marching towards Oneille, to prevent the Genoeſe gallies from ſeizing on that important place: In his way he ſummoned the ſlight fortreſs of Deano, garriſoned by a handful of militia, and fifty Corſicans, to ſurrender, threatening to give no quarter ſhould the governor refuſe to comply; but that brave officer returned an anſwer, that he would defend his charge with the laſt drop of his blood. This reply he faithfully adhered to, and, by his vigorous defence, obliged the prince to abandon the ſiege. In his retreat he was attacked by Reſtori and his Corſicans with great intrepidity. For ſome time the Piedmonteſe ſtood their ground; but the fury of the Corſicans at length broke and defeated them with the loſs of ſixty officers, killed, wounded, and taken priſoners. After this, his highneſs was ſtill more unfortunate; for taking the road of Tatico, near Stuknello, he found the poſt ſo ſtrongly guarded, that, without hopes of paſſing it, he was attacked in front, flanks, and rear, by the Corſicans. Theſe brave iſlanders, without regard to diſcipline, fell on with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Piedmonteſe were totally diſcomfited, and were ſaved from deſtruction only by a ſtrong reinforcement, which fortunately joined them from Catalan. It is true, the Corſicans likewiſe received conſtant ſupplies of freſh troops from the gallies; but their bravery, and not their numbers, it was that obtained the victory, and forced prince Gabriel to ſkreen himſelf under the habit of a prieſt, by which he eſcaped being made priſoner. e The Genoeſe gain ſeveral advantages. f

As for Catanella, his meaſures were more prudently taken, and the iſſue more fortunate. His deſign was to attack Roccabarbena; and, to prevent the enemy's penetrating his views, or incommoding his march, he divided his army into three bodies, each of which had orders to march to the place appointed by different roads. The ſcheme ſucceeded; he appeared before the town without moleſtation, and obtained poſſeſſion of it after an hour's cannonading, notwithſtanding the garriſon was ſufficiently ſtrong to have made a long defence. Such was the ſhameful panic which ſeized the Genoeſe troops, that they fled at a poſtern-gate, leaving their arms behind, to prevent their being encumbered in their flight. The ſame ſucceſs attended this general before Zuccarel, a place of ſlight defence, and ruinous g a walls, but garriſoned by Piedmonteſe deſerters, who, expecting no quarter, made deſperate efforts to prevent their falling into the hands of thoſe who would not fail to puniſh their perfidy.

WHILE Catanella remained at Zuccarel, he was joined by Carlo Emilio de Parella, an officer of fire and ſpirit, who was diſpleaſed with the cautious conduct of the general, and preſſed him to vigorous meaſures, contrary to prudence. Catanella, fearing his reputation might ſuſtain ſome prejudice from the miſrepreſentations of Parella, advanced towards Albengna, and ſent to requeſt prince Gabriel to join him there. But the prince's circumſtances would not permit it, the roads being infeſted with bands of Corſicans, and himſelf wholly engaged in preparations for recovering Villa Nova, which the Genoeſe had lately
b taken. The marquis Livorno, indeed, offered to conduct the army to Albengna, and the prince yielded to his remonſtrances: but the iſſue had near proved fatal; for the Corſicans attacked them in the narrow paſſes, rendered it impoſſible to advance, and almoſt cut off a retreat. Catanella, on the other hand, finding himſelf too weak to attempt any thing with his own corps, and the prince unable to alter his ſituation, made ſeveral puſhes to unite the whole Piedmonteſe army; but this the Genoeſe and Corſicans fruſtrated by their diligence.

WHEN Catalan perceived the Genoeſe forces daily augment, himſelf cut off from the reſt of the army, forage, proviſion, and ammunition failing, and the ſoldiers murmuring, concluding that the campaign muſt end in his ruin, if he kept the open field, he reſolved to retreat among ſome inacceſſible rocks and mountains in the neighbourhood of Zuccarel;
c and in that ſituation wait till fortune ſhould favour the endeavours of the prince to join him. The great irreſolution which appeared in all his motions, indeed, perſuaded the prince, and even Catalan's own officers that he never had any ſerious thoughts of effecting a junction; becauſe they imagined this might have been done by force, had he pleaſed. Exceſs of prudence ſometimes paſſes for folly; Catalan's conduct was not without ſolid reaſons to excuſe it. He had left behind his baggage under a ſlight guard, which his ſon commanded, in the neighbourhood of Albengna. Had he removed at any conſiderable diſtance, the Genoeſe garriſon in that town would be more than ſufficient to beat his ſon, and take all his baggage, which it was impoſſible to carry acroſs the mountains. It was this that induced him to chuſe a ſtrong encampment to wait for the prince, who was now red duced to great ſtraits by the junction of the Genoeſe forces, and the nature of their diſpoſition, which rendered it next to impracticable for him to hold any communication with Catanella. On the other hand, this officer, greatly ſtraitened for proviſions in his preſent encampment, was deſirous of cantoning his army in Caſtel Vecchio, Erli, and Gereſſio, which was a matter of difficulty, on account of the barren mountains he muſt neceſſarily croſs, and the variety of parties with which the Genoeſe blocked up all the paſſes. Neceſſity, however, obliged him to make the experiment; and, after a fatiguing march, the van-guard arrived at Gereſſio when the rear was attacked by the Genoeſe. The Piedmonteſe army had marched in two columns, which were now ſeparated by a long wall that encloſes one ſide of Elri, and it was neceſſary to open a breach here before the corps could aſſiſt
e each other. In the mean time the rear of the army was put in confuſion, and the bridge at Elri ſeized, to prevent Catalan's throwing himſelf into Gereſſio, which was the only paſs by which he could procure ſubſiſtence for the troops. The marquis de Livorno, who commanded the rear of the ſecond column, was entirely defeated; the marquis Careto, third in command, ſlain; together with a great number of ſoldiers and volunteers, which obliged Catanella to make the beſt of his way with his ſcattered forces to Caſtel-Vecchio, a place neither fortified, nor capable of ſupplying him with proviſions. Parella, with a body of volunteers, ſeized upon a church and a ſmall fort in the neighbourhood; and the regiments of Montferrat and Piedmont gained the paſſes of Gereſſio and Zuccarel.

CASTEL-VECCHIO was of all places the moſt unfit to ſuſtain a ſiege, yet Catanella was
f reduced to this neceſſity. On the third of Auguſt, Reſtori with his Corſicans inveſted the place, while Gentilé, with the Genoeſe under his command, ſurrounded Parella. Reſtori's firſt meaſure was to deprive the beſieged of water, for which he knew they muſt be pinched in a few days. The exceſſive heat of the weather effectually anſwered his purpoſe, and reduced the Piedmonteſe, in the ſpace of two days, to the moſt deplorable neceſſity; nor was there any method of removing it, but by forcing the lines which the Corſicans had drawn, and their triple retrenchments defended with cannon. Water was ſold at an enormous price, and the ſoldiers fell down dead with thirſt; upon which Catalan determined to break his way through ſword in hand. The efforts he made were, indeed, glorious, though unhappy: by moon-light he ſallied forth at the head of his men, forced one line after another, and filled them with ſlaughter. The Genoeſe and Corſicans behaved with the utmoſt intrepidity; but the confuſion which happened in the night, rendered it impoſſible to diſtinguiſh friends from foes, by which means Catanella, Livorno, and a few other officers and ſoldiers, made their eſcape, all the reſt being killed or taken priſoners. Parella, with the whole force under his command, was forced to ſurrender at diſcretion; and thus the whole Piedmonteſe army was almoſt totally ruined in one campaign. a

IT was the misfortune of the Genoeſe, either to be ignorant of the means of purſuing their victory, or at leaſt to neglect them. It is a maxim in war never to lay aſide arms till the conquered are under the neceſſity of ſuing for peace. Had the republic attended to this, and carried the war into the enemy's country, the duke of Savoy would have been compelled to grant any terms; but the ſenate contented itſelf with repulſing the danger with which the ſtate was threatened, without a thought of purſuing their good fortune. Inſtead of this, their inactivity animated the duke of Savoy to retrieve his affairs by the moſt vigorous meaſures, at a time when all the world expected to ſee the victorious Genoeſe army carrying ſlaughter and devaſtation to the walls of Turin. Clement the ninth interpoſed b his mediation to reconcile the parties; but the duke's levies being in great forwardneſs, and ſtrong reaſons, furniſhed by the conduct of the Genoeſe, to ſuppoſe thoſe republicans better acquainted with the means of obtaining, than of uſing victory, induced his highneſs to reject all pacific propoſitions. This, however, he did in ſuch a manner, as to amuſe the nuncio, and lull the republic into ſecurity, while he was preparing to deſtroy the very being of the commonwealth. Reſolving to purſue the war with all his forces, and the allies he could make, he diſpatched ambaſſadors to the duke of Bavaria, his brother-in-law, to the dukes of Parma and Mantua, and to Lewis the fourteenth for aſſiſtance. From this monarch he had great hopes of powerful ſuccours, as the anſwer of Lewis appeared favourable, when he was addreſſed to this purpoſe at the commencement of the war. c

AT laſt, the ſenate penetrated the duke's intentions, and, after ſuffering themſelves to be amuſed a long time, ordered their armies to take the field. That under Prato undertook the ſiege of Oneille, the capital of a ſmall principality of that name belonging to Savoy, and obliged the garriſon to ſurrender upon honourable conditions (C). The reduction of this city was followed by that of Corio, Aprico, St. Sebaſtian, St. Peter, Bergo de Marro, Condeſco, and ſeveral other places that ſent deputies to Prato, offering their ſubmiſſion. He then pitched his camp under the walls of Oneille, in a ſtrong ſituation, where he could neither be forced or ſtraitened. This ſeaſonable motion prevented the French fleet, which appeared on the coaſt, from attempting any thing contrary to the intereſt of the republic; for their firſt intention was to have raiſed the ſiege of Oneille, and to retake it. d

Several towns yield to the Genoeſe.

Progreſs of the war.

THE Genoeſe, who had now ten thouſand men in the enemy's country, formed two flying camps under Reſtari and Frediani. Reſtori marched with ſix thouſand men, chiefly Corſicans, acroſs the mountains, to form the attack of Briga, an important place in the neighbourhood of Ventimiglia. On his firſt motion, the peaſants aſſembled to defend the paſs called Notre Dame, within a mile of Briga; but they were ſoon diſlodged, and Briga forced to ſurrender on the firſt aſſault.

FRANCIS MARIA SPINOLA CETO, who commanded the army of St. Remo, was leſs fortunate in the ſiege of Perinaldo, a large town belonging to the duke of Savoy. After firing the works in the ſuburbs, he applied petards to the gates, and ſcaling-ladders to the walls; but was obliged to retire with precipitation, the beſieged having almoſt covered his e men with great ſtones and flaming combuſtibles. He was afterwards joined by Frediani, and both generals reſumed the ſiege with more alacrity and ſucceſs, the governor having ſurrendered at diſcretion after a ſhort attack.

THIS was not the only ſubject of affliction to the duke of Savoy; another of more conſequence occurred about this time. The Spaniſh gallies, commanded by the duke de Turſis, entering the port of Genoa, acted in concert with the Genoeſe admiral, in carrying ſtores, ammunition, and men, to all the maritime towns, which was a direct declaration of his Catholic majeſty's good will to the republic. His highneſs gave immediate inſtructions to his ambaſſador at Madrid, to complain to his majeſty of this breach of his profeſſed neutrality, hoping to obtain an order to recal Turſis; or, in caſe of refuſal, to make Lewis the f fourteenth declare himſelf againſt the republic: but he applied himſelf chiefly to work on the paſſions of the latter, and ſucceeded ſo happily, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, agreeable to the maxims eſtabliſhed in Italy of aſſiſting the weaker ſide, ordered the marquis de Vivonne, with a ſtrong ſquadron, to watch the motions of the Genoeſe fleet, and treat them as enemies, in caſe the republic refuſed liſtening to a reaſonable accommodation, and the mediation of the French envoy.

IT is certain that the republic had always been inclined to peace, and prolonged the war for no other reaſon than becauſe the enemy would not grant ſuch terms as the ſucceſs of

(C) According to Mailly, Oneille was beſieged by general Duraxzo, and taken ſome months after Prato had put his corps in motion (1). It muſt therefore have been the town of Azzo, which, on this occaſion, ſurrendered to Prato.

a the Genoeſe arms deſerved. On the contrary, the duke of Savoy was making the greateſt preparations for attacking the Genoeſe territories on the ſide of Lombardy, where the country was more open, and his cavalry at liberty to act. A powerful army was ſet in motion with orders to attack the enemy in four different quarters, viz. by the paſs of Nova, the mountain of Airolo, behind Pavia, the paſs of Erli, and by the mountain Juſtinian, near Torrano. In their march they were attacked by the Genoeſe, and great numbers of them ſlain in the defiles. But the ill ſucceſs of this ſkirmiſh did not prevent the Piedmonteſe from forcing the paſs of Nova and Erli; after which they burnt ſeveral Genoeſe tents pitched in form of a ſmall camp. The marquis St. Damien, with three thouſand regulars, and a great army of peaſants, laid all the Genoeſe villages in aſhes, and put the inhabitants
b to the ſword; after which he retook Rinaldo, and ſome other places of leſs importance. He made ſeveral attempts on Pena, all of which were fruſtrated by the diligence and intrepidity of the inhabitants, who adhered with an inviolable conſtancy to the fidelity they owed the republic. His diſappointment the marquis revenged on the country lying round Ventimiglia, which he pillaged and burnt, while Prato was buſy putting the fortifications of the town in a ſtate of defence.

After this it was that a fourth attempt was made on Rena, and the place beſieged in form by general Badate, detached with a ſtrong corps by the marquis St. Damien. On this occaſion the beſieged behaved with more gallantry than ever, defending the town againſt the will of the treacherous governor, who, finding them obſtinate, deſerted to the enemy.
c His name was Corſelin, which ought to be tranſmitted with infamy to poſterity, as that of his ſucceſſor merits the higheſt praiſes. Captain Gaſtaldi took the command on Corſelin's departure, and refuſed to capitulate on any terms, tho' the Piedmonteſe general threatened to put to death his two ſons who were priſoners in the camp. His zeal for the ſervice of his country abſorbed all the dictates of natural affection, Gaſtaldi preferring the reputation of a faithful and brave citizen, to that of a fond father. He ſo animated and inſpired his men, that, pinched with the extremity of want, they bravely determined to wait for aſſiſtance from Prato, who was making efforts to relieve this brave garriſon of militia. At laſt, the ſiege was raiſed by Frediani, who, after defeating ſeveral parties of the beſiegers, found means to throw a large convoy into Rena, under cover of a vigorous ſally made by d Gaſtaldi.

Bravery of the garriſon of Rena.

In the mean time, the duke's army on the ſide of Lombardy, was more ſucceſsful, the number of the Piedmonteſe cavalry giving the general a great advantage over the Genoeſe. Ovada ſurrendered to the duke's general, and this obliged Durazzo to recal thoſe from Dolce Aqua, when he was juſt on the point of ſtorming in breach, and making himſelf maſter of the place. It was imagined the Piedmonteſe would next undertake the ſiege of Ventimiglia, to cover which place Prato was recalled. Upon this occaſion, his retreat, amidſt dangerous defiles, lined with the enemy's troops, does more honour to the military ſkill of that officer, than all his former actions, which had raiſed his reputation high. Immediately after this he prepared to relieve Pena, which was again inveſted by the Piedmonteſe, as if they were dee termined to conquer the obſtinacy of this little intrepid garriſon. The efforts he made to accompliſh this purpoſe diminiſhed nothing of the reputation which he ſo deſervedly acquired. D. Anthony of Savoy, with an army of ſix thouſand men, triply entrenched, covered the ſiege; and Prato, with ſcarce one thouſand regulars, planned a ſcheme for forcing this ſtrong camp, or raiſing the ſiege. He diſpoſed his men in ſuch a manner as to conceal his weakneſs, and attacked the enemy with ſuch fury in different quarters, that having forced two entrenchments, he was in a fair way of gaining the third, when a ſudden panic ſeized his men, made them retire with precipitation, leaving their brave general to fall into the hands of the enemy, had he not been reſcued by Grampilla, who flew with a ſmall corps to his aſſiſtance, and brought him off. Notwithſtanding this repulſe, Prato made himſelf maf ſter of Brecco next day, which he fortified, in hopes by this means of making a diverſion in favour of the garriſon of Pena. All his endeavours hitherto proved ineffectual: and the generals of ſuperior rank believing the deſign impracticable, and that all attempts would only be attended with the loſs of ſo many brave ſoldiers, ſent orders for Prato to retire, and rejoin the main army under Durazzo. This was what Prato could not prevail upon himſelf to do: he eſteemed it diſhonourable to ſuffer a brave garriſon to periſh for want of aſſiſtance, and determined upon one more exertion of his genius and courage for their relief. Carefully concealing the orders he had received, and the arrival of the gallies in which he was to embark his men, he publiſhed a report that they had a reinforcement of five hundred men on board, with which he intended next morning attacking the g enemy's lines. In order to publiſh this news in the enemy's camp, he ordered two Corſican deſperadoes to deſert, and take the firſt opportunity of returning to him. By them D. Anthony of Savoy was informed of Prato's intention; and, not caring to come a ſecond

time to blows with an officer of ſo invincible courage, he ſet fire to his camp and raiſed the ſiege; upon which Prato ordered Dornano, with two companies of foot, and a quantity of proviſion and ammunition, to throw himſelf into Pena. No ſooner did the inhabitants ſee themſelves once more delivered from their enemies, than they determined upon revenge, the cruelty of which ſullied all the glory acquired by their courage and fidelity. They murdered all their priſoners, before notice of their intention was given to Prato; an action which afforded matter of great grief to that brave officer, whoſe humanity and principles of honour were equal to his conduct and intrepidity (A). In the mean time, D. Gabriel of Savoy was making rapid conqueſts on the ſide of Lombardy. Ovada was taken after a tedious and bloody ſiege; Oneille regained, and Saſello reduced, in ſpite of the endeavours of the Genoeſe generals. Prato, however, was determined not to abandon the coaſt towns to Damien and D. Antonio of Savoy, although he had repeated orders to embark and join the forces in Lombardy. Inſtead of obeying, he returned the gallies empty, ſending the ſenate an explicit juſtification of his conduct, which was approved; a dangerous precedent of diſobedience, but a meaſure ſometimes neceſſary, where the fidelity, courage, and ability of the perſon are unqueſtionable. Indeed, without this diſcretionary power, it is impoſſible to accommodate meaſures to circumſtances, which hourly change, and become totally different in military operations (B).

His Holineſs and Catholic majeſty now uſed all their influence to accommodate matters betwixt the republic and duke, to prevent the flames of war from ſpreading through the reſt of Italy: but it was Goſmont, the French envoy, who put the laſt hand to this work, removing, by his addreſs, every difficulty that lay in the way. In his way to Genoa he paſſed through Turin, and ſoon penetrated the intentions of the duke, which were to gain time, in hopes of fully re-eſtabliſhing his affairs. The French miniſter ſoon convinced his highneſs, that he muſt either liſten to the mediators, or run the hazard of their joining with his enemies to compel him into meaſures neceſſary to the repoſe of Italy. Having diſpoſed the duke to accept of Lewis's mediation, he haſtened to Genoa, where he was magnificently entertained in the houſe of Pietro Spinola. He next day had an audience of the ſenate, before whom he laid his inſtructions, which were to demand the reſtitution of Oneille, and a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities; after which they were required to appoint commiſſaries to treat of peace. Immediately the ſenate conſented to the truce, but remonſtrated againſt the reſtitution of Oneille, though they were ſoon obliged to accede to this propoſition. At laſt peace was concluded, on condition that the priſoners ſhould be mutually releaſed, their conqueſts mutually reſtored, and boundaries left to be adjuſted by the doctors of Ferrara; ſoon after which the duke died, highly eſteemed and regretted.

For ſome years the republic diligently purſued her commerce, and reaped all the bleſſings of repoſe. In the year 1684, the Genoeſe had the misfortune to incur the reſentment of Lewis the fourteenth, which had almoſt proved fatal to the city, bombarded by a formidable royal armament. Peace, however, was purchaſed by thoſe humiliating conceſſions which the reader has already ſeen at the cloſe of our hiſtory of France [a].

[a] Vol. 25. Un. Mod. Hiſt.

(A) Notwithſtanding this barbarous action, which was executed without the conſent of Gaſtaldi, the ſenate recompenſed the valour of the garriſon, by ordering penſions for life to the wounded, the widows, and children of the deceaſed, and half a year's pay to be preſented to the living. Gaſtaldi had a handſome penſion ſettled on him, and portions aſſigned for his daughters. The city of Ventimiglia had ſo ſtrong a ſenſe of the ſervice done by Prato, in relieving Pena, that it ſolemnly decreed a yearly preſent of a fine ſword, adorned with jewels, to be made to him, as the recompence beſt ſuited to the diſpoſition of a warrior, and his generous diſintereſted ſpirit (1).

(B) The chevalier Mailly relates another ſedition excited this year in Genoa by one La Torré, without diſtinguiſhing him from a perſon of the ſame name, mentioned particularly in the beginning of this war. He even inſinuates, contrary to the teſtimony of all other authors, that La Torré eſcaped on that occaſion, and that now the inquiſition proceeded againſt him on diſcovery of the plot, executed him, razed his houſe, confiſcated his eſtate, baniſhed his family, and perpetuated his infamy by an inſcription in braſs, ſetting forth his crimes (2).

HISTORY of the GERMAN EMPIRE.

CHAP. I.

Containing the Hiſtory of Germany, from the Election of Conrad, to the Succeſſion of Otho.

INTRODUCTION.

a WE have, in the Antient Hiſtory, traced the gradual decline of the Weſtern empire, which, after having been weakened by diviſions and inteſtine broils, was deluged by an inundation of fierce and warlike nations, who have likewiſe been deſcribed under the names of Allemans, Gepidæ, Franks, Suevi, Heruli, Burgundians, &c. We have ſeen how Odoacer, king of the Heruli, made ſuch a ſucceſsful expedition into Italy, that the emperor Auguſtulus, being in no condition to make head againſt him, was obliged to ſubmit, and his reſignation put an end to the empire in the Weſt. The Heruli were ſoon expelled by the Oſtrogoths, and theſe, in their turn, ſubdued by Juſtinian, who re-united this province to the Eaſtern empire; but the popes found means to obtain the temporal, as well as ſpiritual juriſdiction over a conſiderable part of it, while the reſt was erected into a b kingdom by the Lombards, who were very troubleſome neighbours to the pontiffs, and at length beſieged Adrian I. in his capital. In this emergency he had recourſe to Charlemagne, who came to his relief with a powerful army, defeated Deſiderius, and cauſed himſelf to be crowned king of Lombardy. The pope, in order to expreſs his gratitude to that victorious monarch, and ſecure the protection of ſuch a powerful ally, did, with the conſent of the Roman people, declare him emperor, and dignified his dominions with the appellation of the new Weſtern empire, after he had agreed that the pontiffs ſhould reſide in Rome, while he himſelf ſhould chooſe his reſidence on the other ſide of the Alps, where he might be nearer the center of his territories.

THUS Germany became the ſeat of the Weſtern empire; the hiſtory of which it is now c our purpoſe to diſplay; but, before we proceed to a detail of the events which compoſe it, the reader will, doubtleſs, be pleaſed to find ſome general account of this great body, in a ſummary ſketch of that conſtitution by which it ſubſiſts; that, from ſuch previous information, he may conceive a diſtinct idea of the politics which actuated particular ſtates, as well as the motives that influenced the reſolutions and conduct of the community.

The limits of Germany;

GERMANY is at preſent bounded on the north by the Baltic ſea, Denmark, and the German ocean; on the ſouth by Italy and the Swiſs; on the eaſt by Pruſſia, Hungary, and Poland; and on the weſt by the Low Countries, Lorraine, and Franche Compte; ſo that it comprehends the Palatinate, Cologne, Triers, and Liege, which formerly belonged to the Gauls, and is diſmembered of Friezland, Groningen, and Overyſſel, which are now incord porated with the Low Countries.

SINCE the reign of Charlemagne, this country is divided into High and Low Germany: the firſt, towards the ſouth, comprehending the Palatinate of the Rhine, Franconia, Suabia, Bavaria, Bohemia, Moravia, Auſtria, Carinthia, Carniola, Stiria, Tyrol, the Swiſs, and the Griſons; while the provinces of Lower Germany towards the north conſiſt of the Low Country of the Rhine, Triers, Cologn, Mentz, Weſtphalia, Heſſe, Brunſwic, Miſnia, Luſatia, High Saxony upon the Elbe, Low Saxony upon the Elbe, Mecklenburgh, Lauenburgh, Brandenburgh, Magdeburgh, and Pomerania.

GERMANY is likewiſe diſtinguiſhed by thoſe countries that border upon the Rhine, the Danube, the Oder, the Elbe, and the Weſer; and thirdly, it is divided into certain generae lities or large provinces, called circles, comprehending the princes, prelates, counts, and cities, which, on account of their nearneſs to each other, may conveniently aſſemble about their common affairs. Under this appellation the members of the empire were divided by Maximilian I. into ſix parts, namely, Franconia, Bavaria, Suabia, the circle of the Rhine, Weſtphalia, and Lower Saxony: he afterwards added thoſe of Auſtria, Burgundy, the Lower Rhine,

Rhine, and High Saxony; so that the number was augmented to ten, and confirmed in the reign of Charles V. a

EACH circle is provided with directors and a colonel; the first being invested with the power of convoking the general assembly of the states belonging to the circle, and of regulating its public affairs, while the colonel is intrusted with the command of the soldiers, and the care of the artillery and munitions of war.

As all the members must contribute for the occasions of the empire, each circle is taxed for the support of the troops and other public necessities, at the rate of so many horse and foot, or a certain monthly sum, distinguished by the name of Roman months; an appellation derived from the first use of that tax, which was levied for the support of 20,000 foot and 4000 horse, to accompany the emperor in his journey to Rome; and those who could not furnish soldiers, paid a monthly equivalent in money. b

THE circle of Austria, of which the emperor, as archduke, is director, comprehends all the provinces depending upon the empire, which are possessed by the house of Austria; for the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, together with several other states, which they possess independent of the empire, are not comprised in this circle.

THE circle of Bavaria, so called, because that duchy constitutes the principal part of it, includes several other independent states; the elector, as duke of Bavaria, and the archbishop of Salzburgh, being the directors.

THE circle of Suabia, which, more than any other, abounds with imperial towns, has for directors the bishop of Constance and the duke of Wirtemberg.

THOSE of the circle of Franconia, denominated from the province of that name, are the bishop of Bamberg and the margrave of Bareith, or Culmbach, who possesses the burgraviate of Nuremburg. c

THE circle of Upper Saxony is under the sole directorship of the elector; but as for that of Low Saxony, which is one of the most considerable circles in Germany, the king of Sweden, as duke of Bremen, and the elector of Brandenburgh, as duke of Magdeburgh, are alternately co-directors with the eldest of the dukes of Brunswic and Lunenburgh.

THE circle of Westphalia produces such plenty of men and horse fit for service, that, in time of war, the states of this province chuse to furnish their proportion rather in those than in money: their directors being the elector of Brandenburgh and duke of Neubourg, with the bishop of Munster (A). d

THE circle of the Lower Rhine, which is also called the circle of the four electors, because it includes the three ecclesiastic electors, and the Palatinate situated upon the Rhine, has for directors the electors of Mentz and Palatine; while those of the Higher or Upper Rhine are the bishop of Worms and elector Palatine, as having succeeded to the duchy of Simmeren, though the first pretends to be sole director.

As for the circle of Burgundy, which takes its name from that province, now dismembered from the empire, and belonging to the king of France, it was formerly under the directorship and sovereignty of the king of Spain, and comprehended not only High Burgundy, or Franche Compte, but likewise the seventeen provinces of the Low Countries, which in the reign of Charles V. were received as members of the empire, independent indeed of the imperial chamber with respect to justice, but subject to pay as much as is levied from two electors, in case of a war against the Turks: however, this contribution was never raised; and is now entirely omitted in the rolls of the contingencies of the empire. Exclusive of this circle, therefore, the contributions for a Roman month, paid by all the others, amount to 2419 horsemen, and 12,400 foot soldiers; or, in money, to 75,840 florins; and this tax is augmented double, triple, and quadruple, according to the number of troops to be raised, but always in proportion to the established rates in the book of matriculation. e and that of the states.

The empire of Germany is a body, of which the emperor is the head, and the states are the members. These states are divided into three classes, namely, the college of electors, the college of ecclesiastic and secular princes, and that of the imperial towns, which are admitted into the diets or general assemblies. f

CHARLEMAGNE, and his successors, possessed the empire by hereditary right; but that race being extinct, the princes assembled, elected Conrad, and afterwards Henry the Fowler, who was succeeded by Otho, surnamed the Great, after whom the emperors enjoyed their dignities by succession, though the consent of the people was necessary, touching the capacity of him upon whom the empire devolved. This custom continued till the reign of Henry IV. who gave occasion to the constitution which regulates the elections of the emperors, and by virtue of which he himself was afterwards deposed. The confusion which necessarily attended the election, on account of the great number of princes, states, and sovereigns, who had a right to vote, induced them to transfer that power to seven chiefs, g

The nature of the election of the emperor.

(A) The elector and duke are directors of this circle, as being possessed of the duchies of Juliers, Cleves, and Bergue, the counties of La Mark and Ravensberg, together with the lordship of Ravenstein.

a whom they denominated electors, and who were afterwards confirmed as such in the reign of Charles IV. by an ordonnance called a golden bull, which regulates the form of the election, and the power of those electors, which is now hereditarily annexed to certain states of the empire.

BEFORE Charlemagne, and a long time after his reign, the empire was altogether monarchical through the whole extent of its dominions, both in Germany and Italy; but since Frederic II. the electors and princes have insensibly acquired certain rights, to which they did not formerly pretend; so that the government is become monarchical, and partly aristocratical: for there are certain prerogatives which the emperor enjoys by his sole power and imperial authority; while in other affairs he must have recourse to the voice, and sollicit
b the consent, of the princes and electors, and even of all the states of the empire, in consequence of a solemn capitulation which he signs at his election. He assumes all the marks of the antient emperors of the West, with the titles of semper Augustus, Cæsar, and sacred majesty. His crown is closed above, and surmounted with a globe, which is the symbol of univerial monarchy; and the Christian princes allow him the first rank, on account of his dignity. He convokes and dismisses the diets and other imperial assemblies, having a right to authorize their resolutions, which are afterwards published and executed in his name: he confirms the alliances and treaties which have been made by their predecessors for the welfare of the empire: he alone enjoys the benefit of what is called the first prayers, that is, the right of filling up the first canonship, or any other dignity, in the cathedral and collegiate churches, c as well as in the abbies, of the empire, that shall be vacant after his coronation: he creates and confers all the other secular dignities, such as king, prince, archduke, duke, marquis, landgrave, count, and baron. To him alone belongs the power of bestowing the great fiefs of the empire, the investiture of which he gives to the ecclesiastical princes by the sceptre, and to the secular by the standard or sword: he receives the oath of allegiance from the electors, princes, and all the members of the empire; and all the dominions which devolve to the empire, by forfeiture or otherwise, are intirely at his disposal: he grants pardons and remissions, institutes or confirms universities and academies, and possesses other prerogatives, which are marks of sovereignty. But he is obliged to consult the electors, before he can alienate or mortgage the effects of the empire, grant the privilege of coining
d money, or confiscate the estates of rebels. The general consent of all the states is necessary in regulating the affairs of religion, in making or annulling laws, fixing the value of money, proclaiming war within or without the empire, imposing subsidies or general contributions, raising troops, building new fortresses, or putting garrisons in the old, and in making treaties and alliances. Nevertheless, if the affair is pressing, no more than the consent of the electors is required; and in truces or cessation of arms, the authority of the emperor is sufficient. To these restrictions he subjects himself by a capitulation made at his election, which is a contract between him and the electors and princes, introduced since the reign of Charles V. before which time, the ordinary constitutions of the empire served in lieu of this capitulation. In the absence of the emperor, the sovereign power devolves to the king of e the Romans, as perpetual vicar of the empire; but, in default of the emperor and king of the Romans, the authority is transferred to the two vicars of the empire in Germany, namely, the elector of Bavaria, or palatine of the Rhine (for the right is contested), and the elector of Saxony, who each, in his own extent of principality, exercise the same functions in all things, except the grand fiefs, called the fiefs of the sceptre and the sword, which can be bestowed by none but the emperor.

His dignity and prerogatives.

His restrictions.

His substitutes.

THE domain possessed as emperor, and the revenues which he draws from the empire for the support of his imperial dignity, have been formerly very considerable; but at present are so much reduced, as to be altogether insufficient to maintain the posts of the empire; so far are they from being able to support his dignity, or contribute to the subsistence of his
f troops. There is not one town belonging to him as emperor; and in case the Germans should elect a prince destitute of hereditary dominions, the city of Bamberg would be assigned to him as the place of his habitation, and the bishop in that case be obliged to retire to Villac.

Revenue.

The emperor's revenue consists in aids, which are called Roman months, paid by the states and members of the empire, in some other subsidies from the imperial towns, which amount to about 40,000 livres a year, in taxes of the chancery, and exactions from the Jews, distinguished by the name of oblation money.

BESIDES the Aulic council, which shall afterwards be mentioned, there are three others established for dispatching the affairs of the empire. The first is the council of state, com-g posed of a president and four and twenty counsellors, who are princes and counts of the empire, and other considerable noblemen, and ten secretaries for expediting letters and decrees. The second is that of the finances, composed of two presidents, one director, with fourteen assessors, and six secretaries. The third is the imperial council of war, consisting of two presidents, who are generals, and seven counsellors, who are camp-marshals, major-generals, rals, and colonels, with an auditor-general, regiſters, and ſecretaries. The title of king of the Romans, as it is at preſent underſtood, was altogether unknown in the time of the firſt emperors, who were actually ſovereign princes of the city of Rome. Charlemagne having deſtined the ſucceſſion of the empire to his eldeſt ſon, beſtowed upon him the quality of king of Italy, a title which Lewis the Debonair, and Lotharius I. likewiſe conferred upon their preſumptive heirs; an appellation equivalent to that of Cæſar among the antient emperors, and to that of king of the Romans in its preſent ſignification. This laſt title began to be in uſe about the tenth century, when it was ſuppoſed that the pope had the ſole right of creating the emperor. Accordingly many emperors contented themſelves with this appellation, until they were actually crowned at Rome; and in this ſenſe we muſt underſtand the ſecond chapter of the golden bull, which, ſpeaking of the election of a king of the Romans, mentions him only as a ſucceſſor in the empire, who could not be qualified as emperor till after his coronation by the pope. a b

The quality of king of the Romans.

AT preſent, the king of the Romans is he who is choſen by the princes electors, during the emperor's life, to conduct the affairs of Germany in the emperor's abſence, as vicar-general of the empire, and to ſucceed him on the imperial throne at his death, without any other election or confirmation. This is an expedient uſed by the emperor, when he wants to ſee the ſucceſſion ſecured during his own life, or is no longer in a condition to manage the reins of government. The king of the Romans is not crowned with an imperial, but with an open crown; nor does he receive the oath of allegiance till after the death of the emperor; nor is he honoured with the epithet of ſemper Auguſtus; nor does he bear the ſpread eagle with two heads; nor does he exerciſe any power in the empire while the emperor is there in perſon, but, in his abſence, commands by virtue of his dignity. c

The electoral college.

WE have already obſerved, that there are three colleges in the empire, a diſtinction which was eſtabliſhed in the diet of Francfort in the year 1580. Of theſe the chief is the electoral, which originally conſiſted of ſeven electors; an eighth was afterwards added; and it is at preſent compoſed of nine, in each of whom are united the two qualities of prince of the empire and elector. As the firſt, he is ſovereign in the extent of his own dominions, with certain reſtrictions, which render him dependent upon the emperor and empire. As elector, he has a right to elect the emperor and king of the Romans, and precedes all other princes of the empire, not excepting cardinals and kings. This college comprehends three archbiſhops, and five ſecular princes; the firſt are thoſe of Mentz, Triers, and Cologn, who, according to the golden bull, are great chancellors of the empire: the ſecular princes are, the king of Bohemia, great cup-bearer; the duke of Bavaria, great maſter of the palace; the duke of Saxony, great marſhal; the margrave of Brandenburg, great chamberlain; and the count palatine of the Rhine, high-treaſurer. The number of electors was augmented by the emperor Leopold, who erected the houſe of Brunſwick into a ninth electorate, under the title of elector of Hanover, on pretence of giving ſatisfaction to the Proteſtants, who complained, that their authority was diminiſhed by the palatine electorate's paſſing into a Catholic branch of that family. The ſecular electors have both an active and a paſſive voice, each having a right to chuſe and to be choſen emperor; whereas the eccleſiaſtical electors can only chuſe, without having any right to be choſen. The three archbiſhops muſt have attained the age of thirty years before they can obtain that dignity; but the ſecular elector is at age at eighteen. During his minority, his neareſt relation is appointed as his tutor or adminiſtrator, and exerciſes the electoral dignity, maintaining the rank, and wearing the habit, of an elector. We have already obſerved, that two of theſe electors are vicars-general of the empire, which they govern upon the death or reſignation of the emperor, when there is no king of the Romans. Each exerciſes a ſeparate power in the provinces of his juriſdiction; except in the chamber of Spire, the acts of which are ſigned by the names of both, becauſe there juſtice is adminiſtred by all the ſtates of the empire. Each of theſe ſecular electors has a vicar, who performs his office in his abſence; and theſe vicariates are hereditary. The eccleſiaſtics acquire their electorate in the manner by which prelacies are obtained: but the ſeculars acquire it by collation or ſucceſſion. Collation takes place in default of male iſſue legitimate and laic, and is ſanctioned by the emperor; who is obliged to complete the number of electors, and confer the vacant place upon a German prince. The ſucceſſion ſubſiſts, conformable to the ſalique law, according to the right of ſeniority, being independent of all tranſactions, teſtaments, and other civil acts, which are uſed in other caſes for changing the order of ſucceſſion. d e f

The privileges of electors.

THE electors have the right of poſſeſſing ſalt-works, and all ſorts of mines, in their own electorates; to coin gold and ſilver money; to levy the ancient taxes; to acquire the greateſt fiefs in preference to all others, and to be inveſted gratis; to refuſe compliance with any privilege contrary to their own; to exerciſe a ſuperior and ſovereign juriſdiction in their dominion: tho' the vaſſals of all the electors, except thoſe of Saxony and Brandenburg, have g a a right to appeal to the imperial chamber; but the moſt characterizing diſtinction of the electors is their right of chuſing and depoſing the emperor.

THE next college comprehends all the other princes; either ſecular, as dukes, margraves, landgraves, burgraves, counts, &c. or eccleſiaſtic, ſuch as archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, &c. that immediately hold of the empire. Thoſe who compoſe this college, have the right of ſitting in the diets or general aſſemblies with a deliberative and deciſive voice, and contribute to the neceſſities of the empire, according to the tax eſtabliſhed by the matricular book or regiſter of the ſtates. The archbiſhop of Saltzburg, and the archduke of Auſtria, are alternately directors of the college of the princes of the empire; and this alternative is not regulated by the different ſittings, but by the different ſubjects that are propoſed and b diſcuſſed. Beſides theſe princes, there is a number of counts in the empire, who hold of the empire alone, and are divided into four claſſes; namely, thoſe of Wetteraw, Suabia, Franconia, and Weſtphalia, together with a great deal of free nobleſſe, diſtinguiſhed by that of Franconia, Suabia, and the Rhine. The princes of both orders hold immediately of the emperor and the empire, and generally receive their inveſtiture by the ſword, from the hand of the ſovereign ſeated on his throne; though the counts and barons of the chamber of Spire are inveſted with the ſtandard or enſign, repreſenting the arms of their reſpective countries. They have power to appoint judges for the adminiſtration of juſtice; which ſome of them exerciſe as ſovereigns, while others are limited to certain ſums, above which, all cauſes depending muſt be decided by appeal to the chamber of Spire. They are allowed to eſtabliſh
c new laws, create magiſtrates, grant letters of grace, reſpite, ſafe-conduct, majority, and legitimation. They have the right to ſucceed to baſtards, to raiſe and quarter ſoldiers, erect univerſities, coin money, make arms, and caſt artillery; to increaſe the number of their fortreſſes, and ſecure them with garriſons; make alliances among themſelves, as well as with ſtrangers, for their common defence; and, in a word, to reign in their own territories, as the emperor reigns in the empire.

The college of the princes.

THE third college is that of the imperial towns, which, like the other two, aſſembles apart, in order to deliberate upon the propoſals that are made for the occaſions of the empire; and the cities, which compoſe it, are called imperial, becauſe they hold immediately of the emperor and empire. They, as well as the other colleges, have a right to ſit in the diets
d with a deliberative and deciſive voice. They regulate the form of government in their own juriſdiction, creating magiſtrates and officers of juſtice, and enacting laws, regulations, and ſtatutes, by their own proper authority. They have a right to coin money, to fortify their towns, to levy ſoldiers, and to exerciſe every act of ſovereignty, which is exerciſed by the princes of the empire in their different principalities. Formerly the number of the imperial towns amounted to eighty-four or eighty-five; but is at preſent reduced to fifty-eight, ſeparated into two benches in the aſſemblies; namely, that of the Rhine, and that of Suabia. The firſt comprehends the cities of Cologn, Aix la Chapelle, Lubeck, Worms, Spire, Franckfort upon the Maine, Wetſler, Gellenhauſen, Dortmund, and Friedberg; while Ratiſbon, Augſburg, Nuremburg, Ulm, and two-and-thirty other cities, are comprehended in that of e Suabia.

The college of the imperial towns.

THE appellation of Hans or Anſe, which, in all probability, comes from the German word Anzee, ſignifying near the ſea, is given to a confederacy of towns, that engaged in an alliance for the mutual ſupport and improvement of commerce. About the year 1164, the city of Bremen formed the firſt ſcheme of this ſociety, with ſeveral other ſea-port towns in Livonia; tho' the number that firſt entered into the aſſociation is uncertain. Be that as it will, it afterwards increaſed to ſuch a point of importance, as to comprehend fourſcore principal trading towns; among which were many foreign places, that deſired admiſſion into the confederacy. Accordingly we ſee in the old liſt Antwerp, Dort, Amſterdam, Rotterdam, Bruges, Oſtend, Dunkirk, Calais, Rouen, St. Malo, Bourdeaux, Bayonne, Marſeilles, Barcelona, f Seville, Cadiz, Liſbon, Leghorne, Meſſina, Naples, and London.

Of the Hans towns.

IN the flouriſhing times of the ſociety, they choſe four towns, where they eſtabliſhed free ſtaples, or general factories, for the convenience of their ſhipping, and the ſale of their merchandize; for the trade was chiefly carried on by barter or exchange. Theſe were London in England, Bergues in Norway, Novogrod in Ruſſia, and Bruges in Flanders. This Anſeatique alliance, which at firſt had no other aim than the ſecurity of commerce againſt pirates, and the mutual advantage of extending it among the towns concerned, by peaceable and friendly communication, became ſtrong enough to maintain an offenſive war againſt Waldemar III. king of Denmark; whom they obliged to ſue for peace, and cede to them, for a term of years, the iſle of Schonen, in order to indemnify them for the expence of their equipment.
g They afterwards fitted out a powerful fleet againſt Eric X. and gave him great diſturbance. In 1615, they obliged the duke of Brunſwic to raiſe the ſiege of that town, which he had inveſted; and next year entered into a general alliance with the States of the United Provinces. In the ſame manner they often engaged in treaties with other princes and ſtates, and particularly larly with different kings of France, who granted them ſeveral advantageous privileges in trade. a

After the kings of France, Spain, Italy, and Denmark, had forbid their towns to continue members of this ſociety, the Teutonic Hans reſtricted their alliance to Germany, or, at leaſt, to the towns depending upon the empire, and diſtributed them under four metropolitans; namely, Lubeck, Cologne, Brunſwick, and Dantzick. The firſt comprehended the towns of Hamburgh, Roſtock, Wiſmar, Stralſund, Lunenburgh, Stetin, Anclam, Golnau, Gnepſwald, Colberg, Stargard, Stolpen, and Rugenſbald. Under that of Cologne were Weſel, Emmeric, Druſburg, Oſnabrug, Dortmont, Soeſt, Herworden, Paderborn, Northauſen, Nimmegen, Zutphen, Ruremonde, and ſeveral others of Weſtphalia and the Low Countries. The metropolitan of Brunſwick included Bremen, Magdeburgh, Hildeſheim, Goſlar, Minden, Erimbeck, and others: b and in the diviſion of Dantzick were all the Hans towns ſituated upon the Baltick, from the Viſtula as far as Ruſſia, comprehending Colm, Thorn, Elbing, Konigsberg, Riga, &c.

LUBECK is the chief of all the Hans towns, from a pre-eminence which it enjoys, not only on account of its central ſituation, but alſo of its privileges and power. It convokes the general aſſembly, is the depoſitory of the money contributed to defray the common expence; preſerves all the titles, acts, and archives, of the alliance; uſes its own ſeal to the letters ſent in the name of the community to foreign princes and ſtates, as well as to all their reſolutions and treaties: from its citizens are generally choſen the ambaſſadors and deputies appointed by the ſociety; and here the ſyndic of the alliances commonly reſides.

In their aſſembly, the deputy of Lubeck, as preſident, ſits by himſelf, the reſt being ſeated on two benches, to the right and left, and votes before all others: their affairs are determined by a majority; nevertheleſs, when there is a great oppoſition, the queſtion is generally thrown out: their ordinary aſſemblies are held every three years, about Whitſuntide, and the extraordinary as often as the emergency of affairs requires [a]. c

The diet of the empire.

The imperial diets are compoſed of theſe three colleges, which comprehend all the eſtates and immediate members of the empire. The diet is convoked by the emperor, after he has agreed with the electors upon the neceſſity of aſſembling it, and the place proper for the ſeſſion. In this aſſembly, the emperor is ſeated upon a throne; the electors of Mentz, Bavaria and Brandenburg being on his right hand; thoſe of Cologn, Saxony, and Palatine, upon his left; and the elector of Triers oppoſite to his perſon. The eccleſiaſtic princes are d ſeated on benches to the right; the ſecular princes ſit upon the left; and the deputies of the imperial towns occupy others that croſs from the right to the left. The emperor's propoſal being made in the general aſſembly, the three colleges deliberate apart upon the ſubject; then, aſſembling together in one place, communicate their ſentiments, and concur in a reſolution, which is ſent to the emperor; with whoſe approbation it paſſes into a law, and is received as an imperial conſtitution.

The methods of adminiſtring juſtice.

There are two methods of adminiſtring juſtice in the empire: one is exerciſed in general, and the other in particular tribunals. All the princes, ſtates, and members of the empire, have a right to adminiſter juſtice in their own fiefs, except in particular caſes, where an appeal lies to the imperial chamber of Spire, or the Aulic council. In the particular juriſdictions, they follow the laws of the empire; which arethe antient conſtitutions, the golden e bull, the pacification of Paſſaw, the treaties of Weſtphalia, the Saxon law eſtabliſhed by Charlemagne, and the Roman law eſtabliſhed by the emperor Juſtinian, which is obſerved in all places where the other is not received. The general tribunals are thoſe of the imperial chamber of Spire, and the Aulic council of the emperor, which exerciſe an univerſal and ſovereign juriſdiction over all the ſubjects of the empire. The firſt was heretofore ambulatory, and eſtabliſhed at Augſburg by Frederic IV. It was afterwards held ſucceſſively at Franckfort, Worms, Nuremburg, Ratisbon, and Eiſlengen, till Charles V. fixed it at Spire. In conſequence of the treaties of Weſtphalia, it ought to be compoſed of a Catholic judge, and four preſidents, named by the emperor, two of each religion, and fifty counſellors, ſix- f and-twenty of which are Catholics, and the reſt Proteſtants. The judge muſt be a prince, count, or baron; two of the preſidents being of the ſword, and two of the gown. The counſellors are named and preſented in this manner; two Catholics by the emperor, as many by each of the four Catholic electors; two Proteſtants by each of the three Proteſtant electors; and the reſt by each of the circles of the empire. This is the regulation according to the treaties of Weſtphalia; but the imperial chamber is at preſent reduced to a much ſmaller number of officers, being compoſed of the elector of Triers, who is judge as biſhop of Spire, of one Catholic and one Proteſtant preſident, and eight Catholic and ſeven Proteſtant counſellors.

The imperial chamber at Spire.

The Aulic council.

The Aulic council is compoſed of one Catholic preſident, one vice-chancellor, preſented g by the elector of Mentz, and nine counſellors of each religion; who, with the preſident, are

a are nominated by the emperor. They are divided into two benches; one of which is occupied by the nobles, and the other by the lawyers. They hold their aſſemblies near the perſon of the emperor, whence it is called Aulic, or the council of the imperial court.

ALTHOUGH the ſentences of theſe councils are final, there are nevertheleſs ſome caſes in which the parties may appeal to the emperor, and demand a reviſion of the proceſs; particularly in thoſe cauſes which regard the duchies, principalities, counties, and other immediate fiefs of the empire. In both theſe tribunals, the emperor preſides as ſovereign judge, and, when he is preſent, pronounces ſentence; and, in his abſence, he, who repreſents his perſon as judge, has a right to wear an imperial ſceptre as a badge of his dignity [b].

Their deciſions not final in all caſes.

b IN Germany are two ſorts of nobility; one free and immediate, holding only of the emperor and empire; the other mediate, which, though owning the emperor as chief of the empire, is likewiſe ſubjected to the juriſdiction of another prince. This laſt, though not in poſſeſſion of ſuch liberties as thoſe that are peculiar to the firſt, is nevertheleſs very conſiderable in Germany; for there is a great number of thoſe gentlemen of the ſecond rank, whoſe families pretend to be as antient and illuſtrious as thoſe of the immediate nobles, and who, in marrying, prefer the pooreſt gentlewoman to the richeſt plebeian. As for the gentlemen of the firſt rank, many of them are deſcended from thoſe heroes who accompanied Charlemagne and his ſucceſſors in all the victories they obtained over the Saxons and other nations which they ſubjected to their empire. Many others, coming from the neighbouring ſtates to ſettle in Germany, were afterwards united with this body of nobility, becauſe they were of noble c extraction: while others again, whoſe fathers had merited that rank by their perſonal virtue and exploits, were in the ſequel immatriculated among the antient nobility by patents obtained from the emperor; but theſe cannot be admitted into the chapters, from which are choſen the archbiſhops, electors of Mentz, Triers, and Cologne, together with the other biſhops and prelates who are princes of Germany; becauſe, before a perſon can be received into this chapter, he muſt prove his nobility in thirty-two deſcents both by father and mother.

Of the nobility.

THE immediate nobility poſſeſs fiefs, which they hold only of the emperor and empire, and are intailed on heirs male; becauſe, by an expreſs clauſe in their charter, they are
d obliged to ſerve the emperor in perſon, upon all occaſions, with a certain number of ſervants, according to the ſtrength and revenue of the fief. Almoſt all their fiefs are ſituated in Suabia, Franconia, and along the Rhine, comprehending Lower Alſace; a diſpoſition made on purpoſe, that the nobility, being leſs diſperſed, might be the more ready on all emergencies, and more conveniently defend the frontiers on that ſide againſt foreign invaſion.

THE emperor has beſtowed upon the immediate nobility the ſame privileges enjoyed by the other immediate ſtates of the empire, with power to raiſe taxes thro' the whole extent of their reſpective fiefs, and to exerciſe a civil and criminal juriſdiction, the laſt of which is without appeal; but, from the civil, there lies an appeal to the Aulic council, or imperial chamber of Spire.

e HERETOFORE this nobility was admitted to the imperial diets, where they even pretended to take the rank of the cities; but, on account of the extraordinary expences incurred by their ſitting, the calling of them was gradually neglected, tho' they are left at liberty to aſſeſs themſelves in contributing to the public neceſſities of the empire.

THIS nobility forms a kind of ariſtocratical republic; for tho' they are divided into three claſſes, they never fail, on important occaſions, to join their councils and their ſtrength for the preſervation of the whole. They have divided the circle of Suabia into five departments called quarters; that of Franconia into ſix; and that of the Rhine into four. All theſe quarters have their chiefs, which, in Suabia and Lower Alſace, are called directors; but in Franconia, and the Upper and Lower Rhine, they are diſtinguiſhed by the name of captains, f being choſen ſometimes from one family, and ſometimes from another. A chief can regulate nothing without the advice of two or three other gentlemen, who are nominated as his coadjutors, and a lawyer to be conſulted in ſuch affairs as depend upon the interpretation of the law. With theſe counſellors, the director or captain examines the differences that are brought before them, and exerts himſelf for the preſervation of the privileges of the whole body. If it is neceſſary to repreſs the injuſtice or violence of any nobleman, the director or captain convenes the whole circle, or even all the three circles, to ſupport and give ſanction to his determination; and, as to public affairs, the quarters uſually aſſemble once a year.

HAVING thus given a ſuccinct idea of the preſent conſtitution and government of Ger-
g many, it will not be amiſs to mention the preſent character of the people, as we find it deſcribed by modern authors of credit.

The character of the Germans.

THE Germans of theſe days are ſaid to be laborious, ſimple, faithful, valiant, and well adapted for war; but at the ſame time cruel, mercenary, and addicted to pillage. They are ſtaunch to the religion they embrace, ſlow in council, and truſty in their friendſhips; but withal diſguiſed in their enmity, diſtruſtful, ſuſpicious, and more given to exceſs in eating and drinking than any other nation in the world. Heretofore they were barbarous, and groſsly ignorant; but they have been civilized and poliſhed by their aſſiduous application to the ſtudy of arts and ſciences, in which they have made conſiderable progreſs. Yet their improvement is rather owing to indefatigable toil and induſtry than to their natural vivacity, genius, and penetration, in which they are counted inferior to almoſt all their neighbours. Indeed this allegation ſeems to be juſtified by their works, which are not at all remarkable for ſpirit or imagination; but commonly compoſed of tedious citations, compiled by dint of toil and perſeverance; ſo that they have incurred the imputation of carrying their genius not in the brain but in the back. They have nevertheleſs acquired ſome reputation in philoſophy and the belles lettres, and made very ingenious improvements in mechanics; but their hiſtories are not much to be depended upon, becauſe of their exceſſive credulity. This may have likewiſe contributed to that ſpirit of alchemy which hath engaged ſo many of their nation in ſearch of the philoſopher's ſtone. They are extremely fond of hunting, and ſo ridiculouſly vain, that every petty prince in the empire thinks his own family better than that of the king of France. The language is a dialect of the Teutonic; ſome of them profeſs the Roman Catholic, and ſome the Proteſtant, religion; but all others are tolerated for the convenience of commerce and the advantage of the country [c].

CONRAD I.

AS the affairs of Germany are interwoven with thoſe of France, during the reign of Charlemagne and his ſucceſſors, who are therefore naturally comprehended in the modern hiſtory of that kingdom, we ſhall begin with Conrad, the firſt German who ruled the empire, when it became a diſtinct ſovereignty, altogether independent of France, of which it had hitherto been reckoned an appendage.

SOME, indeed, are of opinion, that the commencement of the German empire does not properly take place till the reign of Otho the Great, when Italy was re-united to the imperial dominions [a]; but, in order to maintain the connexion between this and the Ancient Hiſtory, it was neceſſary to take notice of Conrad and his ſucceſſor, who, tho' they were not in poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Lombardy, deſerve, without all queſtion, to be ranked among the German emperors (A).

BESIDES, the extinction of the Carlovingian race, when the empire was wholly detached from France, and the imperial dignity became elective, is ſurely as proper a period for an hiſtorian to begin with as the reign of Otho, in which the Italian dominions were recovered to the empire.

ALTHOUGH the ſucceſſors of Charlemagne had really poſſeſſed the empire, by right of hereditary ſucceſſion devolved from father to ſon, theſe princes uſually procured the conſent of their grandees, as a ſanction to their laſt wills, that no diſputes might attend the diſpoſitions they had made. What was at firſt no more than a political condeſcenſion in the emperors, was in time interpreted into a privilege of thoſe nobles; and hence is derived the right of thoſe electors, by whom the emperor is inveſted with the imperial dignity and power [b].

THUS authorized by cuſtom, the German noblemen aſſembling at Worms, upon the death of Lewis IV. made a proffer of the imperial crown to Otho, duke of Saxony; who declined the honour on account of his great age, and, with a generoſity almoſt peculiar to himſelf, recommended Conrad, duke of Franconia and Heſſe, whom (tho' his own enemy) he knew to be a prince of merit and capacity. In conſequence of this recommendation, the aſſembly elected Conrad, whom ſome writers pretend to have been ſon-in-law to Lewis IV. a circumſtance highly improbable, as Lewis died very young [c].

a BE that as it will, he no ſooner received the imperial diadem than he took all the precautions neceſſary to ſupport his authority, in the midſt of a great many powerful princes, who envied his promotion. Several noblemen of Lorrain, who acknowledged Charles the Simple as their ſovereign, reſolved to put him in poſſeſſion of the dominions which had belonged to Lewis of Germany, on this ſide the Rhine; but the count Des Retz, being deſirous that Lorrain ſhould fall into the hands of Conrad, engaged thoſe of Namure and Limbourg in behalf of that prince; who, underſtanding that his preſence was neceſſary, marched into Lorrain, where, being well received by the lords of his party, he endeavoured to conciliate the affection of the natives, by conferring new titles, and other acts of liberality, in favour of the nobility and clergy [d]. A. D. 912.

b HIS ſtay in Lorrain was ſhortened by the revolt of Henry duke of Saxony, who was incenſed againſt him becauſe he had refuſed to give him the inveſtiture of Thuringia and Weſtphalia; tho' this refuſal was intirely owing to his apprehenſion, that the duke would become too powerful by ſuch an addition to his dominions. Henry, by the aſſiſtance of Burchard duke of Suabia, Arnold duke of Bavaria, and ſeveral other noblemen, ſaw himſelf at the head of an army which Conrad durſt not venture to encounter. He therefore had recourſe to other arts, by which he found means to detach Burchard from the Saxon party; and Henry's forces being at the ſame time weakened by the retreat of Arnold, whoſe country was threatened with an invaſion by the Hungarians, he agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms; in conſequence of which Conrad returned to Franconia. Henry duke of Saxony revolts.

c THE Hungarians having advanced with a great body of horſe as far as the river Inn, demanding tribute of the Bavarians, Arnold aſſembled his troops, which were reinforced by thoſe of Erchanger, adminiſtrator of the treaſury, and Berthold count Walric. Dividing them into two bodies, he placed the moſt conſiderable part in ambuſcade, and with the other retired before them into a marſhy place; where, their horſe being unable to act, they were charged with great impetuoſity, and utterly overthrown [e]. Arnold duke of Bavaria defeats the Hungarians.

THIS ſucceſs inflamed the ambition of Erchanger and Berthold; who, on pretence of being deſcended from Charlemagne, aſpired to the higheſt dignities, and actually turned their arms againſt Conrad; tho', finding themſelves unequal to the enterprize they had undertaken, they ſoon implored his clemency; but he was reſolved to inflict an exemplary
d puniſhment, and they were, after a fair trial in the aſſembly of Altheim, convicted of treaſon, and executed at Aldeingen. Erchanger is executed at Aldeingen.

THIS rebellion was ſucceeded by that of Arnold duke of Bavaria, who took the field, and entered Suabia with a ſtrong army; upon which the emperor forthwith marched againſt him, at the head of ſuch troops as he could raiſe for the occaſion, and overthrew him in a pitched battle, in which Arnold was mortally wounded [f]. Arnold is defeated by Conrad. A. D. 914.

GESELBERT duke of Lorrain, and Burchard duke of Suabia, having received conſiderable ſuccours from Charles the Simple, were likewiſe reſolved to try their fortune againſt the emperor; but, engaging him in a diſadvantageous place, their army was cut in pieces, and Eringer and Bertold, the ſons of Geſelbert, being taken priſoners, were beheaded by ore der of the conqueror. A. D. 916.

THE Hungarians too, taking advantage of the troubles of the empire, after having compelled Berenger, king of Italy, to ſue for peace, in their return made irruptions into Saxony, Thuringia, Franconia, Lorrain, and Alſace, which they deſolated with fire and ſword, and obliged the emperor to purchaſe peace upon the moſt ſhameful conditions [g]. A. D. 917.

AFTER a reign of about ſeven years, Conrad, perceiving his end approaching, recommended to the princes and ſtates of the empire, even when his own brother Everard count of Franconia was preſent, Henry duke of Saxony, and ſon of Otho, as the moſt proper perſon to ſucceed him on the imperial throne [h]; tho' this very Henry had been one of his moſt inveterate enemies (B). The princes having approved of his choice, he, before his death, ſent to him
f by the hands of his brother Everard, the crown, ſcepter, lance, ſword, and other regalia; thus nobly ſacrificing his reſentment to the advantage of the empire, and treating the ſon with the ſame generoſity which he himſelf had experienced from the father. The emperor recommends the duke of Saxony as heir to the throne, and dies.

(B) He had even attempted to poiſon Conrad by means of a golden bracelet, which Hatton, biſhop of Wurtzburgh, was to have preſented to him in Henry's name in token of reconciliation; but this attempt was diſcovered by ſome friends whom Conrad had at Henry's court; ſo that their enmity increaſing, acts of hoſtilities were committed on both ſides. The emperor undertook the ſiege of Merſbourg; but Henry forced his lines, and routed his whole army; of which the carnage was ſo great, that the Saxons ſaid, by way of deriſion, they could ſcarce believe hell was large enough to hold the infinite number of Franks, which they ſent thither in one day (2).

HENRY I. surnamed the Fowler.

A. D. 919. Henry surnamed the Fowler, is elected emperor.

THE emperor being dead, the dukes of Bavaria, Franconia, and Suabia, together with all the other states of Germany, assembled the following year at Fritzlar; where Henry duke of Saxony being present, was elected, and confirmed in the imperial dignity with universal applause. He was distinguished by the epithet of the Fowler, because he was much addicted to that amusement, and was actually engaged in it when he received intimation of his being recommended by Conrad as his successor in the empire [i]. a

THE pope, disturbed by the factions of several petty princes, who assumed the title in Rome, proffered to declare Henry emperor of the Romans; but this honour he declined, either because he would not give himself the trouble of marching into Italy to subdue his competitors, or was resolved to re-establish the tranquility of his own empire before he would engage in that enterprize. With this view he had, in the beginning of his reign, endeavoured to promote a mutual reconciliation among all the princes, counts, and noblemen, of Germany, as the only sure basis of universal prosperity; nor was he disappointed in his aim. Concord and harmony were diffused thro' the whole empire, and the affection of his subjects so happily conciliated, that when the Hungarians, according to custom, invaded his territories with a powerful army, they unanimously took up arms in his defence, and drove the enemy out of the empire, with the loss of eighty thousand men left upon the field of battle, which was fought near the city of Mersbourg. He afterwards defeated the Vandals, who had made an irruption into Saxony, and pursued them as far as the city of Brandenbourg, which he besieged and took in the middle of winter. The same people again having attempted to invade the empire, Henry attacked them upon the coast of the Baltic; where they were utterly exterminated, about one hundred and twenty thousand being killed upon the spot. Gonnen, king of Denmark, met with the same fate. The Sclavonians and Dalmatians were subdued, as well as the Bohemians, whose king, Winceslaus, he took prisoner; and, after long captivity, released, and generously reinstated in his dominions. In fine, he reduced the Abotrites, who had revolted, and was successful against all the enemies of the empire. Among others, he repulsed Charles the Simple from the banks of the Rhine, whither he had come to ravage Lorrain, and the cities of Mentz, Spire, and Worms. b

A. D. 921. Surmounts all opposition.

AT length the two princes, after they had twice conferred with each other at Bonn, entered into a treaty called Pactum Bonnense, which is a famous epocha in history; and this is the only attempt that ever was made by Charles, or his successors, in favour of their pretensions upon the empire [k]. c

SOON after this accommodation, he held an assembly at Coblentz, composed of several French and German bishops, where the treaty was confirmed; and, among other regulations, it was decreed, that there should be no marriage between relations within the sixth degree of consanguinity; and that no layman should receive tythes, which were wholly ecclesiastic [l]. d

ABOUT this time, Conrad, at the sollicitation of some French noblemen, advised Charles of France to dismiss his favourite Haganon, who abused his confidence, and was odious to the whole kingdom; but this advice being rejected, duke Robert, to whose son Hugh Charles refused the abbey of Chelles, assembled a body of forces, took the town of Laon, in which he found the treasures of Haganon, was crowned at Rheims by the archbishop Hervè, and, in order to support his new dignity with the friendship of Henry the Fowler, demanded an interview with that prince. They accordingly met on the banks of the river Roer, that runs by Juliers, where they engaged in a league offensive and defensive, and made considerable presents to each other. e

Charles is defeated by Hugh surnamed the Abbot. A. D. 923.

CHARLES, alarmed at this alliance, extracted courage from necessity; and, assembling his troops, marched directly to Attigni, and attacked the army of his rival. The battle was maintained with great obstinacy on both sides; and, even after Robert was slain, his son Hugh, taking the command, exerted himself with such valour, that Charles was worsted, and obliged to quit the field [m]. The malecontents afterwards elected Raoul duke of Burgundy their king; and Charles, seeing himself abandoned by many noblemen who had hitherto been attached to his interest, had recourse to Henry the Fowler, in whose favour he promised to cede all his possessions in Lorrain. In consequence of this engagement, Henry began to levy troops; and the malecontents of France being terrified at his preparations, Herbert count de Vermandois, one of their chiefs, amused Charles with protestations of fidelity, and, on pretence of concerting measures for suppressing the rebellion, se- f

HENRY, being informed of this event, passed the Rhine with his army, and ravaged the country between that river and the Moselle; but, understanding that Raoul was advancing with a superior force, he repassed the Rhine, and took possession of an advantageous post, where he remained until he had the pleasure of seeing almost all the noblemen of Lorrain forsake the banners of Raoul, who began to treat them with insolence and contempt. This defection might have been very advantageous to Henry, had not he been prevented from turning it to account, by a severe distemper that reduced him to extremity; during which the Lorrainers, despairing of his recovery, reconciled themselves to Raoul, by the b mediation of Herbert de Vermandois and Hugh the Abbot.

HENRY no sooner recovered his health, than, resolved to punish them for their inconstancy, he marched into Lorrain, retook several strong places, pursued duke Geselbert from town to town, and in a little time subdued the whole country. With regard to the laymen of Raoul's party, he banished some, kept others in confinement, and deposed Hugh the Abbot from the bishopric of Verdun, which he bestowed on one of his own adherents. The Lorrainers, exasperated at this arbitrary method of proceeding, formed a conspiracy against the Fowler, and raised an army with such secrecy and dispatch, that he was fain to pacify them by redressing their grievances, and restoring the province to Geselbert, who took the oath of allegiance, and did him homage accordingly. The emperor subdues Lorrain, and is reconciled to duke Geselbert. A. D. 926.

c THE duke, however, not contented with such a dependent situation, began to form new projects and cabals against Henry, who obliged him to appear at the diet of Worms; where he was deprived of his duchy, which was given to Everhard, a Saxon nobleman. Geselbert, enraged at this event, had recourse to arms; but, before he could commit any acts of hostility, he was seized and delivered to the emperor: yet so pliant was his disposition, that, even during his captivity, he insinuated himself into the good graces of Henry, who not only reestablished him in the duchy of Lorrain, but also gave him his own daughter in marriage [n].

To clear his domninions of thieves and banditti, he published a general amnesty in their favour, provided they would inlist in his service; and actually formed them into a regiment. He ordered that all his cities should be garrisoned with a ninth part of the peasants who ind habited the boroughs and villages, and that the other eight should cultivate the lands, on condition of contributing towards the subsistence of the rest, and of furnishing yearly the third part of all their grain, for the magazines established in every city, that there might never be any want either of soldiers or provision [o]. He regulates the police of his dominions.

SUCH was the zeal of this prince for the propagation of the Christian faith, that he undertook, and actually effected, the conversion of the king of the Abotrites (C), and appointed the first bishop in Holstein to preach the gospel among the Vandals, whom he had subdued [p]. He created a marquis in the city of Brandenbourg to defend his frontiers against the Abotrites, as he had done before in Misnia and Lusatia, for security against the incursions of the Bohemians; in imitation of Charlemagne, who had taken the same precautions in Austria and e Moravia against the Sarmatians, Poles, and Hungarians. He likewise ordered his towns to be surrounded with walls, bastions, and ditches, for the advantage of commerce, as well as the security of the inhabitants; and that the nobility might be inured to the exercise of arms, even in time of peace, he appointed tournaments, in which they vied with each other in displaying their dexterity and address. Lunenburg, and taking the capital, put the inhabitants to the ſword. Being afterwards joined by the Abotrites, Wilſes, and Vandals, they found their army augmented to a very great number; and becoming more and more formidable, Henry ordered Bernard, duke of Lunenburg, and the count Theucmare, to march againſt them with a powerful body of forces. Theſe two generals undertook the ſiege of Lunden in Scania; and the barbarians marching to its relief, a battle enſued, in which they were utterly overthrown; ſo that of courſe this town of Lunden fell into the hands of the conqueror [s]. a

THE truce with the Hungarians being expired, Henry aſſembled the ſtates of the empire, and after having recapitulated the victories he had obtained over the barbarians, which ſeemed to preſage his future ſucceſs, expatiated upon the diſgrace that would be entailed upon Germany, provided they ſhould commence tributaries to the Hungarians. His ſpeech had ſuch an effect upon the aſſembly, that they unanimouſly declared for war: but before he would undertake any thing againſt the enemy, he reſolved to take cognizance of ſome abuſes which had crept among the clergy, and which were accordingly reformed in a council held at Erfort in Thuringia. b

The Hungarians invade the empire, but are defeated. A. D. 932.

THESE meaſures being taken for the repoſe of the church and ſtate, he began to make preparations for the war againſt the Hungarians; who having ſent deputies to demand the annual tribute, Henry refuſed to pay it with marks of diſdain, and in lieu of it ſent a mangy dog with a meſſage, importing, that, if they expected any other tribute, they muſt come and look for it themſelves. This haughty reply exaſperated them to ſuch a degree, that they joined the Slaves, and entering Germany with an army of 300,000 men, deſolated the country with fire and ſword. They ſeparated into two diſtinct bodies; one of which croſſed the Rhine in boats, and having pillaged Alſace, fell upon Lorrain, where they were defeated by the count de Sunderhauſen, and obliged to return to their ſecond army in Saxony, which was at that time employed in beſieging Mersbourg. Henry had marched againſt another body that ravaged Thuringia, which having ſurpriſed and utterly defeated, he reſolved to go to the relief of Mersbourg, where he found the enemy drawn up in order of battle. Although he was at that time very much indiſpoſed, and infinitely inferior to the Hungarians in number, he reſolutely attacked them without heſitation, and they being immediately put into diſorder, a terrible carnage enſued, inſomuch that they left above 40,000 men dead upon the field of battle, and a very conſiderable booty, by which the ſoldiers of the emperor were enriched [t]. c d

HENRY, having ſubdued all his enemies, reſtored peace and concord to his ſubjects, and ſubjected the empire to proper regulations, began to taſte the fruits of his wiſdom and ſucceſs, when the pope and citizens of Rome, tired of the civil wars that had raged ſo long in Italy, implored the aſſiſtance of his arms to deliver them from oppreſſion; and, in order to facilitate his compliance, invited him to come and receive at Rome the unction and imperial crown. Far from neglecting an occaſion ſo favourable to his views upon Italy, he forthwith ſet out at the head of his troops; but being ſeized with an apoplexy by the way, he was obliged to return to Manſleben; where, believing himſelf near his end, he convoked the princes of the empire, who, in his preſence, complied with his deſire, and ſettled the ſucceſſion on his ſon Otho. Soon after this nomination, he died at Manſleben, in the 60th year of his age, and 17th of his reign; upon which occaſion it was ſaid, that the ableſt ſtateſman [u], and the greateſt king of Europe, was dead: and really no prince ſurpaſſed him either in the qualities of the heart and head, or in any perſonal accompliſhment. He was extremely munificent to the church, and had the intereſt of religion very much at heart (D). He married Mathilda, daughter of Theodoric, count of Aldenburg, by whom he had three ſons, Otho, Henry, and Bruno, and enjoyed the ſatisfaction of leaving to the eldeſt of theſe, who was already of age, the empire much more powerful, and the authority better eſtabliſhed, than he had received them from his predeceſſor [w]. e a THOUGH the princes of Germany had not been very well diſpoſed towards Otho, the great power he had derived from his hereditary ſucceſſion, together with his enterprizing ſpirit, and perſonal qualifications, would have obliged them to adhere to the promiſe which they had already made in his favour (E). He was accordingly elected emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the unanimous conſent of all the princes then preſent, among which number were the archbiſhops of Mentz, Magdebourg, Triers, and Beſançon; the biſhops of Ratisbon, Treſingen, Augsbourg, Conſtance, Eichſtet, Worms, Spire, Brixen, and Hildeſheim, this laſt being the emperor's chancellor; the abbots of Fulde, Herchfelt, and Erbach, together with the king of Bohemia, and the dukes of Saxony, Bavaria, Auſtria, Moravia, and Lorrain [x]. All theſe took the oath of allegiance, and did homage to the new emperor, whom b they promiſed to ſerve, and aſſiſt againſt all his enemies. Then they accompanied him to the great church, where he was met by the archbiſhop of Mentz, and the dioceſan, in their pontificals, aſſiſted by other biſhops, and all the clergy, who having ſaluted him with the uſual ceremonies, he proceeded into the middle of the church, where he ſtood in the ſight of the people, to whom the prelate addreſſed himſelf in words to this effect: "I here preſent to you Otho, choſen of God, formerly deſtined to the empire by his father Henry, "and now elected into that ſupreme ſtation by all the princes here aſſembled. If this election is agreeable to you, hold up your hands in token of your approbation." This addreſs being received with univerſal applauſe, and a thouſand acclamations, Otho was conducted to the great altar, on which the regalia were placed, when the archbiſhop girding c on his ſword, "Receive (ſaid he) that ſword, and uſe it againſt the enemies of Jeſus Chriſt, "as well as thoſe who unworthily profeſs his name; and employ the authority and power "of the empire, which God hath put into your hands, to confirm and preſerve the peace "of the church." Then putting on the mantle of ſtate, "Remember (continued he) "with what fortitude and fidelity you are obliged to maintain peace and tranquillity to the "end of your life." Laſtly, preſenting him with the ſceptre and mace, he added, "Warned by theſe emblems, inflict upon your ſubjects no other than paternal chaſtiſement: "extend your mercy and compaſſion to the miniſters of God, to the widow and the orphan; "and let the balm of your pity never ceaſe to flow, that you may acquire a never-fading "crown both in this life and that which is to come." After this exhortation, he was d anointed by the biſhops with the ſacred oil, and the archbiſhop ſet the crown upon his head. Then he aſcended the throne, on which he ſat during the ſervice; after which, he was reconducted to the palace, where he dined in public, and was ſerved by the dukes and other noblemen, while the biſhops had the honour of ſitting at his own table.

CHAP. II.

The Reign of Otho I. including the Tranſactions of the Weſtern Empire under this Prince and his Deſcendents.

Otho is elected, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle.

The ceremony of his coronation.

He began his reign with the moſt upright adminiſtration [y], being an implacable enemy to all cruelty and baſeneſs, and, for a little time, he ruled in tranquillity and peace; but this calm was not of long duration. The Hungarians, according to cuſtom, invaded Franconia, and ravaged the provinces of Upper and Lower Saxony, where they put a number of people to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age. However, their progreſs was ſoon checked by Otho, who, coming up with them in the plain of Dortmund in Weſtphalia, attacked and e defeated them with great ſlaughter; then marching into Lower Saxony, fortified Magdebourg, and paſſed the Elbe, to reſtrain the Slaves and other barbarians of the north, who were meditating a freſh irruption. After this expedition, being informed that Winceſlaus, who was inveſted with the dukedom of Bohemia by the emperor his father, had been murdered by Boleſlaus his own brother, who afterwards took poſſeſſion of the duchy by force, he was ſo incenſed at the inhumanity of the uſurper, that he ſent an army againſt him, under the command of Æſic, count of Aſcania, who engaged, and at firſt defeated Boleſlaus, and believed that, by this victory, he had put an end to the war; but the uſurper having, in a few days, rallied and reinforced his troops, and making a ſudden aſſault upon the victors, cut in pieces the whole imperial army [z].

OTHO was mortally chagrined at this misfortune, which, however, he endeavoured to repair, by levying a new army with all poſſible expedition. He accordingly carried on the war for the ſpace of fourteen years with great vigour and perſeverance, till at laſt he gained a complete victory over Boleſlaus, who was fain to ſubmit, and own him for his ſovereign. But this was not the only war which at that time engroſſed the attention of the emperor. a

The ſons of Arnold, duke of Bavaria, refuſe to do homage to Otho,

THE death of Arnold, duke of Bavaria, produced a great revolution in that province. He left three ſons, Everhard, Arnold, and Herman, with a daughter called Judith, who was married to Henry of Saxony, brother of Otho. Everhard, as eldeſt, ſeized the whole duchy, and refuſed to do homage to the emperor, on pretence that he was not his vaſſal, but ally: and although Arnold and Herman diſputed the duchy with Everhard, all three agreed to conſider Bavaria as altogether independent of Germany; a circumſtance which incenſed Otho to b ſuch a degree, that he diveſted them of the duchy, and beſtowed the inveſtiture upon Arnold's brother Bertolf, who willingly did homage for ſuch a preſent. Each pretender was ſupported by his own party: Pope Leo II. owned Everhard as duke of Bavaria, in a letter addreſſed to the biſhops and noblemen of Germany; and Otho, alarmed at this deciſion, ſet on foot a negotiation to engage the three brothers to reſign their pretenſions: but they refuſing to comply with his deſire, he entered Bavaria with a powerful army, and having ſeized Everhard, ſent him into exile. Arnold and Herman were obliged to follow his court, and their uncle Bertolf remained in quiet poſſeſſion of Bavaria [a]. As for the eldeſt, he was obliged to paſs the reſt of his days in the allodial territories depending on Bavaria, ſituated in Voigtland and Franconia: but each of his brothers aftewards obtained a palatinate. Arnold c was put in poſſeſſion of the lordſhip of Scheyern, and became count palatine in Bavaria, and Herman acquired the ſame dignity in one of the provinces upon the Rhine.

EVERHARD, duke of Franconia, was likewiſe inveſted with the ſame quality, by which he maintained a juriſdiction over the magiſtrates and receivers, and beſtowed thoſe places, and many others, upon his own friends and adherents. The Saxons grew jealous of his credit and power; and Henry duke of Brunſwick, the emperor's brother, not only refuſed to ſubmit to his authority, but alſo inſpired the Saxons with the ſame ſentiments, which entailed upon them the reſentment of Everhard, who declared war againſt Henry, and burnt the town of Elmen upon the Weſer. Otho no ſooner heard of theſe proceedings, than he aſſembled the noblemen of his court, and bringing Everhard and his accomplices to a tryal, con- d demned each of them to carry a dog upon his ſhoulders, from the place of his habitation as far as Magdeburg. In this manner did the antient nations of the north puniſh the ſeditious, who had diſturbed the public tranquillity. Evrehard, however, was pardoned at the interceſſion of his friends; though the enmity ſtill ſubſiſted between him and the duke of Brunſwick, and in a little time broke forth in preparations of war: then Otho ſummoned both to appear at the diet of Arensberg (F), which was at that time convened; but they did not think proper to obey the citation; and Henry was afterwards ſurprized by his antagoniſt in the town of Baudewic, and committed cloſe priſoner to a caſtle in Alſace, from whence, however, he was ſoon releaſed, after having entered into a league againſt his brother with Everhard, and Sigebert duke of Auſtraſia. Theſe, who were themſelves pretenders to the throne, e took great pains to perſuade Henry, brother to Otho, that he had the beſt title to the imperial dignity, becauſe he was born after the elevation of his father to the throne; whereas the birth of Otho was not attended with ſuch advantage. He liſtened to theſe idle inſinuations; and an aſſociation being formed, they began to levy troops, and in a little time brought a conſiderable army into the field; but were intirely routed by the emperor, duke Everhard, who was general, being killed in the battle, which was fought upon the banks of the Rhine, and Sigebert drowned in that river, in attempting to make his eſcape. Mean while Henry, taking refuge in the city of Mersbourg, and finding himſelf unable to defend it againſt his brother, was fain to ſubmit by capitulation; in conſequence of which he retired to the dominions of Lewis, king of France, who had declared war againſt the emperor in ſupport of f his pretenſions. Peace was ſoon after concluded between that prince and the emperor, who was reconciled to his brother, and beſtowed upon him the duchy of Lorrain, which did not long remain in his poſſeſſion [b] (G).

a SIGEBERT, or Giſelbert, duke of Auſtraſia or Lorrain, had prevailed upon the noblemen of that province to make a tender of it to Lewis, king of France; who received their homage accordingly: and Otho, hearing of this revolt, marched thither with an army, and defeated the rebels. After this victory, he undertook the ſiege of Chevremont, in the dioceſe of Liege, which, however, he was obliged to quit, in order to oppoſe the progreſs of the count palatine, and the king of France, who had entered Lorrain, and compelled his friends to retire to the other ſide of the Rhine. But Lewis being informed of a contract which the biſhop of Laon had made with his enemy Herbert, count of Vermandois, quitted Alſace, to prevent the effect of this treaſon; and Otho inveſted the city of Briſac; during the ſiege of which, he was abandoned by a number of noblemen, and among the reſt by Frederic, b archbiſhop of Mentz, and Ruthard, biſhop of Strasbourg; nevertheleſs he continued his operations until the place was taken, and then marching into Lorrain, made himſelf maſter of Metz, where he found Frederic and Ruthard, whom he ſent into exile to the abbies of Fulde and Corbie.

The emperor reduces Briſac, Mentz, and Chevremont.

AFTER this ſucceſs, he ordered his general Immot to reinveſt Chevremont, which was defended by Anfred and Arnold with ſuch valour, that the beſiegers were fain to have recourſe to fraud; and having apprehended theſe two officers whom he had invited to a conference, he ſent them to the emperor, and the town immediately ſurrendered [c].

THO' Conrad, the ſon of Everhard, inherited from his father the duchy of Franconia, with the counties of Heſſe and Alſace, he could not ſucceed him in the dignity of count palatine, c becauſe Otho had taken it from his father, and conferred it on Herman, third ſon of Arnold, duke of Bavaria: but as this honour was unattended with any ſolid advantage, the emperor began to annex it to the lands and caſtles ſituated on the Rhine, whence he acquired the title of Count palatine of the Rhine; and, in proceſs of time, theſe counts made great acquiſitions by marriages, purchaſes, mortgages, and imperial donations, ſo as to form a very conſiderable province [d].

Origin of the Palatinate of the Rhine.

ABOUT this time the Slaves, being joined by Boleſlaus, made an irruption into Bohemia, and ſurprized the city of Prague, from which, however, they were expelled by the valour of the inhabitants: nor did they meet with more ſucceſs in their attempts upon the margraviate of Brandenburg, where they were routed by count Geron, who having got their d chiefs into his power, put them all to death, without exception [e].

The Slaves make an irruption into Bohemia and Brandenburg.

LEWIS, king of France, having loſt the eſteem of his ſubjects by his pride and indiſcretion, ſought to prevent the bad conſequences of diſaffection by an alliance with the emperor, which he endeavoured to ſtrengthen by marrying his ſiſter Gerberge, who was widow of Giſelbert, duke of Lorrain. But his hopes were not of long duration; for Otho, perſuaded by the inſinuations of Hugh the Great, and Herbert, count de Vermandois, entered France with a powerful army, obliged Lewis to retire from Champagne into Burgundy, and received the oath of allegiance from Hugh and his confederates. Yet their ardour was ſoon cooled by the death of Herbert; and Otho was recalled to Saxony, to oppoſe the deſigns of his brother Henry, who, taking advantage of the emperor's abſence, quitted Lorrain, and, by dint of e preſents and promiſes, formed a very formidable conſpiracy among the Saxon officers and ſoldiers. His cauſe was eſpouſed by the counts Bacco, Herman, Keenward, Wirende Werle, and Lothaire; and meaſures were taken to aſſaſſinate the emperor at Quidlembourg, where he intended to celebrate the feſtival of Eaſter; but Otho, being informed of their deſign, marched againſt them without loſs of time, and defeated their purpoſe in a moment. The count de Werle, in order to avoid the puniſhment he deſerved, made away with himſelf; the reſt of the conſpirators were beheaded, and Henry confined to the caſtle of Ingelheim: yet he found means to eſcape, and repairing to Frankfort, where the emperor paſſed his Chriſtmas, proſtrated himſelf at his feet in a mourning habit, and implored his pardon, which was immediately granted [f].

ſome of Otho's ſoldiers. Everhard, ſeeing their ſchemes thus miſcarry, artfully inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of Henry, Otho's brother, who was at that time his priſoner, and perſuaded him to ſet up for himſelf, and take arms againſt the emperor. Accordingly, having in a little time joined their forces, they took the field againſt Otho, and were routed on the banks of the Rhine. Henry retreated to Merſbourg, from whence he afterwards retired by capitulation; and having ſtrengthened his party by the acceſſion of Giſelbert, they once more gave battle, on the banks of the ſame river, to Hermannus, the emperor's general, by whom they were entirely defeated; Everhard being ſlain, and Giſelbert drowned, as we have obſerved above. Otho, commiſerating the diſtreſſes to which his brother was expoſed, took him into favour again, and it was not long before he engaged in another conſpiracy againſt his life, which being detected, he fled into another kingdom. Otho, having thus quelled all his enemies at home, ſubdued the kingdom of Burgundy, and became formidable to all the nations around. Then, by the interceſſion and admonition of his holy mother, he was prevailed upon to pardon his brother Henry, by this time harraſſed with the fatigues and miſeries he had undergone, and actually made him duke of Bavaria, Berthold being then dead; in which capacity he did eminent ſervice againſt the Hungarians, and other enemies of the empire.

OTHO having recompenſed the ſervices of thoſe who had never forfeited their fidelity, eſtabliſhed a tribunal at Bonn, to take cognizance of the injuſtice and oppreſſion which had been committed during the troubles, and made a progreſs from town to town, in order to determine differences, and regulate the police of his dominions. He afterwards repaired to Dueſbourg in the duchy of Cleves, where having aſſembled the noblemen of Lorrain, Franconia, and Saxony, he ordered Rutbert, archbiſhop of Triers, and Richard, biſhop of Tongres, to be tried for felony, of which they were accuſed by Conrad, the new duke of Lorrain; but they juſtified themſelves by oath, and were acquitted. Rutbert was afterwards in great favour with the emperor, who erected his ſee into a principality, by an authentic act, which raiſes the archbiſhops of Triers to an equality with ſovereigns, and inveſts them with the rights of regality through the whole extent of the dioceſe [g]. a

A. D. 943. He erects the ſee of Triers into a principality.

ABOUT this time Bertholf, duke of Bavaria, dying, Otho, at the ſollicitation of his mother, beſtowed that duchy on his brother Henry, who thenceforward behaved as a peaceable and loyal ſubject: and the tranquillity of his reign was not again interrupted, until he marched with a powerful army into France, to ſupport Lewis againſt his powerful adverſary Hugh the Great. He was joined by that king and the count of Flanders near Cambray, which they reſolved to attack; but underſtanding that it was too well fortified to leave them any hope of ſucceſs, they turned aſide to Rheims, which ſurrendered in three days after it was inveſted. From thence they advanced to Paris, and ravaged the duchy of France, belonging to Hugh the Great; and, inſtead of beſieging the capital, marched to Rouen, by the advice of the count of Flanders. Having paſſed the river of Andelle, Otho, at the deſire of Lewis, ſent a detachment of his beſt troops, under the command of his nephew, to reconnoitre; and this young captain happening to meet a body of Normans, attacked them with ſuch fury, that they fled to the very gate of Rouen: but this flight was no other than a ſtratagem to decoy the Saxons into an ambuſcade; for the walls and adjacent fields were filled with archers, who immediately appeared, and the Normans made a vigorous ſally at the ſame time; ſo that the troops of Otho being charged on all hands, were routed after an obſtinate diſpute: their commander was killed upon the draw-bridge, and almoſt all the Saxons were either taken or ſlain. Notwithſtanding this misfortune, he reſolved to beſiege the town, and continued his operations without effect, until his army was greatly diminiſhed by famine and diſtemper: then he formed the deſign of betraying the count of Flanders to the enemy, becauſe he had been involved in this dangerous ſituation by his miſrepreſentations; but the count being informed of his intention, withdrew his whole forces in the night, and the Imperialiſts and French perceiving the commotion, miſtook them for an army coming to the relief of Rouen. This apprehenſion filled the camp with diſorder: the ſoldiers immediately betook themſelves to flight; and the inhabitants of Rouen obſerving their confuſion, made a general ſally, in which a great number of the Saxons periſhed. Not contented with this piece of ſucceſs, part of the garriſon, conſiſting of horſe, harraſſed them in their retreat as far as Amiens, where Otho and Lewis paſſed the Somme with their army [h]. The emperor returned to Saxony, leaving his allies ſtill embarraſſed with the war; but at length, through his mediation, they agreed to a truce, during which he received ſuch a dangerous fall in the chace, that his life was deſpaired of, and he nominated his ſon Ludolphus as his ſucceſſor, in the preſence of the principal noblemen of his court aſſembled for that purpoſe; but when he recovered his health, he revoked this deſignation. b c d e

947. Diſpute between Artaud and Hugh about the archbiſhopric of Rheims.

OTHO being at Aix la Chapelle, was viſited by Lewis of France; and in the following autumn they met upon the Chier, to concert meaſures for appeaſing the troubles which agitated that kingdom, as well as for terminating the ſcandalous quarrel ſubſiſting between Artaud and Hugh, who diſputed with each other the archbiſhopric of Rheims. Theſe two prelates being ſummoned to appear at the council of Verdun, Artaud obeyed the citation; and as Hugh refuſed to come, was proviſionally confirmed in the ſee: but that his competitor might have no cauſe to complain, another aſſembly was convoked for the following year, in the church of St. Peter near Monſon; and Hugh ſtill continuing obſtinate, was excluded from the communion of the other biſhops, and ſuſpended from all acts of juriſdiction, until other meaſures ſhould be taken by a national ſynod, to be held next year at Ingelheim near Metz. f

Proceedings of the aſſembly at Ingelheim.

AT this aſſembly, where the emperor and king of France aſſiſted in perſon, the ſentence was confirmed in favour of Artaud, who was acknowleged as lawful archbiſhop of Rheims, and his adverſary was anathematized. Several canons were made to prevent ſimony, and the tythes from being received by laymen; and Lewis, in a ſet ſpeech, complained of Hugh the Great, who had raiſed a rebellion againſt him, and deprived him of liberty. In conſequence of theſe complaints, Otho ordered Conrad, duke of Lorrain, to aſſemble ſome g troops, and accompany Lewis into the Lyonois; where being joined by Robert, archbiſhop of Triers, and Adalberon, biſhop of Metz, after they had expelled Hugh from the ſee of Rheims, they beſieged and took Montaigu, and then marched againſt Laon, which was defended by Threbaut, count de Chartres, whom they excommunicated: they likewiſe ſummoned Hugh the Great to come and give an account of what he had done to the prejudice of Lewis his ſovereign. As for Conrad, without waiting for the iſſue of that citation, he quitted Laon, and returned to Lorrain, after having re-united the city of Monſon to the dominions of the empire; and Hugh the Great was excommunicated by the pope's legate, in a council held at Triers *.

Otho makes war with the Danes. A. D. 949.

THE Danes having taken up arms, and murdered the margrave, appointed by Henry the Fowler, in the town of Sleeſwic, and put to the ſword part of the Saxon colony ſettled in that place, Otho marched into Denmark, in the abſence of king Harold, who had gone to the aſſiſtance of Sturbcon, king of Sweden; and having defeated ſome troops that attempted to oppoſe his paſſage, penetrated into Jutland, without farther reſiſtance. Harold no ſooner heard of this irruption, than he returned to his dominions, and a battle enſued, the particulars of which are variouſly related: but, certain it is, the campaign ended in an accommodation, by which the king of Denmark agreed, that Otho ſhould keep a garriſon in Sleeſwic, to defend the frontiers of the empire, and that the Chriſtian religion ſhould be preached in the dominions of Harold †.

Mediates a peace between Lewis and Hugh. 950.

AFTER this expedition the emperor repaired to Aix-la-Chapelle, to regulate the affairs of the empire; and there he was viſited by Lewis, and his wife Gerberge, who intreated him to employ his good offices in terminating the troubles of France. He accordingly ſent Conrad, duke of Lorrain, with ſome biſhops and counts, to Hugh the Great, who being likewiſe tired of war, willingly liſtened to his propoſitions, and peace was ſoon concluded by virtue of his mediation.

Reduces Boleſlaus. 951.

IN the courſe of the ſame year, the emperor's ſon Ludolphus was married to Idda, daughter of Herman, duke of Suabia, a prince of great power and rich poſſeſſions, which at his death devolved to his ſon-in-law. But, in the midſt of theſe rejoicings, Otho reſolved to chaſtiſe Boleſlaus, who, notwithſtanding his former defeats, was ſtill engaged in new enterprizes againſt Germany. Otho therefore took the field; and having inveſted the town of Boleſlaw, into which Boleſlaus had retired, carried it by aſſault. Yet he granted him peace, upon condition that he ſhould repair the churches, recal the exiled Chriſtians, expiate by canonical penance the crime of parricide, which he had committed upon the perſon of his brother Winceſlaus, and hold his dominions as fiefs of the empire ‡.

The emperor eſpouſes Alix. 952.

IN the midſt of theſe ſucceſſes, his aſſiſtance was implored by Alix, widow of Lotharius, king of Italy, who was perſecuted and ſtripped of her dominions by Beranger the younger; and her intreaties were reinforced by the ſolicitations of pope Agapetus II. who was afraid of being oppreſſed by the ſame power. In conſequence of theſe importunities, the emperor marched into Italy, at the head of a powerful army, married Alix (Ethica, his firſt queen, who was a princeſs of England, being dead), made himſelf maſter of Pavia, in which Alix had been kept priſoner, and, in fine, compelled Beranger to ſubmit; but he was ſo generous as to give him back a good part of his dominions, and to beſtow upon his brothers the marquiſate of Friuli, Verona, and ſome lands in Bavaria, reſerving to himſelf no more than the glory of his conqueſt. Yet, notwithſtanding theſe favours, Beranger abuſed his confidence, broke his word, and renounced his friendſhip.

His ſon Ludolphus rebels,

LUDOLPHUS, ſon of Otho by Ethica, tho' he had already been declared ſucceſſor to the empire, being chagrined at his father's ſecond marriage, engaged in a confederacy againſt him with Conrad duke of Franconia, who was his own brother-in-law, and ſeveral other German noblemen; by whoſe aſſiſtance he took poſſeſſion of divers cities, and fixed his head-quarters at Mentz. The emperor, apprized of this revolt, marched directly againſt him, beleaguered that city; and, underſtanding that his ſon was fled, purſued him to Ratisbon, the ſiege of which he undertook §. After a blockade of ſix weeks, the inhabitants, being reduced to extremity, began to treat about a capitulation; but, before the articles were ſettled, Ludolph, by the interceſſion of the nobles, was permitted to retire with his followers, and almoſt the whole city was burned to the ground. Some time after this retreat, Ludolph took the opportunity, when his father was hunting, to throw himſelf bareheaded at his feet, which he bathed with his tears; and, after a pathetic pauſe, "Have "pity," ſaid he, "upon your child, who returns like the prodigal ſon to his father. If "you permit him to live, who hath ſo often deſerved to die, he will be faithful and obedient "for the future, and have time to repent of his folly and ingratitude." The father, equally ſurpriſed and affected with this moving ſpectacle, raiſed him from the ground, while the tears trickled from his eyes, took him into favour, and forgave all his followers.

Otho defeats the Hungarians.

OTHO, after having put an end to the civil wars of Germany, was, in his return to Saxony, met by ambaſſadors from Hungary, who came on pretence of congratulating him on his victories; but, in effect, were ſpies ſent to obtain information of the ſtate of the empire: for, in a little time, he was informed by his brother Henry, that theſe barbarians had entered Bavaria with ſuch a numerous army, as ſeemed to have left their own country quite unpeopled; and that they had deſtroyed a great number of churches and other edifices, and ſlain all the inhabitants of the towns and villages through which they paſſed. The emperor no ſooner received this information, than he marched to the relief of that province, while the Hungarians were employed in the ſiege of Augſburg; and, notwithſtanding the inferiority of his number, attacked their army with ſuch vigour, that, after a very obſtinate engagement, which laſted a whole day, the barbarians were defeated, and cut in pieces with incredible ſlaughter [l]. a b

A. D. 956. He obtains a victory over the Slaves.

NEXT year he turned his arms againſt the Slaves, who had made an irruption into the empire, under the command of Stornefger, and found them intrenched, with their booty, on the other ſide of the river Ratz; which having paſſed upon a bridge of boats, he defeated them in a pitched battle, in which their king loſt his life, and next day put to death ſeventy priſoners, in order to intimidate the barbarians by this example of ſeverity. Nevertheleſs, they revolted again the following year, and being again defeated, implored the clemency of Otho; who pardoned them, on condition that they ſhould enjoy nothing but the effects belonging to their wives.

Receives ambaſſadors from the Arabs and Ruſſians.

DURING this war with the barbarians, he received an embaſſy from Abderame, king of the Arabs of Cordova, to congratulate him upon his victories, and another from Helen, queen of the Ruſſians, with compliments of the ſame kind, and a requeſt, that he would ſend miſſionaries to inſtruct her ſubjects in the Chriſtian religion [m]. In the midſt of theſe felicitations came deputies from the Italians, to demand ſuccour againſt the tyranny of Beranger; and Otho ſent to their aſſiſtance an army, under the command of his ſon Ludolphus; who, after having defeated the tyrant, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, and in a great meaſure delivered that country from oppreſſion; but, inſtead of applauſe, he met with nothing but ingratitude from the Italians, which roſe to ſuch a pitch of inſolence, that they even reproached him with his paſt conduct, and in particular with his revolt againſt his father. Theſe ſevere ſarcaſms overwhelmed him with grief and mortification, which ſoon brought him to his grave. His death, which was bitterly lamented by Otho, gave Beranger time to breathe, and take the field with Peter Candren, ſon of the duke of Venice, who had been exiled for having embarked in ſome enterprize againſt the intereſt of that republic. Theſe aſſociates began to pillage the country, and even beſieged pope John XIII. in the city of Spoleto; ſo that the Italians implored again the aſſiſtance of the emperor, as a recompence for which, Valpert, archbiſhop of Milan, would conſecrate him king of Lombardy, and the pope beſtow upon him the imperial crown. Otho, flattered by theſe propoſals, promiſed to march into Italy, as ſoon as he ſhould have regulated the affairs in Germany; which in order to diſcuſs, he aſſembled a diet at Worms, where his young ſon Otho by his ſecond wife, was elected king of Germany, and afterwards crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, tho' he had not yet attained the eighth year of his age [n]. Then he appointed Herman Biling generaliſſimo of the troops deſtined to act againſt the Danes and Slaves in his abſence, and left young Otho under the tutorage of the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologn [o]. c d e

Sends an army into Italy.

The pope implores again the aſſiſtance of Otho. A. D. 960.

HAVING taken theſe precautions, and made ſuitable preparations for his march, he ſet out for Italy at the head of a powerful army, accompanied by his wife Alix, and a great number of prelates; and, taking his route through Bavaria, paſſed the Alps without reſiſtance.

ON his arrival at Rome, he was conſecrated by the pope, crowned emperor of the Romans, dignified with the appellation of Auguſtus, and received the oath of allegiance from the ſenate and the people, who ſwore to obey him as their ſovereign lord [p] (H). Upon this occaſion, he diſtributed immenſe largeſſes in jewels, gold, and ſilver, reſtored to the church all the demeſnes formerly granted by Pepin and Charlemagne; which had been wreſted from it by the petty tyrants of Italy. At the ſame time letters patent were expedited and ſigned by himſelf, the biſhops, and nobles, importing, among other things, that, according to the agreement formerly made with Eugenius and his ſucceſſor, the Roman clergy and nobility ſhould oblige themſelves, by oath, to hold no election canonical, and to conſecrate no pope, f

(H) The ſame author relates the particulars of the expedition into France, which the emperor undertook in favour of Lewis his brother-in-law, who had been depoſed by Hugh, ſurnamed the Great, father of Hugh Capet. Lewis was reſtored by the arms of Otho, who beſieged Paris, took Rheims, and made himſelf maſter of Lyons. Mezeray and other French hiſtorians take notice of this invaſion; tho' Heiſs is wholly ſilent on the ſubject, in all probability for fear of diſobliging the French, among whom he lived.

a until he ſhould, in the preſence of the emperor's ſon, or ambaſſador, make the ſame promiſe which had been voluntarily made by Leo III. on the ſame ſubject.

BERANGER and his wife being retired to Monteleone, Otho marched thither; upon which they ſurrendered themſelves, were tried, and condemned to perpetual impriſonment at Bamberg, where they ended their days.

THE emperor had no ſooner withdrawn his army from Rome, than pope John, on pretence that Otho intended to diſpoſſeſs the church of the lands which had been granted it by his predeceſſors, introduced into the city Albert, the ſon of Beranger, who, with his father, had been his moſt outrageous enemy, and indeed the occaſion of his imploring the aſſiſtaance of Otho.

b THESE news no ſooner reached the ears of the emperor, than he returned to Rome (the pope and his new patron having fled at his approach), obliged the ſenate and people to renew the oath and promiſe they had formerly made, and, in order to be revenged on John, convoked a council to try him for the ſcandalous life he was accuſed of having led; for it was not his piety that had raiſed him to the papal chair, into which he was thruſt at the age of eighteen, by the intrigues and bribery of his father Alberic, whoſe influence and power were at that time exceſſive (I). The council being aſſembled, heavy complaints were preferred againſt him for the ſpace of three days by the archbiſhops and biſhops of Italy, as well as by the people of Rome. Otho, who aſſiſted in perſon, ordered him to be ſummoned to appear and anſwer to theſe accuſations; and he, refuſing to obey, was declared unworthy of the c papacy, and depoſed: tho' many authors affirm, that, as this council could not be œcumenical, the depoſition was of no validity. Be that as it will, Leo VIII. was elected by the unanimous ſuffrages of all preſent, took the chair in that very aſſembly, and executed the decree by which Otho was recognized as emperor of the Romans, ſovereign and king of Italy, with all the rights and prerogatives for him and his ſucceſſors, which pope Adrian I. had granted to Charlemagne, including the right of inveſtiture of biſhoprics, and the election and confirmation of popes. This decree was confirmed by the oaths of all the clergy and people; ſo that, from this date, we may juſtly ſtile Otho emperor of the Romans, as he now acquired the ſame title by which it had been conferred on Charlemagne. Having ſettled theſe affairs at Rome, he ſet out to appeaſe ſome diſturbances at Spoleto and Camerina, which he erected d into principalities; but, in his abſence, ſeveral prelates and noblemen at Rome, at the inſtigation of Albert, favoured the return of John, who depoſed Leo, and declared his election void. In a few days after his having thus re-aſſumed the papal chair, he was found in bed with a woman, and miſerably ſlain by a rival. Nevertheleſs his adherents ſtill perſiſted in refuſing to own Leo for pope, and proceeded to the election of Benedict V. who was accordingly promoted to the chair of St. Peter.

Calls a council, depoſes John XII. and elects Leo VIII. to the papal chair.

THE emperor, being informed of theſe tranſactions, marched back to Rome; which having beſieged and taken, he cited Benedict to appear before another council, which he convened for that purpoſe; and he obeying the ſummons, preſented himſelf in his pontificals, and was queſtioned for his preſumption in uſurping the apoſtolic dignity during the e life of pope Leo, contrary to the oath which he had taken. Benedict owned his error, implored the compaſſion of the council, and humbled himſelf before Leo; who, at the deſire of Otho, pardoned his crime, permitted him to keep the deacon's orders, and ſent him into exile at Hamburgh [q]. Then Otho, having obliged the Romans to promiſe upon oath, that they would never chuſe a native of any other country than Germany for their emperor, and regulated the affairs of Italy, he returned to his own country, and held a diet at Cologne, in which was confirmed the diviſion of Lorrain into two provinces; the one, bounded by Luxemburg and Franche Compte, being given to Frederick count de Bar, brother of Adalberon, biſhop of Mentz, and Bruno, archbiſhop of Cologne, reſerving the other, which comprehended the duchies of Brabant, Juliers, and Guelderland, together with the provinces con- f tiguous to the mouths of the Rhine, the Meuſe, and the Schelde [r] (K).

(I) The depoſition of the witneſſes, publicly read in council, contained the following particulars: that, in celebrating the maſs, he had not communicated; that he had ordained a deacon in a ſtable, without minding the canonical hours; that he had ſold divers biſhoprics, and one to a boy not more than ten years of age; that he had violated the widow of Rainerus, lain with his own father's concubine, converted the holy palace into a brothel, and cauſed John the cardinal and ſub-dean to be aſſaſſinated; that he was guilty of ſetting fire to houſes; that he had been ſeen exciting tumults in the ſtreets, with a helmet on his head, and a ſword by his ſide; that, in the courſe of his debauches, he had drank the health of the devil; and that, in playing at hazard, he had been ſeveral times heard invoking the names of Jupiter and Venus (1).

John III is raiſed to the papacy by Otho.

POPE Leo VIII. dying in the courſe of this year, the Romans ſent deputies to know the pleaſure of Otho, who ſupplied his place with John XIII. who was impriſoned by the Romans; but ſoon releaſed, and re-eſtabliſhed by the emperor, who returned to Rome for that purpoſe. a

He puniſhes the Romans for their inconſtancy.

NOT contented with the re-eſtabliſhment of John, he reſolved to puniſh the Romans for their inconſtancy: the conſuls were exiled, the tribunes of the people were hanged, to the number of a dozen; the body of Jefroi, who had been ringleader of the revolt, was dug up, dragged through the ſtreets, and thrown into the common ſewer; and his ſucceſſor as prefect was expoſed upon an aſs, with his head to the tail, and, after having been publicly whipt, confined in a dungeon.

Otho's ſon crowned emperor at Rome.

HAVING made theſe examples, the emperor eſtabliſhed a well-regulated policy in Rome, viſited the cities of Italy, and confirmed the donations of Pepin and Charlemagne [s]. Then he cauſed his ſon Otho to be crowned at Rome, as his aſſociate in the empire; and this ceremony being performed, he repaired to Capua, where he was viſited by ambaſſadors from Nicephorus Phocas, emperor of the Greeks, who came to renew the alliance that formerly ſubſiſted between the eaſtern and weſtern empires. This negotiation did not immediately ſucceed; for Nicephorus, who ſtill poſſeſſed ſome towns in Calabria and Apulia, demanded that Otho would relinquiſh ſome cities that he occupied in the ſame country, and aſſiſt him in expelling the Saracens from others which they had reduced. Otho, whoſe aim was to make himſelf maſter of Apulia and Calabria, in order to unite Italy and Germany into one empire, did not reliſh the demand of Nicephorus; but nevertheleſs took that opportunity of ſending a favourable anſwer to the Greek emperor, and of ſignifying his aſſent to a propoſal which Phocas had made, of a match between young Otho and his daughter Theophania. b c

A. D. 966. Treachery of the Greeks.

Notwithſtanding theſe advances to friendſhip and alliance, Nicephorus was ſo much incenſed at the refuſal of his other demand, and the preſumption of Otho in aſſuming the title of emperor, that he formed an execrable plan of revenge, which he was enabled to execute by his craft and diſſimulation. Ambaſſadors were ſent to Conſtantinople, to regulate the conditions and ceremony of the nuptials, and a place appointed at which the princeſs was to be received by the Germans; who repairing to this rendezvous with a magnificent train, were all maſſacred, or carried priſoners to Conſtantinople, except one or two who eſcaped with the news of this horrible treachery [t].

A. D. 968. Otho ſends an army into Calabria;

OTHO, incenſed at this enormous perfidy, ordered counts Gonther and Sigefrid, who were brothers, to march with the flower of his army into Calabria, where they defeated the Greeks, commanded the noſes of their priſoners to be cut off, and ravaged the whole country. d

NICEPHORUS being ſoon after put to death by his ſubjects, John Zemiſces, his ſucceſſor, not only releaſed the Germans, who were priſoners at Conſtantinople, but alſo ſent Theophania, with a magnificent train and rich preſents, into Italy, where her marriage with young Otho was happily conſummated (L). The emperor, ſeeing his ſon married to his wiſh, and of age and capacity to govern his dominions, enjoyed in peace the proſperous ſtate of his affairs for two years; at the end of which he died apoplectic at the city of Minleben, in Saxony, after a reign of thirty years, during which he gave extraordinary proofs of uncommon generoſity, piety, and courage, and juſtly acquired the appellation of Great [u]. While his father was alive, he married Editha (M), daughter of Edmund, king of England, who founded the city of Magdeburg (N); and afterwards took to wife Alix, who, at his death, retired into a convent (O). e a OTHO II. ſurnamed the Sanguinary, on account of the great quantities of blood which he ſpilt, had been elected and crowned during the life of his father, whom he now ſucceeded in the empire, though he was at firſt oppoſed by Henry duke of Bavaria, his own couſin-german; who being ſupported by ſome biſhops, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed at Ratisbon: however, he was ſoon reduced, and not only obliged to renounce his title, but alſo to relinquiſh his duchy, which was given by the victor to Otho, duke of Suabia. This competitor being quelled, the emperor turned his arms towards the river Elbe, to oppoſe Harold, king of Denmark, who had eſpouſed the intereſts of Henry, and advanced with a large body of troops to ſupport his cauſe; but he was ſo hampered by Otho, that he ſued for peace, adding conſiderable preſents to his requeſt, and ſolemnly promiſing to pay an b annual tribute; for which he gave his own ſon as an hoſtage [x].

As for Henry, he was tried by an aſſembly convoked at Quidlembourg, and being convicted of treaſon, was, together with the biſhop of Augsbourg, exiled to Utrecht, where they were kept as priſoners of ſtate [y].

whom he defeats, and makes peace with the king of Bohemia. A. D. 977.

HE had ſcarce diſengaged himſelf from theſe troubles, when he was involved in a war with Lotharius, king of France, about the ſuperiority of Lorrain, to which the French mo- c narch revived his pretenſions, tho' the immediate cauſe of the quarrel was the countenance and ſupport which France gave to the two ſons of Ranier, count of Hainault, who had been ſtripped of his dominions in the reign of the late emperor. Theſe two noblemen, looking upon the death of Otho I. as a favourable conjuncture, aſſembled ſome forces, marched towards their hereditary dominions, and, in a pitched battle near Peronne, defeated Garnier and Rainaud, the two noblemen to whom Hainault had been given. Then they entered Low Lorrain, which they ravaged without oppoſition; and being ſeconded by Charles, brother to Lotharius, and Hugh Capet, at the head of a good army, they took poſſeſſion of their father's country, after having expelled counts Godfrey and Arnold, who had endeavoured to obſtruct their progreſs [z].

d THE emperor being intimidated by ſuch a powerful aſſociation, headed by the king of France, who took this opportunity to claim the ſuperiority of thoſe and many other countries, endeavoured to appeaſe that monarch, by beſtowing, in fief, the duchy of Lorrain upon his brother Charles. The king of France, however, was not ſatisfied with this condeſcenſion, which he did not conſider as a ſufficient atonement for the loſs he had ſuſtained by Otho's encroaching upon the right he had to certain parts of that duchy: he therefore reſolved to do himſelf juſtice; and ſuddenly raiſing an army, marched directly to Aix-la-Chapelle, in order to take the emperor by ſurprize. Otho eſcaped with difficulty, and, inflamed with a deſire of revenge, aſſembled his forces, to the number of ſixty thouſand men, with which he made an irruption into the territories of Lotharius, ravaged all Champagne e and the Iſle of France, and having granted peace to the French on his own terms, evacuated the country, tho' not without ſuſtaining a conſiderable loſs by an inundation of the river Aiſne, in conſequence of which a great part of his army was deſtroyed a.

GEOFFROY, count of Anjou, ſurnamed Griſegonelle, or Grey Coat, who commanded the French army on this occaſion, propoſed to decide the quarrel by ſingle combat with Otho [b]; but this expedient was rejected by the imperialiſts, who would not ſuffer their ſovereign to expoſe his life to ſuch unneceſſary hazard. Be this as it may, certain it is, he concluded a peace with the king of France, and beſtowed the whole of Low Lorrain, with part of the other, upon Charles, brother of Lotharius, who did him homage on his knees for that country [c].

f HAVING adjuſted the affairs of Germany, his next expedition was into Italy, in order to chaſtiſe the Romans, and recover Calabria and Apulia, of which the Greeks had taken poſſeſſion, by the aſſiſtance of the Saracens, contrary to the treaty made by the two emperors, by which these two provinces were given to Otho, as the dowry of Theophania his wife. Immediately after the death of Otho I. the Romans resolved to free themselves from the German yoke, while his successor was involved in domestic troubles. They raised one Cencius to the consulate [d], elected a new pope, called Boniface VII. who had gone to Constantinople, to invite the Greek emperors, Basilius and Constantine, to come and take possession of Rome; and their fleet, being joined by the Arabians of Africa, had invaded and subdued the coast of Naples and Calabria. a

(P) Some authors affirm, that Otho was defeated by the French, who purſued his army for three days and three nights as far as the river Meuſe, and that Lotharius afterwards made peace with him, againſt the inclination of his nobles (6). Others alledge the emperor retired without loſs, and paſſed the river in a miraculous manner, following St. Wolfgang, who divided the waters, ſo that they marched over on dry ground (7).

OTHO, in consequence of these ravages, marched into Italy, entered Rome without opposition, and from thence going in quest of the enemy, hazarded a battle, in which his enemies were at first put in disorder; but the Roman troops and those of Beneventum giving ground, and the Saracens rallying, his army was so totally defeated, that, being divested of all hope, he fled to the sea-side, and finding a vessel, embarked, and committed himself to the mercy of the waves. The ship being taken by corsairs, who did not know his quality, he was carried into Sicily, where he ransomed himself for a large sum of money, having deceived his captors by the facility with which he spoke the Greek language (Q). b

It was not long before he levied new forces, and renewed the war; during which the A. D. 980. Saracens in Italy were totally exterminated. Then he not only chastized the cowards who had abandoned him in the first engagement, but having discovered that the inhabitants of Beneventum had favoured his enemies, and even furnished them with provisions, he allowed his army to plunder the town for three whole days, and then ordered it to be set on fire. Nor did the Romans, who had likewise deserted him, escape with impunity: having invited the principal persons of that city to an entertainment, he, in the midst of their festivity, commanded the authors of his overthrow to be selected, and put to death in the presence of the whole company [e]; a punishment, which, tho' perhaps just in the main, was inflicted in a manner unworthy of a Christian prince, or a sound politician. This, in all probability, was the origin of the epithet Sanguinary; tho' he was likewise distinguished by the appellations of Rufus and Terror Sarazinorum. c

Orders the Saxons and Thuringians to make head against the Sclavonians.

Being informed that the Sclavonians, taking advantage of his absence, had invaded Saxony, and ravaged the bishoprics of Brandenburg, Hevelberg, and Merseburg, he ordered the Saxons and Thuringians to make head against them; and they, in obedience to his command, charged the enemy with such valour and success, in different encounters, that they were obliged to retreat with the loss of thirty-seven thousand men (R). d

A. D. 983. Dies at Rome.

Soon after this invasion, he died at Rome of a bloody flux [f], occasioned by a wound which he had received from a poisoned javelin, in the battle with the Greeks; and his death is said to have been hastened by his grief for the behaviour of the empress Theophania, who had in public expressed her joy at the victory of her countrymen, tho' it was obtained over her own husband (S).

O T H O III.

Otho III. succeeds to his father, but is opposed by Henry duke of Bavaria; and by Crescentius in Italy.

OTHO III. when he succeeded to his father, was no more than twelve years of age (T), for which reason he was surnamed the Infant; but that appellation being soon laid aside, he acquired the epithet of Rufus, and at length was dignified with the title of Wonder of the World. His election produced great disputes among the Italians and German princes, who had accompanied his father to Rome; some of whom openly declared in favour of Henry duke of Bavaria, and nephew to Otho the first. This prince, who aspired to the empire, claimed the tutelage of young Otho, as his nearest relation, and the government of the empire during his minority. On this pretence he assembled a body of troops, with which he entered Cologne; and seizing the person of the emperor, who was in that city, under the care of archbishop Warin, conducted him, with a numerous train, to Corbie, and from thence to Magdeburg, where they were received amidst the acclamations of the people [g]. (Q) Gobelinus Persona alledges, that it was a Grecian ship in which Otho embarked; and that the master being prevailed upon, by the promise of a great reward, to carry him to the city of Rossario, where the empress then was, he took the opportunity, while the ship was at anchor in the road, and the master hesitating, to throw himself into the sea, and swim ashore, where he was received by his wife and adherents (8).

(R) About this time Hamburg and Bremen were erected into an archbishop's see (9).

(S) Otho made a law, forbidding his subjects to believe an Italian upon his oath; and decreed, that, when a cause could not be determined by evidence, it should be decided by single combat (10).

a try, ſet up a Roman nobleman called Creſcentius, who was at that time conſul, and governor of the city. But the greateſt part of the German princes eſpouſing the cauſe of Otho, who, tho' very young, had already given marks of a fine genius, delivered him from the hand of Henry, and conveyed him to Weiſſemſtadt, where he was proclaimed with the uſual ſolemnity [h]; his title being acknowledged through Germany, Lombardy, and all the other dominions of the empire, except the city of Rome, which had ſwerved from its duties in favour of the conſul Creſcentius. As for his education, it was committed to the care of the archbiſhop of Mentz and the biſhop of Hildeſheim. A. D. 984.

DURING the firſt years of his reign, Lotharius, king of France, invaded High Lorrain, and made himſelf maſter of Verdun [i], which however was, after his death, reſtored to b Germany. The Sclavonians too, aſſiſted by the Danes, followed the example of the Romans, and revolted; but Otho had ſcarce attained the age of fourteen, when he began to exerciſe his courage and capacity againſt theſe rebels, whom he vanquiſhed in divers expeditions, and at length wholly ſubdued. He vanquiſhes the Sclavonians and Danes. 987.

LEWIS V. of France dying about this period, the conteſt began between Charles duke of Lorrain, uncle to the defunct, and Hugh Capet, a nobleman of great talents and influence, who found means to render his competitor odious to his countrymen, to obtain a neutrality of the emperor, and, laſtly, to aſcend the throne of France, after having taken priſoner the unhappy Charles, who did not long ſurvive his misfortune [k]. Conteſt in France between Charles duke of Lorrain and Hugh Capet. 988.

OTHO, having now attained the years of diſcretion, viſited the towns upon the Rhine, c confirmed the privileges of the biſhops and abbots, diſplayed his liberality among the monaſteries; from thence made a progreſs into the northern provinces, and tarried ſome time at Wildeſhuſen, where he made ſeveral regulations for the eſtabliſhment of good order and the reformation of the people, who were ſtill in a ſtate of ſavage ignorance and barbarity [l].

THE Danes, under their king Sueno, pillaged Lower Saxony without oppoſition, divided their fleet into two ſquadrons, one of which entered the Weſer, with a view to ſend out detachments, and lay the country under contribution; while the other, anchoring before Staden, took the city after a faint reſiſtance, and then defeated the emperor's lieutenant, count Thierri, who had aſſembled the militia in order to ſtop their career: but Sigefroi, who had commanded in Staden, and made ſhift to eſcape, rallied and reinforced the imperial d troops, and attacking the enemy, who by this time were thinned by diſtempers, and incumbered in their booty, compelled them to retire on board their ſhips with the utmoſt precipitation. The other detachment met with a worſe fate; for, being bewildered in their excurſions, they forced one Hurbert to be their guide, and he, having led them into the midſt of a number of moraſſes, gave notice to the Saxons, who fell upon them with great fury, and retook the booty they had gained; ſo that Sueno returned to his own country with great diſcomfiture and diſgrace [m]. War with the Danes. 989.

IMMEDIATELY after this expedition, war broke out between him and Eric, king of Sweden, who fitted out a powerful navy; and, giving battle to the Daniſh fleet, obtained a complete victory, in conſequence of which he united Denmark to his dominions. Otho, unwilling to be at variance with ſuch a powerful neighbour, made him tenders of friendſhip, which were immediately embraced, and they engaged in a treaty, by which it was ſtipulated, that German miſſionaries ſhould be allowed to preach the goſpel in the dominions of Eric, and that none of the ſubjects of Sweden, Denmark, or Norway, ſhould, for the future, make incurſions into the territories of the empire [n]. Treaty with Sweden.

WHILE the emperor was employed in theſe tranſactions, Creſcentius neglected nothing to eſtabliſh his power in Rome, where he even impriſoned pope John XIV. becauſe he favoured Otho's party; who, dying in confinement, was ſucceeded by John XV. This new pope was ſo perſecuted by the ſame tyrant, that he fled into Tuſcany, from whence he ſent legates to implore the emperor's protection. The Romans, remembering what they had f ſuffered under the two former Othos for their cruelty to their popes, were ſo terrified at this appeal, that they immediately deputed ſome citizens of the firſt rank to wait upon John, and intreat him to return, with the moſt ſolemn aſſurances that they would, for the future, behave to him with all due reverence and reſpect. Though John, confiding in theſe proteſtations, returned to Rome, where he was honourably received, the emperor, who knew the caballing genius of the Romans, ſent the empreſs Theophania, his mother, into Italy, with a body of troops commanded by Hugh marquis of Brandenburg; and ſhe, being a woman of ſpirit and diſcernment, reſtrained the Romans and the reſt of the Italians within the bounds of their duty, for the ſpace of two years; at the expiration of which ſhe ſet out for Germany, leaving the marquis, whom ſhe had created governor of Florence, to obſerve the motions of that unſteady people. In her journey to Frankfort ſhe was taken ill, and 990. The empreſs Theophania goes to Italy.

993. War with the Slaves. AFTER this ceremony, he marched againſt the Slaves, who had revolted, and taken the city of Brandenburg; and, having expelled them from that place, obliged them to ſue for peace, which he granted upon reaſonable terms; but it was not long before they were ſpirited up to another revolt by one Chiezo, an outlaw, under whoſe conduct they ſurpriſed Brandenburg, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral other places; which, however, were privately betrayed to the emperor by Chiezo, on condition that he ſhould be pardoned, and reſtored to the poſſeſſion of his effects. The Slaves, incenſed at his perfidy, continued the war with various ſucceſs, until, after having ſuffered divers repulſes, they again humbled themſelves before the emperor, who granted them peace, in conſideration of releaſing all their priſoners without ranſom, and ſurrendering the places which they ſtill poſſeſſed on the frontiers of the marche of Brandenbourg [o]. b

OTHO, having thus triumphed over the Slaves, repaired to Halberſtadt, to aſſiſt at the dedication of a new church built by biſhop Hildebrand; from thence he made a circuit thro' the different provinces of the empire, where he enacted new laws, and made regulations for the preſervation of order and the public peace; which being eſtabliſhed by his care

995. and diſcretion, he aſſembled a diet at Magdeburg, in order to demand ſupplies of troops and money for his expedition into Italy, where his preſence was neceſſary to puniſh Creſcentius for a freſh revolt, and quell the ſeditions which had riſen in the cities of Milan, Capua, and Beneventum. Theſe demands were backed by the remonſtrances of the nuncios, whom pope John ſent thither to invite him to come with a powerful army, in order to puniſh the rebels, quiet the troubles of Italy, and receive the imperial crown; and his departure was, moreover, earneſtly ſollicited by Landulphus, archbiſhop of Milan, who had been expelled from his dioceſe, and come to Magdeburg to implore the emperor's protection. c

OTHO, having raiſed a conſiderable army in conſequence of the ſupplies he received from the diet, began his march for Italy, and inveſted Milan; which being ſurrendered in a few days, he entered the city in triumph, and re-eſtabliſhed the archbiſhop, by whom he was crowned king of Lombardy. Thence he proceeded to Pavia, where he celebrated the feſtival of Eaſter, and afterwards repaired to Ravenna, where, hearing of the pope's death, he cauſed Bruno, a relation of his own, to be elevated to the papal chair; and this Saxon prelate, who aſſumed the name of Gregory V. ſoon after his elevation crowned his patron emperor of the Romans, with the ſame ſolemnity and pomp which had attended the coronation of his father and grand-father [p]. d

996. He does a very ſignal piece of juſtice at Modena. THIS ceremony being performed, the conſul Creſcentius pardoned by the interceſſion of the new pope, and the troubles appeaſed at Capua and Beneventum, Otho ſet out on his return to Germany; and, viſiting in his route the principal places of Lombardy, ſtaid ſome time at Modena, where he did a very ſignal piece of juſtice upon the perſon of his empreſs Mary, daughter of the king of Arragon. That princeſs, incenſed at the repulſe ſhe had met from an Italian count, of whom ſhe was enamoured, accuſed him to the emperor of having made an attempt upon her honour; in conſequence of which charge, he was tried, condemned, and beheaded; but, a few days after his execution, the counteſs found means to prove his innocence, and undeceive the emperor; who, being extremely ſhocked at the diſcovery of the truth, ordered the empreſs to be burned alive, and fined himſelf, for his over haſty judgment againſt the count, in a large ſum for the benefit of the widow [q] (U). e

997. THE emperor, at his return to Germany, found the Slaves in poſſeſſion of Bernbourg; from whence having expelled them with great ſlaughter, he repaired to Magdeburg, and deprived the archbiſhop Giſelarius of the government of that country, becauſe he allowed himſelf to be ſurpriſed by the barbarians [r]. This expedition was ſcarce finiſhed when he underſtood that Creſcentius, having been again elected conſul in Rome, had expelled pope Gregory, and elevated another to the papal chair under the name of John XVI. (X). Enraged at this inſult, the emperor returned with a powerful army to Rome; which having beſieged and taken, he ordered the anti-pope to be thrown from the top of the caſtle of St. Angelo, after his eyes had been put out, and his noſe cut off. Creſcentius, being alſo apprehended, was mounted upon a ſorry mule, and conducted through the city with his face towards the tail. The two uſurpers being puniſhed in this manner, and Gregory reſtored, the emperor, to prevent ſuch ſeditions and revolts for the future, publiſhed a decree, importing, that the Germans ſhould have the ſole right and power of electing a Roman emperor among their own countrymen, excluſive of all other nations; and that the pope ſhould have no other authority on ſuch occaſions, than that of proclaiming the election at Rome, and of performing the ceremony of coronation, when the emperor ſhould think proper to go thither. This decree was ratified and confirmed by Gregory; and ſeveral hiſtorians affirm, that Otho and this pope, in order to ſecure the empire to the German nation, afterwards reduced the electors to the number of

THEN he returned to Pavia, where he made ſeveral conſtitutions and regulations for reſtoring and eſtabliſhing the peace of Italy. The new pope dying in the ſecond year of his papacy, he ſupplied his place with Gerbert, formerly archbiſhop of Rheims, who took the appellation of Sylveſter II. and prevailed upon Otho to renew and confirm the privileges which had been beſtowed upon the Roman church by Pepin, Charlemagne, and Lewis the Debonnaire.

HAVING ſettled the affairs of Italy, he ſet out for Germany by the way of Bologna, halted at Ratiſbon, entered Thuringia, and viſited ſome towns in Upper Saxony; from thence he proceeded to Poland, which he erected into a kingdom at the ſollicitation of duke Boleſlaus, c who did him homage, and agreed to hold his dominions as a fief of the empire [u] (Z). Poland is erected into a kingdom. 1000.

SOON after this excurſion, being informed that the Saracens had taken the advantage of his abſence to make an irruption into the Campania of Rome, ſurprize Capua, and ravage the neighbouring country, he haſtened into Italy, aſſembled his army at Ravenna, retook the city of Capua, expelled the barbarians, re-eſtabliſhed peace, and repaired to Rome with a ſmall number of troops. While he reſided in the capital, the Tiburtines, whom he had formerly chaſtiſed for ſedition, revolted again: ſo that he was obliged to go and beſiege the place, which ſurrendered at diſcretion. At his return, he found the gates of Rome ſhut againſt him; and although he was next day admitted, with a few noblemen and officers, a conſpiracy, formed by Gregorio, of the houſe of Toſcanella, had well nigh deprived him of d his life: the Roman people openly rebelled againſt his authority, and it was with great difficulty he made his eſcape by the aſſiſtance of the marquis of Tuſcany, who had in vain attempted to effect an accommodation [x]. While he was buſied in aſſembling forces to revenge this indignity, he was poiſoned by a pair of gloves, ſent him in a preſent by the widow of Creſcentius, whom he is ſaid to have debauched under promiſe of marriage [y]. Marches into Italy. 1001. Is poiſoned by a pair of gloves; 1002.

He died at Paterno, in the 30th year of his age, after a glorious reign of 18 years; his body was carried to Aix-la-Chapelle, at his own re-

OTHO being dead without iſſue, three competitors ſtarted up, ſuppoſed equally qualified to wear the imperial crown; Henry duke of Bavaria, Herman duke of Suabia and Alſace, and Ekkard marquis of Saxony. The firſt of theſe, being grandſon to Otho II. by his daughter, was, by means of his ſuperior power, elected, confirmed, and conſecrated, at Mentz, by the archbiſhop Wilgiſius, under the name of Henry II. and he is ſaid to have been the firſt who was raiſed to that dignity by the votes of the ſeven electors; but this
f ſucceſs he did not attain, until his competitor Ekkard was aſſaſſinated by the counts de Northien, who were Henry's partizans [a]. Henry duke of Bavaria is elected.

(Y) The manner of this conſul's death is variouſly related. Some authors allege he was killed by treachery; and others affirm he fell valiantly fighting in defence of the caſtle, after having ſued in vain for the emperor's forgiveneſs: we are likewiſe told, that Otho took his widow for his miſtreſs, and afterwards did penance for his cruelty to the antipope (13).

Had Charlemagne been interred in this manner, the Normans, who deſtroyed Aix-la-Chapelle before this period, would hardly have left him ſitting upon a throne of gold.

Herman declared an enemy of the empire. 1003.

He began his reign, by causing Herman duke of Suabia to be declared an enemy to the empire, in an assembly at Mentz; and, in consequence of that declaration, he ravaged his dominions with the forces of Germany raised for that purpose: while his rival, resolving to support his pretensions by force of arms, and being furnished with troops by the bishops of Constance and Coire, advanced into Alsace, and took by assault the city of Strasburg; which, though part of his own dominions, had declared against his interest. He likewise proposed to decide the contest by single combat with Henry, who accepted the challenge; but his courage failed him, and he was in a little time obliged to yield to the superior fortune of his adversary [b]. a

The new emperor, having laid Suabia under contribution, marched into Saxony; and at Mersburg received the oath of fidelity from duke Bernard, the archbishops of Magdeburg and Bremen, the counts palatine, Boleslaus, king of Poland, and the deputies of the Slaves, who inhabited Pomerania. b

Being thus acknowleged through all the dominions and fiefs of the empire, he in compliance with the repeated request of his nobles, married Cunegunda, daughter of the first count of Luxembourg, and their nuptials were celebrated at Paderborn with great magnificence. Then he made a circuit among the provinces, where he exercised the virtues of equity and benevolence, deciding vexatious processes, restoring the peace of families, and re-establishing union among the nobility, which were divided by feud or faction. After having taken these wise steps for the advantage of his country, he repaired to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was crowned a second time for the satisfaction of several noblemen, and, in particular of Herbert archbishop of Cologne, who alleged, that the first coronation had not been performed with due formality. c

Mean while Herman, tho' he made shift to surprise Brisac, and gained some other petty advantages, found great difficulty in keeping his partizans together; at length, despairing of being able to cope with the power and authority of Henry, he made him a tender of his submission, by the canal of his friends. This being accepted, he came in person to Bruchsal, and on his knees asked pardon of the emperor, who received him courteously, and granted him every thing he desired, on condition that he should repair the damage he had done to Strasburg [c].

Notwithstanding this accommodation, he renewed his intrigues, in conjunction with Theodoric duke of Lorrain, and publicly committed cruel outrages against some of the emperor's adherents in that duchy; so that Henry, in order to put a stop to these disorders, assembled a diet of the Lorrain noblemen at Thionville; where it was resolved to raze the castle of Mulsberg on the Rhine, and other precautions were taken to interrupt the junction and correspondence of two such powerful opposers. d

Commotions in Italy.

In the midst of these deliberations, the emperor was informed of the commotions by which Italy was agitated. The people of Lombardy, determined to shake off the German yoke, had chosen Hardouin marquis of Ivrea king of Italy; but this election was declared null and void by Arnold archbishop of Milan, who intended that no king of Lombardy should be chosen without his consent; and, in an assembly of bishops and abbots, decreed the crown to Henry, to whom he instantly sent deputies with an account of the transaction, conjuring him to come without delay, and deliver the Italians from the tyranny of the usurper. In consequence of these sollicitations, Henry sent a body of troops, under the command of Otho duke of Carinthia; but Hardouin, having secured the passes of the Alps, attacked them with 15,000 men, in a confined place, where they could not be extended or drawn up in line of battle; and, after a very obstinate engagement, obtained a complete victory [d]. e

Conquests of the king of Poland. A. D. 1004.

The emperor, tho' very much mortified at this misfortune, could not quit Germany, where he was detained by fresh disturbances. Boleslaus duke of Bohemia being a weak and worthless prince, the king of Poland resolved to seize this favourable conjuncture of retrieving Cracovia, of which his dominions had been dismembred by the father of Boleslaus. With this view he besieged and took the town by assault: then pillaged Silesia, and penetrated to the heart of Moravia, destroying the whole country with fire and sword. He afterwards invaded Lusatia, and made himself master of Meissen; while Boleslaus, instead of taking measures to oppose his progress, wallowed in riot and debauchery, and committed such acts of oppression, that his subjects revolted. They chose in his room Wlodowic, a prince of the ducal house of Bohemia, who actually received the investiture of the duchy from the emperor; but, he dying soon after his election, the Bohemians supplied his place with Jaromir, brother of Boleslaus, without the consent or approbation of the Polish king, who was so much incensed at their presumption, that he re-established the banished duke by force of arms. This worthless prince, being now again in quiet possession of his dominions, invited his principal noblemen to a banquet, where they were cruelly murdered: his subjects, ex- f g

ALTHO' Henry was not a little chagrined at theſe revolutions, he did not pretend to treat the king of Poland as an uſurper; but demanded that he would do him homage for Bohemia, and the other conqueſts he had made of the fiefs of the empire. To this demand he ſent no definitive anſwer. The emperor being informed that he had entered into a ſecret aſſociation againſt him, with Hezelo de Scheweinfurt, marquis of Franconia, Erneſt, duke of b Suabia, and Henry's own brother, Bruno, biſhop of Augsburg, he convoked a diet at Merſbourg, and, in conſequence of the deliberations of that aſſembly, raiſed an army of Bavarians, Lorrainers, and Franks, with which he entered Franconia, took the town of Martclau, and other ſtrong places, which were diſmantled, compelled Hezelo to fly for protection to the Poliſh king, and ordered Erneſt, who was taken priſoner in the courſe of the campaign, to be beheaded [e].

An aſſociation againſt Henry

THESE diſturbances being quelled, Henry ordered the Saxon and Thuringian troops to march againſt the Slaves of Holſtein, who had revolted at the inſtigation of the king of Poland, pillaged the country between the Oder and the Elbe, and threatened Saxony with fire and ſword; while their allies, the Poliſh troops, made frequent irruptions into Bavaria. c The emperor having repelled theſe barbarians, ravaged Holſtein, ſecured the frontiers with proper garriſons, and, at his return to Merſbourg, was reconciled to his brother Bruno; at the ſame time he pardoned Hezelo, at the interceſſion of the archbiſhop of Mentz, and the duke of Saxony; but, in order to prevent the bad conſequences of ſuch a turbulent genius, he ordered him to be confined in the citadel of Givinkenſteim, under the care of the archbiſhop of Magdeburg [f].

The Slaves revolt.

IN the courſe of this year, Stephen, duke of Hungary, who had married the emperor's ſiſter Giſella, and converted a great part of his ſubjects to the Chriſtian religion, received from pope John XIX. the title of king and apoſtle; and his dominions were divided into ten biſhoprics, of which Strigonia was appointed metropolitan, though, as yet, the idolaters of d that country were much more numerous than the Chriſtians.

HENRY, being ſtrongly ſollicited by the archbiſhop of Milan to march againſt Hardouin, ſet out for Italy by the way of Bavaria, where he had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing Henry of Luxemburg, his brother-in-law, elected duke by the ſtates or parliament of that province: then, leaving his wife Cunegunda to the care of the archbiſhop of Magdeburg, he paſſed the Alps, and marched towards Verona. Hardouin retired at his approach, while he proceeding to Pavia, was there crowned king of Lombardy by the archbiſhop of Milan; but Hardouin having ſome partizans in the town, they inflamed the populace to ſuch a degree with artful inſinuations, that the whole city was involved in tumult. One multitude ran to the palace, in order to deſtroy the emperor, whom they loudly reviled as a tyrant and uſurper; while : another crowd ſecured the gates againſt the imperial troops, which were encamped without the walls. The Germans, who were within the city, aſſembled for the defence of their ſovereign, repulſed the ſeditious Pavians from the palace, while the ſoldiers in the camp, underſtanding the nature of the commotion, ſcaled the walls in great numbers, and committed a terrible ſlaughter in the ſtreets, until the emperor commanded them to deſiſt, and retired to the fortreſs of St. Peter. Thither the principal inhabitants repaired in a body, to implore his clemency, and lay the blame of the ſedition on a few partizans of Hardouin, who had practiſed upon the ignorance of the vulgar: and he generouſly accepted of their apology, obſerving, that mercy was his favourite virtue, and that he would much rather find their obedience the reſult of affection, than the conſequence of fear [g].

HAVING quelled the commotion, and received the ſubmiſſion of the other towns of Lombardy by their deputies, he repaired to Milan, where he found the inhabitants quiet, and in appearance devoted to his ſervice; and from thence he returned to Germany, by the country of the Griſons, puniſhing delinquents, and enacting ſalutary laws and regulations in the countries through which he paſſed. In his progreſs through the provinces, he convened an aſſembly of biſhops and nobility at Dortmund in Weſtphalia, for the reformation of abuſes both in church and ſtate; and acquired ſuch a character of generoſity, juſtice, and moderation, that people came from all the neighbouring nations to ſettle in the empire. As Boleſlaus, king of Poland, ſtill continued in poſſeſſion of Bohemia, and ſet Henry at defiance, the emperor having declared war againſt that prince, by the advice of an aſſembly convoked at Mersbourg, marched againſt the uſurper, whom he expelled from that duchy, and entered Prague in triumph, where he eſtabliſhed Jaromir, brother of their former duke Boleſlaus;

and gave orders for releasing Hezelo, marquis of Franconia, at the desire of a minister, who solicited his liberty in a pathetic address from the pulpit. Then he assembled his nobles at Magdeburg, where it was resolved to prosecute the war, with the utmost vigour, against the king of Poland, who continued to make incursions as far as the river Sala in Misnia; and, in consequence of that resolution, he passed the Elbe with an army of Saxons. After a fatiguing march, he found the enemy encamped between the rivers Tober and Oder, and crossing the first of these in the night, fell upon them with such fury, that they were intirely defeated [h]. Boleslaus being no longer able to keep the field, sued for peace; which being granted, he returned to Saxony, and severely punished some Slaves, who had interrupted the public peace in his absence. a

It was now that he put in execution the scheme he had formed of erecting Bamberg into a bishopric; which was confirmed by the pope, on condition that the bishop should hold it of the holy see, and pay an yearly acknowledgement of an hundred silver marks, and an horse completely caparisoned: but the bishop of Wurtsburg opposing the erection, as an expedient that would dismember his diocese, Henry assembled a council at Frankfort upon the Main, where he prostrated himself before the bishops and prelates, who, to the number of thirty-five, subscribed the confirmation of his holiness [i]. b

A. D. 1007. The Poles invade Prussia.

BOLESLAUS, weary of the peace, endeavoured, by false insinuations, to decoy Stephen, king of Hungary, into an alliance against the emperor; but that project miscarrying, he fell upon the Prussians, or Borussians, a savage people, who migrating from the source of the Tanais, had settled in the deserts between Poland and the Baltic, where they lived in the utmost barbarity, feeding on horse-flesh, and worshipping serpents; yet they must have possessed something worth having, as the Poles found their account in plundering the country. c

About this period, Otho, duke of the Low Lorrain, and last known descendant of Charlemagne, being dead, Henry bestowed the duchy upon Godfrey, count of the Ardennes. This donation gave umbrage to Albert, count of Namur, and Lambert, brother of the count of Mons, who had married sisters of the late duke, and were now patronized by the king of France, who wanted to revive his pretensions upon Lorrain. They were likewise supported by Baldwin, count of Flanders, who began hostilities in their favour, and took Valenciennes, and other places upon the Scheld, belonging to Low Lorrain. Henry, incensed at these outrages, assembled an army, and marched into Flanders, where he made a fruitless attempt upon Ghent; but he ravaged the country, and carried off a number of the nobility; so that Baldwin was fain to submit, and was pardoned on condition that he would restore Valenciennes, defray the expences of the war, and give hostages for his future fidelity [k]. d

Troubles of High and Low Lorrain.

At the same time High Lorrain was involved in trouble and confusion, on account of the bishopric of Metz, which was usurped by Theodoric, brother of the empress Cunegunda; while another brother, called Adalberon, ambitious of obtaining the archbishopric of Triers, opposed Megingaude, who was nominated to that see by the emperor. But these usurpers were furnished with troops by Frederic, count de Luxemburg, and chiefly supported by their own brother, Henry duke of Bavaria, who was, for his rebellious behaviour, put to the ban of the empire. e

A. D. 1010. Commotions in Saxony.

While the emperor was employed in appeasing the troubles of Lorrain, Saxony was violently agitated by new commotions, excited by a quarrel between Herman, son of Ekkard, count of Thuringia, and Guncelin, marquis of Misnia, which last, in an assembly of the Saxon noblemen, being convicted of having begun the hostilities, and of having engaged in secret connexions with Boleslaus, king of Poland, the declared enemy of the empire, Henry divested him of his dominions, which were given to his rival, and committed him as a prisoner to the care of Arnold, bishop of Halberstadt. His brother Bruno promised to deliver the town of Meisen to Boleslaus, who sent his troops thither for that purpose; but they were repulsed by the garrison, whom their commander could not corrupt, and next day Herman entered, and took possession [l]. f 1011. The imperial troops ravage Silesia.

The emperor, resolving to chastise Boleslaus for his clandestine practices, sent an army against him, under the command of Jaromir, duke of Bohemia, who advanced into Silesia, besieged Glogaw, and ravaged the open country; while Henry fortified Lebus, on the frontiers of Brandenburg and Poland, by which means he was master of the Oder, and in a condition to hinder Boleslaus from making irruptions into Lusatia and Brandenburg.

Then he assembled a diet at Coblentz, in order to do justice upon the rebellious bishops of Metz and Triers, and their brother the duke of Bavaria, who some time after came in person to Aix-la-Chapelle, where they threw themselves at his feet, implored his clemency, and were taken into favour [m].

a THE emperor, fatigued with theſe inceſſant troubles, cloyed with ſucceſs, ſick of human grandeur, and charmed with the tranquillity of a monkiſh life, entertained thoughts of abdicating the empire, and becoming a canon of Strasbourg: but theſe ſentiments were combated by the princes of the empire, who repreſented the neceſſity of his continuing upon the throne for the common good of Germany, in ſuch eager remonſtrances, that he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded, and contented himſelf with founding a rich prebend, the poſſeſſor of which was called King of the Choir. By this time Boleſlaus had ſurpriſed and deſtroyed the town of Lebus; ſo that Henry was obliged to march againſt him; but the Pole, leaving part of his troops with his ſon Maceſlaus, whom the emperor defeated, retired with the reſt to make himſelf maſter of Bohemia, from whence Jaromir had been expelled by his ſubjects, b on account of his cruelty and oppreſſive reign. Accordingly the Pole pillaged the country, and beſieged Prague, which ſurrendered to his arms; while Jaromir fled for protection to Henry, by whoſe aſſiſtance Othalric, the ſon of Jaromir, was put in poſſeſſion of the duchy, at the deſire of the Bohemians, who deteſted the father, whom the emperor ſent into exile at Utrecht. As for Boleſlaus, having intereſted himſelf in a quarrel between the duke of Ruſſia and his ſon, he reſolved to ſupport the latter by force of arms; but being afraid of leaving his kingdom unfurniſhed while at variance with the emperor, he ſollicited Henry for peace, which was granted, after he had done homage for his dominions [n].

DURING theſe tranſactions, the Slaves revolted, and ravaged the northern banks of the Oder with fire and ſword, under their prince Meſtiwoi, who had been affronted by Theodoric, c marquis of Eaſtern Saxony; but Henry was obliged to leave the care of this war to the diet convened at Gruningen, becauſe his own preſence was become neceſſary in Italy, in order to repreſs the inſolence of Hardouin, who had re-aſſumed the authority in his abſence, and reigned without controul. He therefore aſſembled an army, repaſſed the Alps of the Tyrol, defeated Hardouin on the frontiers of the Veroneſe, and proceeding to Rome, was crowned, with his wife Cunegunda, by pope Benedict VIII. who aſked him on the ſteps of St. Peter's, If he would always preſerve his fidelity to him and his ſucceſſors; and was anſwered in the affirmative [o].

IMMEDIATELY after this ceremony, he founded a biſhopric at Bobio, where St. Columban died, made ſome regulations at Pavia, and having appeaſed the troubles of Lombardy, he d ſet out on his return to Germany. In paſſing through Burgundy, he viſited the abbey of Clugni, where he was received as an aſſociate, and afterwards deſired he might be entered as a monk in the abbey of St. Vall at Verdun; upon which occaſion the abbot received him as a brother, on condition he ſhould obey him in all things, and then very prudently commanded him to continue at the helm of the government.

IN obedience to this order, he determined to bear the toils of empire. He quelled ſome diſturbances in Suabia, and afterwards convoked a diet at Mersburg, where Boleſlaus, being accuſed of having violated the treaty, and favoured the revolt of Hardouin, was ſummoned to appear before the ſtates of the empire. Inſtead of obeying this call, the king of Poland began to levy troops, and endeavoured to engage the duke of Bohemia in his intereſt; e and the emperor, paſſing the Elbe with an army, attacked and defeated the ſon of Boleſlaus. This war continued for ſome time with various ſucceſs, and at length was terminated by a treaty of peace, concluded at Bautzen, at the earneſt ſollicitation of Boleſlaus, who obliged himſelf to pay an annual tribute to the emperor for Poland and Moravia.

AFTER the ratification of this treaty, Henry repaired to Baſil, where he was viſited by Rodolphus III. king of Transjurane Burgundy, who being inſulted by his own ſubjects, on account of his effeminacy, came to implore the emperor's protection, and even ceded to him all his dominions. In conſequence of this deed, Henry made a progreſs through the kingdom which he had thus obtained; but the people were ſo exaſperated at the condeſcenſion of Rodolphus, that he was extremely ill received, and had the mortification to be refuſed ad- f mittance into ſeveral towns; ſo that, being provoked at theſe inſults, he permitted his troops to ravage the country, and ſet the villages on fire. His vengeance was afterwards completed by Werner, biſhop of Strasbourg, who, with a body of imperial troops, advanced as far as Geneva, againſt the noblemen who had revolted, over whom he obtained a complete victory [p]. While the biſhop was thus employed, Henry marched into Lower Saxony againſt duke Bernard, who harraſſed that province with his tyranny and exactions; but finding himſelf unable to cope with the emperor, he ſubmitted to his power and correction, and gave ſureties for his future behaviour. Having quieted Saxony, he repaired to Frankfort upon the Main, in the utmoſt tribulation for the calumnies which began to be circulated againſt the em-

Commotions in Italy. A. D. 1019.

ALTHOUGH the towns of Lombardy enjoyed the moſt perfect tranquillity under the emperor's lieutenants, Sicily, Apulia, and Calabria were ſtill expoſed to the invaſions of the Saracens, who at length fell upon Tuſcany, took Euna, and expelled the biſhop; but by the diligence of the pope, who levied forces by land, and armed barks to cut off their retreat, they were defeated and cut in pieces, and their princeſs, who was taken priſoner, afterwards beheaded, for inſulting his holineſs. But the occaſional invaſions of thoſe pirates were not of ſuch conſequence to Italy as the troubles occaſioned by the dominion of the Greeks, who ſtill poſſeſſed part of Apulia and Calabria, which were governed by an officer called Catapan, appointed by the emperors of Conſtantinople. The people, harraſſed by the exactions of this lieutenant, took to their arms, under the command of Mello, prince of Bari, with a view to expel the Greeks; who having received a ſtrong reinforcement from Conſtantinople, threatened the revolters with death and deſtruction. Mello, finding himſelf incapable of oppoſing ſuch a formidable power, had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the Normans, who now began to appear in this part of the world, and who ſerved him ſo effectually, that he defeated the Greeks in a pitched battle; but theſe being again reinforced, were victors in their turn; ſo that Mello, and even pope Benedict, fled to Germany, in order to implore the protection of the emperor, who then reſided at Bamberg [r]. b

HENRY II. tho' extremely well diſpoſed to ſuccour Italy, was for ſome time detained by certain feuds, which had broke out between the princes of the empire: but, in the mean time, at the deſire of his holineſs, he, by a freſh edict, confirmed the laws which he had formerly enacted at Pavia, and convoked an aſſembly at Aix-la-Chapelle, to adjuſt the meaſures for the expedition (B). c

Henry marches into Italy.

ALL the troubles of Germany being appeaſed, and the neceſſary preparations made for the occaſion, he ſet out for Italy, marching along the coaſt of the Adriatic; and ſent a detachment of eleven thouſand men, under the command of Poppo, archbiſhop of Triers, who penetrated into the country of the Marſes, now called Abruzzo; while Pelegrin of Cologne marched directly to Rome, to ſecure the perſons of Pandolphus, prince of Capua, and Athenulphus, abbot of Monte Caſſino, who had joined the Greeks in the pope's abſence. The abbot, hearing of their approach, embarked at Otranto for Conſtantinople, and periſhed by ſhipwreck; and Pandolphus ſurrendering himſelf, was brought to the emperor's camp, tried, condemned, and pardoned, at the interceſſion of Pelegrin. Henry was then employed in beſieging the town of Troy in Apulia, which ſurrendered at diſcretion, after having been reduced to extremity. He afterwards reconquered all the places which the Greeks had taken in his abſence, ſubdued the provinces of Calabria and Apulia, which were obliged to give hoſtages for their fidelity, beſtowed the principality of Capua on the count de Feana, furniſhed the nephews of Mello with troops, to drive the Greeks from Bari, gratified his own followers with conſiderable rewards, appointed a new abbot of Monte Caſſino, and, his army being conſiderably diminiſhed by ſickneſs, returned to Germany, leaving Italy to the enjoyment of that peace which he had eſtabliſhed [s]. d

ALTHOUGH Henry's reign had been generally proſperous, the inceſſant troubles of Germany had kept him in ſuch continual agitation, that, till this period, he never could enjoy that tranquillity which ſeems to have been the conſtant object of his wiſh. But now that he had appeaſed all the diſturbances in his dominions, he reſolved to reap the fruits of his labours in quiet; and being deſirous of living on an amicable footing with his neighbours, he had an interview with Robert, king of France, in which thoſe two princes contracted a particular friendſhip for each other, and concerted meaſures for reforming the abuſes which had crept into their dominions. This conference, at that time called the meeting of the two ſaints, was the laſt remarkable tranſaction of Henry's life; for ſoon after his return, he died at Grone in the month of July, after a proſperous reign of twenty-two years [t] (C). The ſovereignty which the biſhops of Rome afterwards acquired, was owing to the diviſions of the empire, of which they took the advantage to eſtabliſh their own authority.

Being a Detail of the German Affairs, continued to the Death of Henry V.

CONRAD II. ſurnamed the Salick.

GREAT diſputes enſued upon the death of Henry of Bavaria, about the nomination of a ſucceſſor to the empire; at length the princes and ſtates aſſembling in the open fields between the cities of Mentz and Worms, elected Conrad, duke of Franconia, ſurnamed c the Salick, becauſe he was born on the banks of the river Sala (E). The chief care of this new emperor was employed in re-eſtabliſhing juſtice, chaſtiſing vice, and rewarding virtue. Conrad II. ſurnamed the Salick, choſen emperor.

THE Lombards revolting in the third year of his reign, he marched into Italy, and having reduced the rebels by force of arms, went to Rome, where on Eaſter-day he was conſecrated, and crowned emperor by pope John XX. with great ſolemnity, being accompanied by Canute king of Denmark and England, and Rodolphus III. king of Transjurane Burgundy [u]. He had not been many days at Rome, when he was obliged to return into Germany, on account of ſome inſurrections; but before he attempted to quell them, he took care that his ſon Henry, at that time about twelve years of age, ſhould be declared his ſucceſſor, and ſolemnly crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. Then he took the field againſt the authors of the re- d bellion, who were Erneſt, duke of Suabia, Albert, duke of Carinthia, and his own couſin Conradin, duke of Worms. Having defeated them in ſeveral engagements, in one of which Erneſt was ſlain, after having been put to the ban of the empire (F), he made the reſt priſoners, and brought them to a tryal before a general aſſembly of all the princes and members of the empire, who, by a ſolemn decree, deprived them of their dominions. A. D. 1027. Cauſes his ſon Henry to be crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle.

THIS war being happily concluded, he turned his arms againſt Miſico, king of Poland, who had, without his conſent, aſſumed the name and quality of king, and by ſevere uſage compelled his own brother Otho to fly into Germany, and implore the emperor's protection. Henry complied with his requeſt, and put him at the head of an army, which he himſelf afterwards reinforced in perſon: then marching againſt Miſico, they drove him to ſuch ex- e tremity, that he was fain to take ſhelter with Othalric, duke of Bohemia. This prince, in defiance of all the rights of hoſpitality, offered to deliver up his gueſt to the emperor, who rejected the propoſal with diſdain, and conveyed the letter to Miſico, whom he adviſed to chooſe another aſylum. The unfortunate prince, ſenſibly touched with this inſtance of generoſity, repaired to the camp of the emperor, laid aſide his robes and enſigns of royalty, threw himſelf at his feet, and ſurrendered at diſcretion. Henry accepted of his ſubmiſſion, and reſtored his dominions, on the ſame terms on which his father Boleſlaus had poſſeſſed them; while Othalric, ſtruck with his magnanimity, laid down his arms and ſued for peace [x]. Marches againſt Miſico, king of Poland, who ſurrenders at diſcretion. A. As for Otho, he was reconciled to his brother, and honoured with the title of duke; but f being afterwards aſſaſſinated, the emperor, who ſuſpected Miſico of the murder, divided Poland into three provinces, one of which he left in the king's poſſeſſion, and the other two were put under the care of Poliſh governors, who were attached to the intereſts of the empire. This diviſion was the ſource of new revolutions that happened to Poland; for the governors, taking advantage of Miſico's weakneſs and want of popularity, began to act as ſovereigns, and at length declared themſelves independent; ſo that Sileſia was diſmembered from the Poliſh dominions, and Moravia was retrieved by Othalric, duke of Bohemia. BUT

BUT this prince, notwithstanding such an accession to his dominions, had well nigh been ruined by the indiscretion of his son Brztislaus, who had carried off and married Judith, the daughter of count Albert Otho, surnamed the Sincere. The father, exasperated at this outrage, complained in a most pathetic manner to the emperor, who forthwith entered Bohemia with an army, to take vengeance upon the ravisher; and an obstinate battle would have ensued, had not Judith, like one of the Sabine women, interposed between the two hosts, and by her charms and intreaties effected a peace, which was concluded in the tent of Conrad, at whose feet Brztislaus threw himself, and was immediately forgiven [y]. a War in Bohemia.

THIS treaty being concluded, he marched into Saxony against the Lutizians, a people inhabiting the duchy of Mecklenbourg, who lived in pagan ignorance, and made incursions into the territories of the empire. As they had committed flagrant outrages in Saxony, he pursued them to their own country, which he laid waste with fire and sword; put a great number of them to death, in revenge for the sacrilege and barbarities they had been guilty of, and imposed a considerable tribute upon their nation [z]. b

Incursions of the Lutizians.

THIS war was succeeded by another with Stephen, king of Hungary, who having demanded the duchy of Bavaria in right of his wife, sister and heiress of Henry II. and met with a refusal from Conrad, attempted to do himself justice by force of arms. The emperor, without waiting for an invasion, entered Hungary with a powerful army, desolating the country with fire and sword; and Stephen finding himself unable to withstand him, made his submission, and subscribed to the terms of peace which Conrad was pleased to impose: nor was he less fortunate in the termination of his difference with Eudes, count of Champagne. Rodolphus, king of Transjurane Burgundy, had left Conrad his heir, in consideration of his having married Gisela his younger sister: but Eudes, count of Champagne, and son of Bertha, who was the elder sister of Rodolphus, resolved to have his share in the succession; and with that view maintained a bloody war against the emperor, who at length gained a battle near Bar-le-duc, in which the count was slain [a]. c

BY his death Conrad obtained peaceable possession of all Transjurane Burgundy, and at Soleurre held an assembly of the bishops and noblemen, who took the oath of allegiance, and acknowleged his son Henry III. as his successor in that kingdom (G).

WHILE the emperor was employed in taking possession of this fair inheritance, Misico, king of Poland, died, and his son Casimir being too young to manage the reins of government, his mother Ricliza assumed the regency. She governed with such indiscretion, that the subjects revolted, and she and her son were obliged to fly to Magdeburg in Lower Saxony, with all the jewels and treasure which had been amassed by the two preceding kings. d

Rebellion in Poland, which is invaded by the duke of Bohemia.

BRZTISLAUS, duke of Bohemia, profiting by these intestine disturbances, entered Poland, ravaged the country, made himself master of Breslau, Posna, Uladislaw, and even of the capital Gesna, from which he carried off an immense booty.

CONRAD, who had received queen Ricliza with great hospitality, pretended to dispose of the treasure which his vassal, the duke of Bohemia, had got; and his demand being rejected, he advanced into Bohemia with a body of troops, at sight of which Brztislaus submitted. As for young Casimir, he took the habit of a monk at Cluny; but the Poles, tired of living in anarchy, sent deputies to the pope, who granted a dispensation; in consequence of which he was released of his vows, and ascended the throne of his ancestors [b]. e

HAVING thus adjusted his affairs on this side the Alps, and seen his son Henry married to Gonilda, daughter of Canute, king of England, he was recalled into Italy, by a new revolt of several cities and noblemen, headed by Herbert, bishop of Milan, whom he had loaded with favours. His march was so sudden and unexpected, that Milan was in a manner retaken by surprize, and the bishop falling into his hands, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. But, besides this rebellion, he had another errand into Italy, which was to comply with a decree of the electors, importing, that every emperor should go and be crowned at Milan and Modena, in order to make a distinction between the kingdoms of Lombardy and Italy. f

AFTER all these expeditions he repaired to Rome, where he received the benediction of pope Benedict IX. who had succeeded John XXI. Then he returned into Germany, where he was seized with the gout in his legs, and died suddenly at Utrecht, in the 15th year of his reign, after having approved himself a generous, just, able, and magnanimous

To this succeeded the kingdom of Transjurane Burgundy, erected in 888 by Rodolphus I. and both these were comprehended in that of Arles, which began in 930, by virtue of a treaty made between Hugh, king of Italy and Provence, and Rodolphus II. HENRY III. ſurnamed the Black, ſon of Conrad and Giſella of Suabia, was elected in conſequence of his father's recommendation, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle by Philigrino, archbiſhop of Cologn. Is ſucceeded by his ſon Henry III. A. D. 1040.

BRZTISLAUS, duke of Bohemia, refuſing to pay him the tribute which was due, he invaded his dominions, and obliged him to ſubmit. Then he turned his arms againſt Ovo, b who had uſurped the crown of Hungary, and having driven him out of the kingdom, reſtored it to Peter, from whom it had been unjuſtly taken: but finding him extremely odious to his ſubjects, who declared they would rather die than yield obedience to ſuch a cruel tyrant, he beſtowed the crown upon a nephew of king Stephen, who had retired to the court of Bohemia. This young prince was likewiſe expelled by the people, who were ſtrongly attached to Ovo, and who, not contented with his expulſion, entered Auſtria and Bavaria, pillaging and deſtroying the whole country. who reduces Brztiſlaus and Ovo. 1043.

THE emperor, incenſed at their preſumption, marched into Hungary with a conſiderable army; and Ovo being unable to withſtand his power, ſued for peace, which he obtained on the following conditions: that he ſhould pay forty talents of gold to the empire, indemnify c Auſtria and Bavaria, for the damage they had ſuſtained by the irruption of the Hungarians, and releaſe all the priſoners [d]. Next year, however, Henry received ſuch complaints of Ovo's cruelty and rapacity, that he again entered Hungary, defeated him in a pitched battle on the river Raab, took poſſeſſion of Alba Regalis, where he was acknowleged as ſovereign of the kingdom by the ſtates, aſſembled for that purpoſe, and afterwards reconciled them to their old prince Peter, who being re-eſtabliſhed in his kingdom, did homage for it to the emperor. As for Ovo, he endeavoured to excite freſh commotions after Henry's departure; but being abandoned by his adherents, he retired to Tranſylvania, where he was apprehended and brought to Peter, who, by the advice of his noblemen, condemned him to be beheaded.

d ROME had been ſome time diſtracted by different factions, particularly thoſe of the counts of Tuſculum and the Ptolemei; the firſt of which had thruſt Benedict IX. into the papacy, who having continued ſome time in the chair, was depoſed by the Ptolemei and the people, who had ſubſtituted in his place Silveſter III. but, in three months, this antipope was depoſed in his turn by the Tuſculi, and his rival re-eſtabliſhed. Benedict, however, finding himſelf univerſally hated, voluntarily reſigned in favour of John, archprieſt of the Roman church; and ſoon after, repenting of his reſignation, wanted ro reaſſume his former dignity. Theſe three popes, ſupported by their ſeveral partizans, maintained themſelves, each upon a different branch of the revenues belonging to the holy ſee, one reſiding at St. Peter's, another at Santa Maria major, and the third in the palace of the Lateran, and all of them living in the moſt profligate and ſcandae lous manner. During this triumvirate, a certain prieſt called Gratian, partly by artifice, and partly by preſents, prevailed upon all three to renounce their pretenſions to the papacy; and the Romans, out of gratitude to the man who had delivered the church from ſuch a terrible ſchiſm, choſe him pope, under the name of Gregory VI [e].

THE emperor taking umbrage at this election, in which he had not been conſulted, marched with an army into Italy, was crowned at Milan by the archbiſhop; then repaired to Placentia, where he was viſited by pope Gregory VI. and afterwards convened a council at Sutri, in which the reſignation of the three popes was confirmed, Gregory VI. depoſed, and by conſent of the Romans as well as Germans, the papal chair was filled with Heidiger, biſhop of Bamberg, who aſſumed the name of Clement II. and afterwards put the imperial crowns f on the heads of Henry, and Agnes, his empreſs (I). Quiets the troubles of Rome, which had been diſtracted by the factions of theſe pretenders to the papacy. A. THIS ceremony being performed, and the Romans having ſworn they would never for the future chooſe a pope without having ſent previous notice to the reigning emperor, Henry went to viſit the monaſtery of Monte Caſſino, which received valuable marks of his favour: from thence he proceeded to Capua, where he was viſited by the Norman princes, whom he confirmed in the poſſeſſion of Apulia and Calabria, which they had conquered from

However, he prevailed upon the pope, who was along with him, to excommunicate the Beneventines, and beſtowed the city and its dependencies, as fiefs of the empire, upon the Norman princes, in caſe they ſhould ſubdue them by force of arms *. a Nominates Bruno to the popedom. A. D. 1048.

Scarce was he returned to Germany from this expedition, when he received the news of Clement's death; and ſoon after was informed, that a certain biſhop of Bavaria, called Stephen, had intruded himſelf into the chair, under the name of Damaſus II. who was alſo dead, in twenty-three days after his elevation. He learned at the ſame time, that the Romans, imagining he would leave to them the care of chooſing another pope, had diſpatched ambaſſadors to him for that purpoſe; but, being reſolved to preſerve his right, he, without waiting for their arrival, nominated one Bruno, a German biſhop, who immediately aſſumed the veſtments of the ſovereign pontiff. This new pope, who was a modeſt man, and did not much reliſh the dignity that had been conferred on him, was, on his journey to Rome, perſuaded by one Hildebrand (I), a monk belonging to the abbey of Cluny, that he ought not to wear his pontificals until he ſhould be elected at Rome, the emperor alone having no right to create a pope. Accordingly Bruno went thither as a private man, being accompanied by this ſame Hildebrand, who had art and influence enough to raiſe underhand an oppoſition againſt him at firſt, and afterwards to diſpoſe the Romans to favour his election, that he himſelf might have the ſole merit of having raiſed him to the papal chair. This ſcheme ſucceeded to his wiſh: Bruno, who took the name of Leo IX. believing himſelf indebted to Hildebrand for his exaltation, favoured him with his confidence and affection; and thus began the intrigues of that famous monk, who managed the Romans with ſuch addreſs, that afterwards, upon the death of Leo, they, at his inſtigation, choſe another pope of their own accord, with a view to detach the right of nomination from the emperor. The perſon he propoſed was Gebehard, biſhop of Eichſtet, who took the appellation of Victor II. and Hildebrand, foreſeeing that Henry would be offended at their preſumption, went to him in perſon as their deputy, when, by his inſinuation and addreſs, he prevailed upon him to confirm what they had done [f]. Perhaps he would not have found this taſk ſo eaſy, had not Henry been involved in a quarrel with the Hungarians, who had again rebelled againſt Peter, and ſet upon the throne his kinſman Andrew, after he had defeated the other, put out his eyes, and ſent him to priſon, where he died. For theſe reaſons the emperor ſent an army againſt him; and after having worſted him in ſeveral engagements, compelled him to ſue for peace. This treaty, however, was violated by the uſurper, who inſulted Henry's ambaſſadors, and, by a ſudden irruption, ravaged the whole duchy of Bavaria; upon which the emperor took the field again, defeated him in a bloody battle, deprived him of a great part of his dominions, and obliged him to accept of peace, on condition that he ſhould pay a large yearly tribute in money, and furniſh him with a certain number of fighting men (K). b c d

The duke of Bavaria is diveſted of his dominions.

At this period Bavaria was agitated by freſh troubles. Conrad, the young duke, governed his ſubjects with ſuch tyranny and violence, that Gebehard, biſhop of Ratisbon, made repreſentations to him on the ſubject of his miſconduct; and the duke, being incenſed at the freedom of his remonſtrances, pillaged and ſet on fire the town of Packſtein, which was under the prelate's juriſdiction. Gebehard complained of this outrage to the emperor, who ſummoned Conrad to appear at Mersbourg, and anſwer to the charge; and he, being found guilty, was diveſted of his dominions, which were given to the emperor's ſon Henry, who, in an aſſembly held at Tribur, in the dioceſe of Mentz, was about this time declared king of the Romans, and future emperor, tho' no more than three years of age. e

CONRAD, expelled from his dominions, took ſhelter with the king of Hungary; and, being furniſhed with ſome troops, marched into Carinthia, where joining ſome malecontent noblemen, who were diſquieted at the emperor's deciſion, he made himſelf maſter of the f

He was afterwards employed as a ſcribe or ſecretary by the emperor, before whom he appeared in a dream, having two horns that reached up to heaven, with which he overturned his ſon Henry in the mud. The father, ſhocked at this apparition, ſent Hildebrand to priſon, from whence he was releaſed by the interceſſion of the empreſs, and afterwards became a monk (1).

THE revolt of Conrad was ſucceeded by the war of Flanders, kindled by count Baldwin, who ſeized the county of Hainault, invaded Lorrain, and plundered Triers, and other towns, ſituated upon the Moſelle. The emperor, being impowered by the diet at Aix-la-Chapelle to retort theſe violences, marched into Flanders, and laid the whole country under contribution. In conſequence of this diverſion, Baldwin quitted Lorrain, to defend his own territories; and being ſupported by the king of France, he protracted the war to the third campaign, when peace was reſtored to Flanders [g]. War of Flanders. A. D. 1055.

THE emperor, having taken proper meaſures for the proſecution of this war, followed
b pope Victor into Italy, and aſſiſted at a council in Florence, where he complained that Ferdinand, ſovereign of Caſtile, Leon, Galicia, Portugal, and Gaſcony, had aſſumed the title of emperor, and refuſed to do him homage for part of his dominions which he held of the empire. In conſequence of theſe complaints, the pope ſent ambaſſadors to Ferdinand, who, inſtead of complying with his deſire of laying aſide the title of emperor, and doing homage to Henry, raiſed a conſiderable army, which paſſed the Pyrenees, under the command of the celebrated Rodrigo, ſurnamed the Cid, and penetrated as far as Thouloufe, where the difference was compromiſed by commiſſaries, appointed to inveſtigate the pretenſions of both. The king of Caſtile reſigned the title of emperor, and Henry relinquiſhed his right of ſuperiority to the provinces in queſtion [h]. The emperor repairs to Italy

This match, concluded without the conſent or knowledge of the emperor, gave ſuch umbrage to that prince, that he reſolved to expel Godfrey by force of arms from the dominions of Tuſcany; and this laſt, finding himſelf unable to cope with ſuch an antagoniſt, fled to Baldwin, count of Flanders; while his wife, going to juſtify herſelf to the emperor, was arreſted upon the road, and ſent priſoner into Germany.

HENRY, having made a progreſs through the different provinces of Italy, concluded an alliance with Contarini, duke of Venice; and repaſſing the Alps, marched into Bavaria, red duced a rebellion which had been raiſed by the noblemen of that country in favour of Conrad, who was lately dead, and ſummoned his own uncle Gebehard, biſhop of Ratisbon, to the diet, where he was convicted of treaſon, and condemned to perpetual impriſonment; from which, however, he was ſoon releaſed.

GREAT part of Europe being afflicted with a cruel famine, Henry eaſed the ſuffering provinces of their taxes, and ordered corn to be imported from other countries for their relief: but hunger was not the only misfortune his people derived from this calamity. The Sclaves of Luſatia, famiſhed in their own country, made an irruption into Saxony, where they obtained a complete victory over the imperial general; and having pillaged the whole province without reſiſtance, returned with a conſiderable booty; a misfortune which, being

HENRY IV.

Henry IV. succeeds to the imperial crown.

HENRY IV. furnamed the Great, ſucceeded his father when he was no more than five years of age, his education being committed to the care of his mother the empreſs, who diſcharged that truſt with equal diligence and capacity. He was acknowledged emperor at a diet of the princes convoked at Cologn, where, by the mediation of pope Victor II. who was preſent at this aſſembly, Baldwin, count of Flanders, and Godfrey, marquis of Etruria, were reconciled to the empreſs. a

DURING the firſt years of this reign, Germany was harraſſed by inteſtine troubles, occaſioned by the quarrels and feuds of private noblemen. The duchy of Suabia being vacant by the death of Otho de Schweenfurt, the regent beſtowed it upon Rodolphus de Rheinfeld, altho' the late emperor had promiſed to confer it upon count Berthold, who loudly complained of this unjuſt preference, and intereſted his friends in his reſentment againſt the empreſs queen mother. The duke of Bohemia was attacked by the king of Poland, who renounced his dependence on the empire: even the Hungarians, who had been ſo formidable to Germany, were obliged to demand ſuccour againſt the Poles, and, notwithſtanding a reinforcement of imperialiſts, were defeated; ſo that thus king Andrew, with his queen, fled for refuge to Ratisbon. b

State of the empire.

THOSE wars were not the effects of political views, but generally produced from the effects of petty cauſes of reſentment; inſomuch that Thierri, count of Holland, took the field againſt the biſhops of Cologn and Liege, becauſe he had been perſonally inſulted at Liege, for having ſlain by accident a brother of the archbiſhop of Cologn in a tournament [k].

As for the other nations of Europe, they had no connection with the affairs of Germany; nor was the empire embroiled in any external war: ſo that thoſe troubleſome ſpirits, which might have been evaporated in defence of the community, were now employed in fomenting diviſions at home, and it was not without great difficulty that the regent maintained her authority. c

The empreſs dowager is deprived of the regency.

AT length the dukes of Saxony and Bavaria, uncles of the young emperor, together with the archbiſhop of Cologn, and other princes, carried him off by ſtratagem from his mother, who was taxed with having ſacrificed the welfare of the nation to the will of the biſhop of Augsburg, her miniſter, and ſuppoſed gallant; and ſhe, being thus diveſted of the regency, fled to Rome, where ſhe took the veil [l]. As for the emperor, he was put under the tuition of the archbiſhops of Cologn and Bremen; and theſe two prelates were very aſſiduous in this employment, which, however, each exerciſed in a very different manner. Hano, the archbiſhop of Cologn, endeavoured to inſpire him with the love of learning, and to ſeaſon his mind with the principles of virtue; but Albert, his collegue, in order to acquire an influence over his paſſions, and render himſelf neceſſary to him in his affairs, indulged him in all his pleaſures, and gave full ſcope to the licence of youth; during which he contracted bad habits, which he could not afterwards reſtrain [m]. d

A. D. 1062.

WHILE he remained under the tutorage of his mother, Alexander II. had been raiſed to the papal chair, without the privity or conſent of the emperor, in conſequence of a decree of council, called by the ſole authority of Nicholas his predeceſſor, in which it was ordained, that, for the future, the popes ſhould be elected by the curates (now called cardinals) of Rome. The queen regent, in order to maintain the right of the imperial crown, convoked a diet, in which Alexander was depoſed, and another pope elected, under the name of Honorius II. This ſchiſm gave riſe to new troubles in Germany, as well as in Italy, where Alexander was ſupported by Godfrey of Lorrain, who had married Mathilda, heireſs of Tuſcany, and by that match became one of the moſt powerful of the Italian princes [n]. e

A. D. 1072. Henry takes the reins of government in his own hands.

THE emperor, at the age of twenty-two, began his adminiſtration by reſtraining the thefts, robberies, and extortions, which his ſubjects of the duchy of Saxony exerciſed upon ſtrangers, as well as upon one another, in contempt of his authority, and to the prejudice of the public peace. With a few to facilitate this reformation, he took up his reſidence among them at Goſlar, and ordered ſeveral caſtles to be built and garriſoned, as a check upon the delinquents, and to protect the innocent from inſolence and rapine. But as theſe forts could not be raiſed without impoſing taxes upon the ſubject, the rich among the clergy, as well as laity, began to murmur, and traverſe his deſign, on pretence of defending their liberty, which, they affirmed, he intended to invade. They were beſides irritated againſt him on account of his debauches, and encouraged to rebellion by pope Alexander II. who, at the earneſt ſollicitation of Hildebrand, his confident and ſucceſſor, actually ſummoned the emperor to appear at Rome, to give an account of his looſe life, and anſwer to the charge of having expoſed the inveſtiture of benefices to ſale [o]. f

a THE emperor having rejected this citation with disdain, the states of Saxony engaged in an association, under the pretext of defending their liberties, and were so bold as to present him with a memorial, containing the following demands: that he should order his new forts and castles in Saxony and Thuringia to be demolished; that he should restore to the owners the lands and moveables which he had unjustly and forcibly taken away; that he should reinstate Otho duke of Saxony in the duchy of Bavaria, from which he had been expelled (M); that he should confirm to the Saxons their antient laws and immunities; that he should not always reside in one place, but make a progress through different parts of his dominions, to do justice every-where, and provide for the necessities of the church, the widow, and the orphan; that he should dismiss the evil counsellors, and govern by the advice of the states b and princes, whose interest was inseparably connected with the prosperity of the empire; and that he should dismiss his concubine, and cohabit with his queen (N). They concluded with assuring him, he should be respected, obeyed, and supported with their lives and fortunes, provided he would comply with these requests; but, should he persist in his design to oppress them, they were resolved to defend themselves against violence and despotic power p.

Is summoned by the pope, and controuled by the states of Saxony;

To this remonstrance the emperor answered with great coolness, that he would take an opportunity of convoking the diet, which should deliberate and decide upon the subject of their complaints. This reply was so disagreeable to the Saxons, who were not at all disposed to refer themselves to such a tribunal, that they forthwith levied a strong body of forces, with c which they invested Goslar; from whence Henry retired in the night, in order to assemble the other states and princes of the empire, who readily assisted him with their troops in this emergency (O). Notwithstanding these succours, which were considerable, he sent a deputation to the Saxons, with proposals of peace; which, while the states assembled at Wurtzburg, were negotiated at Gerstingen, upon certain conditions which he promised to fulfil.

who besiege Goslar. A. D. 1073.

THO' he was, on this occasion, very much indebted to the good advice and offices of the princes of the empire, he neglected them in points which were no less important, and allowed himself to be swayed by the evil counsels of some particular persons, who had insinuated themselves into his favour. He was a young prince of violent passions, which often hurried him into indiscretions, to the prejudice of his moral character; particularly, his d incontinence was so great, that he seldom or never set eyes upon a beautiful young woman, without endeavouring to sacrifice her virtue to his appetite. The vigilance of his wife being an obstruction to his amours, he conceived an unjust antipathy to that unfortunate princess, and even engaged one of his courtiers to undermine her chastity, that he might have a pretence for obtaining a divorce; but her conduct was so blameless and discreet, that his design miscarried, and he in vain sollicited the pope to dissolve the marriage, which, he said, had never been consummated q.

THIS misconduct gave such umbrage, that he was abandoned by his best friends, and most powerful adherents, even before the dissolution of the assembly which he had convened, and which he dismissed soon after the conclusion of the treaty with the Saxons, betaking e himself to Nuremberg, where he proposed to reside. Here he understood, that one of his domestics, called Reginger, had deserted from his service, and informed the dukes of Suabia and Carinthia, that the emperor had tampered with him to assassinate these two noblemen. This report was of infinite prejudice to the emperor, who, finding himself forsaken by almost all his friends, in consequence of this malicious calumny, offered to prove his innocence by single combat upon the body of Rodolphus, duke of Suabia; who thought proper to refuse the challenge, or at least to refer it to the decision of the princes of the empire (P). Even this condescension was of no effect in his justification, and he found himself so persecuted by his enemies, that he fled for refuge to Worms, where he was hospitably received by the

(M) This Otho had been accused of a design against the emperor's life, and, by a decree of the diet, ordered to appear at Goslar, to maintain his innocence against the accuser in single combat; but he declined the duel, alledging, that his antagonist was his inferior in birth and quality (1).

The author of the Chronic. Magdeburgens. affirms, that Otho was dissuaded from the combat by his friends, upon information that he was doomed to lose his life at Goslar, whatever might be the issue of the duel.

(N) He married Bertha, daughter of Otho, marquis of Italy (2).

(O) The association against Henry consisted of Werner, archbishop of Magdebourg, Burchar, bishop of Halberstat, Henry, bishop of Hildesheim, Werner, bishop of Mersburg, Heilberg, bishop of Minden, James, bishop of Paderborn, Frederic, bishop of Mimmegardefurt, Benno, bishop of Misnia, Otho, duke of Saxony, the marquises of Thuringia, Uko, and Dedo, Frederic, count palatine of Saxony, with several counts and other noblemen (3).

(P) At the same time a gallant cavalier, named Cosheim, begged permission to fight with Reginger; but Rodolphus interposed, and prevented the combat.

inhabitants, notwithstanding the ill offices of the bishop, who had used all his influence in persuading them to shut their gates against this unfortunate prince [r]. a

He finds means to appease the princes, and acknowleges his faults.

While he remained in this city, the princes of the empire assembling at Mentz, in order to deliberate upon the means of depriving him of his crown, and of chusing another emperor in his place, he found means, by secret negociations, to prevail upon some of them to favour him with a conference at Oppenheim. There he intreated them to excuse the irregularities of his youth, protested that he would for the future behave in a manner suitable to the dignity they had conferred upon him; and, in order to manifest his abhorrence of the crime which was laid to his charge, insisted upon fighting with Reginger himself. The proposal was accepted, and a day appointed for the combat; but in the mean time his antagonist disappeared, the princes were appeased, and Henry enjoyed some repose [s] (Q). b

The Saxons rebel again; but are defeated by Henry, who grants them a peace.

The Saxons, however, again revolted, and the emperor, assisted by the princes, raised an army of sixty thousand men, with which he entered Saxony, ravaging the country, and abandoning the towns to the pillage of his troops. Notwithstanding these advantages, he, at the intercession of some princes of the empire, granted a favourable peace to the rebels, disbanded his troops, and even trusted his person to the Saxons, who conducted him in triumph to Goslar, after having obtained in this treaty almost every thing they demanded in their former remonstrance. One of the articles of this peace was the demolition of his castles in Saxony, in the execution of which the peasants not only razed the superb seat of Harlesberg to the ground, but also plundered the church belonging to it, destroyed the tombs, and violated the ashes of the dead. The emperor, who was then at Worms, being informed of these abuses, took the opportunity of laying his complaints before several princes, who were assembled at Bamberg for the celebration of Easter, when the archbishop of Mentz, in the name of the ecclesiastics, as well as of Rodolphus duke of Suabia, Berthold duke of Carinthia, and other secular princes, declared, that, God being offended, and the empire treated with indignity by the authors of that sedition, they were ready to assist him in raising forces to reduce and chastise the rebels. He accordingly began to levy troops, and sent a formal declaration of war to the states of Saxony assembled at Goslar. c

Henry declares war against the states of Saxony.

Having defeated them, he makes himself master of their country;

Preparations were made on both sides for the war, the Saxon army being commanded by Otho duke of Bavaria, who had been proscribed; and the imperial troops by Henry in person, who gave battle to the rebels, and totally defeated them in a bloody engagement; after which he made himself master of all Saxony, and dismissed his troops, on condition that they should re-assemble at Gerstingen at a certain day, in order to put the finishing stroke to the war. Mean while he himself returned to Worms. d and grants a peace.

During this interval, the Saxons endeavoured at an accommodation; which was effected in the next campaign, while both armies were in the field. The chiefs of the rebellion asked pardon of the emperor in public, and begged to be re-admitted into his favour: their submission was accepted, both armies disbanded, and Henry returned to the city of Worms [t].

But he was not long suffered to enjoy the tranquility which was thus restored, being exposed to another storm from Italy, which was attended with much more dangerous consequences. Cardinal Hildebrand, upon the death of Alexander II. had been elected pope by the name of Gregory VII. without the authority or knowlege of the emperor; who, hearing of this transaction, had convoked a diet at Mentz, and, by the advice of that assembly, sent an ambassador to Rome, to complain of this encroachment upon his right, and to insist upon Hildebrand's being deposed, unless he would sollicit the emperor's confirmation. The pope, finding it his interest to temporize, had received the ambassador with great civility, protesting that the papacy had been forced upon him by the people; but that he had no intention to accept of the honour, without the approbation of the emperor and princes of the diet, having delayed the ceremony of his confirmation, until he should have obtained that sanction. e

Hildebrand is chosen pope without the knowlege of Henry.

HENRY, satisfied with these excuses, had confirmed his election; so that seeing himself firmly established in the chair, and universally acknowleged as pope, he began his pontificate with a number of excommunications levelled against the German princes, ecclesiastic as well as secular; in particular against the archbishops of Saltzburg and Bremen, and the bishops of Bamberg, Spire, and Strasbourg; because they were either married, or publicly kept concubines [u]. He moreover excommunicated every ecclesiastic, who should receive his investiture from a laic, together with the laic by whom it should be conferred. This, however, was no more than an experiment, to try the thunder of the holy see; which he intended to launch against the emperor himself. For this purpose, he had sent four legates into Germany to hold a council, the convocation of which was opposed and prevented by f a the b iſhops, and their repreſentatives had orders to treat the emperor as an excommunicated perſon, until he ſhould clear himſelf from the charge of ſimony, of which he had been accuſed before the preceding pope. Nay, to ſuch a degree of animoſity was he incenſed againſt Henry, that he employed emiſſaries among the Saxons, who, by their inſinuations, were prevailed upon to ſend ambaſſadors to Rome, to complain of the injury they had ſuffered in the laſt treaty with the emperor, and to beg that the pope would depoſe him on account of his immorality and miſconduct.

ALTHOUGH Henry had diſperſed the league that was formed againſt him, and reſtored peace to the empire, he dreaded new revolutions from the intrigues and reſentment of the court of Rome; which, in order to avert, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the pope, b accuſing himſelf of ſimony and debauchery, and craving the forgiveneſs of his holineſs; who, after having rebuked him for his crimes, commended him for his candour, and abſolved him in conſequence of his penitence and contrition x. Henry is reconciled to the pope.

HE afterwards propoſed a cruſade, in order to deliver the holy ſepulchre from the hands of the infidels, offering to head the Chriſtians in perſon, and deſiring Henry to ſerve as a volunteer under his command: a project ſo wild and extravagant, that nothing but the enthuſiaſm of the times can exempt the memory of the propoſer from the imputation of frenzy and delirium.

BUT this harmony ſubſiſting between Gregory and the emperor was ſoon interrupted by the diſturbances between Hungary, where Solomon had been depoſed by his brother Geyſa, c and fled for refuge to Henry, by whom he was protected, after having done homage to him for his dominions. Gregory, who favoured Geyſa, exclaimed againſt this act of ſubmiſſion, and wrote a letter to Solomon, giving him to underſtand, that the kingdom of Hungary belonged to the Roman church, and demanding that he would acknowlege its dependence on the holy ſee, and not upon the king of Germany. Diſturbances in Hungary.

GREGORY having thus laid the train, ſent new legates to the diet of Goſlar; which was aſſembled on account of the German princes, who had been taken priſoners in the laſt battle; and there, being ſeconded by the nuncio, they complained, that the emperor ſtill continued to beſtow (R) inveſtitures, without having publiſhed the decrees of the laſt council againſt theſe inveſtitures, as well as againſt ſimony, and the incontinence of the clergy.
d Then they demanded that the princes, who were priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty; that the archbiſhops and biſhops, who were excommunicated ſhould be deprived of their dignity and eſtates; and that the emperor ſhould appear at Rome, on the firſt Sunday of Lent, to anſwer to the crimes laid to his charge; adding that, if he ſhould fail to yield due obedience to the church, he muſt expect to be excommunicated and dethroned. The emperor threatened.

HENRY, incenſed at this preſumptuous declaration from the pope, whom he conſidered as his vaſſal, diſmiſſed the legates with very little ceremony, and called an aſſembly of all the dignified eccleſiaſtics at Worms; where, after due deliberation, they concluded, that Gregory, having uſurped the chair of St. Peter by indirect means, infected the church of God with a great number of novelties and abuſes, and deviated from his duty to his ſovereign
e in ſeveral ſcandalous attempts, the emperor, by his ſupreme authority, derived from his predeceſſors, ought to diveſt the pope of his dignity, and appoint another in his place. He depoſes Hildebrand;

IN conſequence of this reſolution, Henry ſent an ambaſſador to Rome, with a formal deprivation of Gregory; who, in his turn, convoked a council, at which were preſent 110 biſhops, who unanimouſly agreed, that the pope had juſt cauſe to depoſe Henry, to diſſolve the oath of allegiance which the princes and members of the empire had taken in his favour, and to prohibit them from holding any correſpondence with him on pain of excommunication, which was immediately fulminated againſt the emperor and all his adherents y. and is excommunicated.

HE knew that this ſtep would be attended with civil wars: he intereſted the German biſhops in his party: the prelates gained over the noblemen: Henry's old enemies, the Saxf ons, ſeized this pretext of declaring againſt him; and even Guelfe, to whom he had given the duchy of Bavaria, ſupporteed the malecontents with that wealth which he owed to the emperor's bounty: at laſt, thoſe very princes and biſhops, who had joined in depoſing Gregory, gave up their emperor to be tried by the pope, and his holineſs was ſollicited to come to Augsburg for that purpoſe.

BY this ſevere ſentence, which filled a great part of Chriſtendom with troubles and diviſions, and involved Germany in long and bloody wars, the emperor was reduced to ſuch extremity, that he ſet out for Italy in the middle of winter, with his wife and ſon Conrad,

The barbarous treatment he received from the pope.

AFTER a journey attended with great fatigue and inconvenience, Henry alone was admitted within the outer gate, and given to understand, that he had no favour to expect until he should have fasted three days, standing from morning to evening bare-footed among the snow, and then asked pardon of the pope for the offences he had committed. This penance was literally performed; and on the fourth day, being the twenty-fifth of January, he was forgiven, and received absolution.

THIS extraordinary accommodation gave great disgust to the princes of Italy, who never could forgive the insolence of the pope, nor the abject humility of the emperor. Henry himself was ashamed of his own meanness, which, however, he excused as well as he could b to the Italian cities and states, by representing the cruel necessity to which he had been reduced; and, in order to shew how sensible he was of the outrage he had suffered, he soon after declared himself the pope's mortal enemy [z].

Henry is deposed; A. D. 1077. Rodolphus elected emperor

GREGORY's revenge being thus re-inflamed, he exerted himself in embroiling the affairs of Germany, and succeeded so well in his endeavours, that the princes of the empire, under pretext of being discharged from their allegiance to Henry, by the pope's excommunication, deprived that prince of the sovereign dignity, and in his place elected Rodolphus duke of Suabia, whom they solemnly crowned at Mentz [a].

Henry defeats his rival Rodolphus.

THE emperor, apprized of this deposition, set out from Italy with all imaginable dispatch, and taking the field with what troops he could assemble, attacked Rodolphus, whom he defeated in a battle fought near Wurtzburg, from which the duke narrowly escaped with his life. Next year, however, he was in a condition to take the field again, and another engagement ensued, in which, after an obstinate dispute, the emperor was a second time victorious, and his adversary intirely overthrown; so that Henry reduced the whole duchy of Suabia, from which he expelled Berthold, the son-in-law of Rodolphus, who had been left for the defence of the country. From this conquest, the emperor proceeded into Saxony, where he understood the partizans of his rival were re-assembling forces, and, giving them battle in the month of January, obtained a third victory, which was decisive [b]. c

HIS enemies, finding themselves unable to cope with him in the field, sollicited the pope to excommunicate him a second time; and Gregory, being very well disposed to grant their d request, thundered out another sentence against him, confirming at the same time the election of Rodolphus, to whom he sent a crown, on which was engraven these words:

Petra dedit Petro, Petrus diadema Rodolpho [c] (T).

Henry calls a national council at Brixen, by which the deposition of Gregory is confirmed, and Clement III. chosen pope.

HENRY, in order to defend himself from the bad consequences of this second excommunication, called an assembly of the German bishops at Mentz, and asked their opinions about this pretended right of the pope, to dethrone an emperor, and whether or no he might not, with justice, depose Hildebrand, and appoint another in his room. Nineteen bishops then present, after having maturely considered the affair, proposed that Henry should call in the other bishops to the consultation, to be held at Brixen; where they accordingly met in a national council. Here it was the unanimous opinion of all, Italians as well e as Germans, that the pope, instead of having power over the emperor, owed him obedience and allegiance; and that Gregory, having rendered himself unworthy of the papal chair, by his misconduct and rebellion, ought to be deposed from the dignity he so little deserved. On this supposition, those prelates elected, in the room of Hildebrand, cardinal Wiberti, alias Guibert, or Gilbert, archbishop of Ravenna, a person of unquestioned merit, who assumed the name of Clement III. The emperor promised to put this new pope in a condition to repair to Rome and expel Gregory; but, in the mean time, he was obliged to employ his whole forces to frustrate the new efforts of Rodolphus, who had already re-assembled some troops in Saxony. Henry, therefore, advanced against him with great expe- f dition, and the two armies, engaging near Mersberg, fought with great fury; the fortune

She, in her own right, possessed great part of Tuscany, Mantua, Parma, Reggio, Placentia, Ferrara, Modena, Verona, and almost all that is now called the Patrimony of St. Peter, from Viterbo to Orvieto, together with part of Umbria, Spoleto, and the marche of Ancona. Her mother, who was sister of Henry III. had educated this powerful princess in the most implacable hatred to the family of Henry, by whom she had been maltreated. Mathilda paid the most submissive obedience to pope Gregory, who was her director in all things, and, according to some authors, her gallant: nay, her attachment to him, and her hatred to the Germans, proceeded so far, that she made over all her estates to the pope (1).

That nobleman, perceiving his end approaching, ordered the hand he had loſt to be brought to him, and addreſſing himſelf to the officers then preſent, "Behold," ſaid he, "the hand with which "I took the oath of allegiance to Henry, which I have violated at the inſtigation of the "court of Rome, in perfidiouſly aſpiring to an honour, which was not my due [d]." Having pronounced theſe words with marks of ſincere penitence, he expired, and was pompouſly interred at Mersburg in Saxony; his tomb being adorned with the figures of a crown, and other enſigns of royalty. GERMANY being re-involved in new troubles, the emperor did not long enjoy the ſucceſs of this Italian expedition. He then reduced almoſt all the reſt of Lombardy, notwithſtanding the vigorous oppoſition of Mathilda, who put herſelf at the head of her troops, and perſonally faced him in the field (Z). a reſolved to ſet up in oppoſition to his father. Nothing chagrined the emperor ſo much as the preſumption of the Roman church, in electing popes in contempt of his authority; and his reſentment of this conduct, which he looked upon as downright rebellion, was the rock upon which he ſplit; for, after the death of Clement, he appointed ſucceſſively three anti-popes, Albert, Theodoric, and Maniulphus; two of whom were ſhut up in cloiſters, and the third overtaken by ſudden death. Theſe meaſures, which he took in order to preſerve the rights of the empire, ſerved to foment the enmity of the Romans; ſo that Paſcal II. finding himſelf in peaceable poſſeſſion of the chair, called a council at Rome, where the emperor was ſummoned to appear, and, as he did not obey the citation, excommunicated anew, for having introduced thoſe ſchiſms into the church. At the ſame time they confirmed all that b Urban and Gregory had done to his prejudice [o]. But it was by the arts and induſtry of his adverſaries in Germany, that his own ſon Henry was engaged in a rebellion againſt him. The pretext, however, of this young prince, whoſe ambition had been flattered, was neceſſity and zeal for religion. He alledged, that the ſubjects being diſcharged from their allegiance to his father, he was obliged to take the reins of government into his own hands; and that, the laws of the church being preferable to thoſe of nature, he could not acknowledge Henry for his father, until he ſhould be abſolved from the excommunication of the pope [p]. In vain did the emperor uſe paternal remonſtrances to diſſuade his ſon from proceeding to extremities: the breach became wider and wider, and at laſt they openly took the field againſt each other, and the armies met at Ratiſbon, when the father, finding himſelf too weak to hazard
c a battle, retreated towards Bohemia; while the ſon, marching to Spire, made himſelf maſter of that city, and ſeized upon the treaſures of the emperor, which were there depoſited.

A. D. 1105. He is perſuaded to take arms againſt his father;

Elated with this ſucceſs, he fixed a day for the princes to aſſemble at Mentz; and underſtanding that the emperor was reſolved to be preſent with a very powerful army, he, in order to fruſtrate this intention, which might be fatal to his cauſe, had recourſe to an expedient, which was equally perfidious and effectual. Knowing the tenderneſs of his father's diſpoſition, he repaired to Coblentz, and throwing himſelf at the emperor's feet, begged pardon for his undutiful behaviour, which he imputed to the advice of evil counſellors. Being, in conſequence of this ſubmiſſion, immediately taken into favour, he perſuaded him to diſband his army, for fear of giving umbrage to the princes. Then they ſet out together for d Bingenheim, where the ſon inſinuating that his father might run ſome riſque of being detained by the archbiſhop of Mentz, ſhould he enter that city, and undertaking to go and negociate a reconciliation between him and the princes of the diet, the emperor agreed to remain where he was, in expectation of that happy event; but he was next day confined to his chamber by this ungracious ſon, who forthwith repaired to the diet, at which the pope's legate having repeated the ſentence of excommunication, Henry IV. was diveſted of the imperial dignity, and his ſon proclaimed emperor with the unanimous conſent of the whole aſſembly [q] (C).

A. D. 1106. who is ſolemnly depoſed;

This ceremony being performed, the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologne, together with the biſhop of Worms, were ſent as deputies to the father to intimate his depoſition, and demand the crown and other regalia. Henry received this deputation with equal ſurprize and cone cern; and deſiring to know for what reaſon he was ſo cruelly dealt with by his own ſubjects, the arcbiſhop of Mentz replied, that, on account of the ſchiſms he had introduced in the church, and the ſcandalous manner in which he had ſet biſhoprics to ſale, he had been deemed unworthy of partaking the holy communion, and conſequently of wearing the imperial crown. The emperor, extremely mortified at this inſolent declaration, "If (ſaid he) "we have proſtituted the benefices of the church for hire, you yourſelves are the moſt pro- "per perſons to convict us of that ſimony. Say then, I adjure you, in the name of the "eternal God, what have we exacted, or what have we received, for having promoted you "to the dignities you now enjoy?" When they acknowledged he was innocent as far as regarded their preferment: "and yet (continued he) the archbiſhoprics of Mentz and Co- "logne, being two of the beſt in our diſpoſal, we might have filled our coffers by expoſing "them to ſale; nevertheleſs we beſtowed them on you out of our free grace and favour: "and a worthy return you now make for our benevolence. The deputies, unmoved by this pathetic addreſs, and inſiſting upon his complying with the purport of their errand, he retired into his chamber, where he put on his royal ornaments; then returning to the apartment which he had left, and ſeating himſelf in a chair of ſtate, renewed his remonſtrance to this effect: " Here are the marks of " that royalty, with which we are inveſted by God, and the princes of the empire; if you

" violent hands on your ſovereign, you may ſtrip us of them by force; we are not in a than the former upon the biſhops, who forthwith ſnatched the crown from his head, and dragging him from his chair, pulled off his royal robes by force. While they were thus employed, " Great God! (cried he, the tears trickling down his cheeks) thou art the God

HENRY the ſon, having thus got poſſeſſion of the throne, was deſirous of acquitting himſelf, in ſome ſhape, of the violences which had been exerciſed upon his father, who juſtly complained, that he had been condemned unheard. With this view he convened, at Ingelheim, thoſe of the princes who were intirely devoted to his intereſt, in order to oblige the c
A. D. 1106. and afterwards voluntarily reſigns his crown. old emperor to make a voluntary reſignation in his favour. There this unfortunate prince, looking upon himſelf as a dying man, is ſaid to have implored forgiveneſs of all thoſe whom he had offended, and to have thrown himſelf at the feet of the pope's legate, who was preſent, beſeeching that prelate to abſolve him from the ſentence of excommunication; but his requeſt was refuſed, on pretence that he could receive abſolution from no other than the pope himſelf.

To ſuch a degree of wretchedneſs was this unhappy prince reduced by the barbarity of his ſon, that, being deſtitute of the common neceſſaries of life, he entreated Gertrad, whom he had created biſhop of Spire, to beſtow upon him a canonicate for his ſubſiſtence, in that very cathedral which had been founded, built, and endowed, by his anceſtors and himſelf. d
Here again he met with a repulſe from the biſhop, who told him, that he durſt not grant his requeſt without permiſſion from the pope: upon which the emperor ſhed a flood of tears, and turning to thoſe who were preſent, ſaid, with a deep ſigh, " My dear friends, at His extreme wretchedneſs. " leaſt have pity on my condition; for I am touched by the hand of the Lord." Thus was Henry IV. reduced from the higheſt pinacle of greatneſs to the loweſt abyſs of indigence and mortification, being diveſted of his honours, deprived of ſupport, abandoned by his own ſon, his relations, and even by thoſe whom his bounty had enriched; and, to crown his misfortunes, he was kept in cloſe confinement by order of the new emperor.

He makes an effort to retrieve his affairs, but dies at Liege. A. D. 1106. In the midſt of theſe diſtreſſes, when every body thought his courage was utterly extinguiſhed, and his ſoul overwhelmed with deſpondence, he found means to eſcape from his e keepers, and reach Cologne, where he was received and recognized as lawful emperor. From thence he repaired to the Low Countries, where he found friends, who raiſed a conſiderable body of troops to facilitate his reſtoration, and ſent circular letters to all the princes in Chriſtendom, in order to intereſt them in his misfortune. He even wrote to the pope, giving him to underſtand he was inclined to an accommodation, provided it could be made without prejudice to his crown; but before any thing material could be executed in his favour, he died at Liege, in the 56th year of his age, and the 49th of his reign. His body was magnificently interred in the cathedral of that city; but his ſon afterwards ordered it to be dug up, and depoſited in the chapel of St. Afron, where it remained five years unburied, on account of his excommunication. f

Such was the end of Henry IV. a prince of great courage, and excellent endowments, who, had not he alienated the affections of his ſubjects by the exceſſes of his youth (D), and attracted the enmity and oppoſition of the Roman church, in obſtinately adhering to the rights of his prerogative, would have eclipſed the glory of all his anceſtors, and finiſhed his reign with honour and univerſal applauſe. There was an air of dignity in his appearance, that beſpoke the greatneſs of his ſoul: he poſſeſſed a natural fund of eloquence and vivacity, a was of a mild and merciful temper, extremely charitable (D), and an admirable pattern of fortitude and reſignation. From the twelfth year of his age he had been continually engaged in war, commanded perſonally in threeſcore pitched battles, in which he was generally victorious, and ſurvived a great many ſecret attempts that were made upon his life [s] (E).

HENRY V.

HENRY V. ſurnamed the Young, having (as above related) obtained poſſeſſion of the throne (F), was, in the beginning of his reign, ſo favourable to the clergy in every
b particular, that he ſeemed to neglect intirely thoſe rights of the imperial authority, which his father had defended at the hazard of his honour, his fortune, and his life. Nevertheleſs he ſoon changed his conduct: whether he thought himſelf ſufficiently eſtabliſhed upon the throne to pull off the maſk, which he had hitherto wore through policy, or that he found himſelf deceived in the intentions of the Roman church. The firſt mortification he received was from Paſchal II. who, about two months after the death of the late emperor, held a council at Guaſtala upon the Po, by which all the decrees of his predeceſſors againſt inveſtitures were renewed [t].

HENRY, though extremely piqued at theſe proceedings, diſſembled his reſentment, be- Henry V. invites the pope to a conference.
cauſe he did not as yet find himſelf in a condition to oppoſe the court of Rome, and invited
c the pope into Germany, where their difference might be brought to an amicable termination. But Paſchal, who was well acquainted with Henry's haughty and implacable diſpoſition, inſtead of complying with his requeſt, thought proper to take a different route, and put himſelf under the protection of Philip, king of France [u].

THO' the emperor was very much diſturbed at the honourable reception which the pope had met with from that monarch, he did not chuſe to embroil himſelf with ſuch a powerful neighbour; but, on the contrary, ſollicited his friendſhip, and deſired he would mediate an accommodation between him and his holineſs. A conference was accordingly held at Chalons in Champaigne, where nothing was agreed upon, becauſe the pope would not conſent to the article of inveſtiture, which Henry's ambaſſadors would by no means give up [x].

d AFTER this unſucceſsful meeting, Paſchal held a council at Troyes, and the emperor convoked a diet at Mentz. The German biſhops declared for the emperor's right of inveſti- A. D. 1107.
ture, and the fathers of the council adhered to the decrees of the preceding popes, unleſs Henry ſhould, within a year, repair to Rome, and leave his cauſe to the determination of a general council.

IN the midſt of theſe diſputes, the emperor would not neglect his other affairs. Barziwoi, duke of Bohemia, being expelled his dominions by his nephew Suantopelkon, had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the emperor, who ſummoned the uſurper to his court, where he was put in irons, and furniſhed Borziwoi with ſome troops, to re-conduct him to his own dominions: but Suantopelkon's brother, Otho, being at the head of a good army, oppoſed
e his re-eſtabliſhment; and the uſurper finding means to detach Henry from his intereſt with a very large ſum of money, Barziwoi was obliged to take ſhelter with Boleſlaus, king of Poland, who received him with great hoſpitality.

THE emperor, thus furniſhed with the ſinews of war, reſolved, with the approbation of He invades a diet convened at Frankfort, to puniſh Coloman, king of Hungary, for having been concerned Hungary.

Mean while Coloman engaged in a league, offenſive and defenſive, with Boleſlaus, who not only ſent him a reinforcement of troops to oppoſe the progreſs of the emperor, but alſo, under pretence of f aſſiſting his gueſt Borziwoi, advanced into Bohemia, and laid the country under contribution;

Some other people were taken in the very fact of endeavouring to thruſt a ſpear up through his body while he was in the houſe of office; who being brought before him, he diſmiſſed them with impunity (1).

Goes to war with the Poles, and is worsted. A. D. 1109.

HENRY, thus weakened, retired into Bavaria, in order to recruit his forces; and being inflamed with resentment against Boleslaus, for having frustrated his revenge against Coloman, he resolved upon the conquest of Silesia, which, though at that time belonging to the Poles, had formerly been part of the empire. With this view he advanced as far as Glogau, which he invested; but the inhabitants making a gallant defence, he was obliged to raise the siege and retire. He then attacked Breslau, when Boleslaus, duke of Poland, who had assumed the name of king, coming to its relief, a general battle ensued, in which the Poles were vanquished, and obliged to send an ambassador to Henry to sue for peace [z] (G). Boleslaus, however, not relishing the terms which the emperor wanted to impose, resolved b to try once more his fortune in the field, and the two armies engaging near Breslau, the Germans were defeated, after a very obstinate dispute [a]. The loss of this battle induced Henry to desist from his enterprize upon Silesia, and return to the discussion of his affairs with the pope. With this view he assembled a diet at Ratisbon, which, after mature deliberation, granted him the necessary succours to maintain the rights of his crown in Italy. Thus reinforced, he crossed the Alps with an army of 80,000 men, being also accompanied by a great part of the quality, and a number of persons who understood the rights and constitution of the empire, that he might be in a condition to do himself justice, either by negotiation or force of arms: but before his departure, he married Mathilda, daughter of Henry I. king of England, with whom he received an immense sum of money by way of c dower, levied by a tax upon every hide of land in that kingdom. In his march through Tuscany, he took some cities that attempted to dispute his passage, and kept his Christmas at Florence. From thence he sent a splendid embassy to Paschal, with solemn professions of veneration for the holy see, and the pope did not fail to return the civility. Then a convention was held at Sutri, and a treaty of peace concluded to the intire satisfaction of the emperor, who obtained all, and even more than he demanded. But all these concessions were made merely with a view to amuse him, until the pope could take more effectual measures for his own interest.

Makes his entry into Rome, A. D. 1111.

ON the very day of the emperor's entry into Rome, which was also fixed for his coronation, several persons belonging to his train were insulted, and even imprisoned by the po- d pulace. When the treaty of peace was read, in presence of the princes of the empire and Italian prelates, it was formally opposed by these last, who were by the pope privately tutored for the purpose, and the debates which their objections occasioned continued till night. The emperor finding himself duped, gave orders to seize the person of the pope, who had equivocated in such a scandalous manner; and the soldiers, employed in the execution of this order, rushing tumultuously into the churches, maltreated the cardinals and bishops without distinction. The consul put the citizens in arms, and next day a battle

ensued, in which Henry fought in person with great courage. In a word, the Romans were defeated, and the carnage was so great, that the waters of the Tiber were stained with blood [b]. The pope was taken prisoner, together with several cardinals, bishops, and principal citi- e zens of Rome; and the emperor having ordered the walls to be razed in several places, encamped in the open field, where he detained his prisoners during the whole time of Lent, and the Easter holidays. The pope was earnestly intreated by his fellow-prisoners to renounce the right of investiture to the emperor, and crown him according to his desire, that they might obtain their liberty; but he resisted all their importunities, until Henry gave orders to behead his friends in his presence; upon which he thought proper to comply with the emperor's demands, and the former accommodation was renewed and ratified [c] (H).

The pope is prevailed upon to renew the treaty.

THIS treaty being concluded, the pope and the other prisoners were released, and Henry was crowned on the first Sunday after Easter, when the pope dividing the host, gave one half f

(G) The name of this ambassador was Scrobius, to whom the emperor talked in very high terms, telling him, the Poles had no peace to expect, unless they would become tributary to the empire: and, in order to convince him that they were not able to support a war against him, he ordered his people to shew his treasures to the ambassador, who taking off his ring threw it into the heap, saying, "Here is something to augment the store." Upon which Henry replied in the German language, Habdank, which signifies I thank you; and the family of Strobius was distinguished by that name (1).

(H) This accommodation contained these articles: that the emperor should use the cross and ring, in investing those who were canonically elected with his consent; and that they should afterwards be consecrated according to the forms of the church, but never before they should have received the investiture; that the archbishops and bishops might without scruple consecrate those who should be in this manner invested by the emperor; and, finally, that the pope should never excommunicate the emperor; nor, upon any pretext whatsoever, infringe any condition of this treaty. To these articles, the pope and sixteen cardinals solemnly swore upon the holy evangelists (2).

a to the emperor, and took the other to himſelf, in token of perfect reconciliation (I). A new bull was publiſhed to confirm the treaty, leſt the pope ſhould afterwards pretend the former was extorted from him, during his confinement. Then the emperor, having confirmed the privileges of the Romans, and diſtributed largeſſes among the clergy, ſet out on his return to Germany, the pope, with ſeveral cardinals and prelates, accompanying him as far as the Alps. The firſt thing he did, when he arrived in his own dominions, was to beſtow a magnificent funeral upon the body of his father, which had remained ſo long unburied, merely becauſe that prince had maintained the right of inveſtiture, now ſolemnly confirmed by the pope himſelf. Indeed it ſoon appeared, that the court of Rome was not at all ſincere in the conceſſions which it had made; for though Paſchal himſelf ſtill pre-

b ſerved the exteriors of friendſhip and good faith, his legates, and among the reſt the archbiſhop of Vienne in Dauphiny, did not fail to excommunicate the emperor in national councils. Nay, even the eccleſiaſtic princes of the empire refuſed to recognize or receive the bull touching the inveſtiture of benefices: and Albert, or Adelbert, whom the emperor had raiſed to the archbiſhopric of Mentz, intrigued ſo ſucceſsfully in favour of the pope, that the ſubſequent diet declared, his holineſs had a right to revoke that bull in council. It was accordingly annulled by a council of the Lateran, which ordered the bull to be burnt, and the emperor to be excommunicated [d], though the pope refuſed his aſſent to the decree, on account of the oath he had taken. The archbiſhops, biſhops, and chapters, finding themſelves thus authorized by the court of Rome, reſolved to maintain their power of filling their

c vacant ſees without the interpoſition of the emperor, and the whole empire was reinvolved in trouble and diſſenſion.

The council of Lateran annul his treaty with the pope.

A REBELLION breaking out in Saxony, Henry marched thither, ſecured the perſon of the archbiſhop, who had fomented the diſturbance, and laid waſte the whole country: but in his return he was encountered, in a place called Welpeſhold, by Lotharius, duke of Saxony, Frederic count Arnesberg, and Reynerus, biſhop of Halberſtad, who had aſſembled a body of troops to oppoſe him; and after a very obſtinate battle, he was obliged to retreat with great loſs. After this battle Lotharius entered Goſlar in triumph, where an aſſembly of biſhops and noblemen being convened, Henry and his adherents were excommunicated. Indeed, by this time he was almoſt quite abandoned by his ſubjects, and muſt have fallen a d victim to rebellion and the intrigues of Rome, had not his cauſe been ſupported by the valour and ſucceſs of his nephew Frederic, duke of Suabia and Alſace, ſurnamed Monoculus, whom he promoted to the ſupreme command of his army [e].

Troubles of Germany. A. D. 1114.

MATHILDA dying about this time, Henry, as her neareſt relation, claimed the ſucceſſion, notwithſtanding the ſteps ſhe had taken in favour of the holy ſee, alleging, that it was not in her power to alienate her eſtates, which immediately depended upon the empire. He therefore ſet out for Lombardy, and ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, beſeeching the pope to revoke the ſentence of excommunication which had been fulminated againſt him, expreſly contrary to their laſt agreement. Paſchal would not even favour his deputies with an audience; but, that ſame year, convoked a council at Rome, where his treaty with the emperor was

e condemned, and all the ſteps which had been taken by the national councils were confirmed.

HENRY, ſhocked and incenſed at theſe proceedings, advanced towards Rome, in order to diſſipate the pernicious projects which were daily formed to his prejudice; and the pope, who was well acquainted with his diſpoſition, thought proper to retire into Apulia. In this march he ſecured ſeveral towns and caſtles, and gained over divers noblemen to his intereſt, particularly Ptolemy, count of Tuſculum, the chief of the adverſe party, who prevailed upon the Roman people to decree a triumph to the emperor. He was accordingly received at Rome with extraordinary magnificence; and doubting the validity of his former coronation, which had been performed by a perſon who had retracted all he had done upon that occaſion, he reſolved that the ceremony ſhould be repeated, and was actually crowned a ſecond time

f in the church of St. Peter, by the hands of Marius Burdinus, archbiſhop of Prague, who had attended him in this expedition [f].

Heny ſets out for Germany.

THIS was all the fruit he reaped from his expedition into Italy; for ſeeing the true pope protected by all the princes of Apulia, againſt whom he had not a ſufficient number of troops to make head, he returned to his German dominions, leaving a guard with Gregory at Rome, where Gelaſius, having made an attempt to eſtabliſh himſelf, was fain to deſiſt, after his life had been in imminent danger. He then retired into France, and died at the abbey of Cluny, when the cardinals then preſent elected the cardinal archbiſhop of Vienne, legate of the holy ſee in France, who, as we have already ſaid, had excommunicated the emperor in the national councils. The noblemen of Saxony and Weſtphalia entered into an aſſociation to defend themſelves againſt the reſentment of the emperor; and having levied troops, under the command of duke Lotharius, Frederic count Palatine, and the marquis Rodolphus, they ſent deputies to Henry, demanding that he would acknowledge Calixtus for pope, and reſtore to the right owners the fiefs and eſtates he had ſeized by violence and injuſtice. Henry refuſing to give them audience, they took the field with a conſiderable army; and the emperor aſſembling troops to chaſtiſe them for their preſumption, hoſtilities immediately enſued. The operations of the campaign were carried on with various ſucceſs, until the ardour on both ſides began to abate, and ſteps were taken towards an accommodation [h]. b

Between whom and the emperor a fruitleſs negotiation is ſet on foot.

MEAN while the new pope called an aſſembly at Rheims; and the ſtates of the empire meeting that ſame year at Tribur, between Mentz and Worms, gave the emperor to underſtand, that they were quite tired with this long quarrel, which had been ſo troubleſome to the empire. In conſequence of this remonſtrance, a negotiation was ſet on foot: the emperor abated ſomewhat in his pretenſions with regard to the form of inveſtitures; the pope promiſed to take off the ſentence of excommunication; writings were exchanged; and a day fixed for an interview at Monzon. Towards this place the emperor advanced with an army of thirty thouſand men; and the pope, taking umbrage at ſuch a train, halted by the way in a ſtrong caſtle, from whence he ſent his legates to Henry, deſiring to know if he ſtill perſiſted in the ſentiments he had lately profeſſed; but when he underſtood that the emperor had changed his mind, denied his own hand-writing, and become inexorable on the article of inveſtiture, he ſet out on his return to Rheims without delay; nor could the repeated entreaties of the emperor prevail upon him to ſtay one ſingle day, until the princes could be conſulted. He had conceived ſuch a terrible idea of the treatment his predeceſſor had met with at Rome, that he purſued his journey with incredible expedition, detained the council a few days longer, until a decree was paſſed, prohibiting eccleſiaſtics from receiving the inveſtiture of biſhoprics and abbies from the hands of laics; and the emperor, with the anti-pope, and all their adherents, were again excommunicated [i]. c d

A. D. 1120. Calixtus repairs to Rome, and ſhuts up the anti-pope in a convent.

NEXT year Calixtus arrived at Rome, where he was honourably received; upon which Gregory VIII. retired to Sutri, a ſtrong town, garriſoned by the emperor's troops, who were not, however, able to protect him from the enmity of his rival; for the princes of Apulia ſent an army to beſiege the place of his retreat; and he at length fell into the hands of his competitor, who ordered him to be mounted on a camel, with his face towards the tail, and conducted through the public ſtreets of Rome, amidſt the ſcoffs and inſults of the populace; after which proceſſion, he was ſhut up in a convent for life (K). e

Foments a rebellion in the empire, which is terminated by accommodation.

IN the mean time the archbiſhop of Mentz, inſtigated by the intrigues, and authorized by the decrees of Rome, formed a powerful league againſt the emperor and his partizans, who were branded with the name of ſchiſmatics: armies were raiſed on both ſides, and a great deal of blood muſt have been ſpilt, had not the wiſeſt and moſt conſiderable of each party interpoſed, and effected an accommodation. The emperor was unanimouſly ſupplicated to give peace to the empire; that prince referred himſelf intirely to the deciſion of the ſtates; and a diet being aſſembled at Wurtzburg, it was decreed, that an embaſſy ſhould be immediately ſent to the pope, deſiring he would convoke a general council at Rome, by which all conteſts might be determined [k]. f

The affair of inveſtitures ſettled. A. D. 1122.

IN compliance with this requeſt, Calixtus called the famous council, which was opened during Lent, and at which were preſent three hundred biſhops, and about ſeven hundred abbots. The ambaſſadors being heard before this grand aſſembly, the affair of inveſtitures was at length regulated with their conſent, in the following articles: that the emperor ſhould leave the chapters and communities at liberty to fill up their own vacancies, without

THIS treaty being read and ratified by the diet at Worms, the cardinal of Oſtia, the pope's firſt legate, who had accompanied the ambaſſadors in their return, gave abſolution to the
b emperor, and all his ſchiſmatic adherents [m], then ſaid maſs in his pontificals, and adminiſtered the ſacrament to Henry, as the laſt mark of a perfect reconciliation.

THUS ended that tedious conteſt, which had raiſed ſo many diſturbances, and coſt ſuch a world of blood and treaſure. But as, in this accommodation, no mention had been made of the emperor's right to create, or intermeddle in the election of popes, Calixtus was no ſooner dead, than the cardinals, clergy, and people of Rome, without the participation of Henry, proceeded to a new election, which was carried on with ſuch diſorder, that two perſons were choſen at the ſame time, namely, Theobald, who was called Celeſtin, and Lambert, cardinal biſhop of Oſtia. He aſſumed the appellation of Honorius II. and was confirmed in the papacy, upon the voluntary reſignation of his competitor. Honorius II. is elected pope. A. D. 1124.

c AFTER his accommodation with Rome, the emperor was engaged in a civil war, by the revolt of Holland (L), which he reduced by force of arms, as well as the city of Worms, which had alſo rebelled. Nevertheleſs the ſpirit of ſedition ſtill continued to ſpread from town to town; ſo that he himſelf was obliged to fly from Ruffac, at the hazard of his life, in conſequence of a ſudden inſurrection of the people. Henry is engaged in a civil war,

IN a little time after this misfortune, which made a deep impreſſion on his ſpirits, he died at Utrecht, aged forty-four, after a reign of eighteen years, and his body was interred at Spire, among his anceſtors [n]. He married Maud, daughter of Henry I. king of England, by whom he had no iſſue; ſo that his heirs were Conrad, duke of Franconia, and Frederic, duke
d of Suabia, who were his own ſiſter's ſons; and he certainly intended that one of them ſhould be his ſucceſſor in the empire. Henry is ſaid to have been haughty, cruel, and avaricious [o]; but he was certainly a wiſe, politic, and reſolute prince, and, excluſive of his unnatural behaviour to his father, of which he ſincerely repented in the ſequel, he may be juſtly ranked among thoſe emperors who did not diſgrace the diadem they wore. and dies at Utrecht. e Though all the German authors (Krantz excepted) are ſilent with reſpect to this expedition, it is particularly mentioned by the French writers, and an exact detail of the preparations made by Lewis Le Groſs to oppoſe this invaſion, is given by Sugerius, abbot of St. Dennis, who was an eye-witneſs of the whole (1).

CHAP. IV.

Deducing the ſame Subject to the Succeſſion of Henry VI.

LOTHARIUS II.

f AFTER the death of this emperor, it was believed that the ſtates would confer the empire upon one of the ſons of his ſiſter, they being princes of great courage, generoſity, and power, and very much eſteemed by the principal members of the empire; but Albert, archbiſhop of Mentz, who bore an implacable enmity to the memory of the late emperor, and all his adherents, having obtained the regalia from Henry's widow, by cajoling her with a promiſe of preſerving them for one or other of her nephews, found means to influence the princes of the empire to give their ſuffrages in favour of Lotharius, duke of Saxe-Supplembourg [p], who had befriended and ſupported him in all his conteſts with the late emperor. He was accordingly crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, in preſence of the pope's nuncio, while his two competitors neglected nothing in their power to ſupport their pretenſions to the throne; Frederic, duke of Suabia, being actually elected king of the Romans by ſome princes, noblemen, and cities of the empire, and the other ſolemnly crowned at Milan by Lotharius is choſen emperor.

the archbiſhop of that city [q]. The firſt expedition of the new emperor was againſt the Bohemians, whom he hated, becauſe they had aſſiſted the late emperor againſt him, while he was in rebellion. But his pretence for marching into Bohemia at this juncture, was a quarrel between Otho and Sobieſlaus, brothers of the deceaſed duke, who had left the guardianſhip of his children to Sobieſlaus, although Otho was his elder brother. This preference, given contrary to the cuſtom of nations, was reſented by Otho, whom, however, Sobieſlaus expelled by dint of arms. Thus injured, he repaired to the diet at Ratisbon, in order to ſolicit redreſs. The emperor, intereſting himſelf in his cauſe, marched into Bohemia, where, though he ſuſtained ſome damage and diſgrace, he compelled Sobieſlaus to ſue for peace; which was granted, on condition that he ſhould reſtore Moravia to Winceſlaus, the ſon of Otho, releaſe the priſoners he had made, and do homage to the emperor for Bohemia [r]. a b

Surmounts all oppoſition,

In a word, after a ſhort oppoſition, which, however, was obſtinate and bloody, the two princes dropped their pretenſions, and were reconciled to Lotharius, who honoured them with his friendſhip, particularly Conrad, whom he loaded with extraordinary proofs of eſteem and benevolence [s].

A D. 1130. Eſpouſes the cauſe of Innocent II.

HONORIUS II. dying on the 24th of February, Innocent II. ſucceeded him that ſame day in the papacy, by virtue of a canonical election; notwithſtanding which, cardinal Petrus Leonis, who had a powerful faction at Rome, was proclaimed pope by the name of Anacletus. The other, finding himſelf too weak to oppoſe this rival, retired into France, where his intereſt was openly eſpouſed by St. Bernard, who perſuaded Lotharius to declare in his favour. He likewiſe propoſed and effected an interview between the emperor and his holineſs at Liege [t]; where, after ſome diſputes about the article of inveſtiture [u], Lotharius acquieſced in the pope's refuſal to part with that prerogative, and even undertook to re-eſtabliſh Innocent in Rome (M). c and having re-eſtabliſhed him in the papal chair, is crowned at Rome. A. D. 1133.

THIS expedition being concerted, the pope ſet out for Italy, taking France in his way, where he received a conſiderable ſum for the expence of his journey: then proceeding to Placentia, he waited for the emperor, who in a few days joined him with his army, and conducted him to Rome, re-eſtabliſhed him in the chair, in ſpite of all the efforts and oppoſition of the anti-pope. It was, perhaps, with a view to give more weight to this re-eſtabliſhment, and to excite other people, by example, to honour the true pope, that the emperor, at his coronation [x], which was ſoon after performed, kneeled before Innocent, who was ſeated upon a throne, and, having promiſed obedience to the holy ſee, received the crown in that poſture. After this ſolemnity, the emperor returned to Germany, where, by the advice of one Werner Urſperg, alias Ernerius, he ordered that juſtice ſhould be adminiſtered in the empire according to the digeſta or code of Juſtinian *, the uſe of which had been laid aſide five or ſix hundred years. Theſe laws were introduced in Italy, Germany, and afterwards in France and Spain, in lieu of peculiar ſtatutes and particular cuſtoms (N). d Reſtores Innocent, who had been expelled by the duke of Apulia. A. D. 1137.

THE emperor had no ſooner quitted Italy, than Roger, duke of Apulia, who had lately erected his dominions into a royalty, under the name of the kingdom of Sicily, raiſed an army in favour of Anacletus, and made himſelf maſter of almoſt all the places belonging to the holy ſee; upon which pope Innocent retired to Piſa, and again implored the aſſiſtance of Lotharius, who did not forſake him in his adverſity; on the contrary, he levied a powerful army, and dividing it into two parts, gave the command of one to his ſon-in-law the duke of Bavaria, and put himſelf at the head of the other. All the places of St. Peter's Patrimony were ſoon retaken, and the true pope re-conducted in triumph to Rome; a circumſtance which is ſaid to have haſtened the death of Anacletus, who died of grief at the ſucceſs of his competitor. e

THE emperor afterwards drove Roger from city to city, and at length obliged him to retire into Sicily; then ſubduing the provinces of Apulia and Calabria, and all Roger's Italian poſſeſſions, he formed them into a principality, and beſtowed it, with the title of duke, upon Renaud, a German prince, and one of his own relations. f

ON his return to Germany after this glorious expedition, he was ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper at Verona; notwithſtanding which, he proceeded on his journey, in hopes of being recovered by his native air; but death overtook him among the Alps, near Trent, in a the twelfth year of his reign. This prince is celebrated on account of his paſſionate regard for public peace, and the adminiſtration of juſtice; though, from the great number of commentaries made on the Pandects, he is taxed with having introduced chicanry, inſtead of facilitating the inveſtigation of truth.

C O N R A D III.

THE princes of the empire, aſſembling at Coblentz, in order to chooſe a new emperor, unanimouſly elected Conrad, duke of Franconia, nephew of Henry V. and conducted him to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was crowned by cardinal Thiery, the pope's legate, he officiating for the archbiſhop of Cologne, who was not at that time in prieſt's orders [y]. Conrad III. elected. A. D. 1139.

HENRY, duke of Bavaria, ſurnamed the Haughty, who had married the only daughter of Lotharius, and received the duchy of Saxony as her dower, was not preſent at this election, which he conſidered as a violation of his right; becauſe Lotharius, who died without iſſue male, had put the regalia into his hands, and even deſigned him for his ſucceſſor in the empire. In conſequence of this deſignation, he refuſed to ſurrender the royal ornaments to Conrad, after he had been lawfully elected: upon which the princes aſſembled at the diet of Goſlar, publicly diveſted him of his duchies of Saxony and Bavaria; the firſt of which they gave to Albert, marquis of Brandenburg [z], and the other to Leopold, marquis of Auſtria; an alienation which made ſuch a deep impreſſion on the mind of Henry, that he died that c ſame year of grief and mortification (O). Henry, duke of Bavaria, refuſes to deliver the regalia, and is diveſted of his dominions.

ABOUT this time Roger, king of Sicily, had made himſelf maſter of the dominions which belonged to the empire in Apulia. That he might be able to maintain his conqueſt, he excited Welph, or Guelphe, brother of Henry the Haughty, to make war with the emperor, for the recovery of the two duchies which had been confiſcated, and furniſhed him with a conſiderable ſum of money for the expence of his army. After ſeveral engagements that were not deciſive, Guelphe was beſieged by the emperor in the caſtle of Weinsberg, and reſolving to make a ſally, gave for the word Hievvelf. Frederic, duke of Suabia, brother to the emperor, and general of his troops, having diſcovered this word, gave to his own army that of Hiegibelin, the name of a village in Suabia, in which he himſelf had been educated. This d was the origin of the Guelphs and Gibelins, which afterwards grew into ſuch vogue in Italy, where the pope's party was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the firſt, and that of the emperor by the other (P). Guelph, however, ſuſtained great loſs in this ſally, and having defended himſelf to the laſt extremity, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. The emperor, however, inſtead of uſing his good fortune with ſeverity and rigour, gave the duke liberty to retire unmoleſted; but the ducheſs, ſuſpecting this exceſs of generoſity in Conrad, who had been known to entertain a particular enmity againſt her huſband, ſent a gentleman to the emperor, entreating him to grant a ſafe-conduct for her, and the other women belonging to the caſtle, that they might come out with as much as each could carry, and be conducted e to a place of ſafety. The emperor complied with her requeſt; and this evacuation was made in the ſight of the whole army, who expected to ſee them come forth with jewels, gold, and ſilver; but they were not a little ſurprized when they ſaw the ducheſs, and other ladies of quality, ſtaggering under the load of their huſbands, who had offended the emperor. Conrad was ſo much moved with this ſpectacle, which was an undoubted proof of their tenderneſs and courage, that the tears ran down his cheeks; he applauded their conjugal fidelity, entertained them at dinner, and came to an acommodation with Guelph, and his other enemies, notwithſtanding the efforts of his own generals, who oppoſed his generoſity on this occaſion [a]. Guelph, with the aſſiſtance of Roger, king of Sicily, takes the field againſt Conrad. A. D. 1141.

MEAN while this civil war furniſhed ſeveral towns of Italy with an opportunity of withdrawing themſelves from the dominion of the empire, and ſetting up for independent repub- f lics. Even the Romans formed a deſign of re-eſtabliſhing the antient commonwealth, and of retrieving the ſovereignty of the city, together with the patrimony of the church. They had already renewed the order of ſenators, and the rank of patrician, to which they had promoted one Jordanus, inveſting him with the ſame authority which Charlemagne had poſſeſſed Origin of Guelphs and Gibelins.

in that ſtation. This new patrician, accompanied by the ſenators and people, went to pope Lucius II. and repreſenting that the popes originally applied themſelves to eccleſiaſtic affairs, contented with the tythes they received for their ſubſiſtence, they deſired him to deſiſt from intermeddling in politics, and leave the care of the adminiſtration to thoſe to whom it properly belonged; nay, they went ſo far as to take poſſeſſion of the revenues of the city, and turn out the pope's officers, who had been appointed to collect them. Lucius, with his cardinals and clergy, vehemently oppoſed this innovation, and, after obſtinate diſputes, it was agreed, that recourſe ſhould be had to Conrad, who was at the diet at Spire when the ambaſſadors arrived. But before his deciſion could be obtained, the pope put himſelf at the head of ſome troops he had levied, and beſieged the ſenators in the capitol, from which he received ſuch a wound with a ſtone, as in a few days put an end to his life; ſo that the ambaſſadors returned without an anſwer. Lucius was ſucceeded by Eugenius III. who, tho' diſturbed by thoſe ſeditious people in the beginning of his papacy, found means to reduce the rebels to reaſon, and re-eſtabliſh the authority of St. Peter's chair. Quiet being thus reſtored to the city, the pope applied himſelf vigorouſly to the famous cruſade, which was at that time ſet on foot againſt the Saracens, for the defence of the Holy Land; an enterprize in which the emperor Conrad was engaged by the admonitions of St. Bernard, from whoſe hands he actually received the croſs.

At a general diet convened at Frankfort, the preparations for the cruſade were adjuſted; the emperor's ſon Henry was elected king of the Romans; and an imperial council eſtabliſhed at Rotweil (Q), to govern the empire under his authority. In this aſſembly, Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, demanded the duchy of Bavaria, which had been taken from his father, and beſtowed on Henry of Auſtria, and even threatened to retake it by force, in caſe his remonſtrances ſhould not avail. Conrad replied, with great moderation, that the affair ſhould be diſcuſſed, and equitably decided, at his return from the Holy Land; and in the mean time he deſired Wiebold, abbot of Corbie, who had a great ſhare of his confidence, to keep a vigilant eye over the Saxons during his abſence, and to perſuade the duke to undertake a cruſade againſt the pagans of the north.

Conrad engages in an unſucceſsful cruſade. A. D. 1147.

The winter being conſumed in making preparations for the eaſtern expedition, Conrad, accompanied by his nephew Frederic Barbaroſſa, duke Guelf, and many other noblemen, ſet out for Paleſtine, at the head of ſixty thouſand horſe, in excellent order; but the undertaking was not crowned with ſucceſs, one half of his troops having periſhed by the treachery of Comnenus, the Greek emperor, who ordered lime to be mixed with the meal which he furniſhed for their ſubſiſtence [b], and the remainder having been intirely defeated by the Turks. He made ſhift, however, with the wreck of his army, to make head againſt the Saracens for ſome time, and then returned to his own dominions (R).

The bad ſucceſs of this undertaking filled the empire with grief, conſternation, and clamour, and entailed the reproaches and curſes of the people upon St. Bernard, who had not only preached up the cruſade, but, by virtue of a pretended commiſſion from heaven, promiſed victory, honour, and wealth, to all thoſe who ſhould embark in the expedition. They reviled him with the appellations of falſe prophet, impoſtor, and incendiary; and accuſed him of having drained their country of all the riches and men, who could have defended it againſt the inſults and encroachments of their enemies.

Another cruſade is formed againſt the Moors;

Yet, notwithſtanding theſe complaints, which were extremely juſt, ſuch was the epidemic madneſs of the times, that another cruſade was formed againſt the Moors, who were in poſſeſſion of Portugal: a great number of Germans, from the neighbourhood of the Rhine and the Weſer, took the croſs; and, embarking in a fleet of two hundred Engliſh and Flemiſh veſſels, ſet ſail for Spain, to the aſſiſtance of king Alphonſus Henriquez. After having been diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, they entered the Tagus, and, joining the Spaniſh forces, inveſted the city of Lisbon, which, after a ſiege of five months, was taken by aſſault [c].

Its juriſdiction extends over the provinces of Suabia, Franconia, Auſtria, and the Rhine. Nevertheleſs the archbiſhops of Triers and Cologne, the archdukes of Auſtria, the knights of the Teutonic order, and of the order of Malta, the ſubjects of the duke of Deuxponts, and of the duke of Wirtemberg, the abbot of St. Blaiſe, the counts of Hanau, and ſome others, have a right to decline pleading before this tribunal (5).

(R) Conrad having joined his forces with thoſe of Lewis the Young, they undertook the ſiege of Damaſcus, and ſuſtained a furious ſally, in which the emperor, with his own hand, cleft a Turk through the middle, to the aſtoniſhment and terror of the Mohammedans, who, at ſight of this atchievement, fled with great precipitation (6).

a ABOUT the same time, the Saxons engaged in a third crusade against the pagans of the north, and raised two armies, amounting to one hundred thousand men, under the command of Conrad the Saxon, and Henry, duke of Saxony; who penetrating into Sclavonia, destroyed the country, and converted the natives, with fire and sword, to the Christian religion. and a third against the pagans of the north. A. D. 1148.

AT Conrad's return from Palestine, Henry the Lion renewed his demands touching Bavaria, and, as he did not receive a definitive answer, had recourse to arms; but the emperor took such measures as defeated his design against Bavaria, and he was fain to desist, for the present, from his pretensions.

DURING the remaining part of Conrad's reign, nothing extraordinary happened, except
b the revolt of Guelph, who, in his return from the Holy Land, was instigated and bribed by Roger, king of Sicily, to rebel against the emperor; but he was afterwards reconciled to to him through the mediation of Frderic, duke of Suabia, who was nephew to both [d].

SOON after this accommodation, he was very much afflicted with the death of Henry his eldest son, who had been elected king of the Romans before he set out on his expedition against the Saracens (S). This event made the deeper impression, as Frederic, the only surviving son, was yet in his nonage. He therefore convoked a diet at Bamberg, where, on account of his ill state of health, he recommended his nephew Frederic, duke of Suabia, to succeed him in the empire; a prince of great courage and capacity, and in every respect worthy of the throne; the recommendation was therefore approved by all the princes, and c the regalia deposited in his hands. Soon after this settlement of the succession, Conrad died at Bamberg, after having reigned about thirteen years with virtue and reputation [e] (T). He settles the succession, and dies. A. D. 1152.

FREDERIC, I. surnamed Barbarossa.

AFTER the death of Conrad, the princes of the empire, assembling at Frankfort, elected, according to his recommendation, his nephew Frederic, who was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, at the age of twenty-nine. He was the first emperor of that name, and honoured with the appellation of Father of his country, on account of his invariable affection and attach-d ment to the glory of the empire, tho' he was likewise distinguished by the name of Barbarossa, or Red beard. He was no sooner elected, than almost all the princes of Europe sent embassadors to Mersbourg, to congratulate him on his elevation. The king of Denmark went thither in person for the investiture of his dominions, which was granted by Frederic, who crowned him with his own hand, and received the oath of allegiance from him, as vassal of the empire. The emperor's next step was to send the archbishop of Triers, and bishop of Bamberg, embassadors to Rome, to receive the crown in his name, as he could not go thither in person, before he should have pacified and determined the differences which subsisted among the princes of the empire. Of these the most considerable was the quarrel betwen Henry, duke of Saxony, and Henry the Lion, who took the title of duke of Bavaria. This young Henry demanded the duchy as his inheritance; the other refused to resign it;
e and almost all the princes of Germany took arms in favour of one or other of these competitors [f]. Frederic Barbarossa is elected emperor; receives homage from the king of Denmark;

IN order to compose all these disturbances, the emperor called a diet at Spire, where, by the advice of the princes there assembled, he decreed, that Henry, duke of Saxony, should be re-established in the duchy of Bavaria; and, in order to satisfy the other, he erected Austria into a duchy, releasing him from the homage and oath of fidelity to the duchy of Bavaria, of which it formerly held [g]. At the same time the duke of Austria, in consideration of this independency, yielded to Henry, duke of Saxony, the duchies of Tuscany and Spoleto, together with the island of Sardinia. adjusts a difference between Henry, duke of Saxony and Henry of Austria;

THIS affair being compromised, he acted as umpire in the difference betwence Sueno
f and Canute, who had, by force of arms, for some time disputed the crown of Denmark. Canute, after repeated efforts, being vanquished by his competitor, repaired to the diet which was then sitting at Mersbourg, and sollicited the protection of the emperor, promising to do him homage for the kingdom, provided he would declare in his favour. Frederic, allured by

THE next ſtep which Frederic took was to hold a diet at Wurtzbourg, where he liſtened to the complaints of the noblemen of Apulia, whom Roger king of Sicily had ſtripped of their eſtates, and expelled from their country; and he reſolved, with the concurrence of the aſſembly, to march into Italy with all convenient ſpeed, in order to chaſtiſe that tyrant for having injured the vaſſals of the empire, as well as to receive the imperial crown. b quarrels with the pope;

IT was not long before the emperor, in imitation of his predeceſſors, quarrelled with the pope. He had raiſed the biſhop of Zeitz to the archbiſhopric of Magdeburg, becauſe the votes were equally divided between other two competitors. Eugenius III. at that time pope, diſapproved of his depriving one ſee of a biſhop, in order to put him in another, when there was no neceſſity for ſuch a tranſlation; but Frederic, who was perfectly well acquainted with the agreements which had been made between his predeceſſors and former popes, ſupported his creation; and when Eugenius ſent legates into Germany to depoſe the archbiſhop [h], they were obliged to make a very expeditious retreat. c

THE pope dying, Anaſtaſius, who ſuceeeded him in the chair, reſolved to tread in the footſteps of his predeceſſor, and ſent cardinal Gerardus into Germany to determine that affair. But the legate having ſpoken diſreſpectfully in preſence of his imperial majeſty, who was as jealous of his honour as expert in the management of his affairs, he was diſgracefully chaſed out of Germany, and died of chagrin on his return to Rome.

A. D. 1154. but is afterwards reconciled to the holy ſee.

MEAN while Frederic, reflecting upon the miſchievous conſequences of a breach with the pope, ſent the new archbiſhop of Magdeburg to Rome, where he pleaded his own cauſe ſo effectually, that the pope was ſatisfied, and inveſted him with the Pallium [i].

THE emperor, in order to manifeſt his independence of the pope, repudiated, by his own authority, his wife Adelaide, on account of the conſanguinity ſubſiſting between him and her, which not only did violence to his conſcience, but ſeemed to threaten future doubts and diſputes touching the legitimacy of his children. d

A new ſedition at Rome. A. D. 1155.

IT was about this time, that ſeveral cities of Italy revolted from the emperor, in imitation of ſome others which had already taken the ſame ſtep, and the Romans themſelves renewed their attempts upon the pope's ſovereignty at Rome. Their ſedition proceeded to ſuch a length, that a cardinal was actually murdered; upon which Adrian IV. who had by this time ſucceeded Anaſtaſius, put the city under an interdiction. The people at length ſubmitted; the interdiction was taken off; but the difference being afterwards re-inflamed, the pope was fain to take refuge at Viterbo, where he waited for the emperor, whom he had invoked to his aſſiſtance [k]. e

FREDERIC, ſtimulated by theſe conſiderations, put himſelf at the head of a gallant army, accompanied by Henry the Lion, his uncle Welfon, and a great number of the nobility, and marched into Italy by the way of Tyrol. After having held an aſſembly in the plain of Roncalie, compoſed of the noblemen of the empire, together with the grandees and conſuls of almoſt all the Italian cities, who went thither to make their ſubmiſſion, and ſolicit redreſs of grievances, he reduced ſome towns of Lombardy which had revolted, chaſtiſed others which had tyrannized over their neighbours, and proceeded to Pavia, where he was crowned king of Italy [l]. But while he proceeded on his conqueſts, he was not a little chagrined to learn, that Germany was re-involved in troubles, by a quarrel between the archbiſhop of Mentz and duke Herman, count palatine of the Rhine, who had taken arms againſt each other, and reſolved to drive things to the utmoſt extremity (U). f

A dangerous feud in Germany.

An interview between the pope and the emperor;

FREDERIC, alarmed at theſe diſturbances, made haſte to conclude his expedition; and as his chief buſineſs was to re-eſtabliſh the pope in Rome, preſſed him to an interview at Sutri, whither his holineſs repaired upon a mule, in expectation that the emperor would hold his ſtirrup, and help him to diſmount; but this humiliation Frederic would not una dergo, until he was convinced that it was no more than a compliment, which his predeceſſors had paid to the pope, whom they looked upon as the repreſentative of Chriſt [m] (X).

THE emperor re-conducted the pope to Rome, where he received the imperial crown from the hands of his holineſs, and the Romans gave no interruption to the ceremony; but ſoon as Frederic had retired to his camp, the ſedition was renewed; and taking up arms, they beſieged the pope in the palace of the Vatican; but the emperor, on the firſt notice of this inſurrection, haſtened to his ſuccour, cut in pieces all that oppoſed his way, diſperſed the multitude, and quieted the commotion [n].

who re-eſtabliſhes his holineſs in Rome, where he is crowned.

FREDERIC, having puniſhed the Romans for their rebellion, paſſed the Tyber, and encamped at Ponte Lucano, to which place he was accompanied by the pope, who did not b think himſelf ſafe in Rome. Here he was preſented by the Tiburtines with the keys of their city, which he delivered to his holineſs, in conſequence of being told that the town belonged to the holy ſee. From hence he marched to Spoleto, which he took, plundered, and burned, becauſe the inhabitants refuſed to releaſe count Guido, whom they had apprehended in his return from Apulia, where he had been tranſacting buſineſs for the emperor. While Frederic ſtayed a few days at Ancona, in order to refreſh his troops, deputies arrived in his camp from the patriarch of Jeruſalem, with complaints againſt the knights hoſpitallers; but he left that affair to the cognizance of the pope. At the ſame time came ambaſſadors with preſents from the Greek emperor, who propoſed a treaty of alliance, and deſired Frederic to march into Apulia againſt William king of Sicily, who had ſucceeded Roc ger, and was their common enemy. Barbaroſſa immediately called a council, in which it was reſolved to ſend Guibald, abbot of Corbie, as plenipotentiary to Conſtantinople: and in the mean time the exiled noblemen of Apulia returned to their own country, under the protection and countenance of the emperor, whom their enemies durſt not venture to incenſe.

THE affairs of Italy being thus ſettled, the emperor returned to his German dominions, and ordered the princes, who had taken up arms againſt each other, to be ſummoned to the diet at Worms; where, having taken their trial, they were condemned to the puniſhment allotted for the perturbators of the public peace (Y). In a little time after this event, a breach happened between Adrian IV. and the emperor. The biſhop of Lunden, having been robbed and taken priſoner in the imperial dominions, had complained of the d outrage, without being redreſſed; and the pope, eſpouſing his cauſe, ſent legates to demand juſtice of the emperor, whom they found at Beſançon, where he had convoked a diet. There they took an opportunity of reading aloud the letter of his holineſs, which, among other things, imported, that he had, out of his free grace and favour, conferred upon Frederic the ſovereign authority of Rome, and the kingdom of Italy. Every body from theſe words concluded, that the pope had actually beſtowed upon him the empire as a fief of the holy ſee, and what confirmed this conjecture was the behaviour of one of the legates, who, hearing this donation queſtioned, exclaimed, "If not of his holineſs, of whom "then doth he hold it?" This ſaucy interrogation had like to have proved fatal to him and his followers (Z), who were forthwith turned out of the aſſembly, and ordered to take

(X) The emperor went to hold the ſtirrup on the left ſide, when the pope expreſſing his ſurprize, Frederic, with an air of pleaſantry, ſaid he was not well acquainted with the office, and therefore hoped his holineſs would excuſe him. The pope, however, was not ſatisfied with this apology, and went away without beſtowing upon him the kiſs of peace; but, returning next day, the emperor performed his part to a miracle, and every thing was ſet to rights (9).

(Y) Each count was condemned to carry a dog on his back, from one county to another; each gentleman to bear a joint-ſtool; and the common people to ſhoulder cart-wheels. The archbiſhop of Mentz was excuſed on account of his old age (10).

(Z) The legate had no ſooner pronounced theſe words, than Otho count palatine of Bavaria unſheathed the ſword which he wore as marſhal of the empire, and, advancing towards him, would, in all probability, have had no regard to his function, had not he been reſtrained by the emperor (1).

But, that the reader may have an idea of the provocation, we ſhall literally tranſlate the pope's letter from the Annals of John Aventinus. "The Roman empire "was tranſlated from the Greeks to the Germans; but "the king of the Teutones was not called emperor be"fore he was crowned by the apoſtolic power. Before "his conſecration he was king, after it he became em"peror. Of whom then but us doth he hold the em"pire? From the election of his own princes he enjoys "the name of king; from our conſecration he derives "the appellations of emperor, Auguſtus, and Cæſar; "therefore through us he governs. Recollect what "hath happened of old. Zacharias promoted Charles "to the imperial dignity, and gave him the name of "Great, and decreed that the king of the Germans "ſhould thenceforward for ever be emperor, and cham"pion of the apoſtolic chair; that he might reduce "Apulia to the dominion of the biſhop of Rome, to "whom (as well as the city itſelf) it formerly belonged. "Rome is the ſeat of our empire; whereas the emperor's "is at Aix, in the foreſt of Ardenne. Whatever he "hath as emperor, he hath from us; for as Zacharias "transferred the empire from the Greeks to the Ger"mans, ſo can we transfer it from the Germans to the "Greeks. It is in our power to beſtow it upon whom "we will. Beſides, we are appointed by God to rule "over kingdoms and nations, that we may deſtroy, "pluck up, build, plant, &c." Then he brands the Germans for their want of valour; obſerving, that they could not drive Roger out of Italy, nor ſubdue the Frieſlanders and Danes (2).

the ſpeedieſt and ſhorteſt way back to Rome[o]. The emperor, in his own vindication, wrote circular letters, by way of manifeſto, in which he publicly gave the lie to all thoſe who ſhould preſume to ſay, that he held his crown of any other than God himſelf[p]; while the pope employed the German biſhops to repreſent to the emperor the injury he had ſuſtained in the perſons of his legates. To theſe repreſentations Frederic replied with warmth, that he held his crown of God and the princes of Germany, and that he would rather reſign it altogether than ſuffer it to be debaſed in his poſſeſſion. The biſhops, finding him obſtinately determined to ſupport his dignity, adviſed his holineſs to pacific meaſures; and he, wiſely following their advice, ſent another deputation of legates, with a reſpectful letter, in which he explained away the meaning of his former expreſſions. Frederic, who was a prince of great penetration, plainly perceived, that, notwithſtanding this gloſs, the court of Rome waited for nothing but a favourable opportunity of declaring itſelf in another ſtile; and therefore, that he might be the better prepared for ſuch a declaration, he reſolved with all ſpeed to diſcuſs the affairs which might thwart him in his own dominions. With this view he attacked Boleſlaus duke of Poland, who had revolted; him he reduced to obedience, and obliged to pay the arrears of tribute which he owed. In the next place he engaged Uladiſlaus, duke of Bohemia, more firmly in his intereſt, by erecting anew that duchy into a kingdom[q]. Henry IV. had conferred the title of king upon a former Uladiſlaus, duke of Bohemia, but the duchy itſelf had never till now been acknowleged as a kingdom. Then he made a progreſs through the towns of the Lower Rhine, in order to eſtabliſh proper regulations touching the adminiſtration of juſtice, and built the tower of Anweiller upon the Queich, at the diſtance of two leagues from Landau. He likewiſe took meaſures for ſecuring the fidelity of the king of Hungary; and having thus eſtabliſhed peace through all Germany, as well as the neighbouring countries, he reſolved to repaſs the Alps with a powerful army, in order to finiſh the reduction of the revolted towns. In the mean time he ſent Reinald, his chancellor, and Otho count palatine of Bavaria, as his commiſſaries into Italy, with orders to exact the oath of allegiance from the towns of Lombardy, and they executed their commiſſion with equal ability and ſucceſs. While they were thus employed in Italy, Frederic lay encamped at Augſburg, where he was attended by the ambaſſadors of Waldemar I. king of Denmark, who deſired he might be confirmed in his kingdom, which he promiſed to hold as a fief of the empire; and the emperor complied with his requeſt, on condition that he ſhould come, at an appointed time, and receive the inveſtiture in perſon.

ſecures the king of Hungary in his intereſts; marches into Italy;

A.D. 1158.

FREDERIC at this juncture ſurpaſſed all his predeceſſors, ſince the reign of Otho the Great, in power and glory. He had, by force of arms, compelled Boleſlaus, duke of Poland, to do him homage, and pay tribute to the emperor. He had received aſſurances of ſubmiſſion and fidelity from Geiſa king of Hungary, and Henry II. of England had ſent him magnificent preſents: he had honoured Uladiſlaus of Bohemia with the title of king, confirmed the ſovereignty of Waldemar, and eſtabliſhed peace and content through all the provinces of Germany.

His army conſiſting of warlike troops, well armed and diſciplined, being aſſembled at Augsburg, he divided it into ſeveral columns, for the conveniency of marching by as many different routes; and, having happily paſſed the Alps, reduced the town of Breſcia, which had the preſumption to oppoſe his paſſage. While he remained in the territory of this town, he was joined by the knights of ſeveral towns and caſtles in Italy, with their military contingents, and made ſeveral wholeſome regulations for the preſervation of good order and military diſcipline. Theſe previous ſteps being taken, he proceeded to action. Milan was beſieged, and ſurrendered at diſcretion: he was crowned king of Lombardy at Mouza; built the town of Lodi, on the river Adda; and having made himſelf maſter of all the other cities of Lombardy, which had rebelled, he, in an aſſembly held on the plain of Roncalie, ordered a minute inquiry to be ſet on foot concerning the rights of the empire, and exacted homage of all thoſe who held of it, even without excepting the biſhops. Grievances were redreſſed, magiſtracies reformed, the rights of regality diſcuſſed and aſcertained, new laws enacted for the maintenance of public tranquility, and the encouragement of learning, which now began to revive in the ſchool or univerſity of Bologna; and, above all things, ſub-vaſſals were not only prohibited from alienating their lands, but alſo compelled, in their oath to their lords paramount, to except the emperor nominally, when they ſwore to ſerve and aſſiſt them againſt all their enemies.

The pope, taking umbrage at this behaviour towards eccleſiaſtics, ſent a grand embaſſy of legates to complain of his diſreſpect; when Frederic juſtified what he had done, by ſaying it was but reaſonable they ſhould do homage for the fiefs they poſſeſſed; and obſerving that Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, tho' lord of all the ſovereigns upon earth, had deigned to pay for himſelf and St. Peter the tribute which was due to Cæſar.

a FREDERIC having ſent commiſſaries to ſuperintend the election of new magiſtrates at Milan, the inhabitants were ſo incenſed at this infringement of their old privileges, that they inſulted the imperialiſts, revolted, and refuſed to appear before the emperor's tribunal; ſo that he reſolved to chaſtiſe them ſeverely, and ſent to Germany for a reinforcement of troops, which ſoon after arrived with the empreſs. Mean while he ravaged Liguria, declared the Milaneſe rebels to the empire, inveſted Crema, which was in alliance with Milan, and having taken that town after an obſtinate ſiege, commanded it to be plundered and burnt.

In the midſt of theſe tranſactions, Adrian died, and a ſchiſm aroſe in the election of a ſucceſſor. The greateſt part of five-and-twenty cardinals, who were on the ſpot at his death, b elected Roland, chancellor of the church, who aſſumed the name of Alexander III. and the reſt choſe Octavien, of St. Cæcilia; who, ſeeing the papal robe delivered to his competitor, flew upon him, and tore it away by force; then cauſing himſelf to be adored under the name of Victor IV. was at once approved and proclaimed by the people. Alexander, and the cardinals who had elected him, took poſſeſſion of the caſtle of St. Angelo, the governor of which was their friend: there they were inveſted, and for nine days detained as priſoners, until the people, being undeceived, ſet them at liberty, with loud acclamations of "Long live pope Alexander;" who was conſecrated in a village near Rome.

The emperor, however, notwithſtanding the majority of voices by which Alexander had been elected, did not fail to declare in favour of Victor, who had been formerly attached c to his intereſt, whereas the other was an adherent of William, king of Sicily, whom Frederic had long conſidered as his mortal enemy: but, that he might not want a ſpecious pretext for ſupporting Victor, he convoked a council at Pavia, to decide upon the merits of both elections. The two competitors were ſummoned to appear; and the emperor, having opened it in perſon, immediately withdrew, that his preſence might not reſtrain the liberty of opinion [r].

The emperor calls a council at Pavia;

ALEXANDER, looking upon himſelf as a true pope, would not acknowlege a council convoked without his participation; ſo that they confirmed the election of Victor, who was adored by the emperor, and owned as pope with all the uſual ſolemnities. On the other hand, Alexander, who was at that time at Anagni, having, without effect, had recourſe to d admonitions, excommunicated the emperor, with all his adherents, and ſent ambaſſadors to the kings of France and England, to juſtify his conduct, and engage them in his intereſt [s]. Theſe two kings, having inquired into the merits of his cauſe, took him into protection; the Milaneſe, and all the reſt of Lombardy, declared in his favour: but, notwithſtanding this ſucceſs, he did not think himſelf ſafe either in Rome, or any other part of the dominions belonging to the church, becauſe the emperor's party was very powerful. He therefore retired into France [t], where he was honourably received by Lewis the Young; and, ſome time after his arrival, he called a council at Clermont, in Auvergne, where he again thundered out his bulls againſt Victor and his patron (A).

Mean while the emperor, taking the field againſt the inhabitants of Milan, and the other e rebels, obtained over them ſeveral advantages, but at length received a very mortifying check; for having cut off their communication with the town, he reduced them to the neceſſity of either fighting, or ſurrendering at diſcretion; and this ſituation driving them to deſpair, they attacked his troops with ſuch fury, that he was obliged to retire with great loſs. Incenſed by this diſgrace, he ravaged the country, and reſolving to make himſelf maſter of the city at any rate, committed the ſiege of it to the care of one of his generals, while he himſelf repaired to other places, where his preſence was more neceſſary. Tired, however, with the obſtinacy of their reſiſtance, he returned to the ſiege, redoubled his efforts, and, the greateſt part of the inhabitants being dead of famine, the city ſurrendered at diſcretion. He granted life and liberty to the people; but he abandoned the town to f pillage, and, ſparing nothing but churches, ordered it to be intirely razed to the ground, which was plowed, and ſown with ſalt, in memory of its rebellion. Placentia was diſmantled in this expedition, and the other rebellious towns reduced to the obedience of the victor.

condeſcenſion, he gave them, as a fief, the Riviera, from Monaco to Portovenere, inveſted them with the power of electing conſuls, and gratified them with ſeveral other privileges, which they had not before enjoyed. a

He then appointed well-affected governors for almoſt all the cities of Lombardy, diſmantled the town of Bologna, which in other reſpects he favoured as a ſeminary of the ſciences, and received the ſubmiſſion of Imola, Faenza, and all the places in Ancona, Tuſcany, and Romana.

While Frederic in this manner ſurmounted all oppoſition in Italy, Waldemar, king of Denmark, and Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, declared war againſt the Wandales; who, after being twice defeated, ſued for peace; and Henry was gratified with a ceſſion of Mecklenburg, which he peopled with colonies from Germany, Flanders, and Brabant. b

An aſſembly convoked at St. Jean de Laune.

The emperor, hearing that pope Alexander had taken refuge in France, ſignified to Lewis a deſire of ſeeing the ſchiſm terminated by a council, which was accordingly convoked at St. Jean de Laune; and in the mean time he wrote to the kings of Bohemia and Hungary, and to the archbiſhops and princes of the empire, to give their appearance at this aſſembly, which he and the king of France propoſed to grace with their own preſence. With this view, after his glorious campaign in Italy, he returned into Germany, at that time diſtracted with particular feuds, which he appeaſed with his uſual addreſs. Then he ſet out for Beſançon on his way to the council; and the king of France began his journey to St. Jean de Laune; but Alexander refuſed to go thither, and retired to the abbey of Bourgdren, in Berry, contenting himſelf with ſending deputies to defend his cauſe in the aſſembly. As for the two ſovereigns, they ſeemed cautiouſly to avoid a perſonal interview: when the king of France appeared in the council, the emperor was not preſent; and when the Germans gave Lewis to underſtand that Frederic was coming, he mounted his horſe, and fled with great precipitation, in fear of being ſurprized by the emperor, who was attended by a conſiderable body of troops. c

The king of Denmark arrives at Mentz

This aſſembly having proved ineffectual, Frederic repaired to Mentz, where he was viſited by Waldemar, king of Denmark, of whom he wanted to exact an oath of fidelity; but that prince aſſerted the independency of his crown with ſuch reſolution and perſeverance, that the emperor was contented with his doing homage for Wandalia only, on condition, however, that neither he nor his ſucceſſors ſhould be obliged to aſſiſt at the diets of the empire, or furniſh any contingent in time of war; or, laſtly, receive the inveſtiture of that province from the emperor. d

This affair being diſcuſſed, Barbaroſſa chaſtiſed the citizens of Mentz, who had murdered their archbiſhop: he expelled the abbot of St. James, and his monks, who had been accomplices in the crime, razed the city walls, and appointed a ſucceſſor to the defunct: he afterwards inlarged, adorned, and fortified the town of Haguenau, in which he eſtabliſhed the treaſury of the empire, and a college of juſtice, which greatly encreaſed its wealth and importance.

A. D. 1164. The towns of Italy again revolt; and the anti-pope Victor dies at Lucca, and is ſucceeded by Paſchal III.

The remembrance of the rigour with which Frederic puniſhed the city of Milan, was a ſpur that excited the reſt of the Italian towns againſt him; and this being reinforced by the under-hand machinations of pope Alexander, they once more ſhook off the imperial yoke, and obliged Victor to take refuge with Frederic; who, upon the news of this general revolt, reſolved upon another Italian expedition; but judging it expedient that Victor ſhould go thither before him, the anti-pope complied with his direction, and died that ſame year at Lucca [u], where the cardinals of his faction immediately elected × Paſchal III. who was acknowleged as pope in a diet, which the emperor ſome time after convoked at Wurtzburg for that purpoſe (B). e

The emperor, having paſſed the Alps with his wife Beatrice, was joined at the antient Lodi by the Italian noblemen and their troops, and proceeded to Pavia, where he iſſued orders for demoliſhing the town of Tortona, becauſe the inhabitants had rebuilt their walls, which he had formerly levelled to the ground; and here he underſtood, that the Venetians and Romans had formed a league againſt him, in conjunction with the inhabitants of Vicenza, Verona, Padua, and other towns, who complained of being oppreſſed by the governors and officers of the emperor. f

FREDERIC, finding himſelf too weak in Italy to cope with ſuch a powerful aſſociation, endeavoured to weaken it by policy, and, by means of private emiſſaries, tampered with ſome

(B) At this council it was decreed, that no perſon ſhould be declared pope, unleſs created with the conſent of the emperor, and contenting himſelf with the office of Chriſt's apoſtle, and St. Peter's ſucceſſor, without pretending to rival the imperial power. a particular ſtates, which, however, he could not detach from the general confederacy. Failing in this attempt, he reſolved to ſtrengthen the attachment of his own adherents, by granting favours, privileges, and immunities to the noblemen and cities that continued ſtaunch to his intereſt. In particular, he created Baraſon king of Oriſtagno, one of the four bailiwics of Sardinia, for which he did him homage; exempted Mantua from ſome taxations and military ſervice; and inveſted Pavia with the right of electing its own magiſtracy. At the ſame time he ſent receivers to all the towns in Lombardy, who exacted the taxes that were due, and raiſed contributions among the people with ſuch oppreſſive cruelty, as rendered his government deteſtable, and prepared the Italians for a general revolt.

At his return to Germany, he convoked a diet at Wurtzburg, b for healing the ſchiſm that divided the church; and there he, and all the princes and biſhops, together with the ambaſſadors of Henry, king of England, ſolemnly ſwore they would never acknowlege Alexander as the legal ſucceſſor of St. Peter. Injunctions were laid upon all the monks, clerks, and lay-ſubjects of the empire, to take the ſame oath, on pain of forfeiting their dignities and benefices, and of being declared enemies to their country.

About this time pope Alexander, at the earneſt ſollicitations of his friends, ſet out for Italy by ſea, and arriving at Meſſina, was, by the ſhips of William, king of Sicily, conducted to Oſtia, from whence he journeyed to Rome, where he lived a whole year in tranquillity. Frederic having ordered Charlemagne to be canonized, and confirmed the privileges of Aix-la-Chapelle, marched into Italy, with a conſiderable army, after the archbiſhops of Cologne
c and Mentz, whom he had previouſly detached with a ſtrong body of troops to reduce the diſaffected towns of Lombardy.

On his arrival at Lodi, he held a grand council, in order to deliberate upon the operations of the campaign; and here he determined a difference which had long ſubſiſted between the republics of Genoa and Piſa. When the council broke up, he proceeded to Bologna, which he laid under contribution, together with Imola, Faenza, and Forli; but Ancona would not ſubmit to his exactions, until after it was beſieged, and reduced to extremity. While he was employed in the ſiege of this place, the towns of Lombardy, reduced to deſpair by the violence and rapaciouſneſs of him and his commiſſaries, entered into an aſſociation for their mutual defence, and even compelled Lodi, d by force of arms, to engage in the ſame league. The inhabitants of Milan rebuilt their walls, and taking the field, inveſted the caſtle of Trea, in which the emperor had depoſited all the treaſure he had amaſſed. The place, tho' ſtrong and well defended, fell into the hands of the beſiegers, who carried off the money, and the garriſon priſoners to Milan, and razed the fortifications to the ground.

This ſucceſs encouraged the Romans to take arms againſt the two archbiſhops, who were encamped near Tuſculum; but the event did not anſwer their expectation: for though they advanced in good order againſt the imperialiſts, with an amazing odds in point of number, they were defeated in a pitched battle by Rainald, archbiſhop of Cologne, who carried the ſtandard in his own hand, and ſung a German hymn, in which he was joined by the whole e army.

This victory was ſucceeded by a conſiderable advantage, which Frederic gained over William II. king of Sicily, who had inveſted a caſtle belonging to his imperial majeſty. Barbaroſſa, who was ſtill before Ancona, put himſelf at the head of his cavalry, and beat up William's quarters; ſo that he was compelled to raiſe the ſiege, and return to Sicily with great precipitation.

ANCONA was no ſooner reduced, than the emperor marched towards Rome, into which he was obliged to effect his entrance by force. Alexander, after having made ſeveral fruitleſs efforts to oppoſe him, ſtole away to Beneventum, in the habit of a pilgrim; and Frederic, with his empreſs, was crowned by Paſchal the anti-pope, who had waited for the em-f peror's arrival at Viterbo [y].

Hitherto every thing ſmiled upon Frederic; but the plague being introduced among his troops, made ſuch havock, that he was obliged to make a haſty retreat into Tuſcany, and from thence into his German dominions [z], where his preſence was alſo required, on account of a commotion in Saxony; but it was not without the utmoſt danger and difficulty that he effected his retreat. At Pavia, he put all the rebellious towns of Lombardy to the ban of the empire, and, tho' his army was very much reduced by the diſtemper, he, with the aſſiſtance of his Italian friends, made incurſions into the country poſſeſſed by his enemies, and ravaged the territory of Milan.

These petty expeditions, which conſumed the remains of his troops, ſerved no other purpoſe than that of exaſperating the confederates, and their patron pope Alexander, who was by this time rendered more formidable by ſuccours, which he received from Manuel, emperor of the Greeks. In a word, the towns of Lombardy, thus supported, pulled off the mask, and not only appeared in open rebellion, but also insisted upon seizing the person of Barbarossa, whose army was by this time quite exhausted with malady and fatigue. a

In this extremity, he began a negotiation with the friends of pope Alexander, and must have submitted to that pontiff, because all the passes were secured by his enemies, had not the count de Morienne granted him a passage, at the earnest sollicitations of his relation William, marquis de Montferrat. Nevertheless, the Milanese pursued him to the mountains, and pressed him so closely, that he caused some of their hostages, who were in his power, to be hanged; and these executions put a stop to their progress. He afterwards narrowly escaped from Suza, where a conspiracy was formed against his life, and at last arrived in Alsace with the wreck of his army. b

His back was no sooner turned, than the Italian cities again withdrew themselves from their allegiance, and entered into an association for the defence of their liberty; and the inhabitants of Milan, taking the advantage of Frederic's being employed in the empire, began to rebuild their town, which was in a little time brought to perfection.

The confederates likewise built a new town between Asti and Tortona, in order to block up the emperor's road, should he again attempt to pass the Alps, and to overawe the marquis of Montferrat, and the inhabitants of Pavia, who still continued staunch to his interest. This they called Alexandria, in honour of the pope, to whom the property of it was presented at Beneventum, and it became tributary to the holy see.

FREDERIC having appeased the troubles of Saxony, where the nobles had taken arms against their duke, convened a diet at Wirtsburg, in order to reform some abuses which had crept into the church, and dispose the princes and noblemen in favour of his eldest son Henry, who was elected king of the Romans, and in the sequel acquired the crown of Naples and Sicily, by his marriage with Constance, daughter of Roger and Beatrix de Rethel, a relation of Philip Augustus, king of France. c

Calistus III. succeeds Paschal. A. D. 1169.

PASCHAL dying in the midst of these transactions, Calistus III. was elected by the cardinals of his party; but the emperor, understanding that all Italy was tired with the length of this schism, which was disagreeable to his friends as well as his enemies, began to be afraid of a general revolt, and to prepare for another expedition. The confederacy of the Lombard towns grew every day stronger and stronger; the Greek emperor had sent a second embassy, with magnificent presents, to the pope, promising to unite the Greek and Roman churches under his auspices, provided he would gratify Manuel with the imperial crown; and Frederic, dreading his compliance, resolved to send deputies, with proposals of peace to his holiness. Accordingly the bishop of Bamberg, being intrusted with this commission, set out for Italy, and was received by Alexander in a full consistory; but as the emperor neither acknowleged the pope, nor submitted to the holy see, his proposals were rejected. d

Mean while Frederic, the emperor's young son, was elected king of Germany, with the unanimous consent of the diet assembled at Bamberg, and conveyed to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he was crowned by Philip, archbishop of Cologne: and about the same time Henry, duke of Saxony, departed, at the head of a crusade, for Palestine, to assist the Christians of the east, who were cooped up between two formidable enemies; namely, Noradin, of Aleppo, and Saladin, soltan of Egypt. He embarked upon the Danube at Vienna, crossed the province of Servia, was hospitably received at Constantinople, from whence he sailed to Ptolemais, where he understood that the death of Noradin had restored peace to the Christians of the east. The design of his crusade being thus answered, he visited Jerusalem, was regaled by the soltan of Egypt, who loaded him with presents, then returned by the way of Constantinople, where he received ample proofs of Manuel's friendship and generosity, and at length safely arrived in his own dominions. e

As for the emperor, he assembled a diet at Worms, in which he complained of the pope's conduct, and the rebellious towns of Lombardy; and it was resolved, that he should be furnished with the necessary supplies for another expedition into Italy. In the mean time Christian, archbishop of Mentz, as chancellor of the empire, was sent thither with a body of troops to protect Como, Pavia, Crema, and other places, which still held for the emperor, as well as to overawe and confirm those which wavered in their allegiance. f

This prelate held a council at Vienna, in order to decide the differences between the republics of Genoa and Pisa, touching the property of the island of Sardinia; and the Pisans refusing to stand to his award, were put to the ban of the empire. The Florentines, who were their allies, underwent the same fate; and a sharp war broke out between the republics of Pisa and Florence on one side, and those of Genoa and Lucca on the other.

CHRISTIAN, hearing that Manuel, emperor of Constantinople, maintained a correspondence with the inhabitants of Ancona, marched thither, and invested the place; while the Venetians, who wanted to break with the Greek emperor, blocked up the town by sea with a powerful fleet; but, notwithstanding all their vigilance, the Greek deputies found g a means to introduce a reinforcement, and the beſiegers were fain to relinquiſh their enterprize.

BAFFLED in this attempt, Chriſtian marched into the duchy of Spoleto, and took the town of Ferri, which belonged to the Roman church; but while he was thus employed, the confederate towns convoked an aſſembly at Modena, in order to concert meaſures for ſupporting the war; thither the pope ſent legates, to encourage them in their deſign of ſhaking off the imperial yoke; the chiefs bound themſelves by oath to maintain the league to the laſt extremity; they wrote circular letters to all the towns of Lombardy, exhorting them to join for the defence of the Italian liberty; and their remonſtrances had ſuch effect, that ſeveral neutral towns declared for the confederacy, and others abandoned the intereſt b of the emperor.

FREDERIC, alarmed at the news of this defection, would have paſſed the Alps immediately, had not he been detained by the troubles of Bohemia, excited by the weakneſs of king Ladiſlaus, and the tyranny of his favourite Vegeſlaus, who had rendered himſelf odious to the whole nation. The emperor, in conſequence of the complaints he received from the Bohemian noblemen, ſummoned their king to appear at the diet of Nuremberg, to give an account of his conduct; and he refuſing to obey this order, marched at the head of an army to Prague, where he diveſted Ladiſlaus of the adminiſtration, and beſtowed the regency upon his kinſman Sobieſlaus, who had formerly been miniſter, and diſgraced by the intrigues of the queen. This affair being ſettled, and peace eſtabliſhed through the whole
c empire, he appointed the rendezvous of his army at Ratisbon, where a diet was aſſembled at the ſame time: there he explained the motives of his expedition into Italy, and, having received the neceſſary ſupplies, began his march by the way of Mount Cenis. He took and deſtroyed Suza; the towns of Aſti, Tortona, Cremona, and Como, ſubmitted without reſiſtance; then he inveſted Alexandria, which was defended with great vigour by the inhabitants, who, at length, in a general ſally, put the imperialiſts to flight, ſo that Frederic was obliged to paſs the Po, and take refuge in the Paveſan. Here his preſence was the more neceſſary, as the city of Pavia was by this time cloſely beſieged by the confederate army, and even almoſt reduced to extremity. Notwithſtanding the ſuccours he found means to throw in, the calamities of the inhabitants daily increaſed, and, to put the finiſhing ſtroke
d to his diſgrace, Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, retired with his troops, in ſpite of all the remonſtrances of Frederic, who had recourſe to the moſt abject ſubmiſſions, in attempting to alter his purpoſe. His pretence was the terror of excommunication; but, in effect, he had been cajoled by the pope, who flattered him with the hope of aſcending the imperial throne.

THE departure of this duke compelled the emperor to treat with the confederates, and a congreſs was opened by the mediation of the conſuls of Cremona: to this aſſembly, which was held between the two camps, the pope ſent three deputies; but, both ſides being extremely irritated and inflexible, the meeting, after much altercation, broke up, and all hope of a pacification vaniſhed. The ſiege of Pavia was raiſed; the emperor detached e parties, from time to time, to ravage the territory of Alexandria, and the Lombard troops marched thither to ſupport that place, in caſe it ſhould be reinveſted.

MEAN while Chriſtian, archbiſhop of Mentz, carried on his operations with great ſucceſs. He took and ruined a grat number of caſtles in the marche of Ancona, and reduced the city and whole duchy of Spoleto; then he repaired, by the emperor's order, to the court of William king of Sicily, to eſtabliſh a peace, and offer Frederic's daughter in marriage to that prince, who declined the match, leſt he ſhould give offence to his holineſs.

DURING theſe tranſactions, the emperor received a reinforcement of troops from Germany, under the command of Philip count de Heimberg, archbiſhop of Cologne; and advancing againſt the confederates, who were poſted at Signano, an obſtinate battle enſued, in f which Frederic was totally defeated, and narrowly eſcaped with his life: his camp and baggage were taken, a great number of his ſoldiers killed, taken, and drowned in the Po, and the wreck of his army fled for protection to the walls of Pavia.

THIS defeat, which muſt have been very mortifying to a prince like him, accuſtomed to victory, was ſtill aggravated by the alienation of his own ſubjects, many of whom about this time abandoned his intereſt, and by the loſs of a battle fought at ſea againſt the Venetians, in which his eldeſt ſon prince Henry, who commanded his fleet, was taken priſoner (C). Tho' he was, in conſequence of theſe misfortunes, very well diſpoſed to an accommodation

Another revolt in Italy, where the emperor is defeated by land and ſea. A. D. 1175.

(C) The pope, in honour of this victory, ſailed out into the open ſea, accompanied by the whole ſenate; and, after having pronounced a thouſand benedictions on that element, threw into it a ring, as a mark of his gratitude and affection. This is the origin of that ceremony, which is annually performed by the Venetians, under the notion of eſpouſing the Adriatic ſea (14).

with the pope, his pride would not yet allow him to make the first proposal. He therefore a rallied his troops, and exerted himself with such vigour in repairing his loss, that he was next year in a condition to hazard another battle, in which his enemies were defeated.

A. D. 1176. He concludes a peace with pope Alexander.

Being an excellent politician, as well as a great general, he seized this favourable opportunity of signifying his desire of peace to pope Alexander, who received his ambassadors with great joy, and an accommodation was concluded; in consequence of which there was an interview between them at Venice [b] (D).

THE emperor's arrival at that city being notified, he was waited upon by the doge, the patriarch, the bishop, the clergy, and the senate, who conducted him in their barge to St. Mark's, where the pope and cardinals waited his coming. Frederic, when he approached his holiness, who was seated, bowed down with profound reverence, and kissed his feet; a b condescension which brought tears into the eyes of the pope, who clasped him in his arms, and gave him the kiss of peace; then, the emperor taking him by the hand, they entered the church together, where, mass being celebrated by the pope himself, Frederic re-conducted him to the door, still walking on his left hand, and held the stirrup while he mounted his mule [c]. Some time after these first civilities, the pope, the emperor, and all the princes,

A. D. 1177. assembled in the palace of the patriarch, where Alexander harangued in Latin upon the peace which had been concluded; then Frederic made a speech on the same subject in the German tongue, which was interpreted by the archbishop of Mentz; not that the emperor was ignorant of the Latin, but because he was resolved to maintain the dignity of the German empire. The deputies of both solemnly swore to the observation of the treaty, which included c the king of Sicily; and the ratifications were exchanged with all imaginable expressions of joy, which lasted during the whole time of their stay at Venice, from the beginning of August till the thirteenth of September, on which the emperor set out for Ravenna [d] (E).

An accommodation with the revolted cities.

THIS reconciliation was attended with the submission of all the rebellious towns in Italy, which had entered into an association for their mutual defence. By an agreement at Constance, the emperor granted a general pardon, and left them at liberty to use their own laws and forms of government; while they took the oath of allegiance to him, as their lord and sovereign.

Calistus humbles himself, and is pardoned by Alexander.

CALISTUS the antipope, finding himself forsaken, in consequence of the peace between the pope and the emperor, made his submission to Alexander, who received him with great d humanity; but in order to prevent, for the future, those schisms which so often attended the election of popes, he called a general council, in which it was decreed, that no pope should be deemed duly elected, without having two-thirds of the votes in his favour.

Henry the Lion raises disturbrnces in the empire;

WHILE these things were in agitation in Italy, Henry duke of Saxony raised fresh troubles in the empire. He was a proud, haughty, and turbulent prince, who not only oppressed his own subjects, but also committed outrages against all his neighbours. He was at open war with Ulric, bishop of Halberstadt, whom he had expelled from his see, and with Philip, archbishop of Cologne, who headed a faction against him in Westphalia, in consequence of his finding his dominions ravaged by the duke at his return from Italy. Frederic, on his arrival

(D) As the particulars of this accommodation are very differently related by different historians, it will not be amiss to gratify the reader with a detail of them from Romuald, bishop of Salerno, who was eye-witness of every incident. "Frederic," says he, "having gained "a second victory over the Lombards, was very much "importuned by the princes of the empire to make "peace with pope Alexander, for the repose of the "church as well as of his own dominions. Thus sol-"licited, he sent an embassy consisting of the archbi-"shops of Mentz and Magdeburg, the bishop of Worms, "and the Sieur Pasy, his own secretary, with full "power to conclude an accommodation. They found "the pope at Anagni, who received their proposals with "great joy, as he himself had been for a long time de-"sirous of peace; and the articles were soon agreed up-"on. Nevertheless the emperor, disapproving of some "particulars concerning the Lombards, the pope agreed "to hold another congress at Ferrara, in order to re-"move all objection; but in the mean time Frederic, "being persuaded by some evil-minded persons, that "his ambassadors had betrayed him in the treaty, he "was greatly incensed, disowned them and all they had "done, and declared for Calistus: his plenipotentiaries, "finding themselves in this predicament, endeavoured "to justify their conduct by a fair representation of all "their transactions; but the emperor, obstinately re-"fusing to ratify the peace, they plainly told him, "that as Alexander's behaviour on this occasion had "been honest and sincere, and what he proposed fair "and equitable, they had concluded a peace with him, "in consequence of the commission with which they "were invested; and that if his imperial majesty "should persist in refusing to ratify it, they should "be obliged, for the sake of their consciences, to ac-"knowlege Alexander for the true head of the church, "and to look upon Calistus as an impostor. This de-"claration had such an effect upon Frederic, that he "resolved to ratify the peace, and for that purpose im-"mediately dispatched them to Venice, whither he in "a little time followed them in person (15).

(E) Some historians allege, that the pope, at this meeting, set his foot on the emperor's neck, and treated him with insolence and contempt (16); but it is not at all probable, that a prince of Frederic's spirit would have suffered such an insult to pass unpunished; especially as it does not appear, that he was reduced to the necessity of making such abject submissions.

a in Germany, was not ſorry to hear of theſe violences, becauſe he longed for an opportunity of being revenged upon Henry, for his having abandoned him ſo cruelly in his Italian expedition. He forthwith convoked a diet at Worms, where the duke, who did not think proper to appear in perſon, was accuſed of having violated the rights of the biſhops and noblemen; of having oppreſſed and robbed his vaſſals; of having expelled lawful biſhops, and ſupplied their places with his own creatures; of having ſeized the hereditary fiefs belonging to the count de Wincebourg, and his relation Otho d'Aſloï; and of having furniſhed the count de Lipſtadt with troops to ravage Weſtphalia. Tho' the duke was not preſent to anſwer to theſe articles of impeachment, and might have been legally condemned in his abſence, the emperor deferred the trial till the next diet to be held at Magdeburg, where he
b was charged by Thierri, marquis of Alſace, with having ſent the Sclaves to pillage his dominions, and defied to ſingle combat by that nobleman; but he would not deign to give his perſonal appearance, and rejected the challenge becauſe it was ſent by an inferior. Nevertheleſs he deſired to have an interview with the emperor, and excuſed himſelf ſo effectually to Frederic, that he promiſed the duke ſhould be acquitted, on condition he would pay 5000 marks of ſilver to the imperial treaſury. This propoſal he declined, and was ſummoned for the third time to the diet of Goſlar, where he was put to the ban of the empire, and is put to the ban;
Philip, archbiſhop of Cologne, ordered to put the ſentence in execution. That prelate, being joined with the troops of Godfrey duke of Brabant, Philip count of Flanders, Otho count of Guelderland, and many other noblemen, entered Weſtphalia, and laid waſte the country
c with fire and ſword; while the biſhop of Halberſtadt laid the churches under interdiction, and launched an anathema againſt the duke.

MEAN while Henry was not idle: he aſſembled his forces and fell upon Thuringia, of which he made himſelf maſter, after having defeated the landgrave of Heſſe, duke Bernard, Herman count palatine, and Widekinde count de Waldeck: his troops afterwards obtained a victory over thoſe of the archbiſhop at Haresfeld, by the valour of his general Bernard count de Lipſtadt, who retook all the towns in Weſtphalia, which the duke and his adherents had loſt; and made the biſhop of Halberſtadt priſoner, after having burned the town to aſhes.

THE emperor, alarmed at theſe ſucceſſes, convened a diet at Wirtzbourg, where he was ſollicited in behalf of the duke of Saxony, by the ambaſſadors of the pope and the king of d England, who was father-in-law to Henry the Lion. In conſequence of their intreaties, he delayed proceeding againſt him, and ſummoned a general aſſembly of the empire at Gelnhauſen, in Weteravia, where Henry, ſtill refuſing to appear, was formally condemned, and diveſted of his dominions;
ſtripped of all his dominions, which were beſtowed on different noblemen. Frederic, in conjunction with thoſe among whom the fiefs of Henry were diſtributed, aſſembled an army to execute the ſentence of the diet; and, marching into Saxony, reduced that whole province; while the duke, abandoned by his friends, was obliged to take refuge in Holſtein. Bernard de Anhalt being eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of this dukedom, the emperor entered Bavaria, where he met with no oppoſition, and at Ratisbon ſolemnly confirmed the inveſti-
e ture of that duchy, which Otho de Wittelſpach had already received at Gelnhauſen. While Frederic was thus employed in Bavaria, Philip, archbiſhop of Cologne, beſieged and made himſelf maſter of Brunſwick. The town of Lunenburg was inveſted, and the emperor, having detached Waldemar, king of Denmark, from the intereſts of Henry the Lion, by propoſing a double match between his two ſons and two daughters of his Daniſh majeſty, that prince equipped a fleet, with which he blocked up the mouth of the Trave, while Frederic beſieged the city of Lubec by land. This town being taken, and a treaty of alliance concluded with Waldemar, the emperor conquered all the Lower Saxony, together with Holſtein, from whence Henry had been compelled to retire, and then marched to the neighbourhood of Lunenburg, where he was viſited by the unfortunate duke, who threw himſelf at his feet, and begged, with great humility, that ſome of his dominions might be reſtored. Frederic, f touched with his condition, referred him to the diet of Quedlemburg, where a very dangerous diſpute ariſing between him and duke Bernard, the emperor was fain to diſſolve the aſſembly, and delay the examination of his caſe, till the meeting of another diet at Erfurt. There and compelled to take refuge with his father-in-law Henry II. king of England.
duke Henry endeavoured to acquit himſelf of the crimes which had been laid to his charge; but as it was impracticable to withdraw his fiefs, which were already diſpoſed of to different noblemen, Frederic adviſed him to reſide in England, until he ſhould be able to perſuade the princes to relinquiſh his dominions which they had ſhared; and in the mean time he promiſed, that no attempts ſhould be made upon the territories of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, which he would protect in behalf of his children. Henry, in compliance with this advice, retired to England, where he was hoſpitably entertained by his father-in-law Henry II. and there his wife bore him a fourth ſon called William, from whom the preſent houſe of Brunſwick is deſcended [e].

POPE

Pope Alexander dies, and is ſucceeded by Lucius III. A. D. 1181.

POPE Alexander III. dying at this period, the cardinals, without the participation of the reſt of the clergy, elected Ubaldo, biſhop of Oſtia, a native of Lucca, who aſſumed the name of Lucius III. and was ſoon after his elevation expelled by the Romans, becauſe he would not ſwear to the obſervation of ſome cuſtoms, to which his predeceſſors had always adhered. They were ſo much exaſperated at his refuſal, that they pillaged his lands, and chaced him from place to place; ſo that he was obliged to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of Chriſtian, archbiſhop of Mentz, whom the emperor had left to maintain the peace of Italy. a

THAT prelate accordingly came to his ſuccour with a body of German troops, which in a little time would have reduced the Romans, had not his ſucceſs been anticipated by death, which overtook him at Tuſculum. Thus deprived of his protector, the pope ſent nuncios to the emperor, and other ſovereigns, from whom he received conſiderable ſums of money, with which he purchaſed peace, and re-entered Rome. But he was obliged to quit that city a ſecond time. The inhabitants took arms again, they burned and plundered all his lands, and their rebellion raged to ſuch a pitch of fury, that they put out the eyes of a number of the clergy, and ſent them with mitres on their heads, in deriſion, to Lucius, who denounced an anathema againſt the authors of ſuch barbarity, and retired to Verona [f]. b

Diet at Mentz.

MEAN while the emperor had convoked a diet at Mentz, in order to concert meaſures for prolonging the truce of Italy: and to this aſſembly the king of England ſent ambaſſadors, to demand the re-eſtabliſhment of Henry the Lion in ſome part of his hereditary dominions: but this affair, being duly conſidered, was found intangled with ſuch difficulties, that Henry was exhorted to exert his patience for ſome time, until the reſtitution of his territories could be gradually effected by means of argument and perſuaſion. c

OTHO DE WITTELSPACH, who had taken poſſeſſion of Bavaria and its dependencies, began his adminiſtration with ſuch prudence, and took ſuch meaſures for the advantage of his people, that commerce in a little time flouriſhed through the whole province; the ſubjects became wealthy, and his court was diſtinguiſhed for magnificence; ſo that the emperor, growing jealous of his power, declared Ratisbon a free town, independent of his dominion, erected Stiria into a duchy, holding of the empire only, and diſmembred his territories of the duchy of Meranca and principality of Tyrol [g].

A. D. 1183. Treaty of Placentia.

AFTER theſe tranſactions he convoked a diet at Conſtance, where the deliberations turned upon the affairs of Lombardy; and as Henry king of the Romans aſſured his father, that the Italian cities would accept of peace upon reaſonable conditions, the emperor ſent three miniſters to treat with the deputies of the Lombard towns at Placentia; where a congreſs being opened, the treaty was in a very little time concluded and ratified, to the ſatisfaction of all parties. Among other articles it was agreed, that the emperor might exact the oath of allegiance from his Italian vaſſals; who ſhould be obliged to march to his aſſiſtance, in caſe of his being attacked in his journey to Rome, which is called the Roman expedition: that the ſaid vaſſals, and the towns, ſhould be exempted from all other impoſition, but that of ſupplying him with proviſion and forage in his march: that they ſhould enjoy the privilege of raiſing troops and fortifications for their own defence, and decide all cauſes, without appeal, in their own courts of juſtice, unleſs the ſum in litigation ſhould exceed fifty marks of ſilver: and laſtly, that in thoſe towns, where the biſhop had the title of count, he ſhould preſerve the right of creating conſuls; but where the biſhop was not in poſſeſſion of that title, the right ſhould be reſerved to the emperor [h]. d e

As the inhabitants of Alexandria della Paglia were not comprehended in this pacification, which the Italians for a long time conſidered as the baſis of their public liberty, they were obliged to ſend deputies to deprecate his imperial majeſty's wrath at Nuremberg, where they were pardoned, and taken into protection, on condition of changing the name of their city into Cæſarea, and holding their privileges of his good will and pleaſure.

A. D. 1184.

SOON after this tranſaction, Frederic aſſembled a diet at Mentz, and, in preſence of a great number of princes and noblemen, again ſolemnly declared his ſon Henry king of the Romans, and afterwards knighted him and his brother prince Frederic, according to the rules and ceremonies of chivalry. The affairs of Germany being regulated at this meeting, the emperor repaired to Italy, in order to accommodate ſome differences with the pope, touching the ſee of Triers, which was diſputed by two competitors, and the ſucceſſion of the counteſs Mathilda, which was an eternal bone of contention between the empire and the church; and he was moreover actuated with the deſire of ſeeing his ſon Henry receive the imperial crown. f

Frederic repairs to Verona.

INDUCED by theſe motives, he viſited his holineſs at Verona, where a council was convoked to rectify the errors and abuſes which had crept into the church. Being here ſollicited in favour of Henry the Lion, by Lucius, and another embaſſy from England, he conſented to the return of that nobleman to Germany, and promiſed to put him in poſſeſſion of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, which had been preſerved for his uſe: but as the pope would g a neither terminate the ſchiſm at Triers, according to his inclination, nor compromiſe the affair of Mathilda's dominions, nor even compliment his ſon Henry with the imperial crown, he took his departure for Milan, where that young prince was proclaimed king of Lombardy with the uſual ſolemnities; and, in a little time after his coronation, ſet out for Germany, to appeaſe ſome troubles excited by the tyranny and avarice of Philip, archbiſhop of Cologne, whom he accordingly reduced to order.

MEAN while Frederic returned to the council of Verona, at which appeared Heraclius, patriarch of Jeruſalem, imploring ſuccour for his king Baldwin, who was by this time old and infirm, and in danger of loſing all his dominions by inteſtine diviſions, and the victorious arms of Saladin, ſoltan of Egypt. His remonſtrances, however, had little effect upon the b princes of the weſt, who were too much embroiled with their own affairs to undertake an expedition into Paleſtine; and the emperor in particular, inſtead of engaging in a cruſade, in conſequence of the exhortations of the pope, who took umbrage at his ſtaying ſo long in Italy, reſolved to aſſert the rights of the empire to the long diſputed ſucceſſion called the Patrimony of St. Peter. With this view he ſent Henry, king of Sardinia, with an army into Tuſcany; and that prince having ſeized Aquapendente, Chieſſi, Bolſena, Bagnarca, and ſome other towns, inveſted Orvieto, the ſiege of which laſted two whole years. Mean while Frederic in perſon made a circuit round the towns of Lombardy, and took an exact account of their privileges, which in general he confirmed. Then he marched into Romania, be-
c ſieged and took Faenza, where he met with oppoſition, and compelled the greateſt part of Tuſcany to ſubmit to the empire; ſo that the ſucceſſion of the counteſs Mathilda was almoſt wholly reduced under his dominion, when pope Lucius died at Verona, and was ſucceeded by Lambert Crivelli, archbiſhop of Milan, who aſſumed the name of Urban III. and kept his archbiſhopric even after his elevation to the papal chair [i].

A. D. 1185.

MEAN while a match was concluded between the emperor's ſon Henry, and Conſtance, ſiſter and heireſs of William king of Sicily; and the nuptials were actually celebrated with extraordinary magnificence in that very city of Milan, which Frederic had but a few years before utterly deſtroyed [k].

The emperor's ſon Henry married to Conſtance ſiſter of William king of Sicily.

A. D. 1186.

THIS match was by no means agreeable to pope Urban III. who foreſaw that it would certainly one day furniſh the king of the Romans with pretenſions upon Sicily; and his reſent-
d ment hurried him ſo far, that he even ſuſpended from their functions the biſhops who had aſſiſted at the celebration of the nuptials; which were no ſooner conſummated, than Frederic, underſtanding that the inhabitants of Cremona had raiſed an army to hinder Crema from being rebuilt, aſſembled a body of forces, marched to Cremona, and having diſmantled the town, carried off a great number of priſoners; ſo that they were obliged to implore his clemency, and they were forgiven at the interceſſion of their biſhop. As for Milan, the emperor's reſidence in that city was of great advantage to the inhabitants; he extended its juriſdiction over all the caſtles ſituated between the Adda and the Oglis, and ordered that all law-ſuits, which might happen in its territory, ſhould be judged, without appeal, by the conſuls of Milan [l] (G).

e FREDERIC, having thus eſtabliſhed his authority in Lombardy, left the government of that kingdom to his ſon Henry, and returned to his dominions in Germany; where he ſeized all the revenues of the biſhopric of Mentz, becauſe Bertrand the biſhop favoured Folmar, pretender to the archbiſhopric of Triers, againſt Rodulphus, who was countenanced by the emperor.

THIS tranſaction was followed by a difference with Canute, king of Denmark, who refuſed to do homage for Wandalia, which had been conquered by his father Waldemar. Frederic, incenſed at this refuſal, inſtigated Bugeſlaus, on whom he had beſtowed the inveſtiture of Pomerania, to make war upon his Daniſh majeſty; but Bugeſlaus, knowing himſelf unable to cope with ſuch an antagoniſt, contented himſelf with committing hoſtilities againſt Jarimar, f ſovereign of the iſle of Rugen, and uncle to Canute; who having recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the Danes, he was ſupplied with a fleet of ſhips, and obtained a complete naval victory over the Pomeranians. Abſalom, archbiſhop of Lunden, and miniſter of Canute, who commanded the victorious fleet, ſailed to the mouth of the river Pena, made an attempt upon Demmin, and ravaged the country. Next year his Daniſh majeſty embarked in perſon, entered the

(G) In the courſe of this year (1186) Bertrand, biſhop of Metz, introduced into Germany the cuſtom of keeping archives, in which were regiſtered the acts and deeds upon which private fortunes depend. Before this period, all cauſes, relating to property, were judged by living witneſſes, and the deciſion of the moſt part was left to the iſſue of ſingle combat. Theſe combats were fought in the biſhop's court yard, or before the town-houſe, in the preſence of the biſhop's officers, who adjudged the victory, and puniſhed the vanquiſhed either with mulct or mutilation (17).

river Zwina, then plundered part of Pomerania and Wandalia, and at laſt, ſurpriſing Bugeſlaus in his own dominions, compelled that prince to ſue for peace, which he could obtain on no other condition than that of doing homage to Canute, and holding Pomerania as a fief of Denmark[m]. a

THE emperor, whoſe ſituation would not allow him to reinfore Bugeſlaus with troops, was not a little mortified at the iſſue of this war, by which the ſovereignty of Pomerania was loſt to the empire; and he reſolved to retrieve, by ſtratagem, that which he could not regain by force of arms. With this view he ſent an embaſſy to Denmark, inviting Canute to be preſent at the nuptials of his ſiſter Chriſtina, who was betrothed to the emperor's ſon Frederic, and had reſided ſome years in Germany for her education. Had Canute viſited the imperial court upon this occaſion, Frederic would have compelled him to relinquiſh the ſovereignty of Pomerania, and do homage not only for Wandalia, but alſo for the kingdom of Denmark. But the Dane, remembering the emperor's behaviour to his father Waldemar, refuſed to quit his own kingdom, or even to pay the remainder of his ſiſter's dowry, until the ceremony ſhould be performed: a refuſal which exaſperated Frederic to ſuch a degree, that he ſent back the princeſs with the moſt mortifying marks of ſcorn and contempt[n]; and Canute, in revenge for this inſult, made incurſions into the northern parts of Germany.

whom the emperor endeavours in vain to entrap. A. D. 1187. b

Frederic depoſes Sobieſlaus duke of Bohemia, and gives the inveſtiture of that dukedom to Frederic; c

EMERIC, having quarrelled with his brother Bela, king of Hungary, fled for refuge to count Sobieſlaus, duke of Bohemia, who, inſtead of granting him protection, or referring the affair to the cognizance of the emperor, ſent him back to his brother under a ſtrong eſcorte: a ſtep which gave ſuch umbrage to Frederic, who hated Bela, that he ſummoned Sobieſlaus to the diet, to give an account of his conduct in this affair. The duke, declining to appear before this tribunal, was condemned as contumacious, and deprived of his dominions, the inveſtiture of which was given to Frederic, ſon of Uladiſlaus, whom he had ſucceeded in the dukedom.

THE new duke, being furniſhed with ſome troops by the archbiſhop of Saltzburg, marched into Bohemia before Sobieſlaus could put himſelf into a poſture of defence; and while that prince retired into Luſatia, he made his entrance into Prague, and was received with loud acclamations by the people, who were diſguſted at the adminiſtration of his rival. In a little time after his acceſſion, he was ſummoned to attend the emperor at a diet in Ratisbon, and afterwards in a circuit round the towns of Suabia; and Sobieſlaus, taking the advantage of his abſence, aſſembled an army by dint of the friends he ſtill had in Bohemia, and marching to the foreſt of Hercinia, ſecured the paſſes, in order to prevent Frederic's return. Notwithſtanding this precaution, his rival entered the country by the way of Ratisbon, with a conſiderable body of German troops, and a battle enſuing, Sobieſlaus obtained the victory. Frederic, however, having rallied his forces, and being joined by Conrad, marquis de Znain, in Moravia, retrieved his honour, and, in a pitched battle, vanquiſhed Sobieſlaus in his turn. d

HAVING thus effectually quelled his rival, who never appeared in the ſequel, he poſſeſſed his dominions in quiet, until he gave umbrage to the Bohemians, by raiſing ſtrangers to the magiſtracy of Prague, and other unpopular meaſures, which created a ſpirit of diſcontent and diſaffection; in conſequence of which the nobility depoſed him, while he aſſiſted at the diet in Ratisbon, and made a proffer of the crown to his old friend Conrad, marquis de Znain, who was accordingly choſen ſovereign of Bohemia. e whom he ſupports againſt all oppoſition.

BUT this dignity he did not long enjoy; for the emperor, being appriſed of theſe proceedings, intereſted the princes in the affair, and the Bohemians were put to the ban of the empire. The execution of this ſentence, however, was ſuſpended; becauſe Conrad, foreſeeing the tempeſt that was brewing againſt him, relinquiſhed his acquiſition, and the Bohemians ſent deputies to deprecate the wrath of the emperor, who commanded them to take the oath of allegiance anew to Frederic, as their lawful ſovereign, and he was accordingly reinſtated in his dominions[o]. f

A difference between the emperor and the pope.

MEAN while every thing tended to a rupture between the emperor and the pope. The laſt, being diſguſted at the marriage of Henry, king of the Romans, with Conſtance of Sicily, as well as at Frederic's ſeizing the dominions of the counteſs Mathilda, endeavoured not only to detach the towns of Lombardy from the emperor's intereſt, but alſo to foment a differrence between him and the German prelates, who had ſome cauſe of diſſatisfaction in his taking the ſpoils of defunct biſhops, and exerciſing ſome other acts of ſeverity againſt the members of the church. The emperor, perceiving his drift, and dreading the conſequence of a quarrel with the clergy, aſſembled a diet at Gelnhauſen, where he found means to remove the diſcontents of the eccleſiaſtical princes, and engage them in his intereſt againſt the pope, to whom they wrote a very ſharp remonſtrance, containing a detail of the ill offices his holineſs had done the emperor and empire, in protecting the Cremoneſe, his declared g a enemies, in ſtirring up the other towns of Lombardy againſt his authority, in protracting the ſchiſm in the church of Triers, and in levying heavy exactions from the churches of Germany. They, therefore, intreated him to alter his conduct, redreſs theſe grievances, and be heartily reconciled to the emperor, whoſe deſigns he had hitherto ſought to traverſe and oppoſe.

URBAN, far from complying with this advice, was ſo incenſed at their having abandoned his cauſe, that he reſolved to excommunicate the emperor; but he died before the ſentence could be fulminated, and was ſucceeded by Albert, cardinal and chancellor of the Roman church, who took the name of Gregory VIII. and lived but two months after his elevation [p]. This pontiff left his quality of apoſtolical legate to Philip, archbiſhop of Cologne, b who exerted all his endeavours to detach the German churches from the emperor's party, and fortified the city of Cologne, to defend himſelf againſt the effects of his indignation: but his ambition was humbled by Frederic, who, in an aſſembly at Worms, repreſented the evil conſequences of his conduct in ſuch a light, that a decree was made, prohibiting the importation of proviſion and neceſſaries into Cologne; Folmar and his adherents, who had taken refuge with the archbiſhop, were put to the ban of the empire; and Philip given to underſtand, that troops would be ſent into his territory, in caſe he ſhould continue to protect the refugees.

THIS diſturbance was ſucceeded by a war with Humbert, count of Savoy, who had always eſpouſed the cauſe of the pope againſt the emperor, and for that reaſon intailed upon himſelf
c the reſentment of Barbaroſſa. The ſees of Turin and Geneva were detached from the county by Frederic, who erected them into fiefs of the empire; ſo that the biſhops would no longer hold of Humbert, until they were reduced by force of arms: and this compulſion, enforced againſt the imperial decree, excited the indignation of Frederic, who, in his laſt paſſage to Italy, took, pillaged, and burnt, the caſtle of Suſa, together with all the archives it contained. Henry, king of the Romans, being joined by the Milaneſe, who hated the houſe of Savoy, entered Piedmont, took the caſtle of Veillani, and reduced great part of the country; but the progreſs of the war was checked by the death of Humbert, whoſe ſon Thomas I. was left a minor, unter the tutorage of Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, who obtained of Henry, king of the Romans, the revocation of the imperial decree, by which the biſhopric of Turin
d was erected into a fief of the empire [q]. In conſequence of this revocation, the biſhop ceded the juriſdiction and rights of ſignory in that city to the count of Savoy, on condition that this laſt ſhould do homage to the emperor; which homage was afterwards renewed at Baſil to the emperor Philip, who beſtowed upon Thomas the inveſtiture of all the countries, lands, ſignories, which he had inherited from his anceſtors (H).

Frederic makes war againſt Humbert, count of Savoy

FREDERIC was employed in making regulations for the eſtabliſhment of peace and good order in Germany, when the news arrived of Jeruſalem's being taken by the ſoltan Saladin; a circumſtance which filled all Europe with grief and conſternation: ſo much was the ſpirit of the times influenced by that religious knight-errantry, which ſought to wreſt the Holy Land out of the hands of the infidels.

e CLEMENT III. who ſucceeded Gregory VIII. in the papal chair, no ſooner received theſe melancholy tidings, than he ordered a cruſade to be preached up through all the different countries of Chriſtendom. The emperor, aſſembling a diet at Mentz, in order to deliberate with the ſtates of the empire on this unhappy event, took the croſs; and his example was followed by his ſon Frederic, duke of Suabia, with ſixty-eight of the firſt noblemen in Germany, eccleſiaſtics as well as laymen. In conſequence of this engagement, the pope was reconciled with the emperor; the time was fixed for the departure of the cruſards; the rendezvous appointed at Ratisbon; and, in order to prevent the inconvenience of too great

(H) The quarrels between the biſhops and counts of Geneva and Savoy were not ſo eaſily terminated: on the contrary, they became every day more and more embroiled, as is generally the caſe with all thoſe diſputes which turn upon rights acquired by intrigue, inſinuation, or force of arms. The biſhops and counts enjoyed, by turns, the favour of the popes and emperors, who iſſued contradictory bulls and decrees occaſionally in behalf of their favourites (1).

The biſhops and counts of Geneva, like the other noblemen of Burgundy, took advantage of the wars between the emperors and the holy ſee, to render themſelves independent. The counts made the government hereditary in their families, and acted as ſovereign princes: the citizens, by way of balancing this power, intruſted the biſhops, by commiſſion, with the adminiſtration of juſtice, the police, and defence of their privileges; but they were ſoon obliged to oppoſe the enterprizes of theſe defenders. The biſhops, as they grew powerful, erected themſelves into temporal lords of the city, by virtue of commiſſions obtained of the emperors, and left nothing to the counts but the juriſdiction of the country that depended upon the town; ſo that they were reſtricted to the ſovereignty of the territory which is now called the Genevois; and hence are indifferently denominated counts of Geneva, or of the Genevois. It was at length agreed, that the biſhops ſhould poſſeſs the juriſdiction and ſignories of the town, with the power of coining money; that the count ſhould not build any fortreſs without the biſhop's conſent; that he ſhould do homage to the biſhop, and appoint a lieutenant at Geneva to judge civil cauſes (2).

a multitude, Frederic decreed, that no perſon ſhould enliſt himſelf, who could not afford a to expend three marks of ſilver. Notwithſtanding this prohibition, ſuch was the zeal of the Germans, that the adventurers aſſembled to the number of one hundred and fifty thouſand fighting men, well accoutred, and provided with neceſſaries for the expedition.

THE emperor, in order to raiſe money for this occaſion, alienated ſeveral fiefs belonging to his own family, and impoſed a general tax upon the lands, effects, and moveables of thoſe who did not take the croſs; but this exaction, known by the name of the Saladin Tythe, not anſwering his purpoſe, he obtained permiſſion of the pope to diſpenſe, for a certain ſum, with the attendance of thoſe who had enliſted themſelves in a hurry, and afterwards repented of the engagement. Mean while he diſpatched Henry, count de Dier, to ſummon Saladin to reſtore the Holy Land, and the wood of the true croſs, which he had b taken from the Chriſtians of the eaſt; or to declare war againſt him, ſhould he refuſe to comply with theſe demands. At the ſame time he ſent ambaſſadors to the ſoltan of Iconium, and the emperor of Conſtantinople, requiring a free paſſage through their dominions. Dreading the commotions that might be raiſed in his abſence by Henry the Lion, and his adherents, he revoked the proſcription of that nobleman, effected a reconciliation between him and his enemy duke Bernard, and ſolemnly promiſed that he ſhould be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of all his dominions, provided he would return to England, and reſide in that kingdom until the cruſade ſhould be finiſhed. Henry aſſented to the propoſal, and retired to the court of his father-in-law, after having bound himſelf, by oath, to deſiſt from all attempts to interrupt the peace of Germany during the emperor's abſence [r]. c

Settles the ſucceſſion of his hereditary dominions.

THEN he made a progreſs through the principal cities of Germany, accompanied by his ſon Henry, to whom he intended to leave the government of his dominions; and that he might neglect no ſtep tending to the preſervation and peace of the empire, he regulated his ſucceſſion in ſuch a manner, as that none of his children ſhould have cauſe to complain, or a pretext to diſturb the peace of his country.

Sets out for Paleſtine, and defeats the Turks.

HE in perſon marched at the head of thirty thouſand men, by the way of Vienna, to Preſburg, where he was joined by the reſt of his army. Thence he proceeded through Hungary, into the dominions of the Greek emperor, who, notwithſtanding his profeſſions of friendſhip, had been detached from the intereſts of Frederic by Saladin's promiſes and inſinuations, and took all opportunities of haraſſing the cruſards in their march. The emperor, incenſed at d his perfidious dealing, laid the country under contribution, took and plundred Philippopolis, defeated a body of Greek troops who attacked him on his march, and compelled Iſaacus Angelus, emperor of Conſtantinople, to ſue for peace. He wintered at Adrianople, croſſed the Helleſpont in the ſpring, refreſhed his troops for a few days at Laodicea, defeated the Turks in ſeveral battles, took and pillaged the city of Iconium, and croſſed mount Taurus; ſo that all Aſia Minor was filled with the terror of his name, and the Chriſtians of that country were elevated with the moſt flattering hope of relief and advantage from his aſſiſtance; but they were diſappointed in their expectation. to refreſh himſelf from the ſultry heat of ſummer, plunged into the river Cydnus, where, unable to cope with the current, he was unfortunately drowned; but his body was retrieved, e and buried in the city of Tyre [s].

HE was ſucceeded in command by his ſon Frederic, duke of Suabia, who, having performed the laſt offices to his father at Tyre, proceeded on his march, and joined the army of the eaſtern Chriſtians, at that time engaged in the ſiege of Ptolemais; but, before that city was taken, he died of an infectious diſtemper, which proved fatal to the greateſt part of his army, the wreck of which returned to Germany, with the landgrave of Thuringia, the duke of Guelderland, and the count of Holſtein, except a few that remained with Leopold, duke of Auſtria.

Deducing the History of Germany to the Election of Rodolphus, Founder of the Auſtrian Greatneſs.

HENRY VI.

a HENRY VI. ſurnamed the Severe, received almoſt at the ſame time the news of his father's death, and of that of his uncle in-law William king of Sicily. After his father's departure for Paleſtine, this young prince had found it very difficult to maintain his authority in the empire. Henry the Lion duke of Saxony, without paying the leaſt regard to the oath he had taken, returned to Germany, which was now unfurniſhed of her beſt troops, and entered into an aſſociation with ſome diſcontented noblemen, who engaged to aſſiſt him in recovering his dominions. The chief of theſe aſſociates was Hartwick archbiſhop of Bremen, who expected the aſſiſtance of Henry in his turn, to reduce the Dillimarſes, a people who had withdrawn themſelves from the dominion of the ſee of Bremen, and claimed the protection of Waldemar biſhop of Sleſwic. Accordingly Henry, as a mark of gratitude
b to Hartwick, entered Holſtein with a body of troops, furniſhed by the archbiſhop and other noblemen, took Bardowic by aſſault, plundered and burnt the town, and carried off the principal inhabitants into captivity. Lubec, Hamburgh, and other places, intimidated by this example, opened their gates to the conqueror, and the whole country was filled with conſternation. The king of the Romans taking the field, in order to ſtop the progreſs of the Lion, made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Brunſwic, then marching into the territory of Bremen, with a view to chaſtiſe Hartwick, the author of the war, he ravaged the country, and attacked the army of the Lion, who was defeated near Ferden[t]. In conſequence of this battle, the archbiſhop fled to England, and Henry, humbled by his bad ſucceſs, had rec courſe to the interceſſion of the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologne with the king of the Romans, who, in an aſſembly at Fulde, granted him peace, on condition that Brunſwic ſhould be diſmantled, the city of Lawenberg razed to the ground, and Lubec equally divided between Henry and Adolphus count of Holſtein; that the Lion ſhould give his ſon Lotharius as an hoſtage, and that Henry his heir, attended by fifty knights, ſhould accompany the king of the Romans in his march to Italy.

Henry VI. ſucceeds as emperor, and by right of his wife inherits the kingd.m of Sicily.

Henry the Lion again diſturbs the peace of the empire.

Is defeated by the king of the Romans; and obtains peace.

AFTER this reconciliation with Henry duke of Saxony, who pledged his own ſon as hoſtage of his faith, the emperor levied an army, and marched into Italy, with his wife Conſtance, in order to be crowned by the pope, and afterwards to go and recover the ſucceſſion of William, who had died without legitimate iſſue.

d BUT Tancred, count of Leccio, and natural brother of the empreſs, had been declared king of Sicily by the great chancellor, at the head of a party, who dreaded the proſpect of being under the dominion of the emperor. Henry, foreſeeing the difficulties that would attend his endeavours to recover the ſucceſſion, reſolved to conciliate the affection of the Lombard towns, which would be a bulwark againſt the power and intereſt of his rival. With this view he confirmed to the inhabitants of Cremona, Bergamo, and Bologna, the privilege of coining money, with certain reſtrictions. He ſettled in perpetuity to the churches of Reggio and Padua the fiefs of which they were poſſeſſed: then croſſing the Appennines, he engaged in a treaty with the Piſans againſt Tancred, and confirmed and augmented all the privileges of Genoa by an authentic deed, in conſideration of which, the Genoeſe promiſed
e to equip a fleet for his ſervice, to be uſed in the reduction of Sicily[u].

SOON after his arrival in Italy, pope Clement died, and was ſucceeded by Celeſtin III. in the eighty-ſixth year of his age, who being conſecrated at Eaſter, next day crowned the emperor and his wife. A very remarkable circumſtance happened in the ceremony; for the pope had no ſooner placed the crown upon Henry's head, than he kicked it off again, as a teſtimony of the power inherent in popes, to give and take away the imperial dignity according to the emergency of affairs[x].

The emperor and empreſs are crowned at Rome. A. D. 1191.

HENRY, after the coronation of himſelf and his empreſs, put the pope in poſſeſſion of the town of Tuſculum, according to a promiſe he had made before he received the imperial crown, and this place being delivered to the Romans, in conſequence of a treaty ſub-f ſiſting between them and Clement III. they razed it to the foundation, and expelled the inhabitants; but, ſometime after its deſtruction, the town of Freſcati was raiſed from its ruins. The emperor, having thus performed his promiſe, purſued his enterprize againſt the baſtard Tancred, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances and prohibition of the pope, who, tho' he conſidered Tancred as an uſurper, and wanted to ſee him deprived of the crown of Sicily, which he claimed as a fief of the holy ſee, was, nevertheleſs, much more averſe to the emperor's poſſeſſing that kingdom, becauſe ſuch an acceſſion would have rendered him too powerful in Italy for the intereſts of the church. Henry, however, without paying the leaſt regard to his threats and repreſentations, took almoſt all the towns of Campania, Apulia, and Calabria, inveſted the city of Naples, and ſent for the Genoeſe fleet to come and form the blockade by ſea; but before their arrival, he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, in conſequence of a dreadful mortality among his troops, which, among others, ſwept off Philip archbiſhop of Cologne, Otho duke of Bohemia, and the greateſt part of the nobility who ſerved in this expedition: as for Henry ſon of the Lion, he had, before this period, eſcaped by ſtealth in a ſhip from Oſtia. The emperor himſelf was ſeized with the diſtemper, of which he recovered with difficulty. In the mean time, the towns which had ſubmitted to his power, ſeeing his army greatly diminiſhed, and himſelf incapable of action, took this opportunity to ſhake off his dominion, and make their peace with Tancred, whoſe reſentment they dreaded. In particular the inhabitants of Salerno, where the empreſs reſided, delivered that princeſs to Tancred, who afterwards reſtored her to the emperor, in conſequence of the pope's interpoſition.

HENRY, being no longer in a condition to maintain the war againſt his rival, repaired
A. D. 1192. to Genoa, where he entered into new engagements with the inhabitants, concerning the equipment of another fleet for the conqueſt of Naples; then he viſited Placentia, Cremona, and Breſcia, on which he beſtowed particular marks of favour[y]. Having ſecured the fidelity of the Lombard towns, he paſſed the Alps, knighted Lewis IV. of Bavaria at Worms, declared his brother Conrad duke of Suabia, gave Tuſcany to his ſecond brother Philip, with the territories of Spoleto, and the Ecrainer, which he wreſted from the houſe of Guelph, and built an houſe at Coblentz for the knights of the Teutonic order[z] (K).

Now that his wealth and dominions were ſo conſiderably augmented, and his authority eſtabliſhed beyond the reach of all oppoſition and controul, he reſolved to render the empire hereditary in his houſe, and ſecure the crown to his ſon Frederic. With this view he aſſembled the princes at Gelnhauſen in Weteravia, where he explained his intention, which was fulfilled by an irrevocable law, importing, That, in order to avoid thoſe diſturbances which had always attended the election of emperors, the crown ſhould become hereditary, and devolve to heirs male or female.

He ſettles the affairs of the empire.

AT his return to Germany, he took all the neceſſary precautions for ſettling the peace of the empire, ſo as that it ſhould not be diſturbed in his abſence. He applied himſelf particularly to the adminiſtration of juſtice, and in perſon ſat to hear and determine the com-

(K) About this time was eſtabliſhed the Teutonic order of knighthood, the occaſion of which we ſhall explain for the reader's ſatisfaction. Frederic Barbaroſſa, in his expedition to the Holy Land, had been accompanied by a great number of German gentlemen volunteers, who wanted to ſignalize themſelves in the cauſe of their religion. Theſe, upon the death of Frederic, elected his ſecond ſon Frederic duke of Suabia, and Henry duke of Brabant, captain generals of their nation; and under theſe chiefs performed ſuch gallant exploits at the taking of Acra, Jeruſalem, and other cities, that Henry king of Jeruſalem, in conſideration of their great ſervices, erected them into an order of knighthood, under the title of St. George, becauſe all of them fought on horſeback: however, they afterwards aſſumed the name, and put themſelves under the protection, of the Holy Virgin, who was already patroneſs of an hoſpital erected upon Mount Zion, for the benefit of German pilgrims. Their ſtatutes were formed on the plan of thoſe belonging to the knights Templars, and the knights of St. John, ſo as to be adapted for an order that was deſigned to be partly military, partly charitable, that, after having employed one part of their lives in defence of the Holy Land, they might devote the remainder to the exerciſe of hoſpitality, in favour of the poor pilgrims of their nation. Thoſe ſtatutes, among other articles, ordained, That the knights ſhould be deſcended of noble families; that they ſhould be called brother knights of the Bleſſed Virgin; that they ſhould take an oath to defend the Chriſtian church in general, and the Holy Land in particular; that they ſhould protect the clergy, the widow, the orphan, and the poor, in diſtreſs; that they ſhould ſerve and aſſiſt all thoſe who were qualified for being admitted into their hoſpital, and, in general, conform themſelves to all the rules of the order. The emperor Henry not only granted his protection to this order, but alſo employed his good offices with the pope to confirm the inſtitution; accordingly Celeſtin peruſed and improved the ſtatutes. He ordained that their habit ſhould be white with a black croſs ſewed upon it; that they ſhould bear the ſame croſs upon a white banner, and wear it on their atchievements and armour; and live according to the rule of St. Auguſtine. He likewiſe confirmed to them the gift of that German hoſpital upon Mount Zion, from whence they derived their title and foundation, and granted to them the ſame privileges which were enjoyed by the knights of St. John. In conſequence of the bull which he publiſhed on this ſubject, the king of Jeruſalem, and Frederic duke of Suabia, being empowered by his imperial majeſty, created the firſt knights of this order to the number of forty, of whom Henry de Walpot was choſen grand maſter. The emperor beſtowed upon them the right of poſſeſſing in perpetuity all the lands and provinces they ſhould conquer from the Infidels; and Philip king of France was their great benefactor, and allowed them to bear a flower-de-luce at the four extremities of the croſs (2). Theſe knights, after having been expelled from the Holy Land, ſubdued Pruſſia, Pomelia, and a part of Pomerania, which they loſt again, after Albert of Brandenburg their grand maſter had changed his religion (3).

a plaints of his ſubjects, with ſuch patience and perſeverance, as attracted univerſal admiration. One of his favourites having taken the freedom to tell him that he fatigued himſelf too much with giving audience, which often interfered with his neceſſary meals, he replied, That a private man was at liberty to eat when he would; but that a prince ought never to ſit down till after he had diſcuſſed the affairs of the public [a] (L).

NOTWITHSTANDING this indefatigable care and apparent intregrity, he found it a difficult task to acquit himſelf of the ſuſpicion of being concerned in the murder of Albert biſhop of Liege. That prelate had been regularly elected by the canons, and confirmed by the pope, in oppoſition to Lotharius, who had received the inveſtiture of the biſhopric from the emperor: but he did not long ſurvive his conſecration; for he was murdered at Rheims, b by two German knights, who had inſinuated themſelves into his confidence, and who were ſaid to have been employed on this occaſion by his competitor, with the conſent and privacy of the emperor. The archbiſhop of Mentz, together with the noblemen of the Rhine and the Meuſe, exaſperated at this barbarous aſſaſſination, entered the territories of the count of Horſtade, brother of Lotharius, and deſtroyed the country with fire and ſword. The emperor, in order to appeaſe their indignation, and juſtify himſelf at the ſame time, called an aſſembly at Coblentz, where he declared himſelf innocent of the crime, ſoothed the malcontents with fair promiſes, took meaſures for puniſhing the aſſaſſins, who eſcaped into France, ratified the pope's deciſion againſt Lotharius, whom he diveſted of his biſhopric; and thus the ſee of Liege becoming vacant, was filled with Albert de Cuck, to the ſatisfaction of all c parties [b].

Henry ſuſpected of being concerned in the murder of Albert biſhop of Liege.

SCARCE was this affair terminated, when a war broke out between Adolphus duke of Holſtein and Henry the Lion, who ſeized and refuſed to reſtore Holſtein to the right owner, according to the treaty concluded at Fulde. He alledged that the agreement was the effect of compulſion, therefore not obligatory. Adolphus, having no reaſon to expect any ſuccours from the emperor at this conjuncture, when his whole endeavours were employed in raiſing an army for the conqueſt of Sicily; deſpairing, I ſay, of obtaining aſſiſtance from that quarter, he had recourſe to Bernard duke of Saxony, and Otho marquis of Brandenburgh, whoſe intereſt it was to bridle the power of Henry the Lion; and being reinforced with a conſiderable body of troops by thoſe noblemen, and his own nephew the count of Daſtaw, d he marched into Holſtein, where he repulſed the forces of Henry, and ſoon reduced the whole country to his obedience: then he made himſelf maſter of Staden and Lubec, and received from the emperor the inveſtiture of them and ſome other places which he conquered from his adverſary.

War between Henry the Lion and Rodolphus count of Holſtein;

THESE acquiſitions excited the jealouſy of Bernard duke of Saxony, who pretending that he had the beſt right to thoſe dominions which had formerly belonged to the Lion, broke with Adolphus, ſeized Holdeſlois and ſome other places in that neighbourhood, and even threatened to beſiege Lubec, though it was an imperial town. In return for theſe acts of hoſtility Adolphus having formed a league with Benard de Ratzeburg, and Guecelen count de Swerin, inveſted Lawenburg, belonging to Bernard, which being reduced to extremity, the inhabi- e tants deſpairing of ſuccour from their own duke, applied to Canut king of Denmark, offering to put the city under his protection: but, before the Daniſh troops arrived, they were compelled by neceſſity to ſurrender. Adolphus afterwards, in conjunction with the biſhops of Norway, the nobility of Pomerania, and ſeveral princes of Lower Saxony, eſpouſed the cauſe of Waldemar biſhop of Sleſwic, who pretended to the crown of Denmark, and actually ſupplied him with a fleet and army, which enabled him to paſs into that country, and aſſume the title of king; but, by the prudent conduct of Canut, who kept himſelf on the defenſive, and tired out the confederates with delays and procraſtination, the league was diſſipated, the pretender taken priſoner, and Adolphus purſued from Sleſwic into his own country, where he was obliged to ſue for peace, which he obtained of Canut on very hard condi- f tions [c].

IT was at this period of time that Richard king of England, on his return from Paleſtina, where he had acquired great reputation againſt Saladin, was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of the Adriatic, and aſſumed the habit of a pilgrim, that he might ſecurely travel through the dominions of Leopold duke of Auſtria. But that prince, whom he had affronted at the ſiege of Ptolemais, having diſcovered him in ſpite of his diſguiſe, cauſed the unfortunate monarch to be apprehended, loaded with chains, and treated with the utmoſt indignity. The emperor was no ſooner informed of the capture than he demanded the priſoner, whom Leopold delivered, upon promiſe of receiving a good ſhare of his ranſom. Notwithſtanding a ſolemn embaſſy from England to demand the liberty of her prince, who was detained without any a plauſible pretence, in oppoſition to the dictates of honour, humanity, and the law of nations, he, at the diet of Haguenau, preferred ſix articles of accuſation againſt Richard, importing, That he had engaged in a league with Tancred, in order to maintain that uſurper in the poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Sicily; that by quarrelling with the king of France he had prevented the conqueſt of Jeruſalem; that he had invaded the kingdom of Cyprus, and employed the arms of the cruſards in pillaging a chriſtian prince; that he had inſulted the duke of Auſtria during the ſiege of Ptolemais; that he had been acceſſary to the death of the marquis of Montferrat, who had been aſſaſſinated in Paleſtine; and that he had concluded a truce with Saladin, contrary to the intereſts of Chriſtendom.

The king of England obſerved, that, although he was accountable to no perſon for his b actions, and did not conſider the members of that aſſembly as his judges, yet as his honour was concerned, he would wave his royal prerogative, and vindicate his character from theſe baſe and cruel aſperſions. He affirmed that he had not raiſed Tancred to the throne of Sicily, but treated with him as with a king in actual poſſeſſion of the crown; that the jealouſy of the French king was the ſole cauſe that obſtructed the ſucceſs of the cruſards in Paleſtine, and that he ought to bear the blame, as he had retired the firſt from the ſcene of action; that he had taken the kingdom of Cyprus from an uſurper and tyrant, who had provoked his reſentment; but ſurely he could not be juſtly taxed with having been actuated by ambition and avarice on that occaſion, inaſmuch as he had voluntarily ceded that iſland in favour of Gui de Luſignan, to indemnify him for the loſs of Jeruſalem: that the duke of Auſ- c tria, in loading him with ſhackles, had effectually revenged a ſuppoſed affront, for which he might have demanded ſatisfaction in a more honourable manner; that his conduct and character ought to have ſcreened him from the imputation of being acceſſary to the murder of the marquis of Montferrat, who had, in the very article of death, acquitted him of all ſuſpicion of that kind, by deſiring his wife to deliver the city of Tyre into his hands, a legacy which he ſurely would not leave to a perſon whom he had ſuſpected as the author or accomplice of his own murder; and, laſtly, with reſpect to the intelligence he was ſuppoſed to have maintained with Saladin, he modeſtly reminded them of the ſhare he had in the victory obtained over that infidel prince. He accuſed the duke of Burgundy of having abandoned him from a motive of jealouſy, when he was on the eve of beſieging Jeruſalem; and d added, that the truce he had made could not be the effect of any ſordid ſelf-intereſted view, ſeeing that of all the booty he had taken from the caravan of Babylon, he had reſerved nothing to himſelf but the ring upon his finger.

A. D. 1193.
The emperor promiſes to ſet Richard at liberty, but afterwards inſiſts upon his paying an exorbitant ranſom.

This defence appeared ſo ſatisfactory to the German princes, who were moreover affected with the misfortune of ſo great a king, that they unanimouſly intreated the emperor to ſet him at liberty; and Henry promiſed to comply with their requeſt: but this favourable diſpoſition was deſtroyed by the intrigues of Philip king of France, who had fomented diſ-turbances in England, by encouraging John to uſurp his brother's crown, and now dreaded the releaſe of Richard, as an effectual obſtacle to his conqueſt of Normandy, which he invaded during the captivity of its ſovereign. He therefore ſent the biſhop of Beauvais as em- e baſſador into Germany, in order to repreſent to the emperor the great advantages that might be derived from the captivity of Richard; and the inſinuations of that prelate quadrated ſo exactly with the ſuggeſtions of his own avarice, that he refuſed to enlarge his priſoner without a moſt exorbitant ranſom, amounting to an hundred and fifty thouſand marks of ſilver, of which one third ſhould be given to Leopold duke of Auſtria. He moreover inſiſted upon Richard's tranſporting the money at his own riſque, upon ſetting at liberty the king of Cyprus and his daughter, and upon beſtowing his niece Eleanor of Bretagne in marriage upon the eldeſt ſon of the duke of Auſtria. Hard as theſe conditions may ſeem, they were embraced by Richard, who thought he could not pay too dear for that liberty by which alone his crown could be ſecured: for by this time his brother John had ſet up for himſelf, and f embroiled the whole kingdom of England. He for that reaſon wrote to his mother queen Elinor, deſiring ſhe would take meaſures for raiſing the ranſom without delay, while the king of France offered a very conſiderable ſum to the emperor, provided he would protract Richard's captivity for another year. Henry ſuffered himſelf to be ſwayed by this ſordid conſideration, and ſacrificing his honour to his intereſt, refuſed to releaſe his priſoner, even when queen Elinor arrived at Worms, with one hundred thouſand marks of ſilver, and hoſtages for the reſt of the ranſom. He renounced the agreement he had made, and referred the matter to the diet at Spire, where he ſtill equivocated and ſought to delay the deliverance of the king of England to the diet, which was ſummoned to meet at Mentz the following year; but the German princes, aſhamed of his proceedings, freely explained their ſentiments g on that ſubject, and, as their honour was concerned, inſiſted upon his performing the articles of the treaty which they had guarantied. Henry, either perſuaded by their reaſons, or apprehenſive of their reſentment, received the ranſom, and releaſed his priſoner, who ſet

a out immediately for the Low Countries, at which he arrived without having halted by the road: nor was this expedition unneceſſary; inaſmuch as Henry, repenting of what he had done, ſent a body of light horſe in purſuit of Richard, whom they in vain endeavoured to apprehend [c].

LEOPOLD duke of Auſtria, whoſe proportion of the ranſom was ſti'l unpaid, threatened to wreak his vengeance upon the hoſtages. Richard, knowing the brutality of his diſpoſition, remitted the money, which was not raiſed without great difficulty, as England had been impoveriſhed by the cruſade; and with this laſt payment he ſent his niece Elinor, according to the agreement which had been made. But, before ſhe arrived at Vienna, Leopold died of a fall from his horſe, and in his laſt moments ordered the hoſtages to be releaſed, b conſcious of the injuſtice he had done, in detaining Richard, in oppoſition to all the dictates of equity and honour. His ſon and ſucceſſor Frederic ſcrupled at firſt to obey theſe directions; but the lay lords and biſhops of his dominions interpoſing, and giving him to underſtand that the corps of his father ſhould not be buried until the will ſhould be performed, and the pope threatening to excommunicate him ſhould he perſiſt in his obſtinacy, he diſmiſſed the hoſtages, and ſent back the princeſs Elinor, who had not been ſo lucky as to captivate his inclinations [d].

Leopold duke of Auſtria is ſeized with remorſe in his laſt moments.

THE emperor, who meditated another expedition into Italy, and foreſaw future quarrels with the pope, reſolved, if poſſible, to fortify himſelf with the friendſhip of the king of England, to whom he forthwith diſpatched an ambaſſador to aſk pardon for the injuries he c had done that monarch, and promiſe reſtitution of the ſum he had exacted for his ranſom.

THE crown of Bohemia becoming vacant by the death of Conrad de Znaim, who had ſucceeded Frederic, a competition aroſe between Winceſlaus and Primiſlaus, which laſt compelled his rival to fly for protection to the emperor, who eſpouſed his cauſe, and put Primiſlaus to the ban of the empire: but, the other dying before he could be eſtabliſhed in his dominions, the ſtates of Bohemia elected Henry biſhop of Prague, who was confirmed by the emperor in the poſſeſſion of the ducal crown [e].

The biſhop of Prague elected duke of Bohemia.

THOUGH the troubles of Bohemia were thus appeaſed, Saxony ſtill continued in agitation. Henry the Lion exerted all his endeavours to recover the poſſeſſion of his dominions on the other ſide of the Elbe. He formed ſchemes, propoſed alliances, aud tried to intereſt Canut d king of Denmark in his cauſe; but, failing in all his projects, he ſought to regain the good graces of the emperor; and for this purpoſe effected a match between his ſon the duke of Brunſwic and Agnes daughter of Conrad count Palatine, the emperor's uncle, a marriage, which, inſtead of appeaſing, gave ſuch offence to Henry, that he would have ſummoned Conrad to the firſt diet to give an account of his conduct, had not ſome noblemen interpoſed in his behalf, and promiſed in his name, that the count ſhould appear at the imperial court. There he acquitted himſelf in ſuch a manner, that the emperor approved of the ſtep he had taken, and received into his favour the duke of Brunſwic, with whoſe conduct he had hitherto no great reaſon to be ſatisfied. The Palatine, finding him ſo well diſpoſed, perſuaded Henry the Lion to ſollicit his forgiveneſs; and the emperor, having promiſed to e favour him with an interview at Solfeden, the old duke ſet out for that place, but was obliged to halt by the way, in conſequence of a dangerous fall from his horſe. The emperor was no ſooner informed of the accident than he went to viſit him without ceremony, embraced him tenderly at meeting, conferred with him ſeveral times in private, and having no longer cauſe to doubt his ſincerity, gratified his ſon with the honours of the Palatinate, on condition that he ſhould attend the emperor in his expedition into Sicily [f] (M)

noese of his intention, that they might have their fleets in readiness at his arrival. Matters a being thus disposed, he passed the Alps and repaired to Genoa, where he communicated his instructions to the consul Albert d'Olivaro, who commanded the conjoined fleets, with which he sailed towards the coast of Naples, while the emperor marched thither by land. In his route he joined Muscanuwellus, to whom the command of his first army had devolved at the death of count Berthold, who was killed at the siege of Monte-Rodona, and thus reinforced, he soon made himself master of Naples, Apulia, and Calabria, after having taken by storm the city of Palermo, where he cruelly revenged upon the citizens the insult offered to the person of his empress, whom they had detained prisoner in his first expedition. His severity on this occasion, and the cruelty he exercised in other towns, which had presumed to oppose him, frighted the rest into submission; Naples submitted, and, in a very short time, b he found himself in peaceable possession of the Two Sicilies [g].

TANCRED's widow with her infant son and two daughters, had retired into Sicily; but the emperor pursued them so closely, that they were obliged to surrender themselves upon certain terms of accommodation, which he himself proposed. Yet they were no sooner in his power, than, without any regard to his promise, he stripped them of all their effects, ordered the infant to be castrated, and his eyes to be put out, and confined the mother, with her two daughters, in a monastery [h].

The empress is delivered of a son; A. D. 1195.

In the midst of these transactions the empress, though near the age of fifty, became pregnant; and, in order to avoid all suspicion of imposture, was delivered in the open field near Palermo, in presence of a multitude of people, when she brought forth a prince, who was c called Frederic, and in the sequel mounted the imperial throne. Henry having totally subdued the Two Sicilies, and seized the immense treasures which had been amassed by Tancred and his predecessors, appointed regents of his own nation, and settled the affairs of his new kingdom; then returned to Germany, and carried along with him the principal lords and prelates of the Two Sicilies, as pledges of the fidelity of their fellow subjects; but this precaution did not avail, for the Sicilians, unable to bear his tyranny and imposition, raised a rebellion, which incensed him to such a degree, that he ordered all the hostages to be deprived of their eye-light.

But, before he set out for his German dominions, he was informed of the death of his brother Conrad, duke of Suabia and Alsace, which affected him nearly; and he bestowed the pro- d vincial prefecture of Suabia, together with the dutchy of Tuscany, and the fiefs of the countess Mathilda, which duke Guelph had bequeathed to the emperor, upon his surviving brother Philip, who married Irene, daughter of the Greek emperor. On his return to Germany, he sent an embassy to Richard king of England, to propose an alliance against France, in consideration of which he would give him an acquittance for the whole ransom, part of which was still unpaid. The king of England, in consequence of this intimation, refused to conclude a treaty with the French king, although it was at that time pretty far advanced. e

Soon after this transaction the emperor bestowed upon Henry duke of Brunswic the investiture of the Palatinate, vacant by the death of Conrad, whose daughter Henry had married.

His next care was to create his son Frederic king of the Romans, though he was at that time in his cradle [i]; and the princes of the empire proceeded to the election rather through fear than affection [k].

Pope Celestine, disturbed by the power and disposition of Henry, who kept him in eternal disquiet, importuned him in the most pressing manner to succour the Christians in the Holy Land with a good number of troops, and put himself at their head, in imitation of the emperor Frederic his father. In consequence of these sollicitations he sent thither an army under the conduct of the archbishop of Mentz, and the princes of Austria, Brabant, and Thuringia [l], while he himself, with the empress, and his son the king of the Romans, repassed into Sicily, that he might extinguish the remains of the rebellion, and more conveniently provide for the necessities of the holy war. f

He sends troops to the Holy Land;

He had in an assembly at Strasburg listened to the harangue of the pope's legate with great attention, and publicly protested that he would employ his whole power, and even expose his own life for the accomplishment of such an holy enterprize. With these sentiments he convoked a general diet at Worms, where he solemnly declared his resolution, and expatiated upon the subject with such energy of eloquence, that almost all the assembly complied with his exhortations in taking the cross: nay, to such a degree of enthusiasm did this spirit of knight-errantry prevail, that Margaret queen-dowager of Hungary enlisted herself in the crusade, and actually ended her days in Palestine [m].

Such multitude of soldiers from all the provinces of the empire engaged in this expedi- g tion, that the emperor divided them into three large armies, one of which, under the coma mand of Conrad archbiſhop of Mentz, took its route through Hungary, where it was joined by queen Margaret; the ſecond, which was aſſembled in Lower Saxony, embarked in a fleet furniſhed by the inhabitants of Lubec, Hamburgh, Holſtein, and Friezland: and the emperor conducted the third into Italy, in order to puniſh the Norman noblemen, who had rebelled againſt his regency.

THE revolt began among the people of Palermo, who called Richard count d' Acerra to their aſſiſtance; but all his endeavours miſcarrying, he left them expoſed to the ſeverities of the regents, and retired to Campania, where he was apprehended and impriſoned by count Diapold, one of the emperor's deputies. The biſhop of Worms had been ſent to diſ-
b mantle Naples and Capua, and this demolition incenſed the inhabitants to ſuch a degree, that they could not conceal their reſentment, but began to concert meaſures for ſhaking off the German yoke, which they found inſupportable. Things were in this tickliſh ſituation when the emperor arriving at Naples diveſted all the Neapolitans, Calabrians, and Sicilians, of the offices they enjoyed, together with the fiefs they held of the crown, and diſtributed them among his own adherents. He likewiſe extended his ſeverity to the clergy, by diſ-annulling their exemptions from military ſervice, and, in a word, rendered himſelf ſo odious to his Italian ſubjects, that they formed a conſpiracy againſt him, and took up arms at Palermo, under the conduct of Roger count de Moliſſa, who found means to engage almoſt all the towns of Sicily in the rebellion.

chaſtiſes the revolters of Sicily and Naples,

HENRY, alarmed at this general defection, was fain to enter into a negociation with the
c malecontents, and propoſe a conference at Capua, where he promiſed to redreſs all their grievances, and reinſtate them in the poſſeſſion of their eſtates and privileges: but they had no ſooner diſmiſſed their troops in conſequence of this accommodation, than he diſregarded all his promiſes and proteſtations, tranſported part of his army into Sicily, apprehended a great number of thoſe who had appeared in arms againſt him, ſome of whom he puniſhed with death, while the reſt were either tranſported to Germany or detained in priſon.

THESE cruelties, while they intimidated great part of the Sicilians, inſpired a number of enterpriſing men with a kind of deſperate reſentment; in conſequence of which they fortified themſelves in the iſland of Lipari, under the command of count Jordani, a Sicilian nobleman, ſaid to have been privately encouraged by the empreſs Conſtance, who could not
d without horror and indignation behold her countrymen ſo unworthily treated, and was moreover piqued at the indifference of the emperor.

JORDANI himſelf aſpired at the crown, and had taken his meaſures ſo well, that he might have defied the whole power of Henry, had he not been betrayed by one of his own people, who, in conſideration of an extraordinary bribe, introduced the German troops into the iſland. Jordani was taken, after having made a gallant reſiſtance, and put to death with the moſt cruel tortures: all his adherents were alſo executed [n], and Henry, having thus extinguiſhed the embers of rebellion, permitted his army to embark for Paleſtine, under the conduct of Conrad biſhop of Wurtzburg.

THE empreſs thinking this was a favourable conjuncture for recovering the liberties of e Sicily, and proſecuting her deſigns againſt Henry, who was now almoſt wholly unfurniſhed with troops, inſtigated Renaldo and Landulphus, counts of Aquini, to promote a general inſurrection. Landulphus accordingly harangued the people of the neighbouring towns, aſſembled at Sora, who, being inflamed by his diſcourſe, reſolved at once to ſhake off the emperor's yoke, and unanimouſly choſe the count for their general. He forthwith abo-liſhed all the taxes which had been impoſed by the emperor, and, his army increaſing every day, he applied the ordinary revenue to the ſubſiſtence of his troops. Mean while the malcontents of Sicily levied a ſmall army, and being joined by the inhabitants of Palermo, with the empreſs at their head, went and beſieged the emperor in a ſtrong caſtle, to which he had retired on receiving the news of this ſudden revolt. During this ſiege, they ſent circu-
f lar letters to all the towns, inviting them to join for the advantage of the commonweal; and Henry, finding himſelf abandoned by the whole kingdom, was obliged to ſue for peace, which was granted, upon conditions not at all favourable to his intereſt.

HENRY was a prince poſſeſſed of many good qualities: he was prudent, penetrating, eloquent, active, and brave, but at the ſame time cruel and perfidious. His warlike exploits ſpread the terror of his name even into the court of Alexis, emperor of the Greeks, to whom he had actually ſent ambaſſadors to demand tribute, or, in caſe of meeting with a

THIS emperor had made repeated efforts to perpetuate the ſucceſſion in his own family, and for that purpoſe actually obtained a decree of the princes, partly by giving up his right of ſucceſſion to the effects of the clergy in favour of their chapters and churches, and partly by releaſing the nobles from their feudal dependence. Theſe, laſt too he is ſaid to have bribed with the ranſom which he extorted from Richard I. of England, whom he detained in captivity, on his return from Paleſtine, in oppoſition to hoſpitality and good faith.

PHILIP and OTHO.

Philip duke of Suabia takes upon himſelf the adminiſtration of affairs.

PHILIP duke of Suabia was on the road to Sicily, when he was informed of the death of his brother the emperor. In a few days after he was met by a meſſenger, who, by the direction of the late emperor, was diſpatched to him with his regalia and laſt will, in which he had committed to his tuition his ſon Frederic king of the Romans, together with the adminiſtration during the minority of that young prince. At the ſame time he was informed that the inhabitants of Sicily and Apulia had mutinied, and maſſacred the greateſt part of the German troops; but, judging that his preſence would be more neceſſary in Germany, and that he had no time to loſe, he marched thither with his troops, in order to preſerve the empire to his nephew. c

Pope Innocent declares himſelf Philip's enemy.

IN the mean time pope Innocent, who had ſucceeded Celeſtin, and was a ſworn enemy to the houſe of Suabia, thinking this a favourable opportunity for diveſting it of the imperial crown, wrote letters to the archbiſhops of Triers and Cologne, exhorting them to proceed to the election of a king of the Romans, of ſome other family; and omitted nothing which he thought could divide the princes of Germany. He even abſolved them from the oath of fidelity they had taken to the late emperor in favour of his ſon; and ſuch was his animoſity againſt the uncle, that he was heard to ſay, "Philip ſhould either loſe the empire, or he "himſelf forfeit the papacy." In compliance with the pope's repeated inſtances, the archbiſhops of Triers and Cologne aſſiſted by the biſhops of Paderborn and Minden, together with Henry count Palatine of the Rhine, Herman landgrave of Thuringia, the dukes of Brabant and Limbourg, the count of Dachbourg, and other noblemen, met at Cologne, and elected Berthold duke of Zeringia king of the Romans: but he, for certain reaſons, refuſing that dignity, they ſubſtituted in his room Otho duke of Saxony, who was at that time in Poitou with his uncle the king of England, and ſent the counts of Dachbourg and Leiningen, to intimate his election, and requeſt him to return to Germany without delay [p]. d

Otho is elected king of the Romans.

OTHO was no ſooner informed of his election, than he ſet out with all expedition; and having aſſembled the chiefs of his party, together with a good number of troops, which were reinforced by thoſe of his brother Henry count Palatine, made himſelf maſter of Aix-la Chapelle, where he was crowned by the archbiſhop of Cologne. On the other hand, the archbiſhops of Mentz, Magdeburg, Beſançon, the biſhops of Munſter, Ratisbon, Freiſengen, Augsburg, Conſtance, Eichſtet, Worms, Spire, Brixen, and Hildeſheim, the abbots of Fulde, Hirſchfeldt, and Kempton, the king of Bohemia, the dukes of Saxony, Bavaria, Auſtria, and Moravia, the marquis of Rothembourg, and ſeveral other princes, aſſembled at Arnsberg, where they confirmed the election of Frederic, at that time but three years of age, and choſe his uncle Philip king of the Romans, that he might exerciſe the office of guardian with more authority [q]. e

Frederic's election is confirmed by another party, and Philip choſen king of the Romans. A.D. 1198.

THESE two elections divided the empire into two powerful factions, and involved all Germany in ruin and deſolation. The pope threw himſelf into the ſcale of Otho, ſent a legate to Cologne to confirm his election, and excommunicated Philip and all his adherents. Otho, excluſive of his friends in Germany, was ſtrongly ſupported by his uncle Richard king of England, for which reaſon Philip of France, the inveterate enemy of that monarch, declared for Philip, tho' not before he had made a fruitleſs attempt for himſelf, by the means of Marguariti, the blind admiral of Sicily, who promiſed to diſpoſe the Italians in his favour, but was aſſaſſinated before he could bring his project to bear. f

PHILIP, aſſembling a body of troops, marched into Alſace, deſtroyed the harveſt, burned Molſheim, razed the caſtle of Haldenburg, and pillaged all the lands belonging to the biſhop of Strasbourg and the count of Dachbourg, while Otho extended the limits of his dominions along the Rhine and the Moſelle, until his army being weakened by deſertion, he was obliged to retire. Then Philip repaired to Mentz, where he was crowned by the archbiſhop of Tarentum, who officiated for the archbiſhop of Mentz, at that time in Paleſtine, g

After his coronation, he burned the towns of Bonn, Andernach, and Coblentz, ravaged the whole country, and entering Lower Saxony, undertook the ſiege of Brunſwic, which, however, he was obliged to raiſe; for Henry count Palatine no ſooner underſtood that his capital was in danger, than he marched thither with a conſiderable army, and compelled Philip to retreat to Goſlar, where he ſpent part of the winter. He marched into Alſace a ſecond time, where he made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, and at laſt accommodated matters with the biſhop, who admitted him into Strasburg, where he received the oath of allegiance from the inhabitants. About the ſame time he brought over to his party Primi-

Wins over the king of Bohemia;

HENRY count Palatine, to whoſe young ſon this princeſs had been promiſed in marriage, incenſed at the projected alliance, now, for the firſt time, declared for his brother, and aſſembled a ſtrong body of troops, with which Otho made an irruption into Franconia, and inveſted the city of Wirtzburg, which held for Philip. This prince haſtened to the ſuccour of the town, and a deciſive battle muſt have enſued, had not the noblemen of both and Henry count Palatine. A. D. 1200.

Besides the defection of Henry, he forfeited the friendſhip of his uncle John king of England, who, having ſucceeded his brother Richard on the throne, not only refuſed to pay the legacy which that prince bequeathed to Otho, but alſo concluded a treaty with the French king, by which he expreſsly reſtricted himſelf, from aſſiſting his nephew, directly or indirectly; and this article he religiouſly obſerved, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the pope who wrote to him in favour of Otho [t].

Otho is abandoned by the king of England.

While Germany groaned under all the miſeries of a civil war, the empreſs Conſtance
d reſided in Sicily, as regent and guardian to her infant ſon, who had been crowned with the conſent of pope Celeſtin, which was not, however, obtained, but by means of a large ſum of money; and that pontiff dying, there was a neceſſity for ſending deputies to ſollicit the inveſtiture anew from his ſucceſſor, Innocent III. who, taking the advantage of this favourable conjuncture for aggrandizing the ſee of Rome, inſiſted upon her relinquiſhing ſome rights which, he pretended, were prejudicial to the church; namely, that of filling up vacant benefices, the legation (O) granted to the kings of Sicily, and the right of appeal, to the excluſion of the Roman tribunal. But, before theſe conceſſions could be made, Conſtance died, leaving the regency of the kingdom, during the minority of her ſon, to pope Innocent; ſo that he was enabled to act according to his own inclination [u].

The empreſs Conſtance dies in Sicily.

e. Having thus executed his deſigns upon Sicily, in favour of the holy ſee, he declared for Otho in three different bulls iſſued on the ſubject of the ſchiſm of the empire, wrote to the archbiſhops of Cologne, Mentz, as well as to the different provinces of Germany, explaining the motive that induced him to exclude Philip and Frederic from the imperial throne; and, in a letter to Otho, expreſſed himſelf in theſe terms: "By the authority of Almighty God, "devolved to us in the perſon of St. Peter, we receive you as king of the Romans, and "ordain that you ſhall henceforth be reſpected and obeyed accordingly; and, after the "uſual preliminaries, we will ſolemnly beſtow upon you the imperial crown [x]."

But the houſe of Suabia was ſo much dreaded and deteſted by the popes, whom it had always hampered in Italy, that Innocent, far from paying the leaſt regard to theſe ſuggeſtions and intreaties, redoubled his efforts to detach the princes and prelates from the cauſe of Philip; and, in his anſwer to the French king's letter, declared, that either Philip ſhould loſe the empire, or he himſelf forfeit the papacy [y]. a

A new cruſade is ſet on foot.

ALL theſe diſſentions and diſturbances in Europe did not prevent the formation of a new cruſade, which the pope ordained to be preached up for the recovery of the Holy Land. Thoſe who took the croſs were moſtly Germans and French, and the firſt exploit they performed was the reduction of Zara, in Hungary, which they beſieged at the inſtigation of Dandolo, doge of Venice, from whoſe dominion that town had withdrawn itſelf. While they were employed in this ſiege, they received an embaſſy from king Philip, exhorting them to reſtore his father-in-law Iſaacus Angelus, emperor of Conſtantinople, who had been dethroned and deprived of his eye-ſight by his own brother Alexis, ſurnamed Commenus. They undertook this enterprize, in conſideration of ſome advantages ſtipulated with young Alexis, the ſon of the dethroned emperor, who had made his eſcape into Germany, and was then in their army; and, taking Conſtantinople by aſſault, expelled the uſurper, reſeaſed old blind Iſaac, and, at his deſire, ſet his ſon Alexis upon the imperial throne [z]. b

Troubles in the northern parts of Germany.

DURING theſe tranſactions in the eaſt, the northern parts of Germany and Denmark were re-involved in troubles by the reſtleſs ambition of Adolphus, count of Holſtein, who ſtill perſevered in his deſign of reducing Dithmarſie to his obedience, notwithſtanding the bad ſucceſs of his firſt attempt. With this view he invaded that province, which he laid waſte with fire and ſword, until Canute, king of Denmark, ſent thither a body of forces under the command of his brother Waldemar, who defeated Adolphus, and compelled him to return to Hamburg. And although his affairs aſſumed a better aſpect, in conſequence of the aſſiſtance of Otho, margrave of Brandenburg, who obtained a victory over the Daniſh general, this ſmile of fortune was not of long duration: the Danes reduced the cities of Lubec and Hamburg, made Adolphus priſoner, conquered all the country that depended upon the empire on the north ſide of the Elbe, and annexed Holſtein to the crown of Denmark [a]. c

A. D. 1204.

The inconſtancy of the German princes.

GERMANY was at that time in no condition to oppoſe the Daniſh conqueſts: Philip and Otho, the two competitors for the empire, were wholly ingroſſed in maintaining the attachment of their friends, who nevertheleſs abandoned and eſpouſed their intereſts by turns, according to the dictates of caprice, ambition, or reſentment. John, archbiſhop of Triers, changed ſides twice in the courſe of one year: Primiſlaus, or Ottocarus, king of Bohemia, forſook the cauſe of Philip, which, on the other hand, was reinforced by the acceſſion of Henry, duke of Low Lorrain and Brabant, whom he loaded with favours. d

THE whole empire was by this time become a ſcene of blood, confuſion, and anarchy. Every nobleman was at variance with his neighbour. The neareſt relations, renouncing the ties of conſanguinity, burned the houſes, pillaged the vaſſals, and deſtroyed the families of one another. The people were oppreſſed by their lords; the ſoldiers were guilty of the moſt flagrant outrages; and as neither of the pretenders could pay his troops regularly, both were obliged to connive at theſe diſorders. e

Philip ravages Thuringia, and reduces Bohemia into a province.

PHILIP, reſolving to humble the landgrave of Thuringia, who, tho' his relation, had exerted himſelf with remarkable ardour in the cauſe of Otho, marched into his country, which he laid under contribution; beſieged and took the town of Wizenſee, and, defeating the Bohemians who came to his aſſiſtance, entered that kingdom, the greateſt part of which he ſubdued: Bohemia was reduced into a province, and Primiſlaus forbid to aſſume the title of king: tho' pope Innocent afterwards, at the recommendation of Otho, granted him the royal dignity, and took his kingdom under the protection of the holy ſee.

Otho is forſaken by his beſt friends.

THIS chain of ſucceſs intirely changed the face of affairs, ſo that by force, or otherwiſe, the principal princes of the oppoſite party were obliged to ſue for peace; and Philip being a prince of a mild diſpoſition, they found their account in having recourſe to his clemency. The landgrave himſelf was the firſt who ſollicited an accommodation, and was ſo favourably dealt with, that he actually eſpouſed the intereſt of Philip. This was a very ſenſible mortification to Otho, who was already deſerted by his own brother Henry count palatine. Even the archbiſhop of Cologne, who had preſided at Otho's election, and crowned him at Aix la Chapelle, now abandoned his cauſe, without any regard to his own oath of allegiance, or the excommunication of the pope. f a at Aix la Chapelle by the hands of the archbishop of Cologne [b], who had set the crown on Otho's head, and, who, on account of having thus changed his side, was excommunicated by the pope.

His holiness, however, besides, the gratification of his enmity against the house of Suabia, found other advantages in fomenting these troubles in the empire, during which he conquered, and confirmed to the church of Rome, the greatest part of the patrimony which it at present possesses, and found means to be acknowleged sovereign lord of those provinces which formerly held of the empire (P).

Mean while Philip, without minding his efforts and fulminations, redoubled his attention to the main point; and, reinforcing his army, compelled his antagonist to quit the b field, and shut himself up in the city of Cologne; which being invested, and very hard pressed by the besiegers, Otho, seeing no safety but in despair, resolved to make a sally with the flower of his troops, in order either to raise the siege or accomplish his escape. He accordingly attacked the besiegers with great fury; but all his followers were either killed or taken taken prisoners, the new archbishop of Cologn being among the last; and Otho himself escaped into Saxony [c], from whence he fled into England.

Otho flies into England. A. D. 1205.

Philip, being now undisputed master, continued the siege of Cologne, which surrendered to him by capitulation. There he established the archbishop Adolphus, whose competitor he kept in close confinement; and having no other powerful enemies to deal with, he now employed himself in securing the friends, and strengthening the alliances he had
c made. He bestowed one daughter in marriage upon Wincesiaus, king of Bohemia, and matched another with the duke of Brabant's eldest son; distributed large presents in money and effects; and, being naturally of an affable and engaging temper, behaved in such a manner as gained the hearts of all his subjects. He even sent ambassadors to the pope to propose an accommodation [d]; which was the more acceptable to his holiness, as Philip yielded to him several countries which belonged to the empire (Q).

Philip proposes an accommodation to the pope;

While this reconciliation was upon the carpet, and each of them seemed bent upon outwitting the other, Philip understanding that the king of Denmark had marched with an army to the confines of Saxony, in order to assist Otho [e], assembled a great body of troops, and repaired in person to Bamberg, where, while he waited for their junction, he was taken d with a slight indisposition, by which he was confined to his chamber. There being engaged in a conversation with Conrad, bishop of Spire, who was his chancellor, and Henry Cruchs, count of Walburg, he heard the voice of the count palatine Otho of Wittlesbach at the door, and ordered him to be admitted ino his apartment. That nobleman, after some discourse with the emperor, went out, and taking the sword of his gentleman who stood waiting for him at the door, unsheathed it, and re-entered the chamber, where he began to push as if for his own amusement. Philip reprimanded him for the freedom of his behaviour, saying that was no place for such a diversion; to which the palatine abruptly replied, 'This is the only place,' and with these words ran him through the neck. The chancellor was so frighted with this assault, that he hid himself; but the count of Walburg immediately ate tacked the assassin, who wounded him in the cheek, and escaped into the bishop's palace; and while they were engaged, the emperor died by loss of blood [f].

is murdered by Otho of Wittlesbach. A. D. 1208.

The palatine was instigated by revenge to this detestable action. The emperor had promised to give him one of his daughters in marriage, and afterwards refused to keep that promise, because he was declared infamous in full diet by the princes and states of the empire, on account of a murder which he had basely committed at the court of

(P) In the course of this year was instituted a new military order of German knights, to defend the Christans of Livonia against the infidels. The patent was obtained from Otho of Saxony, and pope Innocent confirmed the institution: the habit of the order was a white mantle; their arms two swords, gules, saltere, with a mullet of the same colour. They obliged themselves to assist frequently at mass, to lead a single, chaste, and sober life, to fight against the infidels, and defend the interests of the holy see. In recompence for their services, the popes granted them a full enjoyment of all they should conquer from the pagans; and they were distinguished by the appellation of Ensiferi, on account of their long swords (1.)

(Q) Innocent, not contented with the emperor's yielding the duchy of Spoleto and the marquisate of Ancona to the holy see, demanded one of Philip's daughters in marriage for his own nephew: and this is the origin of nepotism, an establishment to which hitherto the popes had not attempted to aspire (2).

Heiss alleges, that Philip gave his daughter Beatrice in marriage to Otho, in consequence of an accommodation with that prince; but, as no such accommodation is mentioned by any historian of credit, we with Krantz, Otte de Sancto Blasia, the abbot Ursperg, and others, postpone the marriage till after Philip's death.

Bavaria (R). This untimely fate of Philip was regretted by all that knew him; for he was a prince endowed with a great many amiable qualities. His countenance was comely, his perſon elegant, he was prudent, affable, mild, eloquent, liberal, pious, and intrepid. His body was depoſited in the church of Bamberg, where it remained a long time, until it was removed and interred at Spire, by order of his nephew the emperor Frederic II. a

OTHO IV.

Otho's election renewed.

OTHO, being certified of Philip's death, called a diet at Halberſtadt, in order to treat about the affairs of the empire, and there his former election was renewed by the princes of Saxony, Thuringia, and Miſnia, and afterwards confirmed by thoſe of Suabia, Bavaria, and France, at another aſſembly held at Frankfort. It was here that Philip's daughter, Beatrice, appeared in perſon, to demand juſtice upon the murderer of her father, where her tears and ſupplications had ſuch an effect upon the whole aſſembly, that they confiſcated the dominions, and ſet a price upon the head of the aſſaſſin, who was ſoon after ſlain on the banks of the Danube, by Henry de Calat, who cut off his head and threw it into the river [g]. As for Beatrice, ſhe was taken into protection, and afterwards to wife, by Otho, with the unanimous conſent of all the princes, after the impediment of conſanguinity had been removed by a diſpenſation obtained from the pope [h]. b

He marries Beatrice, daughter of Philip; gratifies the pope in all his demands;

THIS emperor, in order to acquire the good graces of his holineſs and the clergy, which he knew would greatly contribute to his eſtabliſhment on the throne, not only promiſed to gratify the pope in all his demands, but alſo to aboliſh the cuſtom of ſeizing, for the emperor's uſe, the effects and lands of the deceaſed clergy; but as theſe promiſes were made ſolely with a view to cajole the pope and the biſhops, he afterwards refuſed to perform them, and in the ſequel ſuffered ſeverely for breaking his word. c

THE new election of Otho to the empire no ſooner reached the ears of Innocent III. who looked upon him as his friend, and a prince entirely devoted to the holy ſee, than he ſent legates with letters of congratulation, in which he offered to crown him if he would come A. D. 1209. to Italy. Tempted by this propoſal, the emperor convoked a diet at Haguenau, in which his journey being reſolved upon, he appointed Rodolphus, count Hapsburg, prefect, vicar of the empire, and principal avoyer of all Upper Germany (S), with power to maintain the imperial rights, inſpect the finances, levy ſubſidies, tributes, tolls, and taxes, and, in a word, to repreſent the perſon of the emperor in his abſence. Having thus provided for the tranquility of the empire, he repaired to Augsburg, where he had ordered his troops to aſſemble; and from hence diſpatched the patriarch of Aquileia before him, to examine the rights and privileges of the Italian towns, to prepoſſeſs the people in his favour, and to remove all difficulties that might retard him in his journey. Next year he ſet out for Lombardy, where he was received as ſovereign of the kingdom [i]. From thence he went to hold a diet at Bologna, where he exacted large ſubſidies of men and money: and, having formed a powerful army, he repaired to Rome, where the pope received him with all the demonſtra- d

THESE condeſcenſions were owing to the ſame motives which had induced him to make the promiſe we have already mentioned to the German biſhops; for, in a little time, it plainly appeared he had only amuſed them for his own ends; and fortune ſoon favoured him with an opportunity of declaring himſelf. A number of his ſoldiers, who were encamped under the walls of Rome, having entered the city one day for their amuſement, a quarrel happened between them and the inhabitants, which roſe to ſuch a degree, that the citizens, taking arms, killed upwards of a thouſand imperialiſts upon the ſpot.

THE emperor complained to the pope of this outrage, for which he did not receive the ſatisfaction he expected; and tho' he did not think proper to ſhew his reſentment at that time, he afterwards manifeſted his diſpleaſure, as well for that inſult, as for the injuſtice of the pope, in taking advantage of the troubles of Germany to ſeize Apulia, together with f

(R) This account of the aſſaſſin's motives we take from Krantz and Arnoldus Lubicenſis; but in the Chronica Auguſtenſis, publiſhed by Freherus, we are told, that Philip, before he aſcended the throne, had promiſed to marry the daughter of Otho, count Wittlesbach, whom he afterwards rejected; and that the father was prompted to revenge by this affront.

Mean while he departed from Rome, apparently in friendship with the pope; and, arriving in Lombardy, made Milan his head-quarters, and cantoned his troops in the neighbourhood, where they passed the winter. In the spring he took the field again, resolved to re-establish, by force, his right and authority in those countries, of which the empire had been deprived. After some victories, he retrieved all that had been withdrawn from his possession, and made hostile incursions into Apulia, ravaging the dominions of Frederic king of the Two Sicilies, who was under the protection of the holy see [l].

winters in Lombardy. A. D. 1210.

From these conquests, however, the emperor's ruin may be dated; for Innocent III. enraged at his proceedings, thundered out an excommunication against him, which he orb dered Sigefrid, archbishop of Mentz, to publish through the whole empire. This prelate being likewise incensed against Otho, for having broken the promise he had made touching the estates of deceased ecclesiastics, not only proclaimed him through all Germany as a person excommunicated and proscribed, releasing and discharging all the princes, states, and cities, from their oath of allegiance, but also convoked a diet, in order to proceed to a new election. At this assembly, which was held at Bamberg, were present the king of Bohemia, the dukes of Bavaria and Austria, Herman, landgrave of Thuringia, and other princes, ecclesiastic as well as secular; they elected Frederic duke of Suabia and king of Sicily, at that c time about seventeen years of age, who, in his infancy, had been proclaimed king of the Romans, at the desire of Henry VI. his father [m]. They at the same time intimated this election to the pope, and sent ambassadors into Sicily to acquaint Frederic with his elevation.

is excommunicated, and dethroned in favour of Frederic, son of Henry VI. A. D. 1211.

Otho alarmed at this revolution, returned to Germany without delay, and called a diet at Nuremberg, where, among others, duke Henry count palatine of the Rhine, his own brother, with the dukes of Brabant and Lorrain, were present. The members of this assembly, after mature deliberation upon the reasons that Otho gave for recovering the estates and countries of Italy, which the pope had unjustly possessed himself of, to the prejudice of the empire, approved of what he had done, and exhorted him to denounce war against those princes, who, out of complaisance to the pope, had, contrary to all reason, proceeded to a new election.

returns to Germany, and makes war upon the revolters;

d The emperor, by the assistance of these princes, finding himself in a condition to make head against the rebels, began with depriving the king of Bohemia of his realm, which he bestowed upon his son, who had complained to the diet, that the king his father had disowned him as well as his mother, who was born marchioness of Misnia, and that he had married the king of Hungary's daughter. The emperor at the same time declared war against Herman, marquis of Thuringia, after having put him under the ban of the empire, while he ordered Henry count palatine, Henry duke of Brabant, and some other princes, to attack and destroy the archbishopric of Mentz; so that the archbishop was obliged to fly for refuge into another country [n].

After this success, the emperor never doubted but he should be able to re-establish e himself on the throne; but, that he might the sooner accomplish his purpose, he thought it was necessary to weaken the support of which the pope and his partizans in the empire availed themselves. This was Philip Augustus, king of France, against whom he entertained another grudge on account of a wager which he had formerly made with that prince, who refused to stand to his agreement (T). This he looked upon to be a favourable opportunity, because Philip was at war with his uncle, the king of England. These two princes, therefore, joined their forces, which were augmented by all the allies they could engage in the expedition; so that the confederate army amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand men. They were met by the French near the village of Bouvines, and a bloody battle ensued, in which Otho, and his allies were totally defeated, and he himself with difficulty es-

(T) When Otho was first elected king of the Romans, his uncle Richard of England, presented him with a very considerable sum of money, and advised him to apply to the king of France, in his return to Germany. In consequence of this advice, he waited upon Philip Augustus at Poitiers, in order to solicit his assistance; but that prince, who secretly favoured Philip, excused himself, and would even have dissuaded him from his enterprize, by magnifying the risque he would run from the power of his competitor. "If (said he) you will now give me "the choice of one of your sumpter-horses with its "load, I will engage to give you Paris, Orleans, or "Etampes, when-ever you shall be raised to the imperial throne." Otho took him at his word, and Philip actually chose the best of fifty horses, which were loaded with one hundred and fifty thousand marks of gold he had received from his uncle. After the death of Philip the emperor, Otho succeeded to the throne, by the unanimous consent of the princes: he sent an embassy to the king of France, to notify his election, and remind him of the wager which he had lost. Philip refused to pay the forfeit, on pretence that Otho had not won the crown from his competitor, which was the condition of the wager; and, being affronted at the demand, gave him to understand that, if he was disposed to contest the matter, he should find him ready for the dispute (1).

caped o (U). He attempted to retreat into Germany, but was prevented by young Frederic, who, with a powerful army, had marched into the empire, and been every where received with open arms. a

He neglected no opportunity to conciliate the affection of the Germans, as well as to reward those who had espoused his cause from the beginning of the contest. To some he gave pecuniary gratifications, and others were rewarded with honourable and lucrative privileges. He instituted an order of knighthood, called the Bear, in honour of the abbot and nobility of that country, who had been the first to receive, and furnish him with troops against Otho. He remunerated the zeal and services of William V. prince of Orange, with the kingdom of Arles, which he bestowed upon him, on condition that he and his successors should do homage for it to the emperor; and he conferred upon the bishop of Strasbourg the whole temporal jurisdiction of that city. Colmar, Schelestadt, and other towns of Alsace, were, by his direction augmented, embellished, and Newbourg on the Rhine declared a free city. b

A. D. 1214. Frederic conciliates the affections of the Germans.

Having established his authority in Upper Germany, he passed the Moselle, in order to reduce the towns by which he was not as yet acknowleged; but he met with no opposition in his march. Triers, and other cities which had been attached to Otho, submitted, and took the oath of allegiance to Frederic; and the dukes of Brabant and Lombardy not only sued for peace, which they obtained, but also undertook that the whole country of Juliers and Westphalia should acknowlege his title p. Even Waldemar, king of Denmark, sent ambassadors to congratulate him upon his election, and sollicit his friendship; in consideration of which, however, he stipulated that the towns of Lubec and Hamburg, together with Holstein, and the other conquests he had made upon the empire, should be united to the crown. c Concludes a treaty of peace with Waldemar king of Denmark.

An alliance with a powerful monarch was of such importance to Frederic, in his present precarious situation, that he complied with the demands of the Danish king, in a solemn treaty, which was generally blamed as injurious to the honour and interest of the empire. Otho, his brother the count palatine, Albert margrave of Brandenbourg, and Waldemar bishop of Bremen, not only exclaimed against the articles of this alliance, but, seizing the first pretence of a rupture with Denmark, assembled a body of troops, with which they marched directly to Hambourg, and took possession of the town without opposition. Nevertheless, they did not long enjoy this conquest; for this city was soon wrested from them by Frederic, and afterwards re-taken by Waldemar king of Denmark, who ravaged the lands of the Palatine, and in the sequel concluded a treaty of peace with the confederates, in which the emperor was not included q. d

Otho retires to Brunswick, where he dies.

OTHO, seeing himself thus abandoned by all the princes of Germany, and altogether without resource, retired to Brunswick, where he lived four years as a private man, dedicating his time to the duties of religion, and then died after a reign fruitful of trouble and misfortune.

FREDERIC II.

He was succeeded by Frederic II. who, being but nine months old at his father's death, had, by his mother Constance, been carefully educated and instructed in the knowlege of every thing that could contribute to make him a great and virtuous prince. He had learned the Greek, Latin, German, French, and Turkish languages, and studied above all things, to follow the footsteps of his grandfather Frederic I. whose name he bore, and whose conduct he proposed as a model for his own. Like him, he laid it down for a maxim, that nothing ought to be deferred till to-morrow which can be executed to-day; imagining, that nothing was done in an affair, while any part of it remained undone. He was, by birth, a prince of great power; for, besides the vast dominions he inherited from his father and mother, he, by the death of his uncle Philip, succeeded to the duchies of Suabia and Rottenburg, together with other dominions, which that prince had acquired. He was confirmed in the imperial dignity by the princes assembled at Mentz; from whom he received the oath of allegiance, as well as from the imperial cities of the Rhine, and was afterwards crowned at Aix la Chapelle with great magnificence; when, as an acknowlegement of the favours which God had hitherto bestowed upon him, he added to the other solemnities of his coronation, a vow to go in person to the Holy Land r. e f

(U) Heiss gives an account of two battles, but he must be mistaken; for the French authors mention but one, and surely they would not let slip any opportunity of magnifying the glory of their king: besides, the German writers describe no other than that which was fought at Bouvines, near Tournay, where Philip, bishop of Beauvais, used a large club instead of a sword, that he might kill without shedding blood; where the king of France was dismounted, trampled upon by horses, and wounded in the throat; and where Otho's chariot was shattered in pieces, and the imperial standard taken (1).

After

a AFTER the ceremony of his coronation, Henry count palatine of the Rhine was, with the unanimous consent of the whole assembly, put to the ban of the empire, and his dignity bestowed upon Lewis duke of Bavaria: a decree which was strengthened by a match projected and executed between Henry's daughter and the duke of Bavaria's eldest son. When the assembly broke up, Frederic repaired to Cologne, where he was received amidst the acclamations of the people, and made divers salutary laws touching the regulation of the police, and the reformation of abuses which had crept into the management of taxes and public money.

WHILE he was thus employed in establishing the tranquility of the empire, pope Innocent died, and was succeeded by Honorius III. who expressed great eagerness in forwarding the crusade, which he ordered to be preached up through all the provinces of Germany, b Sweden, Denmark, Bohemia, and Hungary, and his endeavours were crowned with extraordinary success; for although the emperor excused himself from the performance of his vow, until he should have regulated the affairs of Italy, and received the imperial crown from the hands of his holiness; and almost all the other monarchs of Europe were detained at home by domestic disturbances; nevertheless an infinite number of private noblemen and their vassals took the cross, under the dukes of Austria, Bavaria, the archbishop of Mentz, and the bishops of Munster and Utrecht, and Andrew II. king of Hungary, was, by the pope, declared generalissimo of the crusade. While these crusards of Upper Germany marched towards Italy, in order to embark at Venice, Genoa, and Messina, a fleet of three hundred sail was equipped in the ports of Lower Saxony, for the transportation of the adventurers of Westc phalia, Saxony, and the territory of Cologne; and these joining the squadron of the Frieslanders, Flemings, and subjects of Brabant, commanded by William count of Holland, George count of Weerden, and Adolphus count de Berg, set sail for the Straits of Gibraltar, in their voyage to Ptolemais [s]. But being driven by a tempest into the road of Lisbon, they were prevailed upon to assist Alphonso king of Portugal against the Moors, whom they defeated, and afterwards took the city of Alcazar, which was in possession of the infidels. In the mean time Andrew, with his army, having joined the king of Cyprus, landed at Acra, where he was joyfully received by John de Brienne, king of Jerusalem, and the knights of the temple, hospital, and Teutonic order. Their forces being refreshed and reviewed, they marched against the Saracens, into the great valley of Jesrael, with the wood of the true cross carried before d them: but Coradin, son of Saphadin, soltan of Egypt and Babylon, who commanded the enemy, finding himself unable to cope with the crusards, retired, and they undertook the siege of Thabor, in which they miscarried. Then they separated into four bodies for the convenience of subsisting: Lusignan king of Cyprus died at Tripoli in the flower of his age: and Andrew king of Hungary returned to his own dominions, in order to appease some troubles which had been excited in his absence. Yet he was not suffered to depart, until he had solemnly sworn, that he would not invade the dominions of Austria while the duke remained in Palestine, and agreed to leave one half of his troops for the prosecution of the war against the infidels.

Progress of the crusards in the east. A. D. 1218.

IMMEDIATELY after his departure, the fleet from the coasts of Spain arriving at Ptolemais, e it was resolved in a council of war to besiege Damietta in Egypt, which was accordingly invested by sea and land, and taken after a siege of eighteen months; during which Saphadin died, his son Meledin, who came to the relief of the besieged, was defeated, the duke of Austria, with a great number of crusards, returned to Germany, and a new reinforcement arrived, under the conduct of the cardinal D'Albano, legate of the holy see [t].

DURING these transactions in the east, Frederic continued still unsettled on the imperial throne; for tho' he was by this time acknowleged by almost all the princes and states of Germany, and had purchased the friendship of the pope, by promising, in a solemn obligaf tion, to emancipate his son Henry, and bestow upon him the kingdom of Sicily, to be held as a fief of the church of Rome, as soon as he himself should be crowned emperor; notwithstanding these precautions, the cause of Otho was still maintained in Italy, especially by the inhabitants of Milan and Placentia, who declared war and committed hostilities, against the adherents of Frederic, in spite of the menaces and excommunication which were threatened against them by the pope; until the cause of their dissension was removed by the death of Otho, who expired in the tenth year of his reign, after having, in his last moments been absolved of the censures of the church [u].

The cities of Milan and Placentia still hold out against Frederic.

FREDERIC having reduced to his obedience the provinces of Lower Saxony and the towns upon the Elbe, and exerted his best endeavours for repairing the damage which a long g civil war had done to the empire, convoked a diet at Goslar, where he received the imperial ornaments from Henry count palatine, to whom they had been delivered by his brother Otho; and that prince, having taken the oath of allegiance, was allowed to enjoy his brother's inheritance, gratified with a ſum of money, and admitted to the emperor's friendſhip. During Frederic's reſidence at Goſlar, which he favoured with divers immunities, Thibaut duke of Lorrain made himſelf maſter of the citadel of Roſheim, belonging to the emperor, and ravaged the country of Alſace: but he did not commit theſe hoſtilities with impunity; for Frederic, marching againſt him with great expedition, cooped him up in the town of Amance, where he was taken priſoner, and afterwards releaſed by the interceſſion of the biſhop of Metz [x]. a

THIS diſturbance being quelled, he ſummoned a diet at Frankfort, where, after having ſettled the moſt urgent affairs of the empire, he ſignified his intention of going to be crowned at Rome, and deſired that the princes and ſtates would, according to ancient cuſtom, make ſuitable proviſion for his equipage.

THE pope preſſed him to ſet out immediately upon this expedition, that he might no longer have a pretext for delaying the performance of his vow touching the Holy Land; but before his own departure, he ſent his chancellor Conrad, biſhop of Spire, with circular letters, addreſſed to all the towns in Italy, commanding them to receive and obey that prelate as the miniſter and repreſentative of his imperial majeſty, and to take the oath of allegiance in his preſence. Then Frederic committed the education of his ſon Henry to Wergerus, count de Boland, and appointed a council to manage the affairs of the empire in his abſence. Finally, as a mark of his regard for the German prelates, he iſſued an imperial decree, importing, that the effects of deceaſed biſhops ſhould devolve to their ſucceſſors; that, for the future, no emperor ſhould make any alteration in the taxes and coin; that no place of the empire ſhould afford an aſylum to fugitive ſerfs belonging to churches or biſhops; that no perſon ſhould poſſeſs the fief of an archbiſhop after his death, without the conſent of his ſucceſſor; that no man ſhould pretend to oppoſe the effects of excommunication by force of arms; that no perſon, not even the lord avoyer, ſhould build towns, caſtles, fortreſſes, or other edifices, upon ground belonging to the church, without the conſent of the titular biſhop; that no officer of the empire ſhould try cauſes, impoſe taxes, or levy duties, upon an epiſcopal town, except during eight days preceding and ſucceeding a diet convoked in that place; and laſtly, in caſe that the emperor ſhould ſtop or reſide incognito in any of the epiſcopal towns, he ſhould not there perform any act of juriſdiction [y]. b

HE in the ſame aſſembly granted and confirmed ſome privileges to ſeveral ſecular princes, in particular to the duke of Brabant, who, by letters patent, was declared tutor of all the minors who held fiefs of the empire; and he effected an accommodation between the archbiſhop of Cologn and the count of Luxemburg, who had quarrelled and taken arms about the ſucceſſion of Adolphus, count de Bergue, who died at the ſiege of Damietta in Egypt. d

THE troubles of Germany being appeaſed, and the neceſſary preparations made for his journey, Frederic croſſed the Alps with a good army, halted at Verona, was refuſed admittance into Milan, an inſult which he reſolved to revenge in due ſeaſon: then he repaired to Modena, viſited Bologna, advanced to the frontiers of Sicily, where he was joined by the troops that were under the command of his viceroy Thomas d'Aquini. At length, accompanied by the deputies of almoſt all the Italian ſtates, he arrived at Rome, where he was crowned by pope Honorius III. and upon that occaſion he gave away large ſums of money, which, though beſtowed through pure liberality, the popes have ſince endeavoured to convert into an obligation, by way of acknowlegement for receiving the crown [z] (X). After his coronation, he received the oath of fidelity and homage from the ſtates and cities of Italy; then declared Henry his ſon king of the Romans, having already at Frankfort obtained the conſent of the princes of the empire, appointed his tutors, and betrothed to him Margaret, daughter of Leopold of Auſtria [a]; afterwards, having every where eſtabliſhed peace and tranquility, by means of the princes of the empire who accompanied him, he retired to his kingdom of Naples. There he found that Thomas and Richard, the two brothers of the late pope Innocent, with their adherents, had excited an inſurrection, and made themſelves maſters of one part of that realm: however, he ſoon took vengeance on the authors of the ſedition. Richard was apprehended, condemned, and ſent into exile in the kingdom of Sicily; count Thomas, and ſome other rebels, retired to Rome, where pope Honorius received them into his protection. e f

At the ſame time the emperor marched with a body of troops into Sicily, againſt the Saracens of that kingdom, who had excited diſorders and ravaged the country. At his approach they retired to inacceſſible mountains, where they were beſieged in ſuch a manner, that they could receive no ſupplies of proviſions, conſequently ſurrendered at diſcretion, and were either expelled from the kingdom, or tranſported to other ſettlements in Apulia [b].

THE troubles of Italy being appeaſed, the emperor, by letter, directed the archbiſhop of b Cologn to crown his ſon Henry at Aix-la-Chapelle; and the ceremony was performed in preſence of a great number of noblemen, eccleſiaſtic and ſecular, who afterwards held a diet, in which divers laws and regulations were made, touching fiefs and the adminiſtration of juſtice in feudal courts. A. D. 1223.

FROM Aix-la-Chapelle Henry repaired to Augsburg, where he confirmed the privileges of the town of Strasburg; then he viſited Haguenau, where he regulated the polity of Alſace, and bridled the oppreſſive power which the nobility exerted over their vaſſals. He afterwards, by his father's direction, ſent commiſſaries to Vaucouleurs, to renew the treaty of alliance with Lewis VIII. the new French king, who had ſucceeded his father Philip Auguſtus, lately deceaſed: A treaty by which the emperor promiſed never to engage in any contedec racy with the king of England, to the prejudice of France (Y).

ABOUT this period, Waldemar II. king of Denmark, and his eldeſt ſon, were ſurpriſed by Henry, count de Schwerin, who, on pretence of ſome injury he had received from his Daniſh majeſty, apprehended him and the prince, while engaged in the diverſion of hunting, and committed them priſoners to the fortreſs of Daneberg.

Waldemar II. king of Denmark is made priſoner by the count de Schwerin;

THE Daniſh ſenators were no ſooner informed of the king's captivity, than they addreſſed themſelves to the emperor and the pope, whom they ſollicited to procure the releaſe of their ſovereign. In conſequence of this application, a diet was convened at Northauſen, and the princes agreed that Waldemar ſhould be ſet at liberty, provided that he would do homage to the emperor for his kingdom: on the other hand, the pope pretended that Denmark was
d a fief of the holy ſee, and inſiſted upon Waldemar's owning this dependence, before he would take any ſteps in his favour.

THE captive prince rejected, with diſdain, ſuch terms of enlargement; and, in the mean time, the count de Schwerin being furniſhed with troops by the princes of Saxony, Adolphus, count de Schawembourg, and the archbiſhop of Bremen, invaded Nordalbingia, took the Daniſh general priſoner by ſurprize, and reduced Holſtein, with the adjacent country on the north of the Elbe, and the city of Hamburgh. The knights of the Teutonic order, and the biſhop of Riga, took this opportunity of ſeizing Revel. At the ſame time the Wandalians, weſtern Sclaves, and the count de Werle, ſhook off the Daniſh yoke. Berem and Watiſlaus, princes of Pomerania, wreſted the town of Demnica from the count de Rugen, and Swenteploe
e made himſelf maſter of Dantzick, which had been about ſeventeen years in poſſeſſion of the Danes. At length, by the mediation of the pope, Albert, duke of Saxony, and ſome other princes, the king of Denmark and his ſon were ſet at liberty, in conſideration of 45,000 marks of ſilver, paid by way of ranſom [c]. and releaſed on paying a ranſom.

WHILE this negociation was on the carpet, a violent diſpute aroſe among ſeveral noblemen, who pretended to the ſucceſſion of the counteſs de Dasbourg, who died without iſſue, and whoſe lands were ſeized by the biſhop of Mentz, as reverſionary fiefs belonging to his ſee. The competitors were the biſhop of Liege, count de Linangen, whoſe brother had married the counteſs, the duke of Brabant, and the marquis of Baden, which laſt had made over his right to Berthold, biſhop of Strasbourg. Each pretender made alliances and preparations
f for doing himſelf juſtice by force of arms; hoſtilities were again commenced, and after much miſchief and bloodſhed, the affair was accommodated to the ſatisfaction of all parties, partly by the authority of the emperor, and partly by the admonitions of Engelbert, archbiſhop of Cologn, who did not long ſurvive the pacification; for he was baſely aſſaſſinated in Weſtphalia by the accomplices of Frederic, count de Iſembert, whom he had threatened to chaſtiſe for his exceſſes. (Y) In the courſe of this year the inhabitants of Mentz, taking the advantage of the duke of Lorrain's death, and the abſence of their biſhop, erected themſelves into a republic, and became a free town, after the example of many other cities, which had taken the like opportunities of infranchiſing themſelves, and afterwards received charters, confirming their liberty from different emperors (1).

(1) Lithman, l. iv. c. 884.

ENGELBERT had acquired ſuch reputation in the empire for his prudence and ſage adminiſtration, that the murderer was, by the diet of Nuremburg, put to the ban of the empire, a price ſet upon his head, and he afterwards underwent the ſentence of excommunication. Though he made ſhift to eſcape from Germany at that juncture, he was in the ſequel apprehended in diſguiſe near Liege, and broke alive upon the wheel in the city of Cologn. The vacant ſee was filled up by Henry de Mollemare, and Engelbert's office of tutor to the young king of the Romans conferred upon Lewis, duke of Bavaria [d]. a

THIS prince was juſt returned from the eaſt, where the cruſards had been obliged to ſurrender Damietta to Meledin, ſoltan of Egypt, after having been reduced to the greateſt extremity. The king of Jeruſalem, and the grand maſter of the Teutonic order, came to Europe at the ſame time, in order to ſollicit ſuccours from the princes of Chriſtendom. The pope, incenſed at the loſs of Damietta, wrote a very ſevere letter to the emperor, taxing him with having ſacrificed the intereſts of the cruſards, by delaying ſo long to perform his vow, and threatening to excommunicate him immediately, if he would not forthwith depart at the head of an army for their relief. Frederic, exaſperated at theſe reproaches, renounced all correſpondence with his holineſs, renewed the authority of the legation in Sicily, filled up the vacant ſees and benefices, and expelled ſome biſhops that were creatures of the pope, on pretence of their being concerned in practices againſt the ſtate. b

The emperor reduces the rebels of Naples, and quarrels with the pope, who threatens to excommunicate him.

HONORIUS having received the complaints of the exiles, exhorted the emperor, by letters and ambaſſadors, to re-eſtabliſh them in their dignities and offices, reproaching him for his raſhneſs in preſuming to lift his hand againſt the ſanctuary, in erecting himſelf as a judge over the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and uſurping the authority of the holy ſee; for he obſerved, that if thoſe prelates and officers had given him offence, he ought to have addreſſed himſelf to the pope, who, as head of the eccleſiaſtical order, would have taken cognizance of the matter, and decided according to the merits of the cauſe. To this remonſtrance the emperor anſwered, that ſince the reign of Charlemagne, the emperors had always an authority and ſovereign juriſdiction over the eccleſiaſtic ſtate; that as they had promoted the biſhops and abbots to their dignities and benefices, they had likewiſe occaſionally deprived them in caſe of miſconduct or malverſation; that his grandfather Frederic I. and his father Henry VI. had maintained this juriſdiction in full force; and that he being elevated to the ſame ſtation, pretended to the ſame authority, of which he neither could nor would diveſt himſelf, to the prejudice of the empire and his ſucceſſors. With regard to his hereditary dominions, his mother Conſtance and her predeceſſors, who were always great benefactors to the church of Rome, had ever enjoyed the ſame prerogative over the clergy of Naples and Sicily; and therefore the pope could not juſtly demand that he would part with the rights of his ſovereignty, or allow his holineſs to ſit in judgment upon the eccleſiaſtics of his kingdoms. Not content with ſending this private remonſtrance to the pope, he publiſhed a manifeſto for the juſtification of his conduct, and ordered his troops to march to the frontiers of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. c d

A. D. 1225.

IT was not long, however, before Honorius became ſenſible of his own impolitic conduct, in thus incurring the reſentment of ſuch a powerful prince, and thought proper to deprecate his anger by ſome ſubmiſſive apologies and gentle exhortations; in conſequence of which they were reconciled, and conferred together at Veroli, after the emperor had, as a proof of his ſincerity and attachment to the church, publiſhed ſome very ſevere edicts againſt hereſy, which ſeem to have authorized the tribunal of the inquiſition [e]. A ſolemn aſſembly was afterwards held at Ferentino, where both were preſent, together with John of Brienne, king of Jeruſalem, who was come to Rome to demand ſuccours againſt the ſoltan of Egypt. This prince had an only daughter, named Yolanda, whom he propoſed as a wife to the emperor, together with the kingdom of Jeruſalem after his own deceaſe, on condition that Frederic would perform the vow he had made to go to the Holy Land. The pope, who paſſionately deſired to ſee all the princes of Chriſtendom engaged for the recovery of theſe ſacred places, and particularly longed to be rid of the emperor, that he himſelf might remain ſole maſter of Italy, readily agreed to the propoſal. Frederic was invited to Rome, where he made peace with the pope, and ſigned the marriage articles between himſelf and Yolanda, who was heireſs in right of her mother Iſabel, only daughter of Amaury, king of Jeruſalem [f]; and by theſe articles he bound himſelf to ſet out with an army in two years, for the recovery of the Holy Land. In conſequence of this accommodation, ambaſſadors were diſpatched into Syria for the princeſs, who was then at Ptolemais; but almoſt two years elapſed before ſhe arrived at Rome, and Frederic began in earneſt to prepare for his expedition. The pope ſent the cardinal Conrad into Germany, with letters to all the metropolitans and their ſuffragans, exhorting them to aſſiſt the emperor in ſuch a laudable enterprize: the concurrence of Lewis VIII. king of France, was alſo ſollicited; the grand maſter of the Teutonic order carried letters from Frederic to the king of the Romans, deſiring that prince to convoke a diet at Frank- e f g a fort, in order to deliberate upon meaſures for ſending ſuccours to the Holy Land; and the duke of Auſtria, and the landgrave of Thuringia, ſignalized their zeal at that aſſembly; ſo that the preparations were carried on with extraordinary vigour, when Frederic was informed of a ſecret league, in which the towns of Lombardy had engaged, with a view to renounce his authority.

HE forthwith ſent an account of this confederacy to the pope, repreſenting, that he could not poſſibly accompliſh his vow, without running the riſque of a general revolt in Italy againſt the empire; and Honorius, perſuaded of the juſtice of this remonſtrance, conſented to his delaying his expedition two years longer, after he had ſworn at San Germano, that he would certainly depart at the expiration of that term, on pain of excommunication [g]. Confederacy of the Lombard towns againſt the emperor. A. D. 1226.

b FREDERIC having obtained this reprieve, iſſued orders for convening a general aſſembly at Cremona, to which he invited all the towns of Italy, and the noblemen of the empire, by circular letters, directed to each in particular. He likewiſe ordered his ſon Henry to meet him at that place with a ſtrong body of forces. The aſſociated towns now pulled off the maſk, juſtified their confederation by the authority of a treaty, which had been made at Conſtance, between Frederic Barbaroſſa and the cities of Lombardy, impowering them to make and renew alliances one with another. As their reigning emperor had refuſed to confirm this article, they aſſembled at Bozolo, in the territory of Mantua, where they renewed their aſſociation upon oath, and reſolved to levy troops to guard the paſſes of the Alps againſt the king of the Romans (Z). Accordingly, when that prince advanced as far as Trent, in his c way to Cremona, he found the paſſage blocked up by the troops of Verona, and was obliged to return without ſeeing his father; while the confederates intimated to the German princes, that they had not taken arms with a view to ſeparate themſelves from the empire, but ſolely in order to maintain their rights and liberty againſt the encroachments of the emperor [h]. Frederic convokes an aſſembly at Cremona.

WHILE Frederic was employed in taking meaſures for diſperſing this dangerous cloud that ſeemed to gather around him, another difference aroſe between him and Honorius, touching the nomination of biſhops to the vacant ſees of Sicily. This breach was widened by the emperor's refuſing to comply with the demands of Conrad the legate, who had propoſed to the princes of Germany, that, in order to relieve the preſſing neceſſities of the Roman church, they ſhould grant to the pope two prebendaries in every cathedral, and two cells in each d monaſtery. Frederic, being informed of this extravagant propoſal, gave the pope to underſtand, that, as the affair concerned all Chriſtendom, the empire ſhould conform to the reſolutions of other Chriſtian ſtates, who were ſollicited on the ſame ſubject. Quarrels again with the pope.

HONORIUS, piqued at this repulſe, as well as at the inflexibility of Frederic on other occaſions, reſolved to prevent the aſſembly at Cremona, and actually forbad the deputies at Spoleto to go thither, notwithſtanding the repeated commands and threats of the emperor: a conteſt which gave birth to a literary correſpondence, replete with rancour and reproach. He taxed the pope with envy, malice, and upbraided him in particular with having granted an aſylum to his rebellious ſubjects. Honorius, on the other hand, accuſed him of ingratitude, obſtinacy, pride, and cruelty towards his father-in-law, the king of Jeruſalem; e for by this time Frederic's marriage with Yolanda had been ſolemnized with great magnificence at Rome; and in a little time after the ceremony, which was performed by the pope, he had extorted from John de Brienne a ceſſion of his right and title to the kingdom of Jeruſalem [i].

NOTWITHSTANDING all the engines the pope could ſet at work to traverſe the deſigns of Frederic, that prince repaired to Cremona at the appointed time, where he was met by the deputies from the well-affected towns, and divers ſubjects of importance were diſcuſſed at the aſſembly, tho' nothing of conſequence was decided. From thence he marched towards Milan, and ſummoned the citizens to admit him, that he might be crowned king of Lombardy; but he ſuſtained a repulſe, and finding himſelf incapable at that time of revenging f the inſult, he reſolved to puniſh them in the intereſts of their allies, and actually deprived Bologna of its univerſity, which he tranſlated to Naples, and favoured with extraordinary privileges; tho' it was afterwards reſtored to Bologna at the peace, which was effected by the mediation of the pope, whom the emperor viſited at Reati, and reconciled to his intereſt [k] (A). Holds an aſſembly at Cremona. Peace concluded with the Lombard towns.

(A) The pope, being choſen arbitrator, decreed, th the emperor ſhould ſuppreſs all his reſentment, revoke all the ſentences he had paſſed, and the conſtitutions he had enacted, againſt the confederacy, which, on its part, ſhould furniſh the emperor with four hundred knights for two years, in his expedition againſt the Saracens of the eaſt; that it ſhould make peace with all the towns, places,

THE peace was no sooner concluded, than his holiness reminded the emperor of his vow; a observed, that the time for executing his promise approached; and pressed him to take measures for his speedy departure: but he died before he could see the execution of this great design, which he had so much at heart, and was succeeded in his office, as well as his maxims, by Gregory IX. a kinsman of these two counts, whom, as we have already observed, Frederic had proscribed and banished from the kingdom of Naples.

A. D. 1227. The pope dies, and is succeeded by Gregory IX

DURING these transactions, a diet was held at Aix-la-Chapelle, for the coronation of Agnes, wife of Henry, king of the Romans, where that prince decided a difference between the town of Verdun and its bishop Rodolphus, subjecting the inhabitants to the prelate's jurisdiction; and this sentence produced an insurrection and open war between the parties, which was, however, soon terminated by accommodation.

HENRY, count palatine of the Rhine, and brother of the emperor Otho IV. dying at this b conjuncture without male issue, Henry, marquis of Baden, who had married his eldest daughter, sold his pretensions upon Brunswic to the emperor; and the king of the Romans attempted to take possession, but was prevented by Otho of Saxony, son of William, duke of Lunenburg, sole male heir of Henry the Lion, who secured the place with a strong garrison, confiding in an alliance, offensive and defensive, which he had made with the king of Denmark. It was in consequence of this treaty that Otho furnished his Danish majesty with troops to reduce the inhabitants of Lubec, who had revolted, after having privately secured the countenance and protection of the emperor.

FREDERIC, who repined to see that town dismembered from the empire, sent orders to c the archbishop of Bremen, the duke of Saxony, the counts Schwerin, Mecklenbourg, and Oldenbourg, to give all possible assistance to the citizens of Lubec, in case they should be attacked by the king of Denmark, whose garrison they had expelled. Accordingly, when Waldemar took the field in order to revenge this insult, those princes assembled an army to oppose him, after his irruption into Holstein, and an obstinate battle ensued, in which he lost one eye, and was defeated, and his nephew Otho of Lunenburg taken prisoner. This disgrace served only to animate his courage; he raised another army with incredible expedition, destroyed the country of Dithmarsie with fire and sword, and having ravaged the northern parts of Holstein, returned to Denmark to recruit his army. Mean while the confederates, under the conduct of the duke of Saxony, took Mollen, Ratzeburg, and some other places in Lower d Saxony, which the Danes had possessed for some time: then they invested Lawemburg, which was a place of such consequence, that Waldemar marched to its relief, and was employed in cutting off the convoys of the besiegers, when being alarmed with a false report that the king of the Romans was on his march to join the allies, he retreated with great precipitation to his own dominions, and the town was obliged to surrender [l].

Lawemburg and other places in Lower Saxony, revert to the empire.

GREGORY was no sooner raised to the chair of St. Peter, than he sent a legate a latere to press Frederic to the execution of the promise he had so solemnly made, or in case of refusal, to threaten him with a sentence of excommunication, which he had voluntarily incurred. Frederic finding he could no longer defer his departure, especially as several princes, a great number of noblemen, and others, had arrived from all the kingdoms in e Christendom, in order to accompany him in the crusade, ordered his fleet to be equipped with all expedition, and actually set sail from Brundisi with a most magnificent equipage, and very powerful armament. But being taken ill about three days after he put to sea, he returned with his household to the port from whence he had set out, and gave orders for his army to proceed to the Levant. The pope, incensed at this quick return, declared, with the consent of all the cardinals, that he had incurred the penalty of excommunication, and rendered himself incapable of the imperial dignity [m]; and in letters written to all the kings, princes, and prelates of Christendom, he explained the reasons that influenced his conduct in this affair, giving them to understand, that the emperor had voluntarily submitted to the sentence, in case he should not perform his vow, and threatning to proceed against him in a f rigorous manner.

Frederic sets sail from Brundisi, and puts back.

ON the other hand, Frederic published letters and manifestoes, vindicating his own conduct, promising to accomplish his vow as soon as his health should permit, and enumerating the ill offices which had been done him by the present pope and his predecessors; but whatever effect this justification had with other sovereigns in his favour, the confederated towns of Lombardy made this breach between him and the pope a pretence for revolting, and a endeavouring by promiſes and threats to engage in their aſſociation thoſe cities which were affected to the emperor.

FREDERIC, incenſed at the inſolence and malice of the pope, who had excited all theſe commotions to the prejudice of his intereſt and reputation, reſolved to be revenged upon the ſee of Rome, and began by confiſcating the effects and expelling the perſons of all thoſe eccleſiaſtics within his dominions, who had treated him as an excommunicated prince. He ordered all the pope's couriers to be apprehended, ravaged the lands of St. Peter's patrimony in Apulia, and pillaged the houſes of the templars, whom he conſidered as his inveterate enemies.

GREGORY was no ſooner informed of theſe proceedings, than he called a council, in Frederic is excommunicated.
b which the ſentence of excommunication was repeated againſt the emperor, and all prieſts forbid to perform divine ſervice in his preſence, on pain of privation.

THE emperor thinking the cauſe of his return was more than ſufficient to exempt him A. D. 1228.
from the trouble of proceeding on the voyage, left no ſtone unturned to mortify the pope, in return for the ſentence which he had twice pronounced againſt him; and ſucceeded ſo well in his endeavours, by the addreſs and power of Frangipani, and other rich noblemen of Rome, who were attached to his intereſt, that his holineſs was obliged to quit that city, and take refuge at Perugia [n]. It was upon this occaſion that in Rome, as well as in other parts The animoſity of the Guelphs and Gibellines revived.
of Italy, the animoſity between the Guelphs and Gibellines revived, after it had lain dormant
c ſince Conrad III. under whom it firſt appeared. Mean while Frederic, in order to remove the cauſe of all thoſe excommunications, was preſſed by his friends to perform his vow; beſides, the intereſt of his young ſon Conrad, whom he had by Yolanda, who was lately dead, prompted him to go and take poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Jeruſalem.

THUS determined, he aſſembled at Barletta all the grandees of Sicily, together with the German noblemen who had accompanied him to Italy, declared his deſign of departing immediately for the Holy Land, and his laſt will being read, exacted of all preſent an oath, by which they bound themſelves to ſee it executed, in caſe he ſhould die in the expedition. The pope, informed of his intention, ſent him a formal meſſage, forbidding him to proceed before he ſhould be abſolved of the cenſures of the church. Notwithſtanding this
d prohibition, he embarked and ſailed to Cyprus, where he ſtaid ſome time, and then proceeded for the port of Ptolemais. Nevertheleſs, before he went on board, he ſent a letter to the pope, giving him to underſtand, that he had left full powers with his lieutenant Renaldo, duke of Spoleto, to negociate and conclude an accommodation. But Gregory refuſing to treat with that nobleman, whom he conſidered as a perſecutor of the church, Renaldo entered St. Peter's patrimony with an army, compoſed of Germans and Sicilian Saracens, and laid waſte the whole country. The pope, in revenge for theſe outrages, excommunicated the lieutenant, raiſed an army to oppoſe him, the command of which was given to John de Brienne, king of Jeruſalem, excited a new revolt againſt the emperor among the Lombard towns, and all Italy was involved in the horrors of a civil war.

e MEAN while Frederic met with a very cold reception in his kingdom of Jeruſalem; for A. D. 1229.
the patriarch, and the knights of the hoſpital, temple, and Teutonic order, had been prepoſſeſſed againſt him by the letters of Gregory, who repreſented him as a perjured and excommunicated ſinner. Nay, the grand maſters abſolutely refuſed to march againſt the enemy, while he commanded in chief; ſo that he was fain to conſent that all orders ſhould be given in the name of the duke of Limbourg, who was ſecond in command. This was not the only mortification he endured. Meledin, ſoltan of Egypt, had two very numerous armies in the field: the cruſard troops, including the knights, did not exceed 15,000 men; and he received diſpatches from the count d'Acerra, governor of Sicily, by which he learned that his Sicilian dominions were in great danger from the army of John de Brienne, who aſpired at the f imperial throne, and had even laid ſnares, and contrived ſtratagems, for apprehending the perſon of Frederic, in his return from Paleſtine [o].

THESE conſiderations extinguiſhed all his hopes of making conqueſts in the eaſt, and in- Frederic concludes a truce with the Saracens;
duced him to grant a truce of ten years to Meledin, on condition that the Chriſtians ſhould retain Jeruſalem: having therefore been crowned in that city, and left a ſtrong garriſon in the place, as well as in ſome other towns, he returned with an empty title, which from that time hath been preſerved by the kings of Sicily [p] (B). (B) If we conſider the articles of this peace, againſt which the pope ſo bitterly exclaimed, and reflect on the ſituation of the Chriſtians in the Holy Land, we can have no reaſon to think the truce was diſgraceful to the emperor, or diſadvantageous to the cauſe of Chriſtianity. The Saracens releaſed all the priſoners, and yielded up Jeruſalem, with the whole country, as far as Joppa, that the Chriſtians might paſs and repaſs unmoleſted between the city and the ſea: they likewiſe reſtored to Frederic. Bethlem, Nazareth, and all the country between Jeruſalem,

Holy Land, he found the pope had been very active againſt him in his abſence, and diſ- a avowed the treaty which he had concluded with the ſoltan, as a reproach upon the Chriſtian name; for which reaſon he refuſed to abſolve him from the ſentence of excommunication.

FREDERIC, perceiving he had nothing to hope from the favour of his holineſs, put his troops in motion, and retook ſeveral ſtrong places, of which the pope had deprived him in his abſence, employing in this conqueſt the very forces he had raiſed for the Syrian expedition.

GREGORY publiſhed bulls, ſent ambaſſadors to demand ſuccours from all the princes of Europe, though his remonſtrances had no effect, except among the confederates of Lombardy, who exerted themſelves in his behalf; and, laſtly, as the ſevereſt mark of his reſentment, repeated the ſentence of excommunication, with an additional clauſe, abſolving all b
the ſubjects of Frederic from their oath of allegiance. At the ſame time he again excommunicated the duke of Spoleto, his brother Bertholdus, and Theodore Comnenus, prince of Epirus, who had ſollicited the friendſhip of the emperor, and even aſſiſted him with troops [q].

FREDERIC, after having expelled all the pope's garriſons, pillaged the towns and villages belonging to the holy ſee, and ravaged the country to the very gates of Rome, he was adviſed by St. Lewis king of France, to liſten to an accommodation. He accordingly ſent as ambaſſadors to Rome, Berthold patriarch of Aquileia, Everhard biſhop of Saltzburg, Seifried biſhop of Ratisbon, Sibold biſhop of Augsburg, and Leopold of Auſtria; but the pope received them ſo coldly and kept his pretenſions ſo high, that they returned without having come to any c concluſion.

THIS indifference proceeded from his confidence in the talents of Otho, whom he had ſent as his legate to excite troubles in Germany. That agent tampered in ſecret with the duke of Brunſwic, whom he knew to be diſaffected to Frederic, expatiated upon the wrongs and diſgraces which his family had ſuffered from the emperors ſince the reign of Barbaroſſa, and promiſed in the name of the pope, that he ſhould be elevated to the imperial throne, provided he would exert himſelf in forming a party againſt Frederic. The duke, notwithſtanding the ſuggeſtions of his ambition and revenge, refuſed to engage in ſuch a dangerous enterprize, which he had neither troops nor money to atchieve. The legate, repulſed in this quarter, convoked, in the name of his holineſs, an aſſembly of the princes at Wirtzburg, d where, after having previouſly ſounded every individual in private, he uttered a long harangue, exhorting them to elect a new emperor in the room of Frederic, who was excommunicated and depoſed.

HIS ſpeech was received with indignation, both by the eccleſiaſtic and ſecular princes, who broke up the aſſembly in ſuch a tumultuous manner, that the legate thought of nothing but conſulting the ſafety of his own perſon; and Gregory being made acquainted with the bad ſucceſs of his endeavours, became more tractable, and better diſpoſed towards a paci-

He even intimated theſe ſentiments to the emperor, who next year ſent back Leopold with the grand maſter of the Teutonic order, and then concluded a treaty of peace, promiſing, in the emperor's name, to pay 20,000 pieces of gold, to repair the damage he e had done in pillaging the towns belonging to the holy ſee. The ratifications of this treaty being exchanged, Frederic waited upon the pope at Anagni, where he was abſolved from the ſentence of the church, and magnificently entertained by his holineſs, in token of a perfect reconciliation [r].

NOTWITHSTANDING this agreement, the cities of Lombardy, which had withdrawn themſelves from the emperor's dominion during his quarrel with the pope, refuſed to return to

In this undertaking he conſumed five years without great ſucceſs, becauſe his operations were often interrupted by the affairs of Naples and Sicily; and at laſt he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, in order to quell the diſ- f turbances which had happened in Germany during his long abſence. He accordingly ſet out for the empire, uſing the more expedition in his journey, becauſe he underſtood his ſon Henry was employed in forming a conſpiracy againſt him.

THIS prince had engaged in his intereſt the cities of Milan and Bologna, the inhabitants of which hoped to render themſelves independent, by fomenting a quarrel between the father and the ſon; the biſhop of Strasbourg, and almoſt all the towns upon the Rhine, from Baſil to Cologne, declared for Henry, whoſe party was likewiſe eſpouſed by Frederic, duke of a Auſtria. Thus ſupported he convoked a diet at Boppart, where he explained the pretended motives of his defection, by complaining of the frequent quarrels between his father and the pope, which could not fail to be prejudicial to the empire, and of the little authority which was veſted in himſelf, who, as king of the Romans, ought to govern the empire in the abſence of the emperor. Theſe reaſons, though approved by great part of the aſſembly, were not ſatisfactory to the duke of Bavaria, and Herman, marquis of Baden, who adhering to their duty, ſent an account of this rebellion to Frederic, and exhorted him to come in perſon and diſpel the ſtorm.

He no ſooner received this intimation than he began his journey, and on his arrival in Germany held a diet at Mentz, where he employed his whole care and attention in repairing
b thoſe diſorders. He, in concert with the princes and ſtates of the empire, enacted ſeveral laws and conſtitutions for the adminiſtration of juſtice, and the re-eſtabliſhment of diſcipline and policy, both with regard to ſeculars and eccleſiaſtics; and, in a word, omitted nothing which could contribute to the public tranquillity. His ſon Henry having been convicted of rebellion, and of having entered into a confederacy againſt the emperor, inſtead of being puniſhed according to his demand was ſent to Sicily, that he might be removed at a good diſtance from the dangerous connections he had made.

His ſon Henry is convicted of rebellion. A. D. 1235.

Among other regulations made at this convention, the difference was terminated between the emperor and Otho of Lunenburg, who had ſeized by force of arms the caſtles and towns of Brunſwic and Lunenburg, on pretence of being heir to his grandfather Henry the Lion.
c Frederic erected theſe into duchies, of which he beſtowed the inveſtiture upon Otho, together with an authentic patent or charter, by which the mediate nobility, the citizens of Brunſwic, the inhabitants of its territory, and of Staden, were commanded to receive Otho as their duke, to take the oath of allegiance to him, and obey him as their lord, according to the laws and cuſtoms of the empire[s].

Mean while he carried on levies for raiſing a ſtrong army, that he might once more return to Lombardy, and ſubdue the cities which were aſſociated againſt him. About this time too he married the princeſs Iſabella, daughter of John, king of England. The pope being apprehenſive of the emperor's return into Italy, ſent a nuncio to diſſuade him from that expedition, and even proffered, if he would leave the affair of the revolted towns to his holi-
d neſs, he would engage they ſhould return to their duty and dependence upon the empire. Frederic, however, looking upon this promiſe as a ſnare laid for him, refuſed to accept the mediation propoſed, and continued unſhaken in his reſolution. He therefore ſet out upon this expedition, and when he entered Lombardy ſome ſtates ſubmitted of their own accord, and others were reduced by force; but the principal cities ſtill held out againſt him, confiding in the ſuccours which they had received from the Venetians, and in the ſupport which they and their confederates expected from Henry, king of the Romans, who had engaged in their cauſe at the inſtigation of the court of Rome. Nay, that prince, beſides this rebellious engagement, had continued his ſecret practices with ſeveral princes of Germany, who had promiſed to aſſiſt him on any emergency, and among others with the duke of Auſtria, upon e whom the emperor had conferred the title of king.

A. D. 1236. Frederic returns to Italy.

Frederic, being apprized of this new conſpiracy, conceived ſuch indignation againſt his ſon as intirely ſwallowed up the grudge he bore the pope, to whom he now made ſuch advances, as prevailed upon his holineſs to declare againſt Henry, and to prohibit the princes and ſtates of the empire, under pain of excommunication, to yield him ſuccour or obedience. This ſpiritual authority effectually retained the ſubjects in their duty; and the emperor, having ordered his ſon to be narrowly watched, at length found means to apprehend and confine him in a caſtle of Apulia, where he afterwards died[t].

Confines his ſon Henry.

f That the remains of this conſpiracy might be extinguiſhed, he ordered the dukes of Bohemia and Bavaria to take arms againſt Frederic duke of Auſtria, prince Henry's accomplice, until he himſelf ſhould be able to come and chaſtiſe him in perſon. It was not long before he enjoyed that opportunity; for having in ſome meaſure ſettled the affairs of Italy, and left the pope in terms of peace, he returned to Germany, ravaged the Auſtrian dominions with fire and ſword, and at laſt made himſelf maſter of the city of Vienna, where he founded the univerſity that now ſubſiſts[u]. After this expedition he aſſembled the ſtates of the empire, that they might elect his ſon Conrad king of the Romans; and that young prince was accordingly confirmed the ſame year, at another aſſembly held in the city of Spire[x]. The affairs of Germany, and the ſucceſſion, being ſettled in this manner, he forthwith reſolved to g repair again into Italy, having ſtill at heart the reduction of thoſe cities of Lombardy, which ſtill remained in arms, on pretence of defending thoſe privileges which were granted to them by Frederic Barbaroſſa. The army, which he now led into Italy, being very numerous and formidable, the city of Padua immediately ſurrendered; ſome other places, that made reſiſ-

tance, he ſacked, in order to intimidate the reſt; and all of a ſudden turned his whole forces againſt Milan, which was the centre of the league, and where all their troops were joined; ſo that, ſeeing their army equal in number to that of the emperor, they reſolved to wait him in the field. Accordingly a furious battle enſued, the event of which was long doubtful; but after it had raged for ſeveral hours with great carnage, the victory declared for the emperor [y]. Their general, Petro Tiepolo, ſon of the doge of Venice, together with their other chiefs, being taken priſoners, Frederic ordered them all to be put to death by the hand of the common hangman; and purſuing his advantage, attacked ſeveral places, ſome of which he pillaged and burnt, reſerving Milan for the laſt monument of his reſentment. This battle would have been deciſive, and the Lombard cities intirely ſubdued, had Frederic made a proper uſe of his victory, and proceeded with his warlike operations; but, inſtead of exerting himſelf in this manner, he continued inactive at Cremona, and allowed his enemies to reſpire. In the ſpring he marched into Piedmont, and exacted the oath of allegiance from the inhabitants of Verceil, Turin, and other towns in that province. He afterwards convoked an aſſembly at Pavia, in which he confirmed the privileges and revived the antient laws of the Lombard towns which were attached to his intereſt. The citizens of Milan ſued for peace by the interceſſion of the pope; but, as Frederic inſiſted upon their ſurrendering at diſcretion, they reſolved to periſh rather than ſubmit to his mercy, and made all the neceſſary preparations for continuing the war [z].

The emperor obtains a victory over the league. A. D. 1237.

Pope Gregory, ſenſibly touched with the ſucceſs of Frederic's arms, and particularly piqued at an edict which he had publiſhed to reform the abuſe of eccleſiaſtic tribunals; incenſed, moreover, at his ſeizing the revenues of vacant biſhoprics in Sicily, and beſtowing upon his natural ſon Entius the kingdom of Sardinia as feudatory of the empire, whereas he (Gregory) pretended it was a fief of the Roman church; the pope, I ſay, inſpired by theſe concurring motives, aſſociated himſelf with the Venetians and the cities of Lombardy, and was reconciled with Rome, from whence he had long ago been obliged to retire. On his return to that city, he ſent a nuncio to the emperor, exhorting him to deſiſt from thoſe violences, in conſideration of the favours he had received from the holy ſee; but Frederic, who had been informed of his ſecret connections with the league, diſmiſſed the nuncio without an anſwer; upon which his holineſs ſent back three cardinals upon the ſame errand, who being treated with the ſame diſregard, he had recourſe to thoſe weapons which he had formerly uſed againſt him. A new excommunication [a] was fulminated, and a bull ſent into Germany to ſow diviſion between the emperor and the princes and ſtates of the empire, who were ſubjected to the ſame ſentence, provided they ſhould perſiſt in their allegiance and attachment to Frederic (C). He likewiſe endeavoured to engage Saint Louis in his intereſt, and ſent a legate to prejudice him againſt the perſon and religion of the emperor, as well as to make a proffer of the imperial crown to his brother prince Robert, count of Artois [b]. But Louis would have no hand in ſuch violent proceedings; and plainly gave him to underſtand, that, granting he was diſpoſed to embrace the propoſal, the pope had no power or authority, either to dethrone the emperor, or give away the empire.

Is again excommunicated by the pope.

FREDERIC, who was at Padua when he received the news of this excommunication, ordered Peter de Vineis, his chancellor, to read an anſwer to it before the whole army, in which he refuted the calumnies which were invented and propagated to his prejudice [c]; and this anſwer he ſent into Germany, for the vindication of his honour and integrity. (C) In order to give the reader a juſt notion of the charity and Chriſtian forbearance of the popes, we ſhall tranſlate part of Gregory's bull againſt Frederic, which he ſent to the archbiſhop of Mentz.

"A beaſt of blaſphemy, replete with names, is riſen "from the ſea, with the feet of a bear, the face of a "lion, and members of other different animals; which, "like the pard, hath opened its mouth in blaſphemy "againſt the holy name; not even fearing to throw "the arrows of calumny againſt the tabernacle of God, "and the ſaints that dwell in heaven. This beaſt, de"ſirous of breaking every thing in pieces with its iron "teeth and nails, and of trampling all things under his "feet, hath already prepared private battering rams "againſt the wall of the Catholic faith; and now raiſes "open machines, in erecting ſoul-deſtroying ſchools of "Iſhmaelites; raiſing, according to report, in oppoſition to Chriſt the Redeemer of mankind, the tables of "whoſe covenant he attempts to aboliſh with the pen of "wicked hereſy:---be not therefore ſurprized at the "malice of this blaſphemous beaſt, if we, who are the "ſervant of the Almighty, ſhould be expoſed to the arrows of his deſtruction."

This king of plagues was even heard to ſay, "That "the whole world had been deceived by three mounte"banks; namely Jeſus Chriſt, Moſes, and Mahomet;" and openly affirmed "That two of them ſupported their "glory to the laſt; but the third was diſgracefully cru"cified"

Nor does Frederic ſeem to have been deficient in epithets of the ſame nature; for, in his apology to the princes of Germany, he calls the pope, "That wild beaſt "of which it is written;" and, "Another red horſe "aroſe from the ſea, and he that ſat upon him took "peace from the earth:---this great dragon, which ſe"duced the whole earth, is antichriſt, whoſe forerunner "he affirmed us to be (1)".

a produced all the effect he could desire in the minds of the princes, and kept all the members of the empire firmly united to their chief. Frederic, finding he had nothing to fear from that quarter, resolved to be amply revenged upon the Romans, and suspended all his other operations in order to march to Rome, where he thought his party was strong enough to procure his admission; but the pope, seconded by his clergy, bestirred themselves so artfully among the people, that this his favourite design proved abortive. It was upon this occasion that they engaged in a crusade against him as an enemy of the Christian faith; a step by which he was incensed to such a degree, that he ordered all the prisoners who wore the cross to be exposed to the most cruel tortures [d].

Makes an attempt upon Rome, and miscarries. A. D. 1239.

The emperor, baffled in his favourite scheme, ravaged the march of Trevisano, and en-
b tered the Milanese, in order to besiege the capital; but the inhabitants, having assembled all their own troops and those of their allies, engaged him in the open field, where, after a very obstinate and bloody dispute, his army was intirely routed; though, by favour of the night, he made shift to retreat into the territory of Placentia. There he ordered the bridge to be broken down, to prevent the pursuit of the enemy; and, in consequence of this expedient, he had time to reach Tuscany, where his troops enjoyed some repose.

Mean while all Italy became a prey to the two factions of the Guelphs and the Gibelines, which involved cities, relations, and even private families, in troubles, divisions, and civil butchery, where no quarter was given on either side. Frederic was looked upon by the Guelphs as a Mahometan, and an enemy to the Christian name; and he, on the other hand, c treated the Guelphs with the utmost cruelty and contempt. After the miscarriage of his attempt upon Rome, he took the road to Naples, and took vengeance upon all the Guelphs that fell in his way, giving quarter to none who were found in arms, but expelling, exiling, or imprisoning, the ecclesiastics, and even the cardinals; some of whom happened to fall into his hands. The pope having called a general council in Rome, many prelates from France and other countries assembled at Genoa, where five and twenty gallies being armed for their defence, and joined with those belonging to the pope, they set sail for Rome under that convoy; but being met by the gallies of the Sicilians and Pisans, who were in the emperor's service, a battle was fought, in which three of the Genoese gallies were sunk, and the rest taken, with three cardinals, and a great number of archbishops, bishops, and other ecclesiastics [e]. d In a word, this animosity raged with incredible obstinacy and rancour on both sides till the pope's death; and he being succeeded by Celestin IV. who enjoyed the papacy but eighteen days, the holy see remained vacant for twenty months, during which Frederic sollicited the cardinals to a new election, though he still refused to release those he had taken prisoners; but they as absolutely insisting upon the enlargement of their brethren before they would fill up the vacancy, he was at length prevailed upon to set them at liberty; and the whole college repairing to Anagni, elected Innocent IV. the cardinal who of all others had expressed the greatest regard for the emperor and his interest. Accordingly that prince was congratulated upon his promotion; but Frederic, who had more penetration, replied, that he had no reason to rejoice at an event which deprived him of the friendship of a cardinal, and ine tailed upon him the hatred of a pope [d]. Nor was he deceived in his prognostic.

Takes vengeance on the Guelphs.

Innocent IV. is elected pope, A. D. 1243.

The chief care of the new pope and his cardinals was to procure peace for Italy, which the emperor would not grant, but on condition of keeping what he possessed; whereas his holiness demanded restitution of the towns which had been taken from the church, as the only basis of a sincere and solid accommodation; and insisted upon his doing homage for the kingdom of Naples. Though the emperor refused to comply with these demands, he offered to refer the dispute to the decision of the kings of France and England; but Innocent would not submit to this arbitration. At length they agreed to an interview in the city of Castello, in order to discuss these points, and compromise the affair; but whether the pope had been really apprized of the emperor's intention to seize upon his person, as he affected
f to give out, or only spread that report as a specious pretext for declining the interview, certain it is he would not keep the appointment; and understanding that Frederic was incensed against him for that reason, he resolved to elude his resentment by flying for refuge into France. With this design he privately sent for the Genoese gallies, in which he embarked for Civita Vecchia, and was convoyed to Genoa; from whence, passing through Savoy, he arrived in safety at Lyons, where he immediately took measures for convoking a general council; sending his bulls to the archbishops, bishops, and prelates of Germany, France, Italy, and other kingdoms, that they might assemble at Lyons on the twenty-fourth of June, to deliberate on the measures which should be taken for the security and advantage of the church. In consequence of this call a great many prelates repaired to Lyons, where the emperor was summoned to appear, in order to purge himself of what was laid to his charge, and threatened with the thunder of the church, in case he should fail in his obedience. Tho'

this citation appeared very ſtrange to the emperor, who obſerved that the pope had erected himſelf into a ſovereign judge, whereas all the councils of old had been convoked by the emperors, where the popes and prelates did homage, and obeyed them as their natural lords, he did not fail, however, to ſend ambaſſadors to Lyons, who fairly refuted all the accuſations of the pope, and juſtified him with ſuch ſucceſs, that ſeveral members of the aſſembly declared in his favour. Nevertheleſs, he was excommunicated [c] (D): but he was very little concerned at this ſentence; which, when he heard, "I was, ſaid he, before this "excommunication, obedient to the pope and the laws of the church; but now, that he "has diſpenſed with my duty in that particular, I neither owe him obedience nor reſpect, and "continue emperor notwithſtanding." The pope was very much chagrined at this contempt, and repented of having carried matters to ſuch extremity; but finding himſelf engaged too far to retract, he exerted himſelf ſo induſtriouſly by his emiſſaries, that ſome princes of the empire were prevailed upon to proceed to the election of a king of the Romans. Accordingly, the three eccleſiaſtic electors, together with the biſhops of Bremen, Strasbourg, Metz, and Spire, the duke of Brabant, and Henry landgrave of Thuringia, aſſembled on Aſcenſion-day at Frankfort, and elected this laſt king of the Romans, who was afterwards ſurnamed The king of Prieſts. In favour of this election the pope ſollicited ſuccours from all quarters, and preſented the new king with five and twenty thouſand marks of ſilver, to enable him to ſupport the war againſt Conrad, whom the emperor had left as his lieutenant in Germany; ſo that Henry, being in a condition to take the field, gave him battle, and obtained a conſiderable advantage. He afterwards made an irruption into the duchy of Suabia, part of the emperor's hereditary dominions, and made an attempt upon Reutlingen, which was ſo valiantly defended by the burghers, that he was obliged to retire. He likewiſe attacked the city of Ulm, where he received a wound from an arrow, of which, in a few days, he died.

and excommunicates the emperor. A. D. 1245.

Henry landgrave of Thuringia, elected king of the Romans.

THE emperor, underſtanding the bad ſituation of his affairs in Germany, reſolved to go in perſon to Lyons, and ſollicit an accommodation with the pope. For this purpoſe he had obtained a ſafe-conduct from the king of France; and leaving his Italian affairs to the direction of his natural ſon, Entius king of Sardinia, he actually ſet out for that kingdom; but, on his arrival at Piedmont, he received the news of Parma's being ſurpriſed by the troops of his holineſs, while Entius, with a part of the garriſon, was employed in the attack of Breſcia. This information obliged him to abandon his firſt deſign, and return with all expedition into Italy, where he obſtinately attached himſelf to the ſiege of Parma; which, being well fortified, made ſuch a vigorous defence, that he reſolved to reduce it by famine. He accordingly ſurrounded it with a high wall, and built hard by a new city, called Victoria, which in a little time was as well inhabited as any other town in Italy [f].

The emperor ſets out for Lyons, but returns on account of Parma's being ſurpriſed. A. D. 1247.

FREDERIC perſiſting in his deſign upon Parma, ſeveral months were ineffectually conſumed before it, during which he took no ſtep to remedy the bad ſituation of his more important affairs; and this ſupine neglect gave the pope and his partizans ſuch a handle over him, that they found no difficulty in convoking at Nuitz an aſſembly of ſeveral princes of the empire, eccleſiaſtic as well as ſecular, where, in the room of the landgrave of Thuringia, they elected William, count of Holland, king of the Romans [g]. The cities of Cologn, Mentz, and Strasbourg, approved of this election; but thoſe of Worms, Spire, Landau, and Weiſſenbourg, together with others of Suabia and Bavaria, preſerved their fidelity to the emperor and Conrad, in ſpite of all the excommunications of the pope. Mean while the emperor, ſtill attached to the ſiege of Parma, lived in the midſt of enemies and traitors, who, as they could not execute their revenge upon him in open war, had recourſe to poiſon, during an indiſpoſition which confined him to his bed. For this purpoſe, they bribed not only his firſt phyſician, but alſo Peter de Vineis, a native of Capua, who was his chancellor and intimate friend, who undertook his deſtruction by means of a poiſoned draught; but

(D) The pope declared Frederic attainted and convicted of ſacrilege and hereſy, excommunicated, and dethroned; commanded the electors to proceed to the election of another emperor, and reſerved to himſelf the diſpoſal of Sicily. This ſentence being pronounced, the pope ſung Te Deum; and all the prelates anathematized Frederic, extinguiſhing their tapers by holding the flames downwards.

If we may believe Matthew Paris, the emperor, who was then at Turin, received the news of this ceremony with tranſports of rage very unbecoming a prince of his dignity. He called for the caſket in which the imperial ornaments were kept; and putting the crown upon his head, "Innocent, cried he, has not yet deprived me of "this, nor will I give it up without abundance of blood-"ſhed; but we ſhall ſee how he and his adherents will "ſupport this inſtance of audacity."

Certain it is, he wrote to almoſt all the princes of Chriſtendom, vindicating his own conduct, expatiating upon the pope's violence and injuſtice, complaining of their indifference, and ſolliciting their aſſiſtance (1).

(1) Matth. Paris, p. 702.

Frederic,

a Frederic, being luckily apprized of their purpoſe, refuſed the cup when it was preſented to him; though Peter de Vineis intreated him to take the medicine, of which, he ſaid, he would ſoon feel the good effects. The phyſician likewiſe joining in the remonſtrance, the emperor fixed his eyes upon him, and ordered him to drink one-half of it to his health. Confounded at this command, he pretended to ſtumble, as if by accident, and ſpilt one-half of the medicine. This expedient, however, was not ſo artfully executed, but that all who were preſent perceived his guilt and confuſion; upon which he and his accomplice the chancellor were immediately put under arreſt, and what remained in the glaſs given to a condemned malefactor, who inſtantly died of the doſe. This being a convincing proof of their treacherous intention, the phyſician was ſtrangled; and the chancellor's eyes being put out, b he was abandoned to the reſentment of the Piſans, who were his mortal enemies [h]. But this miſerable traitor daſhed out his own brains againſt a pillar, in order to anticipate their ridicule and reſentment.

NOT long after this event, fortune, which had hitherto favoured Frederic, all at once declared againſt him. He ſtill continued his operations before Parma; but as, in thoſe tedious ſieges, the troops are apt to relax in their vigilance and diſcipline, and ſink into a dangerous ſecurity, the beſieged took the advantage of Frederic's careleſſneſs and neglect; and making a furious and unexpected ſally, cut in pieces the greateſt part of the imperial troops; and purſuing thoſe that fled, entered with them pell-mell into their camp and city, and put all they found to the ſword. It was impoſſible to reſiſt the torrent; ſo that the emperor, c who was altogether unprovided for reſiſtance, mounted his horſe unarmed, and eſcaped to Cremona; while the Parmeſans pillaged his palace and camp, and razed his new city of Victoria to the ground. The report of this victory, being ſpread over all Italy, not only raiſed the ſpirits of the Guelphs, and the reputation of the legate, Gregory Montelongo, who had conducted the enterprize, but likewiſe overwhelmed the Gibelines with diſmay and deſpondence. The emperor, indeed, without allowing himſelf to be dejected at this overthrow, re-aſſembled all his ſcattered troops, and reinforced them with the Gibelines, who flocked to him from all quarters: but his reputation being greatly diminiſhed by this defeat, no town of any conſideration would receive him; and to crown the misfortune, he learned, while he remained in Tuſcany, that his natural ſon Entius, king of Sardinia, with whom he had ind truſted the command of his troops, had marched againſt the Bolognians, by whom he was defeated and taken priſoner; and what added to his affliction on this occaſion, was their refuſing all the offers of ranſom which he made in behalf of that prince, who ended his life among them, after a captivity of twenty years.

A. D. 1248. Frederic is defeated by the Parmeſans.

His natural ſon Entius is taken priſoner by the Bolognians.

THE emperor, being thus deſtitute of all other reſource, reſolved to return to his kingdom of Naples, in order to recruit his army; for which purpoſe he carried on levies with great diligence. Mean while he ſettled his private affairs with reſpect to the partition of his dominions, which he regulated in this manner: To his natural ſon, Mainfroy, he bequeathed the principality of Tarentum, together with the government of his hereditary dominions in Italy, for the term of ten years. Entius had been already ſettled in the kingdom of Sar-
e dinia; to Henry, his third ſon, he gave the kingdom of Sicily, and Auſtria to Frederic, his grandſon, by the late Henry, his firſt-born of the firſt marriage; to Conrad he left the kingdoms of Naples, Jeruſalem, and Italy, together with the duchy of Suabia, and the empire. As for his two daughters, one of them was already married to Albert landgrave of Thuringia (E), and the other to the landgrave of Heſſe. In a few days after this diſtribution, he died of a fever, in the fifty-fifth year of his age [i] (F).

He retires to his kingdam of Naples, and dies.

FREDERIC was certainly a prince of great genius, erudition, courage, and fortitude, and might be juſtly ranked amongſt the moſt accompliſhed princes, if the violence of his temper, the cruelty of his revenge, and his exceſſive appetite for women, had not contributed to tarniſh the glory of his reputation (G).

(E) His eldeſt daughter, Margaret, was very unhappy in her marriage with Albert, landgrave of Thuringia, who, at the inſtigation of one of his miſtreſſes, reſolved to make away with her in the caſtle of Wartburg, near Eiſenac; but thoſe who were employed to execute his barbarous deſign reſpected the princeſs ſo much, as to give her an opportunity to eſcape into a convent in Frankfort. She had two ſons by him, Frederic and Dietmann; at parting with whom ſhe bit a mark in the cheek of the eldeſt, that he might remember, ſo long as he lived, the wrongs of his mother, and revenge them with the firſt convenient opportunity. Accordingly Frederic, when he came to be of age, expelled his father from his dominions, and compelled him to fly for ſhelter to Erfort, where he died in miſery (1).

A. D. 1250. Is succeeded by Conrad, who had narrowly escaped assassination.

WE have already seen that Conrad, when he was no more than eight years of age, had been elected and crowned king of the Romans in the room of his elder brother; but we have not yet observed, that ten years after his election, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Otho, king of Bavaria, nor mentioned an accident that happened to him after his defeat by Henry of Thuringia, commonly called King of Priests. This was an attempt upon his life by the bishop of Ratisbon and the abbot of St. Emeran. Conrad, after the battle, had retired into the city of Ratisbon, of which some time before he had made himself master, and with a small retinue went to lodge at the aforesaid abbey. The bishop, looking upon this as a favourable opportunity for his execrable design, sent thither in the night some soldiers to assassinate Conrad, when he should be asleep: but he having happily changed his apartment, the murderers killed two of his attendants by mistake, and retired upon a supposition that they had done their business; while Conrad, waked by the noise, escaped to his army, which was encamped under the city walls. Next day he ordered the bishop and abbot to be apprehended, and the abbey to be demolished. The bishop was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, the abbot was deprived of his benefice, and Hochfels, who had murdered the two attendants and fled, was in a few days struck dead with thunder [h].

He sets out for his Italian dominions, quarrels with the pope, and dies. A. D. 1254.

CONRAD no sooner received the news of his father's death, than he assumed the quality of emperor, and set out for Germany to take possession of his hereditary dominions; but the cities of Naples, Capua, and Aquina, had put themselves under the protection of the holy see. He therefore marched towards Naples, which he invested and took after a siege of eight months. But he did not long enjoy this conquest in peace; for he was engaged in several quarrels with the church of Rome, and in a little time fell sick and died, leaving by his wife, Elizabeth of Bavaria, an only son, called Conradin, at that time in the third year of his age. His brother prince Henry, who had come to congratulate him upon the success of his arms, did not live to see his untimely fate; but was cut off in the blossom of his youth, not without suspicion of foul play. Some authors affirm, that Conrad was poisoned by his natural brother Mainfroy, prince of Tarentum, who taking the advantage of the minority of young Conradin, whom his father had left in Germany, seized upon the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily [i].

WILLIAM II. count of Holland, son of Florentinus IV. had been, in the twentieth year of his age, elected king of the Romans, in an assembly near Cologn, by several princes of the empire, who were in the interest of the pope, and declared enemies of Frederic and his son Conrad. As his coronation at Aix la Chapelle was supposed to be a matter of great importance, and that city had declared for his competitor, it was taken after a long siege [k], when he was crowned in it with the usual solemnity; and some time after that ceremony, he had engaged and defeated Conrad in a severe battle.

AT the death of the emperor Frederic, he assumed all the ensigns of the imperial dignity, which was confirmed to him by the pope. In order to support himself against the party of Conrad, he entered into an alliance with Otho, duke of Brunswick, whose daughter he espoused, and a very remarkable accident happened to him on his wedding-night.

SOME tradesmen being at work in a chamber near the apartments of the new-married couple, a candle's end happened to fall among straw, which it immediately kindled; and the flames raged with such violence, that the miserable workmen perished, and William, with his bride, were obliged to run out of the palace naked, with such precipitation, that their jewels, furniture, and apparel, were left to the mercy of that devouring element.

THIS was not the only hazardous accident which this unfortunate emperor escaped; for being that same year at Utrecht, to which city he had repaired in order to concert measures for his journey to Rome, whither he was invited by the pope, to his coronation, he was dered it a scene of rapine, misery, and blood: they raised up two competitors against his son Conrad in Germany; they supported the league of the Italian cities against himself; they denounced excommunications, and even preached up crusades, as if he had been an enemy of the Christian name; and, lastly, employed all their industry and invention, in order to murder his reputation. For this reason we ought to be upon our guard, when we read the accounts of him written by monks, bigotted to the church of Rome, with which he was always at variance.

Certain it is, he was a great encourager of learning: he set up schools at Naples, and caused Aristotle and other antient authors, to be translated from the Greek and Arabian languages; and with regard to his settling a colony of Saracens at Nocera, for which he hath been much exclaimed against, the malice and rancour of the Guelphs are sufficient excuses for his having taken any step of that kind, which might contribute to his own safety and advantage.

a. ſo terribly wounded with a ſtone from an unknown hand, that he had almoſt loſt his life.

THE party of this young prince did not make much progreſs in Germany againſt the noblemen who refuſed to acknowlege him as king of the Romans; nor was he ſtrong enough to ſubdue them by force, involved, as he happened to be, in a war with Margaret counteſs of Hainault, who wanted to defraud her eldeſt ſon by her firſt huſband of his inheritance, that ſhe might beſtow it upon the ſons of her ſecond marriage. The diſpute had been referred to the arbitration of Lewis king of France, and Eudes, the pope's legate; but John d' Avenes, the eldeſt ſon, being diſſatisfied with their deciſion, had recourſe to arms; and with the aſſiſtance of William king of the Romans, who was his brother-in-law, reduced the mother and her younger ſons to ſuch extremity, that ſhe was fain to cede the county of b Hainault to Charles count of Anjou, the French king's brother, on condition that he would aſſiſt her with his forces. Thus ſupported, ſhe renewed the war with various ſucceſs, until it was terminated by a treaty at Bruſſels, effected by the mediation of France [l].

William count of Holland, engaged in a war with Margaret counteſs of Hainault.

WHILE this affair was in agitation, William neglected no opportunity to conciliate the affection of the German princes and ſtates. He gratified John and Otho, marquiſſes of Brandenburg, with the reverſion of the imperial fiefs in Saxony; he beſtowed on Thomas of Savoy the inveſtiture of Turin, Montealier, Ivrea, and ſeveral other fiefs that conſtitute the power and greatneſs of the houſe of Maurienne; and confirmed the rights and privileges which had been granted to Thomas of Savoy by the emperor Frederic II. He likewiſe pac tronized and protected a league, or aſſociation, formed by the cities of Frankfort, Mentz, Cologn, Worms, and Spire, for the defence of their commerce, which in thoſe times of confuſion had ſuffered grievouſly from a number of little petty noblemen, poſſeſſed of caſtles, who lived upon plunder and rapine; and the effects of this ſociety were ſo viſibly advantageous to the public, that almoſt all the trading towns of Germany and Flanders ſued for admiſſion; ſo that, in one year after the inſtitution, the confederacy included above threeſcore towns, together with a good number of noblemen, zealous to encourage the commerce of their ſubjects. This, in all probability, is the true epocha of the general union among the hans towns [m]; tho' ſuch a treaty had long before ſubſiſted between Lubec, Hamburgh, and Bremen; in conſequence of which, veſſels of war were maintained at the comd mon charge, in order to protect their commerce; their bills were negotiated without difficulty, and a firm credit was mutually eſtabliſhed among them.

He conciliates the affection of the German noblemen, and patronizes the union of the hans-towns.

AT this period, however, neither theſe three cities, nor the noblemen of Lower Saxony, could engage in this aſſociation, becauſe the war, in which they were involved by the Danes, would not permit them to contract new engagements. Lubec had fitted out a fleet againſt Eric king of Denmark, who had quarrelled with his three brothers; and they, finding themſelves unable to cope with ſuch an antagoniſt, had ſollicited aſſiſtance of the regency of this town, as well as of the dukes of Saxony, and the marquis of Brandenburg. By means of theſe allies, the brothers Abel, Canut, and Chriſtopher, maintained the war for ſome time, though with indifferent ſucceſs, until a reconciliation was effected by the mediation of Jean e of Brandenburg, and the dukes of Saxony and Brunſwick. After this accommodation, king Eric was betrayed and murdered by the accomplices of his brother Abel, who immediately mounted the throne, and reigned with the moſt arbitrary ſway. In particular, he impoſed grievous taxes upon the Friezelanders; and they being incapable of raiſing the ſums which he demanded, he laid waſte their country with fire and ſword, oppreſſing them to ſuch a degree, that they became deſperate, ran to arms, attacked him in his camp, routed his forces, and purſued him into a moraſs, where he periſhed.

Inteſtine troubles of Denmark.

HIS eldeſt ſon, Waldemar, being at that time priſoner to the archbiſhop of Cologn, his brother Chriſtopher took the advantage of his nephew's abſence to ſeize the crown of Denmark; and, under pretence of being guardian to Abel's children, took poſſeſſion of the duchy f of Sleſwic, which they inherited by the death of their father. The counts of Holſtein, who were uncles to the children of Abel by the mother's ſide, after having made fruitleſs remonſtrances to Chriſtopher on the ſubject of this unjuſt encroachment, ſollicited aid of John and Otho, marquiſſes of Brandenburg, whoſe troops enabled them to retake the town of Sleſwic, and reduce the reſt of Holſtein under their power; while the fleet of Lubec ravaged the coaſts of Scania, and a rebellion broke out in the heart of Denmark.

CHRISTOPHER, thus hampered on all hands, gladly liſtened to propoſals for an accommodation, which was concluded by the good offices of the dukes of Saxony, on condition that Chriſtopher ſhould reſtore the duchy of Sleſwic, to his nephews, and that they ſhould renounce all pretenſions to the crown. This affair being ſettled, young Waldemar was, g after having been a priſoner four years, ſet at liberty, in conſideration of a ranſom paid to the archbiſhop of Cologn, by whom he had been arreſted at Bonn, without any cauſe aſſigned [n].

A crusade against the Prussians.

DURING these transactions, an army of German crusards, under the command of Ottocarus king of Bohemia, marched into Prussia to the relief of the Teutonic knights, who had been deprived of several towns, and cooped up in others, by the infidels of the country, reinforced with a body of Tartars. The German auxiliaries, being joined by the knights, worsted these idolaters in several encounters, and at last defeated them in a pitched battle; after which the town of Elburg surrendered at discretion, the Prussian generals were baptized, and, upon this occasion, the town of Konigsberg was founded by the Teutonic knights [o]. a

The affairs of Italy.

WHILE William endeavoured to establish himself in Germany, great part of Italy was involved in war and confusion. The young Conradin, who still remained in Germany with his mother, Elizabeth of Bavaria, had been recommended by his father to the protection of the holy see; and Mainfroy, who acted as regent for the kingdom of Sicily, sent his ambassadors to pope Innocent to signify this request. His holiness accordingly promised to defend his ward, and preserve for him the kingdom of Jerusalem, the duchy of Suabia, and the other great fiefs that belonged to the emperor Frederic; but, at the same time, he commanded Mainfroy to leave the administration of Sicily to the holy see, of which it was a fief, and excommunicated him from non-compliance. Mainfroy, who harboured the design of seizing the kingdom for himself, finding the pope's party very strong in Sicily, thought proper to temporize, and deprecate the wrath of Innocent, who, in consequence of this submission, freed him from the censure of the church, confirmed him in the principality of Tarentum, and appointed him his lieutenant for a great part of the kingdom. But this harmony was not of long duration: a nobleman of the pope's court being assassinated, Mainfroy was suspected of having contrived the murder, because he had been at enmity with the defunct; and though he exerted all his endeavours to acquit himself of the imputation, he could not vindicate his character to the satisfaction of the pope, who resolved to arrest and punish him as a malefactor. Mainfroy, apprized of his intent, retired to Lucera, where he was received with open arms by the Saracen inhabitants, who supplied him with money to raise an army; then, taking the field, he marched towards Troja, where he defeated the ecclesiastical troops commanded by the pope's legate. Innocent did not long survive this misfortune; and dying at Naples, was succeeded by Alexander IV. whose first care, after his elevation, was to check the progress of Mainfroy. He appointed a new legate to command the troops in the room of the cardinal de Fresque, who was lately dead, and bestowed upon the marquis of Honebruc the post of high-steward of the kingdom of Naples: but this new general, finding himself inferior in strength to Mainfroy, sued for peace, and an accommodation was effected, though the pope refused to ratify the treaty; and holding the throne of Sicily as vacant, offered it to Edmund, second son of Henry III. king of England: nay, he ordered a crusade to be preached up in that kingdom against Mainfroy; and, borrowing great sums of money upon the credit of the English monarch, reinforced his army commanded by cardinal Octaviano Ubaldini, and ordered him to besiege Mainfroy in Nocera. The prince of Tarentum, however, saved him that trouble, by attacking him in the field with such fury, that the papal forces were intirely routed, and the victor made himself master of Capua, Labour, Apulia, and the greatest part of Calabria; thence he transported his army into Sicily, which he soon reduced to his obedience; while his holiness retired to Viterbo, to wait for a reinforcement from England [p]. b

The king of the Romans exposed to unfortunate accidents, and slain by the Frizelanders. A. D. 1256.

MEAN while William king of the Romans undertook an expedition against the Frizelanders, who had revolted; because he not only exacted homage of them to the counts of Holland, but also wanted to abrogate their antient laws and privileges, which had been granted and confirmed by Charlemagne. In the prosecution of this design, he met with a misfortune which proved his last; for attempting to pass over the morasses, which were frozen, in order to reconnoitre the burgh of Hochwend, without any attendants, the ice broke, and he and his horse stuck fast in the mud. The Frizelanders, seeing him in this situation, killed him [q], without knowing who he was, and carried his body into the burgh; but afterwards, understanding it was the emperor they had slain, they privately buried him in a burgher's house, being afraid of a severe chastisement from the princes of Germany for having shed the blood of their sovereign. Thus perished that unfortunate young prince, who, by his courage and accomplishments, was worthy of a better fate. c d e f

The empire involved in troubles and confusion.

THE election of the landgrave of Thuringia, and that of the count of Holland, both of which were effected by the practices of Rome against Frederic II. had divided Germany into such violent factions, as entirely destroyed public peace and good order. The clergy took arms against the laity, the weak were oppressed by the strong, and laws divine and human were disregarded; nay, to such a degree of disorder did those disturbances rise, that, as we have already observed, the towns of Spire, Frankfort, Bingen, and Oppenheim, were obliged g a to enter into an association for the security of commerce and the public roads; and Louis, count palatine, seeing the good effects of this confederacy, desired to be included in the league which, by his example, was reinforced by a great number of other towns and noblemen (H). These confederates abolished the toll upon rivers, which had been introduced and augmented during the troubles; by which means, the tranquillity of those countries was restored, though it was soon destroyed by the villainy of those, who wanted to convert the public disorder to their own private advantage.

AFTER the death of the emperor William, the princes several times assembled, in order to elect a successor; but these meetings produced no effect, because no prince would undertake such a weighty charge. At length, however, Conrad, archbishop of Cologn, made a b proffer of it to Richard, duke of Cornwall, brother to Henry III. king of England, who accepted the proposal, and repaired to Germany[r]. It is remarkable of this prelate, who was devoted to the court of Rome, that by his address he had, since the excommunication of the emperor Frederic II. raised three princes successively to the dignity of the king of the Romans, namely, Henry, landgrave of Thuringia; William, count of Holland; and this Richard, duke of Cornwall. With regard to this last, indeed, foreseeing the difficulty he should have in elevating him to the imperial throne without the archbishop of Mentz, who had been kept prisoner a whole year by Albert of Brunswic, he engaged Richard, over and above the vast presents he had already made him, to pay eight thousand marks of silver for the ransom of that prelate, on condition he should assist him with his vote and interest for obtaining the c crown. Accordingly the archbishop of Mentz, being released, convoked a diet at Frankfort, where Richard was elected by the two archbishops, Louis, count palatine, his brother Henry, and some others, who had been influenced by their advice[s]. On the other hand, the archbishop of Triers, and some other princes, who refused to appear at this election, held another assembly, in which they declared for Alphonso, king of Castile, surnamed the Astrologer; and the archbishop having obtained, by proxy, the votes of the king of Bohemia, the duke of Saxony, and the marquis of Brandenboug, in favour of that prince, dispatched into Spain the bishops of Spire and Constance to inform him of his election[t]. Alphonso accepted this honour with many acknowlegements; but as his war against the Moors hindered him from repairing into Germany at that time, he dismissed the ambassadors, after having treated

d them with great magnificence, and loaded them with presents for the electors, and other princes of Germany. Nevertheless, those who had espoused the cause of Richard did not desist from their enterprize: he was conducted to Aix-la-Chapelle, and, with his empress Sanctia (I), crowned on the Ascension-day, by the hands of the archbishop of Cologn. This ceremony being performed, he visited the towns situated upon the Rhine, namely, Cologn, Bopport, Wesel, Mentz, Oppenheim, Frankfort, Worms, and Spire, from which he received the usual homage. But this was no more than a fire of straw; for this prince being exhausted by the great largesses he was obliged to make in purchasing votes for his election, and finding himself without credit (K), friends, or resource, to maintain the imperial dignity, was obliged to abandon the empire, and retire into England, where he ended his days. But he

e did not abandon Germany before he committed the care of the empire to three vicars, namely, Werner de Falkenstein, archbishop of Mentz, who governed Alsace; Philip de Falkenstein, who

(H) In this association were likewise engaged Gerhard, elector of Mentz; Conrad, elector of Cologne; Arnold, elector of Triers; Jacob, bishop of Metz; the abbot of Fulde; Conrad Wilgraf; Richard, count of Catzenclubogen; Frederic, count of Luningen; Berthold, count of Zeigenhagen; Ernich and Galtfrede Wiltgraves; Pappo, lord of Tubingen; Ulrich, count of Baor; the count of Wirnberg; Sophia, landgravine of Thuringia; Adelbert, countess of Leinengen; the lords of Tireberg; Ulrich of Mentzenber; Gerlach of Limberg; Philip of Henckenfelt; Philip of Falckenstein; the lord of Starenberg; the cup-bearer of Erbach; the steward of Altzey; Henry Ermberg; Runbost of Steinbach; the cities of Cologne, Strasbourg, Basil, Zurich, Fribourg, Brisac, Colmar, Schelestat, Haguenau, Weissenbourg, Neustadt, Wimpfen, Heidelbourg, Lauterbourg, Freideberg, Witzlar, Gleinhausen, Marburg, Altzfelt, Fulde, Mulhausen, Achuffenburg, Seligstadt, Diebach, Bacharach, Wesel, Boppart, Andernach, Bonn, Neus, Aix-la-Chapelle, Munster, Bremen, Bravenberg, and Hirchsfelt (9).

(I) Richard's wife Sanctia, or Senchia, was sister of Philip, count of Falkenstein. She was counted the most beautiful woman of her time, and captivated Richard, who married her at Worms, where their nuptials were celebrated with extraordinary magnificence (1).

(K) Richard's money entirely failing in the city of Basil, the princes of Germany took that opportunity of abandoning him; giving out, that they had not elected him for his personal merit, but solely for his riches; so they sent to him a formal act, by which they renounced the oath of allegiance they had taken, and he was fain to make the best of his way into his own country (2).

One may judge of these largesses by which he was exhausted, by the immense sums he possessed before his election. Such were his treasures, that he was in a condition to spend an hundred marks a day for the space of ten years, without touching the revenues he drew from Germany and England (3).

RICHARD, at his coronation, invested Ottocarus with the kingdom of Bohemia, and the duchy of Austria. In passing thro' Flanders, he received homage for the county of Hainault from Guy de Dampierre, whom he created a prince of the empire; together with the renunciation of prince Henry to the duchy of Brabant in favour of his brother John; and performed many other acts of sovereignty before he returned to England, where he still preserved the title of king of the Romans, tho' he did not concern himself much with the affairs [u] of the empire (L).

AFTER Richard's abdication, Alphonso might have peaceably enjoyed the empire, had not his wars with the Moors rendered it impossible for him to quit his own dominions. Nevertheless he likewise exercised the imperial authority with respect to Frederic, duke of Lorraine, who brought the news of his election: he gave him the investiture of his duchy in the most solemn manner, and assigned to him an annual pension of a thousand marks upon the city of Burgos, in consideration of the homage which he rendered to Alphonso in the market-place of Toledo, according to the custom of Castile. b

EACH competitor sollicited the pope to confirm and support his election, and annul the pretensions of his antagonist. However, they received nothing but evasive answers from his Holiness, who thought proper to observe a strict neutrality, that he might not, by espousing either party, give offence to one of the two princes whose friendship was of such consequence to the Roman church. From the kingdom of England he drew very large subsidies, and the arms of Alphonso were necessary to curb the insolence of the infidels in Spain, over whom the king of Castile had obtained several complete victories. c which is involved in trouble and confusion.

FROM the departure of Richard, therefore, to the election of Rodolphus, the empire may be said to have been without a chief, and, during that inter-regnum, suffered all the miseries of a country abandoned to destruction: no laws were observed, no order was maintained; murder, theft, and all sorts of license, were committed with impunity; the poor and weak subjected to the most miserable oppression; and the constitutions of the empire utterly neglected and laid aside. These disorders were not confined to Germany; they passed the Alps, and the greatest part of the cities and states of Italy, which depended upon the empire, either erected themselves into independent republics, or chose princes from the number of their own citizens. In short, universal confusion prevailed, and the accounts we have of these times partake of that confusion; for they generally content themselves with lamenting the deplorable condition of their country, without giving a regular detail of the incidents that constituted its distress. Bishops and prelates had recourse to arms, and shed each other's blood for the defence or augmentation of their benefices; implacable quarrels, and incessant wars were kindled, and raged with great violence among private noblemen, on the most trivial disputes; nothing but rapine and robbery prevailed; travelling was become unsafe; commerce almost altogether extinguished; and anarchy reigned in full despotism. d

IN vain did the princes convoke assemblies to remedy these evils: as there was no supreme authority to influence and direct their deliberations, they produced nothing but fruitless debate and altercation; and sometimes the disputes of individuals terminated in open defiance and bloodshed. e

HARRASSED by these miseries, the princes of Germany resolved to proceed to a new election; and Werner, archbishop of Mentz, convoked a diet, at which it was supposed that young Conradin would be elevated to the imperial throne; but pope Urban, being apprized of their intention, forbad them to chuse the grandson of Frederic II. on pain of excommunication; and at the same time undertook to determine the difference between Alphonso of Castile and Richard of England, within a limited time; before the expiration of which he died; and Clement IV. his successor, left the dispute still undecided.

IN the mean time, the empire continued to groan under the most severe oppression; and the people, instead of exercising their endeavours to re-establish the peace of their own country, were so infatuated as to take up the cross, and form an expedition against the Prussian pagans, who had once more quarrelled with the Teutonic knights. f

AT length the miseries of Germany became so intolerable, that leagues were formed between cities and states for their mutual security; noblemen engaged in contracts of confraternity, in consequence of which they obliged themselves to assist one another with their

(L) Tho' we follow the most authentic historians in saying, that Richard did not meddle with the affairs of the empire after his first return to England, Thomas Wick, in his chronicle, affirms, that he repaired at three different times to Germany, and even governed the empire till his dying day (3).

a lives and fortunes; and in caſe either party died without male iſſue, his lands and ſuperiorities devolved to the ſurvivor. This kind of pactum, or covenant, was afterwards much practiſed in the empire, but could not take place without the ſanction of the diet, and the conſent of the ſtates belonging to the contracting parties [x].

It was alſo during this inter-regnum that ſome princes, and a good number of cities, ſeeing their laws without force, and the empire without a chief, or judge, for the adminiſtration of juſtice, inſtituted certain arbitrators, whom they called Auſtreques, inveſted with ſovereign power, to decide all differences and ſuits that might happen among the conſtituents. Their office laſted but ſix months, at the end of which others were choſen; and this tribunal continued in force till the reign of Maximilian I. who ſubjected their juriſdiction b to the diet of the empire [y].

But, waving the particular ſcenes of violence, injuſtice, and uſurpation, we ſhall proceed to the relation of an event, which, tho' it does not immediately regard the empire, is yet naturally connected with it, being an account of the laſt prince of one of its moſt powerful families.

MAINFROY, the emperor Frederic's baſtard ſon, ſeeing the whole houſe of Suabia reduced to Conradin, who was an infant, had ſeized upon the kingdom of Naples, and become ſo powerful as to rouſe the jealouſy of pope Urban IV. who, that he might not have a maſter ſo near him, made an offer of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily to Charles, brother of St. Lewis, and count of Anjou and Provence [z]. The propoſal was embraced; but Urban dying
c about the end of the year, was ſucceeded by Clement IV. who confirmed the choice of his predeceſſor, and preſſed Charles to come without delay, and take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. In conſequence of theſe ſollicitations, that prince put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, marched directly to Rome, and the pope, who was not then in that city, having impowered five cardinals to perform the ceremony of his coronation, he, with his wife Beatrice, was crowned and conſecrated, on condition of holding his kingdoms of the holy ſee, and of paying to it annually the ſum of ſixty thouſand ducats, as a mark of acknowlegement. He then put himſelf at the head of his army, being reinforced by the Guelphs, who flocked to him from all quarters; and after having gained ſeveral advantages, at laſt obtained a comd plete victory near Benevento, in which Mainfroy was ſlain, ſo that he found very little difficulty in making himſelf maſter of the Two Sicilies [a]. But, far from enjoying his good fortune with humanity, he let the wife and children of Mainfroy, together with ſeveral noblemen of that party, die in priſon, and allowed his army to commit enormous cruelties when the city of Benevento was taken.

Mean while Conradin, duke of Suabia, and ſon of the emperor Conrad, at that time no more than ſixteen years of age, who lived at the court of Lewis the Severe, duke of Bavaria, his own uncle by the mother's ſide, hearing the news of Mainfroy's death, aſſumed the title of king of the Two Sicilies, which belonged to him by right of inheritance; and being excited by the Gibelines, who were afraid that the Guelphs would grow too powerful by the ſupport of Charles of Anjou, he reſolved to hazard every thing for a crown, to which he had ſuch an e indiſputable claim. Accordingly he levied forces, with which he marched into Italy, defeated one of the lieutenants of Charles, and, fluſhed with this victory, began to flatter himſelf with the hopes of being proclaimed emperor, eſpecially when he had brought over to his party a German, named Honorius, his own relation, and a ſenator of Rome. With this expectation he marched towards that capital, and was received with great magnificence, as emperor, by Don Henry of Caſtile, governor of the city, who, having been expelled from his own country by his brother Alphonſo, the nominal emperor, had thrown himſelf into the arms of the pope, and was now become an enemy to Charles, becauſe he thwarted him in his deſigns upon the kingdom of Sardinia.

CHARLES, on Conradin's arrival in Italy, had repaired to France for a reinforcement, by f which he found himſelf at the head of a very powerful army when he returned to Italy, and encountering Conradin, who had by this time made himſelf maſter of Sicily, gave him battle near Alva, where he thought he could avail himſelf of an advantageous poſt which he had taken. He concealed ſome of his beſt troops behind a riſing ground, and after the battle had continued upwards of three hours with equal fury on both ſides, he ordered them to quit the place of ambuſh, and charge the forces of Conradin, who, being already fatigued, were utterly defeated. Conradin, his couſin Frederic of Auſtria, who had accompanied him in this expedition, and Henry of Caſtile, betook themſelves to flight, but were apprehended on the road, in the diſguiſe of grooms, and by Charles committed to cloſe priſon. Some g time after, reſolving to accompany his brother St. Lewis in his expedition to Africa, and being afraid to leave theſe priſoners behind in a kingdom full of faction and revolt, he ordered them to be tried by the syndics of all the cities of the realm; and these judges condemned Conradin and Frederic to death as perturbators of the repose of the church (M). They were accordingly beheaded on a scaffold in the middle of the city of Naples, to the eternal reproach of Charles, and the scandal of humanity; for Conradin had been guilty of nothing but endeavouring to retrieve his inheritance; and Frederic of Austria had assisted him out of pure friendship and generosity. Much about the same time Conrad, prince of Antioch, son of Frederic, who was a bastard of the emperor Frederic II. having come from the east to the assistance of Conradin, was taken by Charles, and hanged like a malefactor. Thus perished, by the hands of the common hangman, the last of that glorious race of Suabian princes, which had produced so many kings and emperors. By this execution also the family of Austria was extinct [b] (N).

Pope Clement IV. survived this barbarous homicide but one month; and his death was succeeded by a vacancy in the papal chair, that lasted two years and nine months before it was filled by Thibaut of Placentia, who assumed the name of Gregory X. As for the desolation of Germany, it continued till after the death of Richard of England, when the princes assembled, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Alphonso, and the intrigues of Ottocarus, king of Bohemia, raised the count of Hapsburg to the imperial throne.

(M) Pope Clement is said to have advised Charles to this barbarous step, by saying on his death-bed, Conradi vita, Caroli mors: Caroli vita, Conradi mors.

(N) Conradin, when he appeared upon the scaffold, pulled off one of his gloves, and threw it among the crowd, as a mark of investiture to his heir, whom he declared to be Frederic of Castile, the son of his aunt. The glove was taken up by a gentleman called Henry Trasches de Walpurg, who carried it to the king of Arragon. The duke of Austria's head being separated from his body, Conradin took it up, and kissed it with great tenderness, bewailing the unhappy fate of that prince, and upbraiding himself as the cause of his death. Then he, kneeling, submitted to the fatal stroke; and the executioner was afterwards put to death, that he might not live to boast of having shed such noble blood (1). This cruel execution was performed in the market-place of Naples, before the church of the Carmelites, in which Conradin lies interred (2).
